1. But little need be said as to the usual general grounds, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, etc. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff authorized the jury to find that an employé of the company in charge of the train and wearing its uniform (perhaps thinking that Mrs. Wright was not leaving the train as expeditiously as was necessary) seized her by the arm and jerked her from the second step of the passenger coach, whence she fell at full length upon the ground, and that after her fall he made no effort whatever to assist her to arise; that she was seriously hurt, and, as a result of her injuries, has suffered and will permanently suffer great physical pain from retroversion of the womb and serious internal complaints consequent thereupon. The plaintiff's evidence as to the cause of the injury was disputed; and evidence was also introduced to show that her present condition was perhaps due to other causes than the fall which she received. The issue of fact thus raised, however, was for the determination of the jury. It is insisted in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial that the verdict is excessive. As we have already decided in Murphey v. Meacham, 1 Ga. App. 155, 57 S. E. 1046, and in Merchants' & Miners' Trans. Co. v. Corcoran, 4 Ga. App. 654, 62 S. E. 130 (7), the verdict of a jury cannot be held to be excessive unless it be manifestly the result of prejudice or bias, or corrupt motive.

2. In the fourth ground of the motion for new trial it is insisted that a new trial should be granted because of the misconduct of the plaintiff's attorney while addressing the jury in saying: "There is Dr. McCurdy. He has the appearance of a dope fiend." It is insisted that this language was not authorized by anything in the testimony, that it was a gross violation of the rules of practice, and tended to prejudice the jury against the witness McCurdy and his testimony. Section 4419 of the Civil Code of 1895 declares: "Where counsel in the hearing of the jury make statements of prejudicial matters which are not in evidence, it is the duty of the court to interpose and prevent the same; and, on objection made, he shall also rebuke the same, and by all needful and proper instructions to the jury endeavor to remove the improper impression from their minds; or, in his discretion, he may order a mistrial if plaintiff's attorney is the offender." This court, while standing for the allowance of the utmost latitude to counsel in proper argument, stands also for the strict enforcement of the above-quoted section of the Code. But it must be borne in mind that, while the duty of the judge is prescribed in the first portion of this Code section, affirmative action on his part is invoked only "on objection made." If improper argument is being indulged, and no objection is made by the opposing party, it may be presumed that such argument is at least not considered hurtful. Indeed, we have seen many instances in which severe and unwarranted criticism of a party or a witness has reacted against the critic. In our view of the case, as no objection was made in the lower court, the exception to the alleged improper remark of counsel cannot be considered. Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 500, 16 S. E. 49. In that case (page 505 of 90 Ga., page 51 of 16 S. E.) it was ruled that "although it is the duty of the trial judge, whether so requested or not, to check improper remarks to the jury, and to seek, by proper instructions to the jury, to remove any prejudicial effect they may have as to the opposite party, a verdict will not be set aside because of such remarks or because of any omission of the judge to perform his duty in the matter, unless objection be made at the trial." Indeed, in the earlier case of Young v. State, 65 Ga. 525, it was held that, when counsel in argument travel outside of the case, the attention of the court should be called to it, and a ruling invoked to restrain him or the attention of the court directed thereto by way of request to charge, but it is too late to raise the point on motion for new trial. See, also, Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Powell, 89 Ga. 601, 16 S. E. 118; Edwards v. State, 90 Ga. 143, 15 S. E. 744; Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 99 Ga. 778, 27 S. E. 169; Bowens v. State, 106 Ga. 760, 32 S. E. 666; Smith v. State, 119 Ga. 113, 46 S. E. 79 (5); Odell v. State, 120 Ga. 152, 47 S. E. 577. We will remark in passing, however, that, as the jury have the right to consider the appearance of the witnesses and their manner of testifying, it cannot well be said that counsel in argument, if he desires, might not as a matter of right have commented upon the appearance of the witness, though, as a matter of judgment, it may sometimes be very inexpedient to do so. It is the right of counsel to discuss and criticize before the jury the manner of witnesses on the stand, and in most cases this would involve the appearance of the witness.

3. The fifth, sixth, eighth, and ninth grounds of the motion for new trial, which object to the exclusion of testimony, in that the court refused to permit certain questions to be asked, present nothing for our consideration. In each case objection is made to questions asked and not to evidence elicited by those questions; and the court was not informed what answer was expected so as to be able to pass upon its relevancy. In the fifth ground it appears that the defendant objected to a question asked of the plaintiff, but, inasmuch as it appears that the question was not answered, we are unable to say that an error was committed, or, if there was an error, that it was harmful to the defendant. In the sixth ground error is assigned because the court refused to allow the witness to answer a question propounded by the defendant's counsel, but the court was not informed what answer was anticipated, and consequently could not determine whether the question would elicit matter relevant to the issues. See Clay v. State, 4 Ga. App. 142, 60 S. E. 1028; Anderson v. Savannah Press Publishing Co., 100 Ga. 455, 28 S. E. 216. The same rule requiring the court to be informed of the probable answer of the witness, where a question is objected to, is applicable to the assignments of error in the eighth and ninth grounds of the motion. The eighth ground is as follows: "Because the court erred in the following ruling: While the witness McCurdy was on the stand, he testified as follows: 'The womb is not a delicate organization, and not easily injured as a rule.' The following question was then asked him, and the ruling of the court made as follows: 'Q. Isn't there, Doctor, a pretty considerable and respectable portion of your profession that believe the womb is just a bundle of muscles? Mr. McBride: I object to that. In the first place, it is a leading question; and, in the next place, what his profession think generally is not admissible. They can bring the profession in here and use them as witnesses, but what other people think cannot be given by this witness. The Court: Now, if you have any medical authority, you might prove it. I think you will have to bring in the proof. McCamy: I think the rule to be just the other way. The doctor can testify as to the opinion of physicians generally. I submit I have the right to ask this witness what a considerable portion of his profession believe about the womb. The Court: I think if there is medical authority, those medical works might be introduced. I rule the question out. You cannot go into that.' Movant insists that the testimony was relevant, and should have been admitted." As to the complaint made in the ninth ground, that the court would not allow the conductor to give his opinion as to the cause of the plaintiff's fall, we cannot determine whether the matter upon which the opinion of the conductor was sought (after having detailed the facts upon which he based that opinion) was admissible, or was inadmissible (as it would have been if the opinion was such a conclusion upon the facts as it was the sole province of the jury to make), for the same reason that prevented the lower court, either at the trial or upon the motion for new trial, from considering the insistence of plaintiff in error. It does not appear that at the time of the trial the court was informed as to the answer sought or expected from the witness; and for the reasons so clearly stated by Judge Atkinson in Anderson v. Savannah Press Pub. Co., 100 Ga. 455, 28 S. E. 216, we are not able to say whether the ruling complained of was or was not error. While a witness, after stating the facts, may give his opinion in some instances as to some facts which might induce a conclusion which the jury is impeded to reach, he cannot supply even a proper conclusion for the jury by the statement of a conclusion of his own. Milledgeville v. Wood, 114 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239 (2); Thomas v. State, 122 Ga. 151, 50 S. E. 64 (1); O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Harris, 127 Ga. 643, 56 S. E. 739 (5); Robinson v. State, 128 Ga. 254, 57 S. E. 315 (4).

4. Complaint is made in the seventh ground that the court erred in admitting, over the defendant's objection, the mortality tables in the appendix of the seventieth volume of Georgia Reports. The plaintiff in error insists that the effect of this error was to exaggerate the jurors' idea of the plaintiff's damages, and that the error assisted the plaintiff in convincing the jury that she was worse hurt than she actually was. The error assigned upon the admission of the mortality tables is that they were immaterial and irrelevant, and illustrated no issue in the case. If we were deciding the point as one of first impression, and could consider the assignment of error as sufficient, we would not hold it to be well taken. If one is entitled to recover for pain and suffering at all, and it is demonstrated by the evidence that the pain and suffering will continue as long as life lasts, it would seem that evidence as to probable duration of life would be admissible to enable the jury to measure, or at least approximate, the total pain and suffering. It is true that this is to be measured only by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury, but even a jury left for their admeasurements to no other tribunal than their own enlightened conscience, having arrived at a valuation of the pain endured for a year, if satisfied that the pain would continue through life, might desire to know the probable duration of that life. And, if this measure of computation addressed itself to their consciences, it would be nothing more than equitable to the defendant, either by the use of the annuity table or some similar means, to reduce the tentative finding to its present cash value. We are aware that the Supreme Court has decided in Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co. v. Moore, 99 Ga. 229, 25 S. E. 460, and in Atlanta, Knoxville R. Co. v. Gard- ner, 122 Ga. 83, 49 S. E. 818, that the mortality and annuity tables are not proper evidence, and that a charge thereon was inappropriate where there was no proof of value of services or earning capacity. But we are not called upon to decide whether or not the trial judge erred in the admission of the tables in the present case; for the reason that the ground of the motion fails to show the contents of the tables. W. & A. R. Co. v. Hyer, 113 Ga. 776, 39 S. E. 447. It has frequently been decided that the ground of a motion for new trial, complaining of the admission or rejection of evidence, should be complete in itself or in connection with exhibits attached to the motion, so as not to require reference to other portions of the record to render it intelligible; and, though the dissenting opinion of the minority of the court in the Hyer Case, supra, accords with our individual judgments, and it would seem that reference to tables contained in the volumes of our own reports might be the subject-matter of our judicial knowledge, still the exact point was presented in W. & A. R. Co. v. Hyer, supra, and decided to the contrary of our individual views. In that case it was held that "a mere statement in a brief of evidence that the plaintiff 'introduced in evidence the mortality and annuity tables in the seventieth Georgia Report' does not authorize this court to take judicial cognizance of the contents of the tables published by the official reporter as an appendix of that volume." This being true, the seventh ground is insufficient to present to our consideration the complaint that the court erred in the admission of tables which are not set out in the motion. As remarked above, however, if we were not bound by the ruling in the Hyer Case, the effect of our ruling upon the plaintiff in error would be the same, for we would hold that there was no error in admitting the tables upon the authority of the decision in Powell v. Augusta & Summerville R. Co., 77 Ga. 192, 3 S. E. 757 (10), in which it was held that, "where there is evidence tending to show that the state of impaired health and diminished ability to labor, attributable to the injury, may endure through life, the mortality tables are admissible in evidence to aid the jury in dealing with the element of time involved in their computation of the damages." An inspection of the original petition as contained in the record in the Supreme Court in that case shows that the damages were sought, just as in the present case, as compensation for pain and suffering alone. The same objection to the mortality tables was urged as is now before us. In passing upon this phase of the case, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "There was such evidence in this case, and the tables were, therefore, relevant. One who is to live long in pain is more damaged than one who has to endure suffering but for a brief time. Test this by applying it to two cases and contrasting them, the first in which pain is to last only for a day, and the second for 20 years. It may be thought that the loss of ability to labor is not pain, but this is a mistake. There is no greater blessing of life than ability to labor, even though the proceeds may belong to another. It is better for happiness, as well as for virtue, to work for nothing than to be idle. A physical injury that destroys the power of a human being to labor is one of the most serious injuries which it is possible to inflict. True, it is not to be measured by pecuniary earnings where the suit is by a married woman, for such earnings as a general rule belong to the husband, and the right of action for their loss is in him, but the wife herself has such an interest in her working capacity as that she can recover something for its destruction, and what she is to be allowed ought to be more or less according to the length of time during which her privation is likely to continue. Such privation may well be classed with pain and suffering, especially where it involves the breaking up of established habits. To man or woman accustomed to work enforced idleness is torture." Under the well-recognized rule that the older of two decisions must control, it would seem to us that if there be conflict between what is ruled in the Powell Case, supra, and the Moore Case and the Gardner Case, supra, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, the latter decisions must yield to the prior adjudication.

5. In the tenth ground of the motion for new trial complaint is made that the court erred in submitting to the jury an allegation of negligence contained in the petition, to wit, that the stool was improperly placed at the steps of the coach, when there was no evidence authorizing the submission of this issue. We do not think that the court was guilty of any error in this respect. The tenth ground is as follows: "Because the court erred in the following charge to the jury: 'Plaintiff alleges that, when the train reached Anniston and stopped at the depot, the agent of the company placed the stool under the steps of the train for her to alight, or for the passengers to alight, and that, in placing it, they placed it on unlevel ground, and that, when she stepped upon the stool, it turned and threw her to the ground violently, and injured her. (Interposed by plaintiff's counsel: "I was intending to state to the court that we did not rely upon that ground.") The Court: I was stating the pleadings. The other ground of negligence, gentlemen, is: She alleges further that when she was attempting to alight, and was on the second step from the ground, the agent or employe of the company took her by the arm and pushed or pulled her off the steps and violently onto the ground, and that her knee, hip, face, and head were injured, and that her womb was injured or displaced, disarranged. Now, that briefly states the issues, gentlemen. I do not undertake to give all the words of the petition or plea, but to briefly state the contention of the parties.' Movant says that this charge was error, because it submitted to the jury an issue which was not supported by the evidence, to wit, plaintiff's contention that the stool upon which she alighted was negligently and improperly placed upon the ground, and that this fact assisted in bringing about her injury." It is apparent that the court did nothing more in the excerpt complained of than to state the contents of the pleadings. It is always proper for the trial judge to summarize the contentions of the parties as made by the pleadings, and not less important that he should do this if there has been an abandonment of any of the contentions of either party, or a failure to establish a contention on the part of either. This for the reason that if he first calls the attention of the jury to the original contentions between the parties, and then states that any special position or contention has been abandoned or withdrawn, and therefore should be disregarded, the jury are assisted by having their attention more especially directed to the remaining issues by the process of subtraction, and their vision of the contested issues is clarified by this elimination of issues which have been abandoned or which there has been a failure to prove. In this case the court was proceeding to summarize the allegations of the petition, and the interruption by the plaintiff's counsel, and his statement that the plaintiff abandoned the allegation that she was injured by the improper placing of the stool was an incident which withdrew from the consideration of the jury that allegation of negligence even more forcibly than perhaps the judge could, as he doubtless would, have done later in his charge. That the statement of the abandoned ground of recovery was intended merely as a rehearsal of the pleadings which the jury would have with them in the jury room, and that it was no doubt the intention of the judge later in the charge to narrow the issue to the allegation which was supported by testimony, is evidenced by the judge's language in proceeding after the interruption, when he said, "I was stating the pleadings." The entire charge of the court was not sent up, but it is evident, from the excerpt quoted above, that the jury could not have been misled or the plaintiff in error prejudiced by the circumstance of which complaint is made.

6. Complaint is made in the eleventh ground that the court charged the jury that, "under the law, the railroad company is held to exercise extraordinary diligence in receiving and transporting passengers and in seeing that they are safely alighted from the train. That degree of diligence is upon them until the passenger has safely alighted from the train—extraordinary diligence." And, further, that the court erred in charging upon the same subject: "Now, the question is: Did the railroad company exercise this degree of care and diligence in seeing that this passenger was properly and safely deposited upon the ground at her destination?" It is insisted that by this charge the court held the defendant to the duty of actually assisting the plaintiff to alight from the train, and that, under the circumstances of the case, the defendant did not owe the plaintiff that duty. It is urged that the court's expression that the defendant was required to use extraordinary care in seeing that passengers "are safely alighted from the train" and "safely deposited upon the ground" necessarily includes the idea of actual assistance, and stated too strongly the duty of the defendant carrier to the passenger. In support of this contention, the plaintiff in error's counsel relied upon the decisions in Daniels v. W. & A. R. Co., 96 Ga. 786, 22 S. E. 956, and Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Earwood, 104 Ga. 127, 29 S. E. 918. We do not think that the ruling in either of these cases is in conflict with the charge of the trial judge in this case. It is not decided in the Daniels Case that there are not occasions when it might be the duty of a railroad company to render passengers physical personal assistance in alighting from trains. It was merely held that the circumstances in that case were not such as to call for personal assistance in the exercise of extraordinary diligence. In the Earwood Case it was held that if a railroad company has provided suitable and safe means for entering and alighting from its trains, and has stopped its train in proper position to enable passengers to avail themselves of this means, it is not bound to render them personal assistance. It was further held that "the contract of the carrier is that he will carry the passenger safely and in a proper carriage, and afford him convenient and safe means for entering and alighting from the vehicle in which he carries him, but he does not contract to render him personal attention beyond that." In the Earwood Case the damages were attributable to a breach of an alleged contract of the defendant's to assist an aged and infirm passenger to alight from the train; and the court very properly held under the facts of that case that neither was the defendant informed of the passenger's condition nor was the contract alleged the contract made, even if the promise as made by the conductor was binding upon the company; and the judgment was reversed for the error of the court in charging, in effect, that the promise of the conductor was binding on the company.

As to the charge in the present case, we think in the first place that the instruction is not subject to the criticism urged against it, to wit, that he instructed the jury that the defendant was under the duty of assisting this plaintiff to alight from the train. Whether it is the duty of a carrier to assist a passenger from the train in the exercise of that extraordinary diligence which it is its duty to exercise towards every passenger must depend upon the particular facts of the special case under investigation. A railroad company is ever bound to use extraordinary care and diligence for the safety and comfort of its passengers. In most instances this would not include assistance in entering or alighting from a train. But the duty of exercising extraordinary care does not terminate until the relation of carrier and passenger ceases; and the relation does not cease until the passenger has at least been discharged. A passenger in alighting from a train, if his destination has been reached and the proper time for leaving the train has arrived, is still as much a passenger as when seated in the coach. Whatever is necessary to be done for the safety of the passenger in the exercise of extraordinary care for his safety must be done as much while the passenger is alighting as while he is pursuing his journey. If a helpless passenger or an intoxicated passenger is attempting to alight, and, by reason of his helplessness or his intoxication, his safety is endangered, it might be the duty of the company, in the exercise of extraordinary diligence toward its passenger, to assist such passenger to alight. Whether such a duty would arise would depend upon whether the circumstances were such as that extraordinary diligence would require that the passenger be assisted. It may be stated as a rule that, while it is not necessarily the duty of a carrier to assist its passengers to alight from a train, circumstances might arise within the knowledge of the carrier which would require assistance in alighting to be extended in the exercise of extraordinary care. And whether such circumstances exist as require active assistance is a question to be determined by the jury in determining whether extraordinary diligence was used. If the charge of the court in this case could be construed as announcing that the carrier was under a fixed duty to assist its passengers to alight in all cases, it would undoubtedly be erroneous under the principles announced in the Earwood Case, supra, but plainly the language actually employed could not have conveyed any meaning to the jury other than that the duty of extraordinary diligence for the safety of a passenger continues until the passenger has safely alighted upon the ground. And this is sound law. No harm could have resulted from the instruction; because the plaintiff's recovery, if she is entitled to recover at all, depends upon the fact that she alleges, not that the defendant company failed to assist her to alight, but on the contrary, that the employé of the defendant actually jerked her violently down off the steps when she was attempting to alight. Under her testimony, if the jury believed it, she would have been entitled to a recovery against the defendant whether it was the duty of the defendant's agents to assist her to alight or not. When the charge criticised is analyzed, it simply amounts to a statement that the defendant was bound to use extraordinary, and not ordinary, diligence; and, for this reason, the second criticism, in which it is insisted that the duty of the carrier to passengers in alighting is only ordinary diligence, is without merit. See W. & A. R. Co. v. Voils, 98 Ga. 453, 26 S. E. 483, 35 L. R. A. 655, and Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co. v. Moore, 108 Ga. 84, 33 S. E. 889 (1).

7. In the absence of a timely request, it is not necessarily reversible error for the trial court to omit to charge upon the burden of proof. In a case where complaint is made that no instructions are given as to the burden of proof, the general rule that he who assigns error must show not only error, but that the error was hurtful to him, should be applied. In the present instance, under the evidence adduced, and in the absence of a request, and bearing in mind that when the plaintiff showed her injury the presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company was raised, the plaintiff in error should have shown, by the assignment of error, in what respect it was injured by the omission. See Augusta Southern R. R. Co. v. McDade, 105 Ga. 137, 31 S. E. 420.

8. Complaint is made that the judge erred in charging the jury as follows: "You will determine from the evidence whether or not the injuries are permanent, or whether they are temporary injuries. That you will arrive at from the proof in the case. If you find the issue for the plaintiff, and you find the injuries are permanent, there is no rule of law given by which you would estimate damages in a case of this kind. The damages sought to be recovered are for pain and suffering. She alleges that she suffered great pain from the injuries received, and that she will continue to suffer great pain, and that is what she seeks to recover damages for; and, under the law, there is no rule laid down save the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors seeking for the truth. Under all the evidence in the case, you consider what ought to be paid. Now, after you go that far with the case, you determine whether the injuries are permanent, or whether they are temporary injuries." The instruction complained of in this ground of the motion evidently referred only to the character of plaintiff's injuries as to their permanence, or their temporary character, and falls within the rule stated by Chief Justice Bleckley in the Powell Case, supra. If the plaintiff's injuries were permanent, she was, of course, entitled to recover more than if her suffering was temporary and ephemeral. If, after determining that the plaintiff had been injured by the fault of the defendant, the jury were satisfied that she was entitled to a recovery of some amount, the next question which would naturally arise would be: What was a proper amount? This would bring up the question as to whether the injuries were permanent or temporary, and evidently there can be no recovery for permanent pain and suffering growing out of physical injury unless the evidence shows that the injury itself is permanent. For this reason we are of the opinion that the instruction complained of was not confusing. It would perhaps have been well to instruct the jury that the question of permanent injury in the case at bar was introduced solely for the purpose of illustrating whether the pain and suffering was likely to continue permanently. As the entire charge was not sent up in the record, we, of course, do not know what language anteceded or followed the instruction of which complaint is made; but there is nothing in this instruction, when it is boiled down, except that it is the duty of the jury to determine whether the injuries are permanent or temporary, and this inquiry is pertinent where the contention is made that the suffering will be permanent. In other words, the instruction of the judge amounted to the statement: "No injury, no suffering; temporary injuries, temporary suffering; permanent injuries, permanent suffering." The instruction of the learned trial judge that, if the injuries are permanent, there is no rule of law given by which you may estimate the damages in a case of this kind, save the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, etc., evidences that the idea of diminished capacity to earn money was intended to be excluded from the consideration of the jury, and must have been so understood by it.

We conclude that the verdict was authorized both by the law and the evidence, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

VEASEY v. STATE. (No. 1,757.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 919*)—NEW TRIAL—REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

The remarks of the solicitor were entirely legitimate under the evidence, and, even if objectionable, would not be a ground for a new trial, unless they were objected to at the time and some appropriate action of the court then invoked. Civ. Code 1895, § 4419; Odell v. State, 120 Ga. 152, 47 S. E. 577; Southern Ry. Co. v. Wright (this day decided) 64 S. E. 703.

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

No error of law appears, and there is some evidence, although weak and unsatisfactory, to support the verdict, which was approved by the trial judge.

Error from City Court of Newnan; A. D. Freeman, Judge.

Fletcher Veasey was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Newman, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Stallings, Sol., and W. C. Wright, for the State.

LIVINGSTON v. STATE. (No. 1,803.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§§ 111, 191, 202*)—OFFENSE INCLUDED IN CHARGE.

The statutory offense of pointing a weapon at another may be included within the offense of assault with intent to murder, where the assault is charged to have been committed by pointing and aiming a gun or pistol at another. It is not necessary to negative explicitly the exceptions provided in a penal statute, by the operation of which a defendant may be justified or excused in the commission of an act otherwise unlawful, when the existence of the statutory exceptions is necessarily impliedly negated by the language employed in making the charge. Judgment may be pronounced upon a verdict finding one guilty of pointing a weapon at another, although the pointing is not expressly charged to have been intentional, if the language used in the accusation is such as to raise no other implication than that the pointing and aiming was intentional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 295-298, 604-621, 645; Dec. Dig. §§ 111, 191, 202.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

G. W. Livingston was convicted of unlawfully pointing a pistol at another, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. W. Bennett, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Thomas, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted for assault with intent to murder, and was convicted of unlawfully pointing and aiming a pistol at another. He moved in arrest of the judgment, upon the ground that the indictment does not contain sufficient allegations, not sufficiently specific allegations, to be the basis of the verdict of the jury, and especially that the indictment did not contain an allegation that the pistol was "intentionally" pointed at another, not in any sham battle by the military, and not in self-defense, nor in defense of habitation, property, or person. The motion in arrest of judgment was overruled. The indictment charges Livingston with the offense of assault with intent to murder, "for that the said * * * Livingston * * * unlawfully, feloniously, with malice aforethought, and with a certain pistol, * * * did make an assault, with the intent the said A. S. Cody to kill and murder, and the said * * * Livingston, with said weapon, which he then and there held, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, point, aim at, and attempt to shoot and kill him, the said A. S. Cody, with the intent aforesaid, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." The verdict was: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of a misdemeanor, pointing a pistol at another, not in his own defense."

That the offense of pointing a pistol at another may be so included within the offense of assault with intent to murder that one who is indicted for assault with intent to murder may be convicted of the lesser offense of pointing a pistol at another has been decided by the Supreme Court in Jenkins v. State, 92 Ga. 470, 17 S. E. 693 (1), upon the authority of the prior rulings in Arnold v. State, 51 Ga. 144, and Isom v. State, 83 Ga. 378, 9 S. E. 1051. It is true that in the Isom Case, supra, as pointed out in Lanier v. State, 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 536, the verdict was for stabbing, upon an indictment charging assault with intent to murder, and to that extent the nature of the case differs from the one now before us. The principle, however, is the same. It is not necessary to negative explicitly the exceptions provided in a penal statute, by the operation of which a defendant may be justified or excused in the commission of an act otherwise unlawful, when the existence of the statutory exceptions is necessarily impliedly negated by the language employed in making the charge. In the Lanier Case we held that if it was admitted that the stabbing was done unlawfully and "contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof," these statements alone (if the explicit negating of the exceptions was not insisted upon by demurrer) were sufficient to show that the cutting was not done in self-defense, nor under any circumstances of justification provided by the Code. In Jenkins v. State, supra, where the indictment was for assault with intent to murder by pointing, aiming, directing, shooting off, and discharging a loaded pistol at another, it was held that a verdict of guilty of shooting at another would be sufficient, even without superadding the words "not in his own defense."

The learned counsel for the plaintiff in error insists, however, that the verdict is insufficient to authorize a judgment thereon, for the reason that the indictment does not charge that the pistol was "intentionally" pointed. We agree with the counsel that the fact that the pointing is intentional constitutes the gravamen of the offense of pointing a pistol or gun at another, and that it is essential that it should be charged and proved that the pointing alleged was intentional. Section 343 of the Penal Code of 1895 declares that "any person who shall intentionally point or aim a gun or pistol, whether loaded or unloaded, at another, not in a sham battle by the military, and not in self-defense, or in defense of habitation, property or person, or other instances standing upon like footing of reason and justice, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The ruling in the Jenkins Case, supra, rules as to the exceptions provided in the statute; and the rulings in Isom v. State, supra, and Lanier v. State, supra, control as far as the point made upon the omission from the indictment of the word "intentionally" is concerned. It being alleged in the indictment that the pistol was unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought pointed at Cody, in an attempt to kill him, the only necessary implication which can be raised is that the pointing was intentional. The pointing could not have been an unintentional pointing, if it were either unlawful or felonious; and if done with malice aforethought, as the indictment charges, the pointing was obliged to have been found by the jury to have been done, not only intentionally, but perhaps with deliberate intention.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

SUNDAY (§§ 3, 29*)—SHOOTING ON SUNDAY—"WILLFUL AND WANTON FIRING OF WEAPON."

A mad dog is a public enemy; and to shoot at a mad dog is not the "willful and wanton firing of a weapon," within the terms of the act of 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 107), which forbids the shooting of firearms on Sunday. It is the duty of the court, upon the trial of one charged with a violation of this statute, to instruct the jury as to the meaning of the words "willful and wanton," as used in the statute; and it is error to restrict the defense of the accused to cases of actual self-defense or defense of property. It is for the jury to determine whether shooting at a mad dog on Sunday is a willful and wanton shooting, within the meaning of the statute, although they might believe that the dog was fleeing at the time he was shot at, and that neither the defendant's person nor his property was in danger.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 10, 112*)—ILLEGAL SALE—CITY ORDINANCES.

A municipality may under its ordinances punish the offense of keeping intoxicating liquors on hand for the purpose of illegal sale, and it makes no difference in a particular case that the keeping of the liquor for this purpose was at a place of business or other public place. The municipal offense is distinct and separate from the state crimes which may have been incidentally committed in connection with it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-12, 122; Dec. Dig. §§ 10, 112.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Speros Athens was convicted of an illegal sale of intoxicating liquor, and brings error. Affirmed.

Rosser & Brandon and Moore & Branch, for plaintiff in error. W. P. Hill and J. L. Mayson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff in error, Athens, was convicted in the police court of Atlanta for the violation of section 1537 of the City Code, which is as follows: "Any person, firm or corporation, who shall keep for unlawful sale in any store, house, room, office, cellar, stand, booth, stall, or other place, or shall have contained for unlawful sale in any barrel, keg, can, demijohn or other package, any spirituous, fermented, or malt liquors for such sale, shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, either or both, in the discretion of the court." The proof showed that the defendant had some whisky at his restaurant in Atlanta and sold some of it. He applied for the writ of certiorari, the judge of the superior court refused it, and he excepts.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error, in their argument seem to concede that the ordinance is, so to speak, abstractly valid, under the authority of Callaway v. Mims, 5 Ga. App. 9, 62 S. E. 654, and the cases there cited; but they contend that it is unenforceable as applied to the facts of the present case. They insist that, since the state law makes it a misdemeanor for any person to have intoxicating liquor on hand at his place of business or at other public places, the ordinance cannot be applied to a case where the defendant's act of keeping the liquor for unlawful sale was at his place of business or other public place, because this would allow the city to punish for the identical transaction cognizable by the state courts under the law just mentioned. They analogize the case to that of Kassell v. Mayor of Savannah, 109 Ga. 491, 35 S. E. 147, and to that of Pennington v. City of Newman, 117 Ga. 701, 45 S. E. 65.

In the Kassell Case the court said: "We do not mean to say that the second section of the city ordinance in question should be treated as absolutely a void enactment. That portion of the ordinance simply provided generally against the sale of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors of any character on Sunday. If a person who committed such an act was not one whose business or ordinary calling involved the work of retailing spirituous or intoxicating liquors, the principle herein decided would not apply to his case. In the present case, however, it appears from the record that, if the accused was guilty of any offense at all, it consisted in pursuing her business, or the work of her ordinary calling, on the Lord's Day, within the meaning of the penal law of the state on that subject." In the Pennington Case the ordinance prohibited the carrying on of trade or traffic on the Sabbath. The Supreme Court held that the ordinance could not be applied to one whose only offense against it was the carrying on of his ordinary trade, as that was an offense against the criminal laws of the state.

We fully recognize the soundness of the principle of these and similar cases; and, if the ordinance now before us prohibited merely the keeping on hand of intoxicating liquor generally, these cases would be clearly in point, and we would have no hesitancy in holding that such an ordinance would have no validity, as applied to a case where the defendant kept the liquors on hand only at a place of business or other public place. The fact that the defendant kept the liquors at his place of business created no offense under the ordinance. The fact that the place where the liquors were kept was a place of business was in no wise essential to the investigation under the ordinance. Only the fact that they were kept, and that the intent or purpose of the keeping was an unlawful sale of them, entered into the gist of the transaction cognizable in the police court.

The purpose of the keeping is without importance as applied to the state offense, and is altogether important as applied to the city offense. To have kept the liquors at the restaurant to drink himself, or give way, or to induce trade, or to manufacture into other beverages, would have been a violation of the state law, but not of the municipal law. The city offense never came into existence until the defendant formed the intent and purpose of making an unlawful sale. The fact that he had already violated the state law by bringing the liquors to his place of business, and that he was continuing to violate it by keeping them there, did not put him in a position where he could not aggravate the transaction by adding to it an additional element, not included in the state offense, thereby converting it into a municipal offense.

This brings us to the contention of the plaintiff in error that, if the intention or purpose of the actor in the transaction is to be considered as such an element of the municipal offense as to distinguish it from the crime under the state law, then to allow the municipality to hold jurisdiction to punish because of this distinction alone would be to permit punishment for a mere state of mind. The argument is not valid. Intention, state of mind alone, is oftentimes the essential element in distinguishing the lawful from the unlawful, and in differing one offense from another. To take property from the lands of another without an animus furandi is trespass; with the intent to steal, it is larceny. The specific intent to kill differentiates assault and battery from an assault with intent to murder. An intention to defraud distinguishes the criminal sale of mortgaged property from the innocent. A reasonable fear of an apparent, though not actual, danger to one's life, a mere state of the slayer's mind, converts the killing from murder to justifiable homicide. To have intoxicating liquors at one's place of business to drink or to give away is unlawful, but it lacks that aggravation which characterizes the keeping of it for the purpose of unlawful sale, just as to commit assault and battery in a private place is unlawful, but lacks the element of aggravation which converts it into a municipal offense if it be committed in a public street.

Suppose the city ordinance were a state law; would a conviction of the offense created therein bar a prosecution under the statute upon territory of which the ordinance is said to trespass, or vice versa? Or, to state it more concretely, suppose that prior to the adoption of the general prohibition law there had been enacted a special law for Fulton county, making it criminal for any person to have on hand intoxicating liquor for the purpose of unlawful sale, and the defendant had been indicted and had been convicted in the state court for that offense upon proof that since the date of the enactment of the general prohibition law he had kept the liquor on hand at his restaurant for the purpose of unlawful sale; would this conviction bar another prosecution under the prohibition law for keeping it on hand at his place of business? We think it would not. The two transactions would be legally distinct. Veasy v. State, 4 Ga. App. 845, 62 S. E. 561, and cases cited.

The municipal offense in this case is sandwiched (if I may use this word to express the idea) between two state offenses, the essential elements of one of which (the keeping of the liquor and the fact that the place where it was kept was a place of business) furnish one of the elements of the city offense and an incidental detail connected with the transaction physically considered; and the commission of the other, the actual sale, supplies the proof as to the other essential element, namely, that the keeping was for the purpose of unlawful sale. But does this extinguish the independence and separate identity of the municipal offense, or merge the transaction wholly into the state crimes?

Let us see if we cannot suppose a transaction in which the separate state offenses may be similarly involved without any one of them being merged into one or both of the others. A person at a church, having a pistol concealed in his pocket, shoots at another from the pocket through the lining, and without revealing the existence of the pistol otherwise. He may on this state of facts be separately tried and convicted for the three offenses, carrying a pistol to a church, carrying a pistol concealed, and shooting at another. See Veasy v. State, supra. To this transaction the crime of carrying the pistol concealed stands almost identically in the same relation as does the municipal offense of having had the liquor on hand for the purpose of unlawful sale stand to the two state crimes involved in the facts of the case now before us. In the supposed case the elements of the crime of carrying the pistol to the church (the carrying and the fact that the place was a church) furnished one of the elements of the concealed weapon case (the carrying) and an incidental detail connected with that transaction physically considered; and the commission of the other offense, the fact of the shooting, supplies the only proof of the fact that the defendant had a pistol concealed, for it was stated in the supposed facts that the existence of the pistol in the defendant's pocket was not otherwise revealed.

We went into all this question fully in the case of Callaway v. Mims, supra. In that case we discussed the whole question at length, and indulged in an extensive citation of authorities. That case, at least to the extent of the line of reasoning there presented, controls this one. We see no reason to change the views we there expressed. We would not again have dealt so lengthily with the question, if it were not for the ability and strenuousness with which we are urged by counsel to limit that case, and to distinguish the present transaction upon its particular facts.

We have had several of these cases involving the right of municipalities to punish under ordinances like the one before us; and in almost every case it is argued that it is a dangerous policy to permit police courts, in which no jury trial is obtainable, to impose such severe penalties as most of the city charters allow for the violation of these ordinances on a subject as to which the municipalities hold jurisdiction by so small a margin and by so slight a shade of distinction. There may be force in this argument. Personally, some of the judges of this court think so. If so, it addresses itself to the General Assembly, and not to the court. However, there is one obvious way by which these complaining offenders may escape all this hardship—by respecting and obeying the law.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—ILLEGAL SALE.

Mike Lyons was convicted of keeping liquor on hand with intent to sell unlawfully, and brings error. Affirmed.

Lamar Hill and Burton Cloud, for plaintiff in error. W. P. Hill and J. L. Mayson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mike Lyons had an upstairs bedroom on Broad street, in the city of Atlanta; and he was accused and convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta for keeping intoxicating liquor on hand in that room for the purpose of unlawful sale. A witness swore that he met Lyons in a poolroom, and, hearing some one else ask him what sort of whisky he had, he also asked him if he could get some whisky from him. Lyons took him to this room, and sold him rye whisky. The witness lay down on a bed in the room, and while he was there several other persons came in and bought liquor from Lyons. The police raided the place, and found a large quantity of whisky under the bed, in a trunk, in bureau drawers, etc. After having been convicted in the recorder's court, Lyons took the case by certiorari to the superior court. Upon the hearing there, the judge overruled the certiorari, and he excepts.

The plaintiff in error presents the point that by converting his bedroom into a blind tiger, and by allowing a large number of persons to come there indiscriminately and get liquor, he made it a place of business and a public place, and that the only offenses committed by him were violations of the state law. The facts in the record present no such point. It is true that in the case of Bashinski v. State, 5 Ga. App. 3. 62 S. E. 577, this court held: "If a person should make a common practice of selling liquor illegally at a fixed place, that place would thereby become his place of business; but a single sale of liquor, or even sporadic sales, will not ipso facto convert the place where the sale occurs into the seller's 'place of business,' in accordance with the meaning of that phrase as found in the prohibition act of 1907." We also held, in Tooke v. State, 4 Ga. App. 497, 61 S. E. 917 (4c), that a person might convert even his private residence into a public place, by allowing the public to come there indiscriminately to buy or drink liquor. Therefore it may be true by these tests, that Lyons had succeeded in converting his bedroom into either a public place or a place of business.

But if we concede all this, and should further concede that the municipal offense of keeping liquor on hand for illegal sale cannot be committed in a place of business or a public place (and we in no wise concede this; see Callaway v. Mims, 5 Ga. App. —, 62 S. E. 654; Athens v. Atlanta, 64 S. E. 711, this day decided) yet the concession would not help the defendant's case, even though he converted the private place into a public place or place of business, by bringing liquor there to sell and thereby attracting a crowd to whom he sold it; for his crime was complete when he brought the liquor into the private place for unlawful sale, and his subsequent continuation and augmentation of the nuisance, and his consequent conversion of the private place into a public place, so that he also violated the state law, did not wipe out his already complete guilt under the municipal law. "An offense committed against one jurisdiction cannot be wiped out by committing another against another jurisdiction." Per Bleckley, C. J., in Menken v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 672, 2 S. E. 561.

TRESPASS (§§ 19, 20*)—TITLE WITHOUT ACTUAL POSSESSION—COMMON GRANTOR.

Where, in an action of trespass, it appears that a named grantor had conveyed a portion of the standing timber to the defendants, and had subsequently conveyed the land and the remainder of the timber to the plaintiff and that the defendants had cut some of the trees not included in their timber conveyance, and it further appears that there had been no actual possession of the land, the plaintiff, in order to recover for the cutting of the timber not deeded to the defendant, must, under section 3877 of the Civil Code of 1895, show legal title to the land or to the timber involved in the suit. While the plaintiff in trespass may generally make a prima facie case against the defendant by showing that he and the defendant claim under a common grantor, yet this principle is not applicable to the state of facts set out above. The grant of a portion of the timber conveys a distinct estate, separate and apart from the estate conveyed by the grant of the land and the remainder of the timber; and the doctrine of estoppel by reason of claiming under a common grantor applies only when both parties to the action claim title to the same property.

Error from City Court of Douglas; C. T. Roan, Judge.

Action by J. A. Gaskins against the Gray Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Defendant assigns cross-error. Affirmed on the main bill, and cross-bill dismissed without prejudice.

J. A. Gaskins brought suit against the Gray Lumber Company for trespass, and the trial resulted in the court's awarding the nonsuit, to which exception is taken. The substance of the plaintiff's claim was that Fisher H. Gaskins had conveyed to Timmons, McWhite & Co. all of the timber suitable for turpentine and sawmill purposes growing on certain lots of land in Berrien county, that Timmons, McWhite & Co. had in turn conveyed this same timber to the Gray Lumber Company, and that subsequently to making the timber deed just mentioned Fisher H. Gaskins had conveyed to the plaintiff the land upon which the timber stood, thereby conveying to him such timber as was not included in the other conveyance; but, as we gather from the record, the plaintiff does not contend that this conveyance transferred to him any rights in such of the timber as was included in the defendant's timber deed. The plaintiff's contention is that the defendant cut from the lands, after they were deeded to him, certain timber standing thereon not included within the terms of its deed, because it was not suitable for sawmill and turpentine purposes. One branch of this controversy went to the Supreme Court, and in that case the deed under which the defendants claimed the timber was construed. See Gray Lumber Co. v. Gaskins, 122 Ga. 342, 50 S. E. 164. In the present action the plaintiff notified the defendant to produce all the deeds, leases, and other muniments of title by which it claimed the right to cut any of the timber mentioned in the petition, and the defendant produced only the timber deed mentioned above; and this was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff. The plaintiff also introduced warranty deeds from Fisher H. Gaskins to the plaintiff, dated subsequently to the timber deed and conveying the lands upon which the timber was located. It is unnecessary to recite the other evidence in the case, as the foregoing is all of it that relates to the plaintiff's right to recover, so far as his title is concerned. There was no possession of the land, and the plaintiff was required to prove title, in order to recover.

Hendricks & Christian and W. H. Griffin, for plaintiff in error. Lankford & Dickerson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). By reason of section 3877 of the Civil Code of 1895, the common-law rule that, if the owner of land was out of possession, he could not recover in trespass, has been changed to the extent that the true owner (that is, the person holding the legal title) may maintain an action of trespass, though he was not in possession at the time the wrong was committed; but, to bring himself within the statute, the burden is upon him to show that he is the true owner, and this he can do only by showing title. Yahoola Mining Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 482; Whiddon v. Williams Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 701, 25 S. E. 770; Moore v. Vickers, 126 Ga. 42, 54 S. E. 814. In the opinion in the case of Moore v. Vickers, supra, there is the hint as to a lurking doubt as to whether the plaintiff could show such a title as would support an action of trespass by proving that he and the defendant claimed under a common grantor. However, in the case of Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Wall, 126 Ga. 172, 54 S. E. 944, decided at the same term of the court, the proposition was definitely stated and announced that, if it be shown that the defendant in the trespass action claims title from the same common grantor as the plaintiff and from no other source, prima facie the plaintiff may recover if his title as derived from the common propositus is the superior; in other words, the admission implied against the defendant by reason of his having taken a conveyance of the property from the plaintiff's grantor is sufficient to cast on the defendant the burden of showing that the title was not in the common grantor at the time he took his conveyance. The estoppel does not seem to be so complete in the case of trespass as in the action of ejectment, where the application of the general doctrine is more familiar.

The question that confronts us, then, is whether, under the facts of the present case, the plaintiff and the defendant so hold under a common grantor as to make a prima facie case in behalf of the plaintiff. It will be remembered, from the statement of facts given above, that the defendant claims no title to the land and holds no conveyance to the land itself, but claims and shows a conveyance only to the timber, which, however, is realty, and is a thing that may be conveyed and dealt with as realty separate and apart from the land itself. Balkcom v. Empire Lumber Co., 91 Ga. 651, 17 S. E. 1020, 44 Am. St. Rep. 58; Moore v. Vickers, supra; Red Cypress Lumber Co. v. Beall, 5 Ga. App. 202, 62 S. E. 1056; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Davis, 5 Ga. App. 214, 62 S. E. 1023. The plaintiff, on the other hand, claims no interest in so much of the timber as is included in the conveyance under which the defendant holds. As to the timber which the plaintiff says the defendant cut and damaged, the latter either has no title at all or else its title is derived from some source independently of the plaintiff's grantor; and since it produced at the trial no conveyance covering the timber in dispute it will be presumed that it had none. Under these circumstances we do not think the rule as to estoppel by reason of claiming under a common grantor is applicable. There is no contest whatever between this timber deed and the plaintiff's land deed. Neither claims superiority over the other as a conveyance of title from Fisher H. Gaskins, the alleged common grantor. The plaintiff admits the validity of the timber deed and the defendant admits the validity of the plaintiff's land deed, so far as the regularity of the conveyance is concerned. If the plaintiff claimed any of the timber included within the defendant's conveyance, then the rule would be applicable; but he makes no such claim. The defendant would, if the question arose, be estopped primarily from denying that Fisher H. Gaskins owned the timber which he conveyed it; but Fisher H. Gaskins might have owned the timber which he conveyed the defendant, and not have owned the land on which the timber stood. Since the land and the timber or the land and certain portions of the timber, may be separately owned, it is a non sequitur to say that, because the defendant is required in law to admit that an alleged common propositus owned a portion of the timber, the admission must extend to the fact that he also owned the land and the remaining timber.

Almost this same question was involved in the case of Moore v. Vickers, supra. There the plaintiff himself had conveyed the land to a person named McMillan, and had reserved the timber to himself. McMillan sold the land to the defendant, and the defendant cut the timber which had been reserved. The Supreme Court, speaking of the attempt to apply the doctrine of common grantor, said: "Even if it be conceded that this rule is applicable to cases of trespass, it does not follow that the plaintiff has shown himself by virtue thereof to have been the true owner of the standing timber at the time of the alleged trespass. The rule as to common source of title only applies where each of the contesting titles emanates from the same grantor. It does not apply where the contest is between a grantor, who reserves an interest in the land, and his grantee, in a case where the burden is on the grantor to show title to the excepted interest." Moore v. Vickers, 126 Ga. 44, 54 S. E. 815. It was held, therefore, that the plaintiff did not make out a prima facie case by showing the facts just recited. In the case of Campau v. Campau, 87 Mich. 245, it is said: "The doctrine that adverse claimants under a common grantor are estopped from denying their grantor's title does not hold where the grantor's deed does not purport to convey the entire title." The facts of that case make it analagous in principle to the case at bar.

Suppose, in the case before us, that the alleged common grantor, instead of conveying to the grantees in the timber deed the timber on five lots of land, had conveyed to them two lots of land, and then had conveyed to the plaintiff the three lots of land remaining in the tract, and the defendant had, under the deed to the two lots, attempted to cut, also, the timber on the other three lots. Would it for a moment be contended that the plaintiff could recover by showing the two sets of deeds emanating from the same source to these parts of the same tract, and by showing, either inferentially or directly, that the defendant claimed the right to cut the timber on the plaintiff's three lots by no other right than the deed to the two lots? To allow such a recovery would be to overthrow a proposition well established in the law, that where the land is in the actual possession of no one the trespasser is amenable for the damages only to him who can show the title. The timber and the right to cut it are as distinct entities, in the sense in which we are now talking about these things, as would be the two separate parts of a tract of land. We have made a somewhat exhaustive search for authorities upon this question, and we have found no case which militates against the proposition here asserted, while the case of Moore v. Vickers, supra, from our own state, and the Michigan case, cited above, both seem to support the principle fully. We are led to the conclusion, therefore, that the court did not err in granting a nonsuit on account of the failure of the plaintiff to show such a title to the property sued for as would support the action.

We have discussed the question as if the plaintiff's action sounded in trespass, because both parties have ably argued the case as if it were such an action. It may be, however, that, properly construed, the suit is one in trover for timber cut and carried away. Such a cause of action we construed the petition as asserting in the case of Milltown Lumber Co. v. Carter, 5 Ga. App. 344, 63 S. E. 270. It will be readily seen, however, that the doctrine we have announced above is clearly applicable, whether the suit is in trover or in trespass; for the plaintiff's title to the timber he is suing for depends upon his title to the land in either event.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed. Cross-bill dismissed without prejudice.

FREEMAN v. MATTHEWS. (No. 1,338.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 150*)—ALLEGATION OF CONTRACT IN WRITING—NECESSITY.

"Where proceedings are brought to enforce rights arising under a contract required to be in writing, failure to allege in the pleadings that such contract was in writing cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer. The silence raises no presumption that the contract exists only in parol." Anderson v. Hilton & Dodge Lumber Co., 121 Ga. 688, 49 S. E. 725 (1); Taliaferro v. Smiley, 112 Ga. 66, 37 S. E. 106; Draper v. Macon Dry Goods Co., 103 Ga. 661, 30 S. E. 566, 68 Am. St. Rep. 136.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 361; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 206, 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The charge of the court is free from any material error, and the exception to the ruling of the trial judge, in permitting the question which was objected to, cannot be considered, because only the question was objected to, and no statement is made as to the answer anticipated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4056; Dec. Dig. §§ 206, 1033.*]

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A verdict in favor of the plaintiff was authorized by the evidence; but as the verdict rendered in his favor includes two items amounting to $100, which were not proved it is directed that the judgment be reduced by that amount.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Action by Mike Matthews against J. T. Freeman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error.
Park & Collins, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. 1. The defendant in the court below excepted pendente lite, and in the bill of exceptions assigns error on the judgment overruling certain special demurrers to the plaintiff's petition. The demurrers raise the point that the petition does not show that the contracts of sale complied with the statute of frauds. The petition alleged that the petitioner and the administrator's deceased intestate each owned a one-third interest in a certain sawmill outfit, steers, and a lumber dray, and that the petitioner sold his third interest in this property to the deceased for $300. Another item of indebtedness alleged in the petition arises from the sale by the petitioner to the deceased of a watch for the sum of $50. The plaintiff did not amend his petition in response to the special demurrers, and the contention of the plaintiff in error is that, under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 5048, and the decision of the Supreme Court in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 564, 38 S. E. 859, the trial judge should have dismissed the petition.

There can be no doubt that, as a general proposition, the principle relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in error is sound; but under the rulings of the Supreme Court in Draper v. Macon Dry Goods Company, 103 Ga. 661, 30 S. E. 566, 68 Am. St. Rep. 136,

Taliaferro v. Smiley, 112 Ga. 62, 37 S. E. 106 (3), and Anderson v. Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company, 121 Ga. 688, 49 S. E. 725, the failure to allege that a contract is in writing does not raise the inference that it is necessarily in parol. The plea of the statute of frauds is a personal plea, and the failure to allege that the contract was in writing cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer. In other words, it is presumed, unless the contrary appears from the petition itself, that those contracts which by law are required to be in writing have been put in writing—that the parties have obeyed the law, rather than disobeyed it. So, when a contract is alleged, it is presumed that the contract was in writing. As in this case the plaintiff alleged a contract of sale which by terms of the statute of frauds should have been in writing, and therefore presumably was reduced to writing, and as, for that reason, the defendant should have pleaded as an affirmative defense, that the contract rested only in parol, and was therefore violative of section 2693 of the Civil Code of 1895, the trial judge did not err in overruling the special demurrers.

2. It is unnecessary to discuss in detail the several exceptions taken to the charge of the court. It is sufficient to say that, while the language employed in one instance is somewhat involved, we do not think that the jury was misled thereby, and the subject presented, as well as the language used, was more favorable to the defendant than to the plaintiff. The former, therefore, can have no cause of complaint. The exception to the question which the court permitted to be asked over the objection of the defendant's counsel presents nothing for our consideration, as the answer was not objected to, and no statement as to the answer anticipated was made to the trial court in advance of his ruling.

3. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the finding in favor of the plaintiff as to the sawmill outfit and the item of $15 for which suit was brought. A verdict for the plaintiff, in the absence of any evidence in behalf of the defendant, was therefore demanded. There is, however, no evidence to support a finding for the purchase price of the watch, for the value of which plaintiff sued; nor did the sole witness, Mr. Howell, state that he had any knowledge that Matthews advanced any of the $50 claimed to have been loaned by him to the deceased during his sickness. The proof as to both of these items rests purely upon supposition. We therefore direct that, if the defendant in error will write off $100 from the verdict and judgment in his favor, the judgment refusing a new trial be affirmed; otherwise, that the judgment be reversed.

Judgment affirmed, on condition.

ROBINSON v. McWILLIAMS-RANKIN CO.
McWILLIAMS-RANKIN CO. v. ROBINSON.
(Nos. 1,619, 1,698.)

EXEMPTIONS (§ 48*)—WAGES—"LABORER."

A conductor of a freight train may be required to exercise both mental skill and manual labor in the performance of his duties; but where the printed rules of the railway company, regulating his employment and prescribing the character of his work, clearly show that his services consist mainly of work involving the exercise of his intellectual faculties and business capacity, he is not a "laborer," within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 4732, and his wages are subject to garnishment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action between T. E. Robinson and the McWilliams-Rankin Company. From the judgment, Robinson brings error, and the McWilliams-Rankin Company assigns cross-error. Affirmed on the main bill, and cross-bill dismissed.

R. D. Feagin, for plaintiff in error. R. S. Wimberly and Napier & Maynard, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The only question presented in this case for the decision of the court is whether or not the wages of a conductor of a freight train are exempt from the process of garnishment, on the ground that he is a laborer, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 4732. There is no controversy as to the facts. The oral evidence shows that some of the duties of a freight conductor are mental, and some are manual, in character. As was said by this court in Howell v. Atkinson, 3 Ga. App. 58, 59 S. E. 816: "The nature of the labor to be performed, and whether the mental element preponderates or not, is to be determined by the contract of employment." The written rules regulating the employment of the conductor and prescribing his duties in the present case clearly show that he was to have general control and superintendence of the train and of the employes on the train, its running and management, procuring waybills, making reports, attending to the delivery of freight according to waybills, and generally performing work requiring the exercise of intellectual faculties and business capacity. We see no difference in the facts of this case from those of Miller and Bussey v. Dugas, 77 Ga. 386, 4 Am. St. Rep. 90, where it was decided that the wages of a conductor of a passenger or freight train were subject to garnishment under the Code.

Who falls within the category of a journeyman mechanic or day laborer, within the meaning of the statute, must depend upon the facts of the particular case. The Supreme Court, in Oliver v. Macon Hardware Co., 98 Ga. 249, 25 S. E. 403, 58 Am. St. Rep. 300, has laid down the test by which the question should be determined. This test is whether the contract of employment requires mainly mental skill, or mainly manual labor. If the former, the wages are subject to garnishment; if the latter, they are not subject. See, also, Howell v. Atkinson, supra, and Cohen v. Aldrich, 5 Ga. App. 256, 62 S. E. 1015. Applying the test given by the Supreme Court in the Oliver Case, supra, to the duties of this conductor, as prescribed by the rules of the railway company regulating his employment, we conclude that his wages were subject to the process of garnishment, and that the judgment of the superior court, in dismissing the certiorari and affirming the judgment of the justice in so holding, should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions. Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

THOMPSON et al. v. ROBINSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 131*)—OPERATION—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

A contract for sale of coal provides that part of the purchase money shall be paid by a given day, when the vendor is to make a deed, and that, if not so paid, the contract shall be void, and declares this provision for payment of the essence, and there is default in such payment. No oral extension of time made after that day will bind the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 283, 284; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 131*)—SALE OF REALTY—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

A defunct contract for the sale of realty cannot be revived by an oral contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 283, 284; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 97*)—PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION OR TENDER THEREOF.

A contract for sale of land demands payment of purchase money by a given day, and declares this provision of the essence, and if not complied with the contract to be void, deed to be made on such payment. The vendee must pay or tender the money on the day, and thus put the vendor in default, else the vendee cannot have specific performance.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 140*)—ABSTRACT OF TITLE—DUTY TO FURNISH.

Unless the contract so provide, a vendor of land is not required to furnish abstract of title.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Bill by Josiah V. Thompson and others against James M. Robinson and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. H. Conaway, for appellants. McCamie & Clarke and A. C. Chapman, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. James M. Robinson made two written agreements with M. Low Parriott selling to Parriott the coal in two tracts of land. Each agreement contains the following clause: "But it is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that the payment of the first installment of one-fourth of the purchase money on or before the 8th day of August, 1905, is the essence of this agreement, and in the failure to pay the same in the time specified is to render this contract null and void, and the parties of the first part and second parts are to stand relieved from all damages and responsibility for the nonexecution and nonfulfillment of this contract, but a compliance in making said payment is to render this contract unconditional, absolute, and binding to all intents and purposes on the parties hereto of the first and second parts." Parriott assigned the contracts to Josiah V. Thompson. Robinson refusing to convey, Thompson filed a bill in Marshall county circuit court to enforce a conveyance, which the court dismissed without relief.

The contract plainly makes payment of three-fourths of the money the soul and essence of the contract. It is not pretended that the money was paid or tendered by the day named, but it is claimed that Robinson waived it by allowing further time to Parriott to have a survey made and an abstract of title. This contention of waiver on pay day must be closed against the plaintiff by saying that only two witnesses speak on this point, Parriott and Robinson, and they flatly contradict each other. This feature of the case having been decided by the circuit court on conflicting evidence, and we not being convinced that the decision is wrong, it must stand, as to the alleged waiver before the contract by its terms ceased to exist. I speak of waiver before the death of the contract. I am here conceding, for argument, that such prompt payment might be waived before the contract expired by its terms; but there are authorities of high character saying that when the statute of frauds demands a writing, as terms of payment are a substantial element, the contract cannot be varied as to those terms except in writing. "Time of performance of a contract to convey land cannot be extended by parol." Blood v. Goodrich, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 68, 24 Am. Dec. 121. In Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 42, 16 L. Ed. 860, it is said that "a written contract not required to be written may be varied by oral agreement; but the better opinion is, according to the weight of authority, that a written contract within the statute of frauds cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement, unless such agreement is in writing"—citing a large number of English and American authorities. Again asserted as law in Swain v. Seamans, 9 Wall. p. 272, 19 L. Ed. 554. Likewise Abel v. Munson, 18 Mich. 306, 100 Am. Dec. 165; Brown v. Sanborn, 21 Minn. 402; Ladd v. King, 1 R. L. 224, 51 Am. Dec. 624. The plaintiff bearing the burden to prove clearly the waiver before the death of the contract (Lumber Co. v. Friedman, 64 W. Va. —, 61 S. E. 815), it is not necessary to decide whether there can be such oral waiver. Perhaps under our state decisions there may be. If an original question, I would say that such oral agreement, changing a material provision of the contract, cannot be allowed. The statute was made to avoid fraud and perjury. What more striking instance of its wisdom than this: Two contracting parties swearing squarely contrary on a vital point, one or the other false, the court cannot say which, and must decide against the assertor of this waiver. It is not plausible to say that Robinson was to furnish abstract. The contract does not put the duty upon him; the law, in America does not. "In the United States an abstract is not an implied feature of every sale of land. Since every title is of record, the doctrine of caveat emptor, in the absence of special agreement, requires the purchaser to satisfy himself as to title, and for that purpose to make the necessary investigation and abstracts." 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 213. It would be well to shut out oral evidence in this state where promoters, adventurers, and speculators take these contracts, fail to answer their conditions, hold them indefinitely, thus tying up the owners of land, and at last defeat the conditions by trumped-up oral evidence.

I say that the plaintiff has not proven any waiver of this vital condition before the expiration of the contract. 20 Cyc. 233, tells, what in reason ought to be and is law: "Where a written contract for the sale of land has ceased to be operative in accordance with its terms, either by lapse of time or occurrence of specified conditions, an oral agreement reviving the contract is within the statute." The text of 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1101, is: "A new agreement altering the terms of a written contract which was within the statute of frauds, or required by any law to be in writing, or discharging or waiving such contract in part only, must also be in writing, in order to be binding or admissible in evidence, inasmuch as a verbal waiver would be to substitute a verbal contract for one required to be in writing. This is true even though the agreement of waiver may be in such terms that, taken alone, it would not require to be in writing. The only ground upon which a party will be bound by such waiver is that the other party has so governed his conduct, relying upon the attempted waiver or alteration, that it would be aiding a fraud to permit him to deny its validity." On page 897 is the text: "Where a written contract for the sale of land has ceased and terminated by its own terms upon the happening of a contingency, or by the action of the parties under it, it cannot be revived by parol and have its original force and effect." In McConathy v. Lanham, 116 Ky. 735, 76 S. W. 535, was a written sale of minerals, with clause that, if consideration should not be paid by a date, agreement to be void. Failure to pay. Parol contract to extend time. Held that, as contract was terminated by failure to pay, parol extension was void under the statute. Brown on Stat. Frauds, § 267, says: "It would seem to be very clear that a defunct mortgage cannot be revived by a parol agreement, and it has been decided that a defunct written agreement for the sale of land could not." Wood on Stat. Frauds, § 238, so states. In Heth v. Woolridge, 6 Rand. 605, 18 Am. Dec. 751, there was a sale of land and a time given for searching for coal. It was claimed that an oral subsequent agreement extended this time, but the court held that the statute denied any force to such agreement. The able Judge Carr said: "Many cases may be cited to show that a written agreement cannot be varied by parol." In Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. 475, we find that "a parol agreement on the part of the vendor, however explicit, to waive the forfeiture of the contract which the purchaser had incurred, would be of no effect at law, and could be enforced in equity only where there has been part performance." There is no question of part performance in this case. In Lawyer v. Post, 109 Fed. 512, 47 C. C. A. 491, the court said: "It is not pretended that the plaintiff paid or tendered the consideration within the time given by the written option. It is contended that the defendant, the owner, made certain oral extensions and agreements, which may be enforced. * * * Assuming that the evidence establishes that the defendant * * * verbally gave an extension of time in which he would sell and convey, such oral agreement must be held void under the statute of frauds." In Teal v. Bilby, 123 U. S. 572, 8 Sup. Ct. 239, 31 L. Ed. 263, it is held that, where there is nothing in a contract requiring a writing, it may be varied by an oral contract; but the court said that rule did not apply "where there is something in the nature of the contract requiring it to be in writing, and the conclusion necessarily follows that where, as in this case, there is something in the nature of the contract requiring it to be in writing, it may not be waived by a consequent oral agreement." Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 42, 16 L. Ed. 360, says that there may be oral modification where the contract is not one requiring a writing, but that "a written contract within the statute of frauds cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement, unless such new agreement is also in writing." So in Swain v. Seamans, 9 Wall. 272, 19 L. Ed. 554.

Of course, the cases given in beginning of this opinion denying force of oral contracts to vary writings even before their end would, for stronger reason, apply after extinction of the contract. The English case, Marshall v. Lynn, 6 Mees. & W. 109, holds that such oral extension "is a new contract, incorporating new terms, and I think cannot be enforced by action unless in writing." Now, in fact, in our case there is no agreement after the death of the contract to extend time for payment. Nothing further is shown than that Robinson employed a surveyor to survey the land, and stated to strangers that the land had been sold to Parriott, and that he was still tied up by his sale; that he had an abstract made and took it to Parriott. It is said he thus recognized the sale. What if he did? He might have made the most explicit admission as to that sale. He might have made a distinct resale. It would not avail. It would not prevent from change of mind. The case of Gas Co. v. Elder, 54 W. Va. 335, 46 S. E. 357, may seem to conflict with this decision; but the terms of that contract were different, as it required a clear title when money should be paid, and put the duty of abstracting and showing good title on the vendor, and it provided, not that there should be unqualifiedly forfeiture for nonpayment on a day, as it said "on 30th day of November, 1890, or as soon thereafter as title shall be examined and accepted by the vendee," and the vendor could not then make good title. The contract itself allowed the vendee time beyond the day. No bad title is proven in this case. There is no pretense of any tender of purchase money on pay day. Say that the covenant by Parriott and that by Robinson were mutual and dependent. Ought not Parriott have tendered the money, and thus put Robinson in default? Could he ask deed before offer of the money? Irvin v. Bleakley, 67 Pa. 24, puts it in such case very strongly: "Whichever party first desired to enforce performance was bound to regard his part of his contract as a condition precedent and perform or tender it." That was where payment and conveyance were dependent covenants. Pomeroy's Eq. vol. 6, § 809, says: "Where the stipulations are mutual and dependent—that is, where the deed is to be delivered on payment of the price—an actual tender and demand by one party is necessary to put the other in default and cut off his right to treat the contract as still subsisting. Time essential. Where time of payment by the vendee is made essential, and a fortiori where, if his payments are not made on the exact day named, the vendor may treat the contract as at an end, the vendee must make an actual tender of the price and a demand of a deed at a specified time." "Where certain conditions remain unperformed by the plaintiff which it would be his duty to perform contemporaneously with the defendant's compliance with the contract, there must be a tender or offer of performance by the plaintiff, or specific performance will not be decreed." 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 42. In fact the contract in the present case makes the duty of payment prior to the duty of conveyance, since it says, after requiring payment by a date, "that upon the cash payment of three-fourths of the purchase money on or before the 8th day of August, 1905, that the party of the first part is to convey."

Decree affirmed.

Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for plaintiff in error. Geo. S. Wallace, for defendant in error.

Adams & Cooper and J. Newman, for plaintiff in error. Robinson & Prunty, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. We cannot consider evidence or instructions, since the bills of exceptions presenting them cannot be considered. There is no certificate of the judge to the clerk certifying them to him to be filed as made within 30 days of the term. This certificate is the final act of the judge—his final act of authentication. If exceptions are made in term, though ever so formally executed by the judge, no one would say they were part of the record without a court order. If in vacation, this certificate and order of the judge take the place of the court order. It is the final act. The order must be recorded in the order book, and a copy appear in the transcript. There is nothing to show filing, except the clerk puts the bill in the transcript. No such certificate. We must so hold, unless we ignore former cases. Section 9, c. 131, Code 1906, in words requires these things. State v. Blair, 63 W. Va. 635, 60 S. E. 795; Wells v. Smith, 49 W. Va. 78, 38 S. E. 547; Craft v. Mann, 46 W. Va. 478, 33 S. MOORE v. WEST VIRGINIA HEAT & LIGHT CO.

1. TORTS (§ 27*) — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for tort, the plaintiff bearing the burden of proof, a verdict for him cannot be found on evidence which affords mere conjecture that the liability exists, and leaves the minds of jurors in equipoise and reasonable doubt. The evidence must generate an actual rational belief in the existence of the disputed fact.

2. GAS (§ 20*)—INJURIES—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE —BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a liability is asserted on the ground of tort, the plaintiff bears the burden of proof of the fact on which the liability rests, and the burden to disprove such fact does not shift to the shoulders of the defendant until plaintiff's evidence shows a state of facts sufficient to establish a rational belief of the existence of such fact.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County.

Action by T. E. Moore against the West Virginia Heat & Light Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

BRANNON, J. T. E. Moore's house was destroyed by fire, and he sued the West Virginia Heat & Light Company to recover damages for its loss. That company owned a natural gas well 5,580 feet from Moore's house, and a pipe conveying its gas ran within 150 yards of Moore's house, and from that pipe a smaller one conveyed gas to Moore's house for his use in it. He used gas in two stoves. The company shut off the gas to connect with a pipe to convey the gas to Cairo, and then without notice turned on the gas again, and, as Moore claims, this caused the fire. Upon the trial the defendant company demurred to the evidence, and upon the demurrer the circuit court of Ritchie county gave judgment for Moore for $950, and the company sued out this writ of error.

The question ruling the case is: Does the evidence sustain the plaintiff's action? The case does not so much involve negligence. The question is whether the fire originated from the returning gas. Assuming that turning off and turning on again the gas without notice is negligence, the problem is: Did the fire come from this cause? It is needless to say that the burden of proof to establish this fact rests on the plaintiff. "A verdict based alone on mere conjecture, without evidence to support it, where the rule as to burden of proof requires some reliable affirmative evidence, should not be permitted to stand." Robinson v. W. Va. & P. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 583, 21 S. E. 727. "A mere equipoise of evidence is insufficient to satisfy the burden of proof, nor is conjecture or theory or bare possibility of the existence of the ultimate fact to be proved sufficient." 8 Ency. of Ev. 866. "When, under the evidence, the injuries complained of may have resulted either from defendant's negligence or from some other cause for which he is not responsible, the plaintiff cannot recover, as he has not discharged the burden of proof." 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 516.

The house was a board house of one story and a half. One stove was in the kitchen, another in the sitting room. The upstairs including part of the house was not used as a room, but as a place to stow away things. It was over the sitting room. The gas was turned off from the well and the fire went out in the stoves. Then Mrs. Moore left the house and went to a neighbor's to get him to put up a stove for coal, as she had been told some time before by an agent of the company that, owing to a sale of the well, the gas would be cut off from the house at some future time, and, when cut off, it would not be restored to the house. Shortly after she left the house was discovered to be on fire. There was then no one in the house, and no one saw the commencement of the fire, or could give any account of its commencement or how it started. It was first observed at a schoolhouse in the vicinity by fire issuing from the roof, and, when the teacher and another or others went to the house, he opened the sitting room door, and saw that the fire was in the garret and was consuming the ceiling over the sitting room. It is clear that the fire started in the garret; but how no one knows. Mrs. Moore had been ironing, and had the stoves quite hot. From the stove in the sitting room ran a pipe to the ceiling, and there connected with a flue of iron running from the ceiling up through the tin roof; the flue being an iron casing used in oil wells. When the teacher and another with him looked in the sitting room, they saw no fire in the stove. This, so far, goes to show that the gas had not yet come back. The plaintiff's theory is that the gas passed into the burner in that stove and went up pipe and flue. How did it ignite, if so? His counsel would say that there was a latent spark in burner or pipe or flue, and when the gas went into them, one or another, ignition occurred. The teacher and the witness with him did not observe it there. If it went into the stove pipe or flue and there ignited, the flame would have followed the current back down into the stove, so they could have seen it in the stove, unless the stream was so strong as to drive it on up, which is a far-fetched idea; there being no evidence of such a strong volume of gas. And how can we say that the volume was any greater than it had been all day before the gas was cut off? The regulator was the same, the stopcocks the same. If the gas filled the room and exploded, we could see how the fire occurred, but there was no explosion. And whence the fire to cause explosion? And the fire started above the room and burned downward. There is nothing to show any stronger current; but what we do know goes against it. Another circumstance proven by the teacher, a witness for the plaintiff, is that there was a gas jet or flambeau in the yard, and the teacher did not see it burning when on the ground, and thinks it was not. These things go to show that the gas had not yet come back when the fire started. The teacher noticed no gas escaping. The evidence for plaintiff of experienced gas men is that, if the regulators worked well, no greater quantity of gas would be admitted when the gas came back than before. We could ourselves assume this, even if not proven. When there is no evidence of greater flow of gas, when the regulators and stopcock were the same as before, how can we say that the trouble came from a larger flow? And why, if no larger, would it set the house on fire when it had not for nine months before? There was no change in fixtures. Evidence of plaintiff clearly proves that, if the regulators worked, there would be no greater flow of gas than before. Why, if the gas came back and ignited, would it not go up the pipe and flue and out? Why prove so disastrous at this particular time? Why would it not go up the flue? I ask again. If the gas came on before the fire, it would either go up the flue, or into the room; but those on the ground scented no gas, and no explosion occurred. The chief reliance of plaintiff to prove that this gas started the fire when it came back is that a latent spark might have been in the burner in the stove, stovepipe, or flue in soot, and, when the gas came, it was fanned into a flame, and thus the gas ignited. Unless we adopt this theory (only theory), there is absolutely no ground for the claim that the fire came from returning gas. Such a thing is barely possible, not probable even. The gas was cut off at least a quarter of an hour. A plaintiff's witness residing close to Moore, and getting gas from the same pipe line, timed it, and says the gas was off one hour. Now would it be likely that latent sparks would lie latent so long? Evidence for plaintiff, giving different opinions as to how long sparks would last, goes to show this not likely. There is not a particle of evidence to prove that sparks or soot were there. It is all surmise. We are asked to build up this theory for charge on mere surmise, mere possibility; but the party alleging negligence must "establish it by proof sufficient to satisfy reasonable and well-balanced minds. The evidence must show more than a probability of a negligent act. The facts from which the jury can determine whether or not there was negligence must be shown by competent evidence, and the jury should not be left to mere conjecture or random judgment." N. & W. R. Co. v. Briggs, 103 Va. 105, 48 S. E. 521. So, on the same principle, possibility that this spark theory may be true will not do; even mere probability will not. No man can say with any confidence that it is true.

It is important in this connection to add that the chief witness offered as an expert to support this theory, Huldeman, says that such might have been the origin of the fire, yet distinctly says that this is a mere conjecture; that the origin of the fire is conjecture. He says he had known several fires to occur by leaking gas and igniting of gas, "or something of the kind they did not discover," and further said he had heard of several fires similar to Moore's "the cause for which could not be explained." He was asked if he knew of a house burned in that way, and answered: "Not just exactly that way. I don't know exactly that it was soot forming that caused it, but I have known houses to burn by leaking valves, or the igniting of gas that accumulated, and that no one knewed anything of in the building." Then came the question: "I mean to ignite from latent flames? Answer: I don't know as to that. Question. You don't know that Mr. Moore's house caught from a latent flame? Answer. I don't know. Question.

You don't know how it caught, do you? Answer. I don't know how it burned. I know that the house was burned. That is all I know about it." I have detailed this much of this witness' evidence so much relied on to show how frail the foundation. Such the case of the evidence. I am, have been above, speaking of the evidence for the plaintiff. This witness says there would have to be a blaze for ignition. Not likely there was any lingering blaze in a light burner and pipe so long after gas was off. Not likely a spark would become a blaze. If there was a blaze, it could not have been in the burner in the stove. How could it be away up in the pipe or flue? An experienced witness for plaintiff stated that he would think that metal of the thickness of such a gas burner as Moore's would not get hot enough to ignite "to turn off and right on again"; that the burner would not usually get hot unless soot filled it up. There was no evidence of this. Surely the burner would cool in 15 minutes or more, taking the shortest time the gas was off under the varying evidence. It is suggested, but not much pressed, that the returning gas may have ignited from a red hot burner or stove. But Mrs. Moore, the only person in the house, and she using the stove, says the burner in the sitting room, which was under the garret where the fire started, was not red hot. She did not notice that the one in the kitchen was. The fire did not start over the kitchen.

Plaintiff, seeing how frail this foundation, appeals to the evidence of a witness who saw gas burning in the pipes, seeking to show the actual presence of gas. But that was 8 o'clock, long after the fire began, after the house had been consumed. Of course, if the gas came during or before the total extinction of the fire, it would ignite from the burning house. Just here I remark there is another feature casting obscurity. It is not certain that the gas had come back to the house when the fire started. There is variance among witnesses as to the length of time the gas was off. The evidence of those at the well is that the gas was turned off at half past 12 o'clock. A witness of plaintiff, Cokely, living near Moore, and getting gas for his home from same pipe line, the most accurate witness because he carefully noted the time by the clock and examined his regulator, and seems to be careful in observation, says the gas went off at 1 o'clock and came back at 2, by the clock. If this be correct, it is quite probable that the fire started before the gas came on; for Mrs. Moore says it started a little after 1 o'clock, and the teacher says he first noticed fire about 2, but it then had a good start, was coming out the roof, and destroying the ceiling. It was then large enough to be observed at the school several hundred yards off. It was burning downward, and would thus take longer time to gather volume. And the roof was tin, not shingles. The fire probably started a good while before discovered. And it goes to show that the gas came on after the fire began, that the teacher and those with him did not see or hear the jet or flambeau of gas in the yard. If flaming and roaring, it is likely they would have seen and heard it.

Counsel say that the evidence establishes a prima facie case, and the burden falls on the defendant to prove that the fire did not come from the cause alleged by the plaintiff. But a case to call for judgment has not been proven. The evidence does not do so. Where a railroad company was sued for causing a fire, in order to raise the presumption of negligence, so as to cast on defendant the burden that its locomotive had suitable fixtures to arrest sparks, the jury must be reasonably satisfied that sparks emitted in dangerous quantity caused the fire, "and evidence merely 'tending' to prove it is not as a matter of law sufficient." L. & N. R. Co. v. Malone, 109 Ala. 509, 20 South. 33. Mere tendency to prove will not shift the burden. If the evidence "in reference to a fact is equally balanced, or it does not generate a rational belief of the existence of the fact, leaving the mind in a state of doubt and uncertainty, the party affirming its existence must fail for want of proof." 2 Ency. of Ev. 785. "Where the testimony upon the issue leaves it doubtful whether the affirmative of that issue is sustained, it is a safe and proper course for the jury to find against the party holding the affirmative." Lexington Co. v. Paver, 16 Ohio, 324. The court said in Sim v. Bank, 8 W. Va. 274, that evidence to establish a debt should do more than produce a suspicion—"it should be sufficiently clear and definite in its character to satisfy the mind of the court of the fact to a reasonable certainty." The evidence should generate a rational belief of the fact creating liability in cases of tort.

We reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and render judgment for the defendant upon the demurrer to evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Bill by Minnie B. Stafford against H. C. Jones and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant W. P. Hawley appeals. Affirmed.

Harold A. Ritz, for appellant. Sanders & Crockett, Cook & Howard, and John L. Stafford, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. D. M. Easley, substituted trustee in a trust deed executed by H. C. Jones conveying certain real estate in Bluefield, Mercer county, W. Va., to secure a note owned by W. P. Hawley, advertised to sell on the 8th day of February, 1908. Pending the publishing of this notice of sale, Minnie B. Stafford, a subsequent judgment creditor of H. C. Jones, brought a lien creditors' suit in the circuit court of Mingo county against said Jones, making other lienors, including said Hawley and the trustee, parties to the suit for the purpose of enforcing the liens against Jones' land, and enjoining the sale by the trustee until the amounts and priorities of the liens could be ascertained. The injunction was granted, and on the day before the trustee's sale was to have been made, it was served upon the trustee and said Hawley. Original process issued on the 5th of February, 1908, returnable to "March Rules," and was served on H. C. Jones, the judgment debtor, on the day of its date, and on W. P. Hawley and D. M. Easley, trustee, on the 8th of February, 1908. There are other lien creditors, parties to the bill, upon whom no service appears to have been made. Plaintiff alleges that Jones is the owner of real estate in Mingo and in Mercer counties; that Hawley's trust deed lien is upon land in Mercer county, alleging the date thereof and the date of her judgment, thereby showing that the trust deed is prior to her judgment. But it does not allege the dates and amounts due of all the liens; nor that Hawley's lien is prior to all others. The bill is filed on behalf of plaintiff and all other lien creditors, and further alleges that the sale by the trustee, if permitted to be made for cash, as it was advertised to be sold, and in the condition of the title on account of the unsettled liens, would result in a great sacrifice of the lands. The bill was sworn to, and was filed at March rules, 1908. Hawley filed his sworn answer in term on the 4th of March, and moved for a dissolution of the injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of Jones' land and collect the rents and profits, and hold the same subject to the future order of court. Notice of motion for a receiver had been served upon Jones; and both he and the plaintiff appeared to the motion to dissolve the injunction. The court denied both motions, and from that order Hawley appealed.

Two questions are presented: (1) Was it error to refuse to dissolve the injunction? (2) Was it error to refuse to appoint a receiver.

Hawley's answer denies none of plaintiff's allegations; but some of them, for want of information, he refuses to admit. In support of his motions, he alleges that since the making of the trust deed securing his debt Jones had sold and conveyed some of the land covered by it; that the property embraced in his trust deed consists of houses and lots in the town of Bluefield; that the houses are badly in need of repair; that taxes are unpaid; that there remains not more than a sufficient amount of land embraced in his trust deed to satisfy his debt, which he alleges to be $6,221.75, with interest from the 4th of January, 1908; that his is the first lien on said real estate; that considerable sums of money are derived by Jones as rents from said houses; but it is not alleged that Jones is insolvent. He prays for a dissolution of the injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver. To his answer Jones at the same time filed his sworn replication; but he did not answer the bill. In his replication he admits the amount of Hawley's lien and its priority, and specifically sets out the value of each parcel of land covered by the trust deed, and advertised to be sold by the trustee, which, according to his estimate, amounts to very much more than the trust debt. He also admits having sold certain lots after the trust deed was given. He denies that the taxes had not been paid, and specifically sets forth certain improvements which he had made on his houses. He further avers that the buildings thereon are insured against loss by fire for the benefit of said trust creditor for an amount ample to pay said debt in case of loss by fire. He avers his solvency, and that he owns considerable other property than that covered by the trust deed, and that he is able to respond to any judgment that might be returned against him for any deficiency that might result from a sale of the property covered by the deed of trust. No proof was taken.

The question presented is whether or not, upon this showing, and at this stage of the case, the court should have dissolved the injunction and directed the trustee as commissioner to execute the trust and bring the fund into court. It clearly appears from the state of the pleadings that the cause was not matured for final hearing; nor does it seem that an order of reference could have been made, as it does not appear that any notice had been given of a motion for such reference at that term. A number of the defendants had not answered, and the cause was not matured as to them. This is a lien creditors' suit, brought on behalf of Hawley and all other lien creditors, under the provision of section 4147, Code 1906, the concluding clause of which section reads: "If after the commencement of such suit, any lien holder commence any other suit or proceeding in or out of court to enforce a lien claimed by him on the real estate, or any part thereof, of the judgment debtor, upon which a lien is sought to be enforced by such suit, the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, may enjoin him from so doing, and require him to come in and assert his lien in such suit, or make such order or decree in relation thereto as to such court or judge may seem right and proper to protect the interest of all parties having such liens." This statute unquestionably denies the right to the trust creditor to enforce his lien out of court. In construing the above statute in the case of Parsons v. Snider, 42 W. Va. 517, 26 S. E. 285, this court held that, where a trust creditor and his trustee had been made formal parties to such creditors' suit, they could not thereafter make sale under the deed of trust. Point 5 of the syllabus in that case further holds that such trust creditor cannot defeat the action of the court by such independent proceeding outside of the suit, but that he must await the court's action. This case, however, does not go so far as to decide that such trust creditor, if he be the prior lienor, may not have a sale of the trust subject under an order of the court, and before a final decree adjudicating the rights and priorities of all the parties. Hawley's answer and Jones' replication thereto show the exact amount of Hawley's lien, and that it is the first lien on the land covered by the deed of trust. This fact is therefore conclusively established as between Hawley and Jones; and by the law as laid down by this court in Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 16, 12 S. E. 1078, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774, and Bank v. Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 580, 23 S. E. 792, 56 Am. St. Rep. 878, it is also conclusive on other lienors unless fraud or collusion be shown. These cases decide that one judgment creditor cannot in such judgment creditors' suit collaterally attack the judgment of another creditor except for fraud. This rule we understand to apply also to a lien of a trust deed. But may not the other lienors dispute the priority of the lien? One of the chief purposes of such a suit is to determine priorities of liens; and any lienor has the undoubted right to dispute the priority of any other creditor's lien. Consequently Jones' admission of the priority of Hawley's trust lien is not conclusive on the other lienors; and, until this asserted priority is determined either by their answer admitting it, or by the finding of a commissioner, it could not be certainly said that Hawley's trust lien is prior to the liens of some other creditors. The dates of some of the judgments do not appear from the pleadings. It might bring about great confusion if the court should direct a sale of the land before the priorities of the liens are determined in a manner binding on all the parties. The creditors who might want to bid for the land at a sale would be uncertain as to their rights, and would not know how to bid on the property. Such a condition would tend to becloud the title, and to materially depreciate the value of the property.

The fact that the trustee advertised to sell for cash is not a matter of which Jones can complain, and is certainly not a matter of which any creditor of his could complain. Jones himself is responsible for this, having stipulated in the deed of trust the manner of sale. It is a part of his solemn agreement. The court itself in decreeing sale could not change the contract of the parties, if the trust deed is the first lien, and direct a sale on any different terms. So that, if a cash sale should work a hardship on Jones, he is the author of it. Watterson v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 108, 24 S. E. 578; Wood v. Krebs, 33 Grat. (Va.) 685. Section 4147, Code 1906, does not deny a prior trust deed creditor the right to have a sale by order of court of trust property according to the terms of his trust, after the bringing of a lien creditor's suit to which he is made a party, before an ascertainment of the rights of all subsequent lienors, and before final decree. It simply prohibits him, after such suit, from proceeding out of court or from instituting any other proceedings in court. His rights must be administered in the judgment creditor's suit. There would seem to be no good reason for requiring a prior trust creditor to stand by and wait the determination of the rights of all subsequent lienors after his lien has been conclusively determined. The determination of their rights could in no wise affect his. Neither could any pending questions among subsequent lienors in any wise affect the title of the trustee. In such a case the court might with perfect propriety, and without danger of violating the rights of subsequent lienors, direct a sale of the trust property, and require the fund to be brought into court for distribution. In view of the fact that it is not conclusively shown that Hawley's trust debt is the first lien, and in view of the fact that its alleged priority is liable to be controverted by other parties to the suit, we do not think the court erred in refusing to dissolve the injunction.

It is insisted that it was error to refuse to appoint a receiver to take charge of Jones' real estate, collect rents and profits, and preserve the same for the future order of the court. The refusal to appoint a receiver is not an appealable order. But an order appointing a receiver has been held to be appealable on the ground that it falls under the seventh clause of section 4038, Code 1906, allowing an appeal from an order requiring the possession or title of property to be changed. Ruffner v. Mairs, 33 W. Va. 655, 11 S. E. 5. There are a number of cases decided by this court where the action of the circuit court in the appointment of receivers has been reviewed; but none reviewing such action in case of a refusal to appoint a receiver. And it has been at least once before expressly decided by this court that an order refusing to appoint a receiver is not appealable. Robrecht v. Robrecht, 46 W. Va. 738, 34 S. E. 801. We therefore hold that we have no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the order refusing to appoint a receiver.

For the reasons herein expressed, we will affirm the decree.

HARTIGAN et al. v. HARTIGAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. CURTESY (§ 11*)—BAR—DIVORCE FROM BED AND BOARD.

A decree of divorce from bed and board, with perpetual separation, in the terms provided by section 12, c. 64, Code (Code 1906, § 2923), does not bar the curtesy of the husband against whom such decree is pronounced in lands belonging to the wife at the time of the decree; but upon lands thereafter acquired by her it operates like an absolute divorce, thus, as to such property, barring claim to curtesy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtsey, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. BARRING RIGHT OF CURTESY.

Quere: May not the court by virtue of section 11, c. 64, Code (Code 1906, § 2927), in granting such divorce, bar, by a special order in the decree, the right of curtesy or dower in the existing real estate of the parties, or either of them?

Within the meaning of the word "interest," there is usually embraced a mere contingent or inchoate interest.

Error to Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Action by Elizabeth W. Hartigan and others against James W. Hartigan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

See, also, 58 W. Va. 610, 52 S. E. 720.

Lazzelle & Stewart, for plaintiffs in error.
Goodwin & Reay, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. In a suit for divorce pending in the circuit court of Monongalia county it was decreed "that the plaintiff, Mary V. Hartigan, be divorced from bed and board from her husband, the said defendant, James W. Hartigan; that the said plaintiff and defendant be perpetually separated; that said plaintiff be hereafter perpetually and fully protected in her person from said defendant and in all her property and estate now owned by her except as hereinafter provided, and in all her property and estate hereafter acquired by her against any claim, demand, or estate of said defendant and free from any marital right or claim of said defendant; that the said defendant be hereafter perpetually and fully protected in all his property and estate now owned by him except as hereinafter provided, and in all property and estate hereafter acquired by him against any claim, demand, or estate of said plaintiff." That this decree was founded upon the ground of cruelty, and not desertion, is made clear by the opinion upon the affirmance of the decree by this court. 58 W. Va. 616, 52 S. E. 720. Mary V. Hartigan died seized and constructively possessed of real estate. James W. Hartigan was in actual possession of the same as her tenant under provisions of the divorce decree. He refused to surrender possession to the heirs of Mary V. Hartigan, claiming the right thereto as tenant by the curtesy. The heirs sought to oust him by an action of unlawful detainer, claiming that his curtesy right was terminated by the clause of the divorce decree recited above. The case was heard upon an agreed statement of the facts. The court found in favor of the defendant, and rendered judgment for him. The effect of that judgment is that James W. Hartigan's right of curtesy in the real estate was not cut off by the divorce decree. Does the decree sever that right? This is the principal question for our consideration upon the writ of error to the judgment.

At the common law a divorce a mensa et thoro had no effect whatever upon curtesy or dower, nor, indeed, upon any of the marital rights of either party touching property. 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 121. And in Virginia such divorce has no more effect than at the common law, in the absence of any order of court, in the sentence of divorce, to the contrary. 2 Minor's Inst. 122. The same is true in this state. Our statutes on the subject are the same as those of Virginia. The jurisprudence of the two states in this behalf is the same. And in the Virginias a divorce a mensa et thoro, with a decree of perpetual separation added, such as is now in question before us, provided for by statutes precisely the same in the two states, is plainly defined as to its effect on curtesy or dower by Mr. Minor. "Such a decree of perpetual separation," says he, "has no effect upon the marital rights of the parties (nor consequently upon curtesy and dower) as to existing property; but upon property thereafter acquired it operates like a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, thus, as to such property, barring the claim to curtesy or to dower." 2 Inst. 122. Is not this text a construction of our statute law by eminent Virginia authority? He is speaking of the identical section of the law upon which this decree is based. And in the decree the court has followed this statute, doing only that which is provided by the statute, using the same language employed in it. May we not say, then, that Mr. Minor, in fact, construes this decree by the text we have quoted? That construction says that this decree does not bar the curtesy which James W. Hartigan claims. The real estate in which he claims such right was owned by Mary V. Hartigan at the time of the divorce decree. It is not property acquired by her thereafter.

It is true that Mr. Minor indicates throughout his dissertations on the subject that, in granting a divorce, it is competent for the court to make an order barring or affecting curtesy or dower where without such order the decree would not have that effect. 1 Inst. 303; 2 Inst. 118, 119, 138. It would seem that this view is based on that which is section 11 of chapter 64 of our Code (Code 1906, § 2927). In granting any kind of divorce the court is by that section given power to make any order it may deem expedient concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties or either of them. It is insisted that this relates only to alimony. But a thorough review of the origin and growth of this statute from the first enactment on the subject throughout the revisions to the existing law leads us to favor that which Mr. Minor advisedly recognizes; that is, that the court may, by a special order in the sentence of divorce, cut off or bar curtesy or dower where the decree without such special order would not have that effect. And this is suggested in Harris v. Harris (Va.) 31 Grat. 13. The discretion given by our section 11, c. 64, to the court as to an order relating to the estate of the parties, is there denominated as "a broad and comprehensive one." Certain it is that the language formerly employed in the older statutes and recommended by the revisors for the Code of 1849 in this behalf expressly authorized the court to make an order affecting or barring curtesy and dower. Is not this power still retained by the broad and comprehensive discretion given to the court by section 11 relative to the making of any order it may deem expedient as to the estate of the parties or either of them? It seems so.

But we deem it unnecessary to decide the foregoing question, since in the decree before us there is no such special order of the court. As we view it, the decree is silent, as is the statute upon which it is based, in relation to curtesy in the property of the wife owned at the time of the decree. The decree, following the statute, expressly bars curtesy as to after-acquired property. As to after-acquired property, the statute makes the decree of perpetual separation to operate as would a decree a vinculo matrimonii. A decree from the bonds of matrimony has the effect to bar curtesy or dower in existing property, even for supervenient cause. Porter v. Porter, 27 Grat. (Va.) 599. As to existing property, however, the decree under consideration does only what section 12 empowers the court to do in making an order of perpetual separation; that is, it protects the wife in the possession and control of the property during the separation. That protection is personal to her. It cannot exist after her death. Then it can be of no service to her. The decree is made for her. It is not intended as a protection to those who come after her. If the court had power under section 11 or other part of the chapter to bar the curtesy right in question, it has not done so. It could do so only by the use of plain terms. We are not justified in annihilating a sacred property right by strained construction, or in basing an act of such annihilation upon mere implication. As to existing property of the wife, the decree makes no reference to the curtesy of the husband therein. That curtesy still exists. The divorce was simply from bed and board. The bonds of matrimony were not dissolved. They existed until the death of Mary V. Hartigan. Though the parties were separated by legal decree, they were still man and wife. "No interest of the husband in the wife's lands, either during their joint lives or after her death, is taken from him by this divorce." 2 Blsh. on Mar. & Div. § 1678. "A decree of divorce a mensa et thoro pronounced against the husband does not bar him of the right of curtesy." Smoot v. Lecatt, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 590. "As a divorce a mensa et thoro does not destroy the relation of marriage, but merely suspends some of the obligations arising out of that relation, it follows that the right as regards succession to property is not impaired. * * * So a husband is tenant by the curtesy of his wife's lands." Clark v. Clark, 6 Watts & Serg. (Pa.) 87.

At the common law, unless for causes existing ab initio, an absolute divorce could only be obtained by act of Parliament. A parliamentary divorce, being for a supervenient cause, when a marriage not void ab initio had for a time existed with all attendant rights of the relation, did not have the effect to bar those rights unless there was a special provision in the act to that effect. "If an act of Parliament dissolving the marriage contract do not divest dower except a special clause excluding it be inserted, it is difficult to conceive upon what principle a judicial decree can have that effect in the absence of legislation providing that such shall be its operation." 2 Scribner on Dower, 543.

There is another reason justifying the holding that the husband's curtesy remained in the particular property in question, even if it could be held that the effect of the decree was to bar curtesy in all existing property of the wife but that expressly excepted. This decree expressly excepts from its force the property now in litigation. In the clause of the decree we have quoted, it will be observed that there are the words "except as hereinafter provided." Now, looking further to the decree to see to what this exception relates, we find that as to the very property now sought to be recovered the court expressly reserved "for future order * * * the question of the interests of each of the said parties in the said property." It is argued that this reservation relates to interests other than curtesy. But the language used is sufficient to include such marital interest. Curtesy is an interest—a contingent one it is true, and yet an interest, nevertheless. The word "interest" is usually construed as embracing a contingent interest. Young v. Young, 89 Va. 675, 17 S. E. 470, 23 L. R. A. 642; Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. 122, 20 S. W. 972; Madigan v. Walsh, 22 Wis. 501. Whatever may have been the cause for this reservation in the decree it is there. And by it the court expressly reserved the question of whether or not it would eventually end the husband's contingent curtesy interest in the property. That interest has not been taken away from James W. Hartigan, as is contended, even if the court had power to do so.

It cannot be seriously contended that in this case it is shown that the husband deserted his wife, and thereby lost, under Code, c. 65, § 16 (Code 1906, § 2945), his right of curtesy in her lands. The record and final decision of the divorce case negative this contention. They are before us in the agreed facts, and we look to them in this particular. The judgment will be affirmed.

BRANNON, J. I do not differ with Judge ROBINSON in his statement of law in this case. Code, c. 64, § 11, empowers a court to make decree in cases both of divorce from the bond of matrimony and from bed and board as to the property of the parties owned at the date of divorce, and to cut off by its decree right of curtesy and dower. That section, however, does not authorize it to do so in case of decree of perpetual separation as to property acquired after the decree. The Legislature deemed it advisable to give this power in such case, and by section 12 made such decree operate as would a divorce from the bond as to such after-acquired property. My doubt in this case is whether we should not hold the decree in this case, under its broad language, as made under both sections, cutting off curtesy as to both present and after-acquired property.

STATE ex rel. KELLER v. GRYMES.

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 311*) — PROPERTY AND BOOKS—RIGHT OF DIRECTOR TO EXAMINE.

Each member of the board of directors of a private corporation is clothed by law with equal rights and powers, and each has a right, at all reasonable times, to make an investigation of the property and funds, books, correspondence, and papers of his corporation, which are in the possession of its agent or general manager, and to make copies thereof for his own information as such director.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1375½; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 311*) — PROPERTY AND BOOKS—RIGHT OF DIRECTORS TO EXAMINE.

The right conferred by general law on an individual director to make such investigation is not abrogated by section 2276 of the Code of 1906.

3. STATUTES (§ 239*)—CONSTRUCTION IN FAVOR OF PRESERVING RIGHT.

If a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one consistent with pre-existing rights and the other in derogation thereof, the courts will give to it that construction which preserves the pre-existing rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 311*)—"BOARD OF DIRECTORS."

The words "board of directors," as used in Code 1906, § 2276, providing that the books of a corporation shall be subject to investigation by the board of directors, applies to the board, both as a unit and also to each individual member composing the board of directors; and each individual director is entitled to inspect the corporate books.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of one Keller, to compel J. C. Grymes to give relator full access to all the correspondence, books, records, and papers of the Wake Forest Mining Company. A peremptory writ was awarded, and Grymes brings error. Affirmed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiff in error. Price, Smith, Spillman & Clay, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This is a proceeding by mandamus in the circuit court of Kanawha county, and involves the question of the right of a director of a corporation, who is also one of its stockholders, to inspect and make copies of so much of the books, records, accounts, and correspondence of such corporation as he may desire. The relator is a stockholder and director in the Wake Forest Mining Company, a West Virginia corporation, engaged in the business of mining and selling coal in Kanawha county. Its capital stock consists of 250 shares of the par value of $100 each. Relator owns 30 shares, and is one of the directors, of whom there are 5, and has been a stockholder and director since the formation of said company in the year 1902. J. C. Grymes, another stockholder, is also one of the directors, and is president, treasurer, and general manager of the company, and keeper of the records, contracts, papers, and correspondence of the company. Relator filed his petition in the circuit court of Kanawha county on the 27th day of August, 1907, praying for a writ of mandamus against said Grymes to compel him to give relator "full and free access to all correspondence, books, records, and papers of said company." He alleged in his petition that his sole purpose in making the demand "was in order to ascertain whether the affairs of said Wake Forest Mining Company were being honestly and economically administered in the equal and impartial interests of all its stockholders, and to ascertain facts which it was his right and duty to know as a director of said company; and that he had, and has now, no interests adverse to those of said company in any way." The alternative writ issued, and the defendant moved to quash it, which motion was overruled. Respondent then answered, admitting many of the facts recited in the writ and denying others. He admits that relator was not permitted to examine the "pay rolls and general books, including journals, ledger, and cash books of the Wake Forest Mining Company, the daily and monthly cost sheets showing operating expenses and the general books of the company and other of its records showing the cost of producing coal, the salary and wages paid, and the other items of expenses charged against the gross proceeds of sale of coal." Respondent attempts to justify his refusal to permit the inspection of such records, etc., on the ground that relator and W. R. J. Zimmerman, another stockholder and director, desire the information for the purpose of harassing and annoying the management of the said company by trying to force the other stockholders to buy their shares of stock at an extravagant price, or to force the other stockholders to sell to them their shares of stock. He alleges that Zimmerman and relator are brothers-in-law, and are friendly to each other and unfriendly to the management of said company; that they are employed by rival coal companies, the said Zimmerman being employed by the New River Consolidated Coal Company and the said Keller by the Sandy Creek Company; that the former of said companies is selling its coal in competition with the coal sold by the Carbon Fuel Company; and that the latter rival coal company owns or controls mines in the Kanawha coal fields and in the state of Ohio, and also produces and sells coal in competition with the Carbon Fuel Company. But it is not alleged that either relator or Zimmerman has any interest in said rival companies other than that derived from their employment. He alleges that if said rival coal companies employing relator and Zimmerman could obtain the information which relator seeks, it would be of great detriment to the Carbon Fuel Company and the companies whose coal it sells, including the Wake Forest Mining Company; but respondent does not allege that relator is seeking the information for the purpose of disclosing it to said rival companies, or that he would so disclose it, if he could get it. Relator demurred to respondent's return to the writ, and the court sustained the demurrer; and, respondent not desiring to make any other or further answer, a peremptory writ was awarded on the 11th day of November, 1907. To the judgment of the circuit court granting this writ respondent obtained a writ of error from this court. T. A. Bartlam, vice president and secretary of the Wake Forest Mining Company, and J. R. Thomas, another director, were also named as defendants in relator's petition. But they made their separate returns, expressing their willingness to permit relator to examine any and all records and books pertaining to the business of the company, and the proceeding was discontinued as to them.

The question which this record presents for our decision is: Has a director in a private corporation a right to know all the details of the business affairs of his corporation? The question would seem to answer itself. A director directs, guides, manages. He is one of the trustees, intrusted with the direction and management of the business pertaining to his corporation. Then is it not necessary that he should have all the information in regard to the affairs of his company that he can obtain, in order that he may direct its operations intelligently and according to his best judgment in the interest of all the stockholders whom he represents? Of what value to his company would his judgment and services as director be if the keeper of its accounts and records should withhold from him all information in regard to the details of the business? Can the general manager of a corporation, even though he be a director, withhold the books, records, and papers of which he is only the custodian, and which are the property of the whole corporation? We say not. The general manager is the creature of the directors, and his powers cannot exceed theirs. The creature is not greater than his creator. The director is a trustee or agent of his corporation. He is the trusted representative of all the stockholders, and is entitled to all the information belonging to his company that will enable him to manage and direct the affairs of his corporation to its best interests. His duties and responsibilities, and consequently his rights, are much greater than those of a mere stockholder, and at the common law even a stockholder was permitted to inspect the books and records of the corporation, provided he did so without interfering with its business operation, and, in order to defeat his right to do so, it was necessary to show that he wanted the information for some improper purpose. Cook on Stock and Stockholders (3d Ed.) § 511, thus states the law: "The stockholders of a corporation had at common law a right to examine at any reasonable time any one or all of the books and records of the corporation." And in the same section, in regard to the right of a director, he says: "A director has an absolute right to examine all the books of the company, even though he is hostile to the corporation. But in Connecticut a contrary rule is laid down where he is seeking information in order to organize a rival company"—citing the case of Hemlinway v. Hemlinway, 58 Conn. 443, 19 Atl. 766. This was an action for an assault brought by one director against another for an assault committed on him in taking from his possession a letter file which he was using for the purpose of copying the contents. It appears that there were only these two directors, and that they constituted the company, each owning one-half the stock, and that the one who complained of the assault was seeking the information for the purpose of forming a rival company. The assault was justified on the ground (1) that no more force was used than was necessary to take from him the papers; and (2) that the party assaulted was seeking to get the information for a purpose detrimental to the corporation. The right of a director to inspect the records of his company is thus stated in 10 Cyc. 770: "Every director has a right to inspect the books and records of the corporation in order to ascertain what the corporation is doing, and the majority of the board cannot lawfully exclude a minority from this right." The same doctrine is held in the following cases, viz.: Stone v. Kellogg, 62 Ill. App. 444; Phoenix Iron Co. v. Commonwealth ex rel. Sellers, 113 Pa. 563, 6 Atl. 75; State v. St. Louis, etc., Co., 124 Mo. App. 111, 100 S. W. 1126; People v. Central Fish Co., 117 App. Div. 77, 101 N. Y. Supp. 1108; People ex rel. Muir v. Throop, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 183; Lewis v. Brainerd, 53 Vt. 519; Huyilar v. Cragin Cattle Co., 40 N. J. Eq. 392, 2 Atl. 274; People ex rel. Richmond v. Pacific Mail Steamship Co., 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 280. See, also, High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 308; 2 Cook on Corp. (6th Ed.) § 511; Hellwell on Stock & Stockholders, § 337; 7 Thomp. Corp. § 8480; 5 Cur. Law, 834; and 2 Clark & Marshall on Corp. 1646.

But it is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that this common-law right of a director or a stockholder to inspect the records and papers of a corporation has been very much modified and limited in West Virginia by statute. Relator is both a stockholder and a director; but, inasmuch as he is seeking this information in his capacity as director, it is not necessary for us to decide, nor do we mean to decide, how far the common-law rights of a stockholder have been limited by our statute. We shall confine our observations alone to relator's right to have the inspection of the records and papers as a director. It is claimed that sections 43, 46, 47, 49, 51, 52, and 60 of chapter 53 of the Code (Code 1906, §§ 2272, 2275-2277, 2279, 2280, 2288) define the powers and duties of the board of directors of such a corporation as the one in which relator is director, and limit the actions, rights, and duties of the board of directors, and require that all action shall be by the board as a unit. If section 47 does not limit the common-law right of a director, none of the other sections referred to do so. It reads as follows: "The property and funds, books, correspondence, and papers of the corporation, in the possession or control of any officer or agent thereof, shall at all times be subject to the investigation of the board of directors, or a committee appointed for the purpose by a general meeting of the stockholders. The minutes of the resolutions and proceedings of the board shall for thirty days before the annual meeting of the stockholders, be open to the inspection of any committee appointed, in writing, by the holders of at least one-twentieth part of the total value of outstanding shares, or by the holder or holders of such number of shares. They shall be produced when required by the stockholders at any general meeting." What is the proper construction of the words "board of directors," as used in this section? It is claimed that, by the words "board of directors," the Legislature meant to limit the right of investigation to the board as a whole or as a unit, and that this section takes away the right of an individual member of the board to make such investigation, except at a board meeting; that, if such had not been the intention of the Legislature, the statute would have contained the words, "or any individual member thereof," following the words, "the board of directors." We do not think the Legislature intended to deny the right of individual investigation, nor do we think the statute should be given such an effect by construction. This court has announced the following rule in reference to the construction of statutes: "If the sense of a statute be doubtful, such construction should be given, if possible, as will not conflict with general principles of law." B. & L. Ass'n v. Sohn, 54 W. Va. 101, 46 S. E. 222. "Statutes changing the common law are strictly construed, and it is not further abrogated than the language of the statute clearly and necessarily requires." Lewis'

Suth. Stat. Const. (2d Ed.) § 573, and to the same effect is the case of Bailey v. Gardner, 31 W. Va. 94, 5 S. E. 636, 13 Am. St. Rep. 847.

The statute says the books, correspondence, and papers, etc., "shall at all times be subject to the investigation of the board of directors." This evidently means that the officer or agent of the corporation who has charge of such records, papers, etc., shall be ready at any reasonable time within business hours to exhibit them to any individual director who may desire to see them. Each director must see for himself. The board of directors, as a whole, could not make the investigation. They could not all conveniently read the same book or paper at one and the same time; and it is clear that the Legislature intended that each member should at some time have the right to investigate, with his own hands and eyes, and for himself, and it would be unreasonable to hold that it meant that each one could investigate only when they were all together, each examining in turn, until all had completed the investigation. Then, if each one has the right to inspect all the records with his own eyes at some time, what possible reason could there be for not permitting him to do so at a time which might best suit his own convenience, provided his doing so does not unnecessarily interfere with the business operation of his corporation? If there is no right of individual investigation by each director, and if the time and manner of making investigation must depend upon the action of the entire board at a meeting, the law would, in effect, give the majority members the power to deny to the minority the right to investigate certain parts of the record, papers, and correspondence at any time by voting down any resolution providing for an investigation that might be offered by the minority. The statute was not intended to have this effect, and to give it such would be an unreasonable construction.

There are other reasons apparent in the law why the right of individual examination of the records and papers should be given to each member of the board. The Constitution of 1872 evidently intended that the minority stockholders should have representation on the board of directors by providing cumulative voting in the election of directors. And why provide for this representation on the board if the advantage to be given by such representation is to be nullified by putting it in the power of the majority of the directors to deny the minority certain information with regard to the business of the corporation which might be of greatest importance to them in enabling them to guard the interests of those by whom they were elected? Furthermore, the law charges the directors with an important duty, and places upon them certain liabilities, and it may often be essential that they should have all the information concerning the business management of the corporation in order to protect themselves against individual liability as well as to enable them to discharge their duties as the agents, trustees, or directors of the corporate affairs. Again, the statute requires an annual report to be made each year by the board of directors of the business of the corporation for the benefit of its stockholders, which duty is upon the board as a whole. But the board is made up of individual members, each acting and casting his vote according to his best judgment and belief upon the information which he possesses. How, then, can he be expected to subscribe to a report dependent upon, and largely made up from, the more minute affairs and business details of the corporation, concerning which he has no individual knowledge? The law certainly requires each director to discharge his duty to his corporation with fidelity, and to the best of his ability, and does not intend that one member of the board should be charged with any greater duty, or held to any greater responsibility, than another, and designs that all the directors shall have equal rights. We construe the words "board of directors," as used in section 47, c. 53, Code, to apply to the board, both as a unit and also to each individual member composing the board of directors, and we hold that each individual director has the right to inspect "the property and funds, books, correspondence and papers of the corporation" at all reasonable times, and within reasonable hours, without unnecessarily interfering with the business operations of their company. It is not necessary for us to decide in this case nor do we decide, whether or not this right of examination by a director could be lawfully refused in the event it is shown that he sought the information for a purpose detrimental to the interest of the corporation, because this question does not arise in the case. Respondent's return to the writ does not allege that relator sought to make the investigation for the purpose of using the information he would obtain in a manner detrimental to his company. It is therefore unnecessary for us to decide what our holding would have been if it had been alleged that it was his intention to use the information for such a purpose. The question was decided on demurrer and the allegations of the return must be taken as true; but it is nowhere alleged that relator intended to use the information to the injury of his corporation.

We find no error in the judgment of the lower court, and will affirm it.

April 20, 1909.)1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 37*)—BILL—SUFFICIENCY—MENTAL INCAPACITY.

A bill to set aside and cancel a deed of trust on the ground of mental incapacity in the grantor to execute it, charging, with reasonable certainty as to time and relation to the event, committal of the plaintiff to an asylum for the insane, and not admitting or in any way disclosing a discharge therefrom or a lucid interval, is sufficient as to the allegation of mental incompetency.

2. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 37*)—BILL—SUFFICIENCY.

It is not essential to the sufficiency of such a bill that it allege fraud or undue influence in procurement of the execution of the deed.

3. EQUITY (§ 147*)—BILL—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Such a bill is not rendered multifarious by the incorporation therein, by way of inducement, argument, or aggravation, of foreign and immaterial matter which, set up in a bill for a different purpose, would afford ground for relief wholly different in character from that sought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RECORD ANSWER—PLEADING AS PART OF RECORD.

An answer, filed at rules, is a part of the record of the cause, and presumed to be a part of the foundation of the final decree, though not mentioned in any order in the cause, if process has been executed and sufficient time to regularly mature the cause has elapsed, and nothing to the contrary appears in the record.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1043*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INFORMALITY IN PROCEEDINGS.

A decree will not be reversed at the instance of a party who has taken depositions for an informality in the proceedings when it appears that there was a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and substantial justice has been done.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1043.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1170*)—HARMLESS ERROR—WANT OF REPLICATION.

If the defendant has taken depositions as if a replication to his answer had been filed, a decree against him will not be reversed for want of a replication.

7. DEEDS (§ 196*)—MENTAL CAPACITY—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Mental incompetency is presumed in respect to a deed executed by a person after he has been adjudged insane and before his discharge from the hospital in which he was confined, although, at the time of its execution, he was at home, under a permission or furlough, given by the hospital authorities; and the burden of proof is on the grantee to prove it was executed in a lucid interval.

8. DEEDS (§ 211*)—MENTAL CAPACITY—LUCID INTERVAL.

To sustain a deed as having been executed in a lucid interval the proof must be clear, going to the mental state and habit of the grantor, not merely to an accidental interview, or the degree of self-possession in a particular act. It must show the power and restriction of mind deemed necessary in general to the disposition and management of affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 639; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

9. COSTS (§ 238*)—ON APPEAL—PARTY INTRODUCING ERROR.

An appellant who in the court below induced an error, consisting of failure to insert a saving clause, by introducing in his answer a matter foreign to the bill, and failing to ask for a reservation of his rights, respecting the same, may have the error corrected in the appellate court, but will not be allowed costs for such error alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Bill by John Towner against Maggie Towner and another. Decree for complainant, and Maggie Towner appeals. Modified and affirmed.

G. W. Farr, A. F. McCue, and L. W. Chapman, for appellant. Jas. A. Watson, Freer & Robinson, and J. W. Stuck, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. On the 11th day of January, 1905, John Towner entered into a contract, by which he agreed to pay his wife, Maggie Towner, $1,000, without interest, in installments of $100 each, the first of which was to become due on the 15th day of December, 1905, and the others on the 15th days of each succeeding December, until all should be paid. The agreement further provided for a separation of the parties. On the 14th day of January, 1905, Towner executed a deed of trust on his farm, containing 79 acres and 40 poles, to secure the payment of said sum, and made L. W. Chapman trustee therein. The trustee published a notice of a sale of the property, to be made on the 31st day of March, 1906; default having been made in the payment of said first installment. Thereupon Towner presented in the circuit court of Doddridge county his bill in equity against Maggie Towner and the trustee, praying an injunction to prevent the sale, setting up fraud in the procurement of the deed of trust and his mental incompetency to execute the same, and prayed cancellation thereof. An injunction in conformity with the prayer of the bill was awarded on the 16th day of March, 1906. At May rules, 1906, defendant, Maggie Towner, filed her demurrer and answer to the bill. Depositions having been taken, the case was submitted to the court on the 17th day of May, 1907, when a decree was pronounced, canceling, annulling, and setting aside the deed of trust and perpetuating the injunction, from which decree the said Maggie Towner has appealed.

The first assignment of error is predicated on the overruling of the demurrer. Under this heading it is said (1) the bill does not sufficiently charge insanity; (2) it does not sufficiently charge the exercise of undue influence; (3) it is multifarious; (4) the charge of fraud is insufficient; (5) it is unintelligible and uncertain, allegations purporting to charge matters resting in the knowledge of the plaintiff and those stated to be upon information and belief being so intermingled as to be inseparable. The bill charges that prior to the 16th day of January, 1905, on the ——— day of ———, 1904, plaintiff's mind became affected, and he was by legal proceedings committed to an insane asylum, where he remained as a patient and inmate until December, 1905. It further says that while his mind was thus affected and weakened "he was wholly unable to transact business, but had no power to exercise mental thought or consideration." These charges or statements are substantially repeated in the bill. We think they amount to a sufficient allegation of insanity. The bill says the plaintiff had been adjudged insane and committed to an asylum. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it is presumed that his insanity continued. Eakin v. Hawkins, 52 W. Va. 124, 129, 43 S. E. 211. There is no intimation of restoration to sanity. The allegations as to undue influence are somewhat lacking as regards specification of improper conduct on the part of the defendant. For the most part they are general, saying she obtained advantages over him by her power and persuasion, while he was mentally weak, in fact, insane, and that he was persuaded and induced by his wife while in that condition to execute the deed of trust. In other places it charges generally that she cheated, defrauded, and robbed him of his money and property while he was absolutely insane, and while she knew him to be so, and susceptible to her influence as a child would be. Whatever may be said of this as a defect, or whether it is one or not, a sufficient ground for relief sustaining the action of the court is found in the charge of insanity. The charge of multifariousness is based on certain clauses, imputing desertion, abandonment, and other improper conduct to the defendant. These clauses, however, do not purport to state a cause of action. No prayer for relief is predicated upon them. Neither a divorce nor any other judicial action respecting the marital relation of the parties is sought. We think there is nothing in the other grounds of demurrer assigned. The bill is intelligible, and the distinction between matters stated upon the plaintiff's knowledge and those stated upon information and belief is reasonably clear.

There is nothing in the complaint founded on alleged failure to give time for an answer after the overruling of the demurrer. As has been stated, the answer was filed at rules. The statute permits this, and, as it is found in the record and depositions were taken and filed, it must be treated as in the case and raising the issues, although it is not mentioned in any decree, nor replied to. Nor is the decree reversible for failure to recite the cause was heard on the answer, or for want of a general replication. As process was issued and executed, the bill and answer filed and depositions taken, and sufficient time elapsed to mature the cause for hearing, it is presumed it was regularly matured for hearing, nothing to the contrary appearing on the record. Riggs v. Lockwood, 12 W. Va. 133; Linsey v. McGammon, 9 W. Va. 154. If any aid to this presumption is necessary, it is found in the recital, saying the cause was heard "upon all former orders, decrees, and proceedings" had therein. This harmonizes with the last clause of section 4, c. 134, Code 1906 (section 4035), saying: "Nor shall a decree be reversed at the instance of a party who has taken depositions, for an informality in the proceedings, when it appears that there was a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done." No decree can be reversed for want of a replication to the answer if the defendant has taken depositions as if one had been filed. Code 1906, c. 134, § 4 (section 4035); Chalfants v. Martin, 25 W. Va. 394; Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685. As we have said, the adjudication of insanity raised a presumption against the defendant. Ordinarily there is a presumption of sanity placing the burden upon the party attacking the conveyance on the ground of insanity; but, if the grantor has been previously adjudged insane, or general mental derangement established by proof, it is presumed the infirmity continued, and the burden is cast upon the party endeavoring to uphold the deed. Neither presumption is conclusive. Either can be overthrown. Besides, some insane persons have lucid intervals, and, if a deed be executed or a contract made in such an interval, it is valid. Beverage's Committee v. Ralston, 98 Va. 625, 37 S. E. 283; McPeck v. Graham, 56 W. Va. 200, 49 S. E. 125; Bishop on Con. § 959; Fishburne v. Ferguson's Heirs, 84 Va. 87, 107, 4 S. E. 575. In order to sustain the burden so thrown upon him, the party relying upon the deed or other instrument must clearly prove mental competency at the date of execution; and the proof must go to the state and habit, not to the accidental interview or the degree of self-possession in any particular act. Fishburne v. Ferguson, cited. A leading case on this subject is Attorney General v. Parther, 3 Bro. 5, 441, in which Lord Thurlow said: "The evidence in support of a lucid interval, them; but for a single offense committed by such an agent or servant in violation of the rules of such company, and contrary to its positive instructions, this court has held in at least two cases, and we think rightly, that the railroad company is not liable. State v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 803; Hall v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 36, 28 S. E. 754, 41 L. R. A. 669, 67 Am. St. Rep. 757.

The finding and judgment of the court below will therefore be set aside and reversed, and judgment of acquittal entered here, and the defendant discharged from further prosecution in this behalf.

HALL v. MCGREGOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1909. Rehearing Denied May

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 453*)—JUDGMENT—INDIVIDUAL JUDGMENT.

A judgment against one styled as executrix, without recovery to be had from goods and chattels in her hands to be administered, is not a judgment against the estate, but an individual judgment against the person so styled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1899, 1902; Dec. Dig. § 453.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 111*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—LIABILITY OF REPRESENTATIVE.

A personal representative is individually liable for compensation to an attorney for services rendered on behalf of the estate, at the instance of such representative.

3. EQUITY (§ 269*)—BILL—AMENDMENT.

If the identity of the originally intended cause of suit is preserved, the particular allegations of a bill in equity may be changed by amendment, in order to cure imperfections and mistakes in the manner of stating plaintiff's case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 552-556; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 414*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

A judgment cannot be assailed in equity upon pleadings which fail to show affirmatively some reason, founded in fraud, surprise, accident, mistake, or adventitious circumstance beyond the control of the party complaining, why the defense was not made at law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ritchie County.
Bill by Cyrus Hall against Matilda McGreggor and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. H. McGreggor and S. A. Powell, for appellants. Freer & Robinson, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. A clear disposition of the case demands a statement somewhat in detail. The plaintiff claimed compensation for services rendered as an attorney of the estate of David McGreggor, deceased, upon employment therefor by Matilda McGreggor, the executrix. Upon such cause of action plaintiff recovered a judgment before a justice of the peace for the sum of $300. The action proceeded against Matilda McGreggor, "executrix of the last will and testament of David McGreggor, deceased." Executions on the judgment, in like form, were returned by a constable "No property found." Thereupon plaintiff instituted his suit in equity for the enforcement of his judgment against the lands of which David McGreggor died seised and possessed. In the bill these lands were alleged to have been devised by the will to the said Matilda McGreggor. The judgment was alleged to be a lien on the lands aforesaid. For its payment a sale of the lands was prayed. Between the time of the rendition of the judgment and the institution of the suit for its enforcement against the lands, Matilda McGreggor and the children of David McGreggor, deceased, who were litigating as to the estate, compromised their controversy. Matilda McGreggor's title to portions of the real estate was defined. She quitclaimed to the children as to other portions of it. She resigned as executrix. The plaintiff's bill for the sale of the lands named her as late executrix, widow, and devisee. The children were parties to the bill. With Matilda McGreggor they answered after their demurrer had been overruled, resisting the enforcement of the judgment, alleging that it was obtained by fraud. The substance of this charge was that, after instituting the action, plaintiff had represented to Matilda McGreggor that he would not proceed to judgment therein; that he thereby caused no defense to be interposed. Special replications were filed and evidence was taken. At this point it seems conceded that a ruling of the court brought to the attention of counsel the fact that the judgment, in its form aforesaid, particularly upon such cause of action, was merely a personal one against Matilda McGreggor. There was reference to a commissioner to ascertain what real estate, if any, the judgment was a lien upon, to whom that real estate belonged, and other pertinent matters. The commissioner reported that the judgment was a lien on the real estate of Matilda McGreggor, and described that real estate. The greater part of this real estate, it would appear, was that allotted to her by the compromise. That part was real estate of which David McGregor died seised and possessed, and that part, at least, was real estate which the bill sought to subject to the payment of the judgment. Numerous exceptions to the report were indorsed by these defendants. It appeared that proper and necessary parties, holders of vendors' liens as to some of said real estate, were not before the court. The exceptions at the time were not passed upon, and the case was remanded to rules, with leave to the plaintiff to amend the bill by making new parties, and any additional allegations necessary and material for the proper presentation of his cause. The bill was amended. Complete new process issued thereon, and the cause again matured. The amended bill fitted the case to the findings of the commissioner, and prayed for the enforcement of the judgment against the lands of Matilda McGregor as a personal judgment against her, and not as a judgment or claim having to do with the real estate of the decedent. Demurrer to the amended bill being overruled, specific answer was made on the part of Matilda McGregor, and separate answer as to said children. She denied that the judgment was one against her personally. It was further asserted that the plaintiff never intended his judgment to be personal against her, and that he had never so treated it until the aforesaid ruling of the court was made; that she had been misled in believing that the judgment was not being sought against her personally, but against the estate of which she was executrix at the time, and that she therefore made no defense to it. It was further alleged that the returns on the executions did not apply to her personally, and that she had property out of which the executions could have been made. The judgment was attacked as being rendered without notice to her. Any debt of Matilda McGregor to plaintiff was denied, and an injunction against the enforcement of the judgment was asked. To these answers special replies were made. Depositions were taken relative to matters raised upon such issue. Then followed a decree adjudicating that the judgment was a valid and existing lien on the real estate of Matilda McGregor; that said judgment was a personal one against her; that the words "executrix of the last will and testament of David McGregor, deceased," were merely descriptive. The relief prayed for in the answers was denied. The report of the commissioner was set aside. Reference was had to a special master for ascertainment and report of the real estate of Matilda McGregor upon which the aforesaid judgment was a lien, the nature of her estate therein, and other proper matters. Upon the report being returned there was final decree in the case for the amount of the judgment, its interest and costs, in favor of the plaintiff against Matilda McGregor, providing for a renting of the real estate ascertained to be owned by her in the event she should not pay the same within the day fixed. It is from these decrees that we now have this appeal.

There is much in the record that should not be there. Extended evidence has been produced, the greater part of which is improper or irrelevant to a proper conception of the case. Our consideration of the record shall be limited to those matters upon which correct decision turns.

Is the judgment a personal one against Mrs. McGregor? Yes, clearly so. Thompson & Lively v. Mann, 53 W. Va. 432, 44 S. E. 246; Hanson v. Blake, 63 W. Va. 560, 60 S. E. 589. This is true, not only because of the form of the judgment and the statement of the account filed before the justice upon which it is based, but it is forcibly true by reason of the very substance of the cause of action. A personal representative is individually liable for compensation to an attorney for services, rendered at the instance of such representative, on behalf of the estate. 2 Woerner's American Law of Administration, § 356; 18 Cyc. 882; Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 33 S. E. 310, 76 Am. St. Rep. 828. The representative has recourse for reimbursement for reasonable expenditures in such behalf, in his settlement with the estate.

The amendment to the bill was not absolutely essential to the enforcement of the judgment as a personal one against Mrs. McGregor. The original bill set forth this judgment so that its legal effect was most apparent, and asked that it be enforced out of the lands of which David McGregor died seised and possessed. These lands were therein alleged to have been devised to Mrs. McGregor. Yet the amendment was regular and proper. It cured imperfections in the manner of stating plaintiff's case. It made no new case. The identity of the original cause of suit was preserved. That cause of suit was the enforcement of this same judgment against this same real estate, or real estate of which that mentioned in the amended bill is a part. The same parties remained involved. The end sought by the amendment is precisely the same as that originally intended by the plaintiff—the collection of his judgment. In Hanson v. Blake, supra, we recently held: "So long as the form of action is not changed, and the court can see that the identity of the originally intended cause of action is preserved, the particular allegations of the declaration may be changed by amendment in order to cure imperfections and mistakes in the manner of stating plaintiff's case." Certainly the rule is not more rigid in equity. Indeed it is the same. Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 43, 20 S. E. 852; Hogg's Equity Procedure, § 327. The rule in equity demands simply that a new, substantive cause of suit be not introduced; that the identity of the cause of suit be preserved. By this amendment the plaintiff's case was simply made to conform to the real equities in his favor which the progress of the cause disclosed as those related to his originally intended object of that suit. That object was to collect his judgment out of the lands. If it appeared that the real character and force of the judgment was mistakenly or imperfectly alleged, it was right to correct this error by amendment. And even if it appeared that the ownership of the lands was erroneously set forth, there could properly be amendment as to this fact, so long as the original object was sought—the collection of the same judgment from the same real estate, and especially as between the same parties. The demurrers were rightly overruled.

There would be little finality and stability to judgments were it possible to overthrow them upon the facts alleged in the answers in this case. As to the charge of fraud in the original answer, it suffices to note that there is no denial of notice of the judgment within the time for appeal therefrom, nor anything making a case of fraud, surprise, accident, mistake, or adventitious circumstance sufficient to affect the force and validity of the judgment in view of the failure of Mrs. McGregor to take advantage against it directly at law. The allegations of the answer to the amended bill, calling for affirmative relief, do not make a case of fraud, surprise, accident, mistake, or adventitious circumstance beyond control of the party complaining, as against this judgment. Such case is necessary to relief in equity from a judgment at law. This principle needs no citation of authorities. It has become a maxim of equity. The judgment from its rendition had a legal effect. Its legal import was that of a judgment against Mrs. McGregor. She is chargeable with knowledge of this import. Failure to be properly advised in the premises in time to destroy the legal effect of the judgment, if it was erroneous, was her own act. Diligence on her part in seeking advice of good counsel would, if there was error, have saved her. Equity cannot excuse lack of diligence, which is only another name for negligence. But the case set up by her in this answer is in truth overcome by the facts disclosed as a whole therein. She, in effect, assumes and admits the judgment to be one properly payable by the estate. Viewing the judgment as she does in this answer, she, as executrix, admitted, by making no defense to the claim in the manner provided by law, that the cause of action was a just one. And the facts stated by her show that, if the original cause of action upon which the judgment is based was just, then because of its nature she is liable personally. The effect of her answer is to say that the plaintiff did render the services as attorney to the estate for which she was executrix, at her instance, for which he should be paid by that estate, and not by her. Yet this very statement shows her liability for the same individually, and supports the validity of the judgment as a personal one against her. She cannot defeat a judgment that appears from her pleading itself to be right.

It seems that Mrs. McGregor was misadvised in the premises. That fact cannot overthrow a proper decree. It is simply unfortunate. Costs have been incurred unnecessarily. And it clearly appears that the plaintiff was also erroneously advised concerning the true purport of his judgment for a time. However, since in the latter stages of the case it is practically admitted that there is no controversy as to the amount and justice of plaintiff's claim for services, but only as to who should pay it, it does not appear inequitable or unjust in any particular that the decree should have applied the correct legal rule as to individual liability on the part of the executrix.

As to the contention that the returns of no property found do not relate to Mrs. McGregor individually, and that she had sufficient personal property out of which the amount of the executions could have been made, we must view these returns in the same light as we do the judgment. And a return of no property found, as a basis of right to proceed in equity for enforcement of a judgment against land, we hold to be conclusive as between the parties. 17 Cyc. 1379; Smith v. Triplett, 4 Leigh (Va.) 590. The statute is: "The lien of a judgment may be enforced in a court of equity after an execution of fieri facias thereon has been duly returned, to the office of the court or to the justice from which it issued, showing by the return thereon that no property could be found from which such execution could be made." Code 1899, c. 139, § 7 (Code 1906, § 4147). This statute demands a return showing no property found, nothing more, as a basis of suit. Here we have such showing by returns on the executions that were issued on the judgment. Can we say that the statute requires more? It merely requires the showing of such return. It does not demand that there shall in fact be no property. If the officer is derelict, there is complete remedy on his bond. And the return cannot be attacked by showing that sufficient property existed, because the plaintiff has done all required by the statute when he shows such return. It is not a question of the existence of sufficient property, but the existence of such return of an officer. Fraud and collusion in making such return, for the purpose of basing a suit thereon without resort to personal property, may alter the rule. Newlon v. Wade, 43 W. Va. 283, 27 S. E. 244. But nothing short of such fraud and collusion does alter it. No sufficient case in that particular has been made, although insisted upon and argued. The plaintiff has not been successfully impugned in connection with the making of the returns on the executions upon his judgment. The officer may have been at fault.

Complaint against the decree because it provided for executions to issue thereon as at law is without merit. By statute, decrees for land or specific personal property, and for the payment of money, are placed on the same footing as are judgments therefor. Code 1899, c. 139, §§ 1, 2 (Code 1906, §§ 4141, 4142). An execution may issue on such decree. This law is indeed old. Tate v. Liggett, 2 Leigh (Va.) 101; Windrum v. Parker, 2 Leigh (Va.) 369; 4 Minor's Inst. (3d Ed.) 984.

In the light of the foregoing observations, which, we think, sufficiently dispose of the various assignments of error, we affirm the decrees.

SCHILB v. MOON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 27, 1909.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 342*) —
SALE OF REALTY—PAYMENT OF DECEDENT'S DEBTS.

If, pending a suit to subject land to the payment of a judgment, the judgment debtor dies, and his heirs to whom the land descended are made parties, the suit thus becomes one to sell the land of the heirs for the debt of the decedent, and, before a sale is decreed, the accounts of the administrator of the decedent must be settled and the unadministered assets, if any, ascertained and administered by the court in relief of the realty descended to the heirs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by Jacob Schilb against Eliza Hendrickson and others. Decree for plaintiff, and one of the defendants appeals. Reversed.

V. B. Archer and William Beard, for appellant. McCluer & McCluer, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. A former decision in this case is reported in 50 W. Va. 47, 40 S. E. 329. The decree complained of in that appeal was reversed. It was a decree subrogating the plaintiff to the rights of the Second National Bank of Parkersburg as to the judgment paid that bank by him, and giving him a personal judgment for the amount thereof against Anna Moon and others. It was held error to have pronounced such decree without the bank's having been a party to the cause. The right of subrogation as decreed was upheld. After that decree had been entered, Anna Moon died. The appeal was prosecuted and the reversal procured by her administrator. The cause was remanded. Thereafter the bank and the heirs of Anna Moon were made parties. Amended bills were filed, and the cause was prosecuted to a decree for the sale of the land owned by Anna Moon at the time of her death, for the payment of the judgment to which plaintiff was subrogated. One of the heirs, who had not appeared, and as to whom the cause had been heard upon the bill taken for confessed, moved pursuant to section 5, c. 134, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 4036), at a subsequent term, to set aside and reverse the decree for errors. This motion was overruled. That party has appealed from the decree for sale of the land which descended to her and others from Anna Moon, still relying upon the errors assigned in her motion to reverse below.

The decree for sale must be reversed. It is plainly erroneous. It directs the sale of the real estate of a decedent to pay a judgment lien before the accounts of the administrator have been settled, and the unadministered assets, if any, have been ascertained and administered by the court in relief of the realty descended to the heirs. Laidley v. Kline, 8 W. Va. 218; Boggs v. McCoy, 15 W. Va. 344; Hart v. Hart, 31 W. Va. 688, 8 S. E. 562; Kilbreth v. Root, 33 W. Va. 600, 11 S. E. 21. There was no allegation by the plaintiff that there was absolutely no personal estate applicable to the judgment. Therefore that fact has not been taken for confessed as to the defendant now complaining. On the other hand, the plaintiff by his own pleadings shows that there was some personal estate. This fact clearly appears throughout the record. The administrator answered that there was ample personal estate to pay the debt. Unless the contrary had been confessed by the nonappearance of the defendant who brings this appeal, it was, as to her, plain error to disregard the existence of this personal estate and make decree, in the very teeth of the fact, reciting that it appeared that decedent had no personal estate "out of which the judgment * * * could be made." Perhaps the judgment could not have been made wholly out of the personal assets; but it was a certainty that assets existed which could be and should have been applied on the judgment before the entry of any decree for sale of the land of the heirs. At any rate, the fact that no personal assets existed was not alleged, and was not confessed as to appellant. Hence it was the court's duty toward her to ascertain, by a settlement of the accounts of the administrator, whether or not such assets existed, and, if they did exist to any extent, to apply them properly toward the relief of the realty. Appellant can surely complain that her land has been charged with a decree for a larger sum than it should pay. She cannot, to relieve her real estate, be compelled to pay off that which the personal assets of the decedent, though ever so small in amount, should pay. This is old law. It is soundest equity. The land descended to the heirs subject only to the amount of the debts of decedent remaining after the personal assets are applied thereon. This decree has subjected that land to sale for the payment of a larger debt than it should pay. Even in suits on a vendor's lien against land of a decedent the personal assets must be settled and administered before a sale of the land is ordered. Bierne v. Brown's Adm'r, 10 W. Va. 748; Sommerville v. Sommerville, 26 W. Va. 482. In any case where land descends to an heir, it can be charged as against him with only the amount of debts of the decedent which the personality fails to pay.

The court heard the cause upon the report of a commissioner made before Anna Moon's death and before appellant was a party to the cause. This was error as to appellant, except as to such matters relied upon in that report which were alleged in the pleadings against her and confessed by her nonappearance. After Anna Moon died and the heirs were made parties, the suit, by the very force of events, assumed an entirely different character from that which it had when that report was made. The report should not have been relied upon in view of the new phase of the suit, and of the new parties whose rights could not be prejudiced by such finding. It was not pertinent to that which the suit had in fact become—one to sell the land of a decedent, descended to heirs, for that decedent's debt. We do not specifically inquire what harm was done appellant by the court's reliance upon this old report of a commissioner. It is enough to say that the looking to it, after there was a complete change in the character of the suit and the parties thereto, was not consistent with the rights then to be determined.

The mandate will be that the decree for sale be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for further proceedings to be had pursuant to the principles herein announced and according to equity.

DEPUE et al. v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 14, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 48*)—CONVEYANCES BETWEEN.

If a husband convey land directly to his wife, and she, in turn, attempt to reconvey it directly to him, by executing a deed to him, and after her death he convey it to a third person, and then die, the equitable title is in the heirs of the wife by descent, and the legal title in such third person or his successors in title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 242, 243; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 917*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION IN FAVOR OF CORRECTNESS OF DECISION.

A general demurrer to a bill in equity challenges its sufficiency in all respects, and a decree sustaining such a demurrer is presumed, in the appellate court, to rest upon any sufficient ground disclosed by the bill, even though it was not assigned in writing, as a ground of demurrer, while others, not well taken, were.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3708; Dec. Dig. § 917.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—WRONG REASON FOR CORRECT DECISION.

A sound decree, sustaining a demurrer, should not be reversed merely because the trial court assigned an erroneous or incorrect reason therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3408, 3411; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 19*)—JURISDICTION—EQUITABLE TITLE.

A purely equitable title cannot be maintained in a court of law, and, for that reason, all relief, respecting the same, must be sought in a court of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 46, 47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 5*)—EQUITABLE RIGHTS.

The statute of limitations never runs against a right, the vindication of which belongs to the exclusive jurisdiction of the equity courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 13, 15; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

6. EQUITY (§ 17*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 106*)—LEGAL ESTATES—RECOGNITION.

Courts of equity recognize legal estates and titles, and in such courts such titles prevail over equitable ones. A title to land, acquired by adverse possession, is respected in courts of equity as well as in courts of law.

7. EQUITY (§ 71*)—LACHES.

Laches will bar a purely equitable demand, and the period of delay allowed depends upon the peculiar circumstances of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

8. EQUITY (§ 72*)—LACHES.

If the right of the plaintiff is clear and not dependent upon oral evidence, and no injury or prejudice to the defendant has resulted from the delay, as by the death of parties, change of conditions, loss of evidence, or the like, the cause of action is not barred by laches, unless the lapse of time and the circumstances are such as to raise a presumption of intent, on the part of the plaintiff, to abandon or relinquish the right.

9. EQUITY (§ 71*)—LACHES.

Mere forbearance to compel rendition of a just debt or other right, the existence of which is clear beyond doubt, does not prejudice the party from whom it is due, and it is not inequitable to enforce rendition thereof after long delay; but if the length of time be long enough in itself, or with the aid of circumstances and conduct, to satisfy the chancellor that the plaintiff had abandoned his right before he brought suit to enforce it, his demand will be regarded as stale and lost by laches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 209; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

10. EQUITY (§ 71*)—LACHES.

Delay, for a period less than 20 years, in the assertion of an exclusively equitable demand, fully proven by documentary evidence, under circumstances not in any way operating to the prejudice of the defendants, and tending to negative the inference of intent on the part of the plaintiff to abandon or relinquish the right, will not bar relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 204; 206; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

11. EQUITY (§ 75*)—LACHES.

Moral as well as legal considerations, such as ignorance of law or regard for the feelings of relatives, will be considered and given weight in determining whether the plaintiff has abandoned his cause of action; but such considerations do not relieve from, or stay, the statute of limitations, nor excuse delay, working prejudice by death of parties, loss of evidence, or other similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 227; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

12. CURTESY (§ 8*)—ESTATES SUBJECT TO.

A husband has an estate by the curtesy, after the death of his wife, in lands which he had voluntarily settled upon her, if he did not, in express terms or by plain implication, relinquish such right in the instrument of conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtesy, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

13. CURTESY (§ 11*)—ESTATES SUBJECT TO.

As the husband's estate by the curtesy in his wife's real estate is given by the law for reasons of public policy, and not created by contract between the husband and wife, no presumption of intention to preclude it arises from the mere fact of a conveyance from the former to the latter, however it may have been effected.

14. EQUITY (§ 150*)—BILL—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

If, under the circumstances stated in point 1 of this syllabus, the husband, after the death of the wife, has conveyed a portion of the land to persons who have, in turn, conveyed it, in separate portions, to others, so that it constitutes two tracts claimed by different persons, the heirs may assert their rights as to both of such tracts against all the interested parties in a single suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Bill by Hal. H. Depue and others against H. W. Miller and others. Decree for defendants, and complainants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Cunningham & Harper, for appellants.
Pendleton & Boggess, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. In the circuit court of Roane county a demurrer to the bill of Hal. H. Depue and others, heirs at law of Henry Depue, was sustained and the bill dismissed. From this decree the plaintiffs have appealed.

The object of the suit is the cancellation of a number of deeds to clear the alleged title of the plaintiffs from cloud and obtain an accounting for timber taken from the land. They are out of possession, but the bill proceeds upon the theory of an equitable title only in the plaintiffs, which will not sustain an action at law for the recovery of possession. The facts alleged are substantially as follows: The ancestor being the owner of two tracts of land, the home place, containing 275 acres, and the Ward land, containing 433 acres, made a deed, on the 21st day of December, 1880, by which he conveyed both of said tracts directly to his wife, Anna B. C. Depue. Thereafter they resided together on the home place, until the death of the wife about July 19, 1889; but on the 25th day of May, 1889, about two months before her death, the wife attempted directly to reconvey all the land back to her husband. In neither transaction was there a conveyance from both husband and wife to a trustee and then a conveyance by the trustee back to one of them. More than two years after the death of the wife, the husband, by deed, dated October 2, 1891, conveyed 103 acres out of the 433-acre tract to Julia A. Bridwell and Walter Bridwell. On the 9th day of June, 1892, the Bridwells conveyed to John C. and Ira S. Bartlett 35¼ acres of the land so conveyed to them. On the residue thereof they executed a deed of trust to Walter Pendleton, trustee, to secure a debt due to H. W. Miller, under which it was sold; Miller purchasing it. On February 23, 1903, the Bartletts conveyed their part of the 103-acre tract and some other land to Sidney Wine, who has possession thereof, while the other is in the possession of Miller. Both tracts have been denuded of their timber by these purchasers. Henry Depue died about the 3d day of January, 1907, and this suit was commenced on the 16th day of February, 1907.

If it shall appear that the plaintiffs have only an equitable title to the land, a court of equity is the only forum in which it can be vindicated, and the bill should have been entertained, unless it is multifarious or relief is barred by laches. No other conceivable grounds of defense appear on its face. If, on the contrary, they have the legal title, giving a right of action at law, they have no standing in a court of equity to recover possession, for they do not need its aid, nor to remove a cloud from the title because they are out of possession. In order to maintain a bill to remove cloud from title, the plaintiff must have not only the legal title, but possession of the land as well. Mackey v. Maxin, 63 W. Va. 14, 59 S. E. 742; Harr v. Shaffer, 45 W. Va. 709, 31 S. E. 905; Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353; Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682.

Indubitably the deed from Henry Depue to his wife vested in her the equitable title to the land (McKenzie v. Ohio River R. R. Co., 27 W. Va. 306), and the deed from the wife back to the husband was utterly void (Smith v. Vineyard, 58 W. Va. 98, 51 S. E. 871; Austin v. Brown, 37 W. Va. 634, 17 S. E. 207; Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 216). Obviously at the date of the death of the wife she held the equitable title and the husband the legal title. On her death the former went to the plaintiffs by descent. If the legal title remained in the husband until his death, it also passed to them on his death, and, the legal and equitable titles being so united in them, their remedy at law would be clear and adequate; but, as to the land involved here, he conveyed that title to the Bridwells, long before he died. Though he may have had no moral right to do so, he had the power, and did it. Though the conveyance was in violation of the trust, he made it, and his deed passed such title as he had. Atkinson v. College, 54 W. Va. 32, 43, 46 S. E. 253; Patteson v. Horsley, 29 Grat. (Va.) 262. This being true, the legal and beneficial estates remained separate after the death of Henry Depue, the former in the hands of the grantees, immediate and remote, and the latter in the hands of the heirs; and we have the situation presented in the case of Blake v. O'Neal, 63 W. Va. 483, 61 S. E. 410, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1147. Not having the legal title, the plaintiffs are utterly unable to obtain standing in a court of law to test the right of possession and title, and are wholly without remedy elsewhere than in a court of equity. In all such cases there is of necessity jurisdiction in equity. Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682; Blake v. O'Neal, cited; Kinports v. Rawson, 36 W. Va. 242, 15 S. E. 66; Swick v. Reese, 62 W. Va. 557, 560, 59 S. E. 510.

Multifariousness, charged against the bill, would preclude an adjudication on the merits, if sustained; but we are of the opinion that the plaintiffs could properly proceed against both tracts of land in one suit. Their demand as to each is founded upon the same title, and the primary relief sought as to each is the same. The differences relate merely to the parties defendant and the subsidiary or sequential matter of accounting. Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682, has been invoked as a precedent, applying the doctrine of multifariousness under the conditions here presented; but there are material differences which comparison will reveal. All the defendants are alike interested in the vital questions presented, title, appropriateness of the remedy, and sufficiency of the bill. In Moore v. McNutt, the titles were strange and hostile. We think Gains v. Chew, 2 How. (U. S.) 619, 11 L. Ed. 402, in which the objection was overruled, is more in accord with this case in its facts, circumstances, and relation of parties.

More than 15 years elapsed between the date of the deed to the Bridwells and the bringing of this suit, and on this disclosure the defense of laches is asserted here in argument, but was not brought to the attention of the court below by any written assignment thereof as a ground of demurrer. That this defense may be raised in this state by a demurrer has been long since firmly settled. Whittaker v. S. West Virginia, etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507; Hogg's Eq. Prin. p. 419; Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 304. Failure to assign laches as a ground of demurrer is made the basis of a contention that it was not passed upon by the trial court. The statutory rule, declared in section 29 of chapter 125 of the Code of 1899 (Code 1906, § 8349) would not apply for the reason that certain other grounds were assigned, if it were ever applicable to demurrers in equity; but it affects only demurrers at law. Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 613, 619, 15 S. E. 223. No causes of demurrer need be assigned in equity cases. It suffices to say the bill is not sufficient in law. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. 468. As such a demurrer challenges the sufficiency of the bill, it makes all the reasons available on the hearing. The trial court sustained the demurrer to this bill, because, in its opinion, there is an adequate remedy at law, as we perceive from the terms of the decree, saving to the plaintiffs their right of action at law. While this, as we have indicated, was an erroneous view of the status of the parties, it amounts only to the assignment of an erroneous reason for a correct decree, if the bar of laches exists, which does not vitiate it. If the judgment, decision, or ruling of the trial court is correct on any legal ground, it will be affirmed, although the reasons assigned by the court below are erroneous. Ballard v. Chewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. 170; Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. (Va.) 423; Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. (Va.) 555; Silshy v. Foote, 14 How. (U. S.) 219, 14 L. Ed. 394; Corning v. Troy, etc., Factory, 15 How. (U. S.) 451, 14 L. Ed. 768. A correct ruling upon a demurrer will be sustained, though an insufficient reason for it has been stated. Tatum v. Tatum, 111 Ala. 209, 20 South. 341; Sechrist v. Rialto Irrigation Dist., 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261.

Having concluded, upon the authorities and principles above stated, that the defense of laches was raised by the demurrer, it becomes necessary to determine whether it appears upon the face of the bill. The demand is purely an equitable one. In other words, it is cognizable only in a court of equity as we have stated. The statute of limitations therefore does not apply, and in such cases courts of equity do not recognize, and are not controlled by, the period of limitation fixed by the statute. Newberger v. Wells, 51 W. Va. 624, 42 S. E. 625. Whether relief in equity is precluded by the delay is determined by the court, in such cases, according to equitable rules and principles. Cramer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594. The bill presents no element of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, respecting the equitable title. They derived that by inheritance from their mother, who was no party to the deed executed to the Bridwells. The defendants contracted with the father alone. An allegation in the bill indicates the existence of an impression or belief, on the part of the plaintiffs, that they had no right of action or remedy at law or in equity until after the death of their father, and under the principles declared in McNeeley v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. 508, 63 L. R. A. 562, they were not bound to sue until after the death of the father, if he had an estate by the curtesy in the land. Having voluntarily settled the land upon his wife, by the deed executed to her, he had no such estate, as tested by certain Virginia decisions. Sayers v. Wall, 26 Grat. (Va.) 354, 21 Am. Rep. 303; Irvine v. Greever, 32 Grat. (Va.) 411; Dugger v. Dugger, 84 Va. 130, 4 S. E. 171; Jones v. Jones, 96 Va. 753, 32 S. E. 463; Ratliff v. Ratliff, 102 Va. 887, 47 S. E. 1007. However, none of these decisions are binding upon us, and they are against the great weight of authority throughout the country. In no other state, so far as we have observed, do the courts so hold. There are some decisions, construing deeds and wills, in which the terms used plainly indicate intention to exclude the husband from curtesy and give effect to such intent. Rigler v. Cloud, 14 Pa. 361; Stokes v. McKibbin, 13 Pa. 267; McCulloch v. Valentine, 24 Neb. 215, 38 N. W. 854; Poole v. Blake, 53 Ill. 495. But when there are no such terms in the deed from husband to wife or to a trustee for her separate use, he is not deprived of his curtesy anywhere except in Virginia. 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 522; Ogden v. Ogden, 60 Ark. 70, 28 S. W. 796, 46 Am. St. Rep. 151; Deming v. Milles, 35 Neb. 739, 53 N. W. 665, 37 Am. St. Rep. 464; Tremmel v. Kleibolt, 6 Mo. App. 549, affirmed in 75 Mo. 255; Soltan v. Soltan, 93 Mo. 307, 6 S. W. 95; Meacham v. Bunting, 156 Ill. 586, 41 N. E. 175, 28 L. R. A. 618, 47 Am. St. Rep. 239; Kerr, Real Prop. p. 682, § 850; 12 Cyc. 1010, 1011. Curtesy is an estate given by the law for weighty reasons of public policy, not by mere contract. It aids the father in maintaining, caring for, and controlling his children in case of the death of the mother. Such power is given for public as well as private benefit. Believing the general rule more consonant with reason and the principles of law, and better sustained by authority, than that declared by the Virginia court, we adopt it and hold that the grantor in the deed under consideration did not relinquish his curtesy. Reputable courts have held that, under such circumstances as are disclosed here, the remainderman may sue in equity to remove cloud from his title before the expiration of the life estate. Hogan v. Kurtz, 94 U. S. 773, 24 L. Ed. 317; Robinson v. Pierce, 118 Ala. 273, 24 South. 984, 45 L. R. A. 66, 72 Am. St. Rep. 160; Wright v. Miller, 8 N. Y. 9, 59 Am. Dec. 438. There may be authority to the contrary; but, granting, for the sake of argument, that the reversioners could have sued in equity to cancel the deed to the Bridwells, as a cloud on their title, their impression that they could not do so was no misapprehension or ignorance respecting any matter of fact, and, though ignorance of law does not excuse anybody's conduct, it bears on the question of intention of the parties, so far as that may be material. They brought their suit promptly after the death of the father. He died in January, 1907, and this suit was brought in February, 1907. The relationship of parents and children existed. The plaintiffs were once infants, we know. When they became adults, the bill does not disclose. They may have been under the disability of infancy during the greater portion, or practically all, of the period of delay. We perceive also that the relation subsisting between them and their father and the defendants may, and most likely did, influence their conduct. No suit could have been instituted by them without involving him. Successful prosecution thereof might have precipitated an action against him for breach of his covenant of warranty. They might have been decidedly averse to involving him in trouble and annoyance, and so delayed action until after his death without any intention to relinquish their right. It is apparent that all the material facts are not disclosed by the bill. It is equally obvious, considering the allegations of that paper, that no element of estoppel or loss of material evidence exists. The defendants do not appear to have improved the land or expended money on it on the faith of the silence of the plaintiffs, nor does it appear that any change has taken place which made it inequitable upon their part to refrain from assertion of their rights. The right involved is disclosed by documentary evidence. Nothing is dependent upon oral testimony. The vital question is purely legal.

Under these circumstances, many of the principles of the doctrine of laches are inapplicable. The case is one in which the only circumstance relied upon is lapse of time, and this is accompanied by other circumstances tending to negative the existence of any intention to abandon or relinquish the claim. Elements favoring of estoppel or loss of evidence, when they exist, reduce the length of time and apply the bar of laches after the lapse of a very short period. Under some circumstances, delay of only a few months, or even a few weeks, suffices; but these short periods are never adopted in the absence of such, or similar, circumstances. In the case of Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594, Judge Snyder made an exhaustive examination of the authorities bearing on this question, and, after having done so, said that when none of these elements, death of parties, loss of evidence, or dependence upon oral testimony for the ascertainment of the rights of the parties, exists, and the court is satisfied that justice can be certainly attained notwithstanding the lapse of time, relief has been granted after a period longer than 20 years. In the syllabus of that case the court said: "If important facts rest upon mere parol testimony, this will be a consideration of much weight, but if upon written or documentary evidence it will be entitled to very little weight." The same doctrine was enunciated in Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469. In that case the effect of mere lapse of time, without more, was ascertained and declared. In point 7 of the syllabus the court said: "Lapse of time, when it does not operate as a positive statutory bar, operates in equity as an evidence of assent, acquiescence, or waiver." That proposition was deduced by a very able author from the English decisions. Kerr on Fraud & Mistake, 305. Among the cases cited for it is that of Pickering v. Stamford, 2 Ves. Jr. 582, in which heirs were allowed to recover from trustees after a lapse of 30 years. The time and all the circumstances were considered, and, as it was found that nobody had been prejudiced by the delay, the further and vital inquiry was whether it appeared that the plaintiffs intended to relinquish or abandon their right. Like the plaintiffs in this case, they had been under an erroneous impression as to the state of the law. The Master of the Rolls said: "Upon full consideration I am satisfied that it is impossible by any fair presumption to infer that these parties being cognizant of their rights slept upon them, or ever intended to relinquish what I must say upon the whole complexion of the case they never knew they had a right to. That is a presumption the circumstances almost afford, for, if they had released, it is impossible not to suppose the trustees, who have kept such accurate accounts, would have had a release from them of this right as well as of their legacies and as well as they had from the heir. The law was very little known. Sir John Strange first determined it about 14 years after the statute. If before that time parties not knowing the law had permitted the trustees to dispose of the property, I think a court of equity would not have punished them. This will was made seven years afterwards. All the circumstances show the parties did not know it. * * * No jury could, I think, infer that this demand was released. If that is so, the next question is: What inconvenience would arise, that ought to bar? The plaintiffs do not demand the interest already distributed through their default. If the accounts of the personal estate could not be now obtained, and it was impossible to know to what the plaintiffs were entitled, that is a sufficient reason for saying they should not have it, and rob the charity, because they could not tell what belonged to them and what to the charity; but that is unfortunately not the case. Then the only inconvenience will be that the charity will now cease to have the benefit of so much. That is certainly to be lamented, but it will not involve any person in difficulties to be attributed to the neglect of the plaintiffs. Therefore desiring to be understood by no means to give any countenance to these stale demands, any more than I did in Hercy v. Dinwoody, or Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay, or Lord Thurlow in Lord Deloraine v. Browne, but upon the circumstances that there is nothing inducing great public or private inconvenience, that the accounts are found, and that the trustees are not called on to account for what has been disbursed, I am bound to decide in favor of the plaintiffs."

The whole doctrine of laches, as it is understood and applied in this country, was developed by the English decisions. The opinion just quoted from reviews and analyzes the former decisions rendered by Lords Camden and Thurlow, and clearly points out all the elements of it. It shows that when nothing appears but lapse of time and circumstances, not working prejudice or injury to the defendant, in case relief should be granted, the only inquiry is whether, in view of all the facts, the plaintiffs have abandoned or relinquished their right. Substantially this doctrine was stated in Hale v. Hale, 62 W. Va. 609, 59 S. E. 1056, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221. It is also asserted and applied in Southern Railway Co. v. Gregg, 101 Va. 308, 43 S. E. 570, holding as follows: "Laches is only permitted to defeat an acknowledged right on the ground that it affords evidence of the abandonment of the right. The doctrine therefore can have no application to a case where a demand has been continuously asserted and as continuously acknowledged." In Bell v. Wood, 94 Va. 677, 27 S. E. 504, the court said: "Generally, if the sum sought to be recovered is certain, the transaction has not become obscure, and there has been no such loss of evidence as will be likely to produce injustice, a court of equity will not refuse relief merely because there has been delay in asserting the claim." For the proposition that ignorance of law, superinducing delay in the assertion of a right, may operate to preclude a finding of laches, or to excuse it, if mere lapse of time be considered laches, Cranmer v. McSwords is authority. It says: "While ignorance of law will not prevent the operation of the statute of limitations, the rule is different in equity, a court of conscience. In such court moral as well as legal grounds may be considered, and a satisfactory moral excuse may be entertained, although it resulted from ignorance of law." This is reiterated in Berry v. Wiedman, 40 W. Va. 36, 20 S. E. 817, 52 Am. St. Rep. 866. For the proposition that family relationship, which may have induced delay out of mere tenderness to the feelings of parties, will operate in the same way, Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726, and Roberts v. King, 10 Grat. (Va.) 184, are authorities. These decisions emphasize the importance of the element of intention when the circumstances are such that the court is able to see that justice may be done between the parties, notwithstanding the lapse of time or delay in the assertion of the right. The distinction between laches and the statutes of limitation is as broad as the difference between courts of equity and courts of law. The very object and purpose of the whole system of equity jurisprudence is relief from the hardships inherent in the fixed and inflexible rules of the common law. If courts of equity should now adopt rules equally fixed and inflexible, such as the statutes of limitation, or adopt the fixed rules of the common law, the very purpose of their existence would be defeated. They must keep themselves free from such rules and retain the power to do justice in each case according to its circumstances, subject to certain general principles, equitable in their nature and operation, and the limitations set by law.

The decisions of this court afford a number of instances of preclusion from relief by comparatively short periods of delay; but they are all cases in which parol evidence was relied upon to establish mistake, or fraud, or other grounds of relief from contracts by way of rescission, cancellation, or like. Lafferty v. Lafferty, 42 W. Va. 783, 26 S. E. 262; Whittaker v. S. W. Va., etc., Co., 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507; Curlett v. Newman, 30 W. Va. 182, 3 S. E. 578; Walker v. Ruffner, 32 W. Va. 297, 9 S. E. 215; Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 100. But these precedents are inapplicable, under the circumstances of this case, and, as Judge Snyder said of cases of the class to which they belong, they have no direct bearing on the question under consideration.

What has been said here upon the subject of laches is predicated upon the facts disclosed by the bill. What may be developed by the answer and the proof, if the case should proceed to a hearing on the evidence, we are unable to foresee. As the bill only partially develops the facts and circumstances, we do not decide finally whether the defense of laches can be made in such a case as this.

In respect to the authorities invoked in support of the contention that relief is barred by the statute of limitations (Jones v. Lemon, 26 W. Va. 629; Swann v. Thayer, 36 W. Va. 46, 14 S. E. 423; Mullan's Adm'r v. Carper, 37 W. Va. 215, 16 S. E. 527; Gapen v. Gapen, 41 W. Va. 422, 23 S. E. 579; Woods v. Stevenson, 43 W. Va. 149, 27 S. E. 309; Phillips v. Piney Coal Co., 53 W. Va. 543, 44 S. E. 774, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1040; and Ruckman v. Cox, 63 W. Va. 74, 59 S. E. 760), it may be repeated that the statute does not run against a purely equitable demand, and that the right set up in the bill is of that character. Against such a right, however, a title acquired by adverse possession under color of title may be set up. The decisions cited in the brief for appellee enunciate this proposition, but the statute does not begin to run against the equitable demand from the time of the accrual thereof. If a trust is established, whether it be an express or a constructive one, and there is a breach of it, or an equitable cause of action for any reason accrues under it, the statute of limitations has no application and does not run against the cestui que trust, unless his demand is of such a nature that he could sue upon it in a court of law. However, in the case of a trust in respect to real estate, there may be a disavowal and renunciation, and on this there may be commenced the process of acquiring good and complete independent title by adverse possession; but the process of acquiring such new title begins, not with the mere disavowal of the trust. It requires something more. There may be, at the time of the disavowal, actual possession of the land, and often the repudiation itself consists of the giving of notice of hostile possession thereof. If the breach of the trust occurs before there is such possession, the statute does not then begin to confer new title, but if, after the disavowal of the trust, or contemporaneously therewith, and in pursuance thereof and under the instrument of disavowal, it being a deed by the trustee to a stranger, such possession be taken and continued for the period of 10 years, a new and independent title, superior to that of the equitable title, is thereby acquired and will prevail over it and defeat it, even in a court of equity, for courts of equity were never devised for the purpose of overriding or disregarding the law of legal estates, nor vested with power to do so. They have a wide field of operation within the law and accomplish results without in any way overturning, unsettling, or swerving common-law rules, or denying legal rights; but no such title can be made out in this case. The possession was not adverse until after the death of Henry Depue, and this suit was brought in less than two months after his death.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of is clearly erroneous, and must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

DUDLEY v. G. W. NISWANDER & CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. DISCOVERY (§ 1*)—NATURE OF REMEDY.

Equity has jurisdiction of a bill seeking to substitute an equitable for a legal forum when there is prayer for discovery, and there are averments showing the indispensability thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 267*)—AMENDED OR SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Amendment or supplement to a bill in equity fitting the developments of the case, if the identity of the cause of suit is preserved, may in the sound discretion of the court as to the propriety and time of the same be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 545; Dec. Dig. § 267.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 433*)—ACTIONS—PARTIES—INTERVENTION—PERSONS ENTITLED.

In a suit in equity by an administrator for the recovery of a fund belonging to the estate of his decedent, it is proper to allow a creditor seeking to charge the fund with the payment of a debt of the decedent to intervene by petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1774; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 232*)—DEMURRER TO BILL GOOD IN PART.

A demurrer to a bill as a whole is properly overruled if the bill is good in part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 506; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 596*) — WRIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—VARYING WRITING.

Though, in a written contract under seal, an admission, invoked merely as evidence in favor of one claiming no rights under the contract, and invoked not as having acquired the essentials of an estoppel in his behalf, may be explained or qualified by parol testimony, even to the extent of contradicting the terms of the contract in which it is contained; but cogent proof is required in the premises.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by J. W. Dudley, administrator of the estate of Mary J. Plumb, deceased, against G. W. Niswander & Co. and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McCluer & McCluer, for appellants. C. A. Kreps, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. A mercantile firm, doing business in Parkersburg, under the style of G. W. Niswander & Co., became indebted to Mary J. Plumb in the sum of $1,400 for money borrowed. The firm was composed of G. W. Niswander and W. C. Plumb. The latter was the son-in-law of the former and the son of Mary J. Plumb. Several months before the maturity of the note given her by the firm for the money Mary J. Plumb died. She was survived by D. S. Plumb, her husband, and W. C. Plumb, her only child and heir at law. She left a will, devising, in general terms, practically all of her property to her son. No provision whatever was made therein for her husband. This will, known to both father and son, was not probated. No administration of the estate was sought by them. On the day of the maturity of the note, Niswander, together with his son-in-law and partner, and the father of the latter, adjusted the payment of the note by the following writing:

"A statement showing the monies in my hands, the amounts which I have paid out, and the statement of account between M. J. Plumb, deceased, and W. C. Plumb.

By amount received as belonging to M. J. Plumb.	$1,484 00
To amount paid Bently & Gerwig for funeral expenses	$ 65 00
To Varley Bros. for carriages, funeral expenses	16 00
To digging grave.....	7 00
To Dr. W. J. Davidson, medical services.....	14 50
To C. A. Smith, legal services	12 00
To McCluer & McCluer, legal services, preparing statement of account....	5 00
	$119 50	$1,484 00
Leaving a balance in my hands of said fund of...		$1,364 50

—one-third of which amount, to wit, $454.83 D. S. Plumb will be entitled to, less the amount due from him to the store of $26.11. This will leave the amount net due D. S. Plumb out of the amount aforesaid of $428.72 which is the net amount, which the said D. S. Plumb is entitled to receive out of the above fund as his interest.

"And whereas, by an agreement between G. W. Niswander and D. S. Plumb, on account of said G. W. Niswander become his security on an appeal bond and decision rendered against him by E. F. Wilson, justice of the peace, in favor of the Star Grocery Co., to the circuit court of Wood county, it was agreed between him, and the said D. S. Plumb, that he should retain $100 to indemnify him, the said G. W. Niswander until it should be ascertained whether the said justice of the peace should be reversed, and whether the said D. S. Plumb should have the costs to pay or not, and in event the said G. W. Niswander does not have the costs to pay, then the said D. S. Plumb is to receive this $100, which the said G. W. Niswander was permitted to retain out of the fund aforesaid, which would leave the amount now which the said D. S. Plumb would be entitled to receive the sum of $328.72, leaving the $100 for the determination of the suit in the circuit court of Wood county.

"And it is further agreed on the part of the said D. S. Plumb that the receipt of the $328.72, which he hereby acknowledges is in full of all claims against the said W. C. Plumb on account of the fund aforesaid, and the $100 will be left in the hands of the said G. W. Niswander for the determination of the suit in the said court.

"And it is further understood and agreed between the said W. C. Plumb and D. S. Plumb that the said W. C. Plumb is entitled to the sum of $900.66, which the said W. C. Plumb agrees is in full of all his claim for the above fund.

"And it is mutually acknowledged between them, that this is a full and complete settlement between them, of all claims of one against the other with reference to the fund of $1484.00 left by M. J. Plumb, now deceased.

"Witness the following signatures and seals this the 1 day of Jan'y, 1903.

"[Signed] W. C. Plumb. [Seal.]
"D. S. Plumb. [Seal.]"

Two copies of this writing were made; one copy being retained by each party thereto. By the firm's checks Niswander made distribution of the amount of the note as expressed in the writing recited above. The check to his partner was indorsed back to the firm for that partner's credit therein. It will be observed that this distribution was directly according to the statute of descent and distribution.

Soon after this transaction, D. S. Plumb called upon the officers of the Traders' Building Association, to which Mary J. Plumb was indebted at the time of her death, and told them of the note and what had been done in the premises. He suggested to them that there was an opportunity to make the money due the association, that his deceased wife had left the amount of the note, and that it had not gone into a proper administration of her estate. Later he exhibited to the officers of the association his copy of the writing. Thereupon the estate of Mary J. Plumb was committed for administration to the sheriff of Wood county. As such administrator he instituted this suit in equity against the firm of G. W. Niswander & Co., its individual partners, and D. S. Plumb, alleging that they had combined together to defraud the estate of Mary J. Plumb and creditors thereof by agreeing to make and by making the division of the proceeds of the note, as above set forth, without the intervention of an administrator. The bill avers that some one without authority delivered the note into the possession of Niswander, or into the possession of the firm. It further avers that these parties, "though acknowledging that they had such note, declined to deliver the same to complainant, and declined and refused to permit plaintiff to have a copy thereof or to see and inspect the same, or to give him any memorandum thereof; and complainant says that he has been unable to get any description of said note or of the exact amount thereof, or the date thereof, or the time of payment thereof, or who the real makers of said note were, and consequently he has been unable to file any suit at law upon said note for want of the proper description of the date and of the parties to said note, and hence it has been necessary for him as he is advised and believes to come into a court of equity for a discovery and for such general relief in the premises as to equity appertains in such cases." It is distinctly alleged that the attempted payment and distribution of the proceeds of the note were void and constituted no discharge of the makers thereof, and that the acts of the defendants are fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the estate of Mary J. Plumb and plaintiff's rights as administrator thereof. Accordingly the bill prays that G. W. Niswander and W. C. Plumb may be required to produce and surrender said note which they, as individuals or as a firm, executed, and to make full disclosure in reference thereto; that the distribution of the assets by the writing aforesaid and the surrender of the note may be set aside and canceled as void against plaintiff and the creditors of the estate represented by him; that there be an accounting as to the proceeds of the note by the defendants; and that the fund may be distributed rightfully in the cause.

Defendants, in resistance, maintain that the note, for valuable consideration, had been assigned by Mary J. Plumb in her lifetime to her husband; that the proceeds of the note actually belonged to him; that, the note being a negotiable one and properly indorsed, the firm owing the same is acquitted of the indebtedness by a payment of the obligation to one having possession; and that the amount paid to W. C. Plumb therefrom was merely in settlement of what his father owed him. D. S. Plumb answered, and testified that he gave the information to the officers of the building association, and surrendered to them a copy of the writing, because he was drinking and had become angry with his son and wanted to give him trouble, but that he was a bona fide owner of the note by purchase from his wife before her death.

Sufficient has been said for an understanding of the controversy. It is useless to detail more. A decree has been made substantially as sought by plaintiff. From that decree comes this appeal. We shall briefly consider the assignments against the correctness of the decree.

The demurrer to the original bill was properly overruled. Sure ground of equity cognizance is set forth. A necessity for resort to equity is shown. Defendants contend that the bill does not allege that the discovery asked is indispensable, because there is exhibited the writing hereinbefore recited, showing the amount of the proceeds of the note. But that writing does not show what the plaintiff seeks to ascertain; that is, who actually, the firm or its individual members, should be called to account. It gave plaintiff no safe information for an action at law. The bill shows the materiality and indispensability of a discovery. It does not allege the same in terms, but sets forth the facts from which such materiality and indispensability appear. This meets the rule applicable to this case that "if the demand of the plaintiff be legal, and therefore not cognizable in a court of equity except on the ground of discovery, it must be averred in the bill that the discovery is indispensable for lack of other evidence." Hogg's Eq. Pro. § 164. By this rule it is not meant that the mere assertion of the fact must be made in the bill, but that the averments must be such as to show that it exists. Where a plaintiff "asks chancery for both discovery and relief, as his demand is proper for the law court and seeks to transfer it to the court of chancery, he must show cause for going into chancery and that is by showing that only by discovery can be recover." Thompson v. Whitaker Iron Co., 41 W. Va. 580, 23 S. E. 797. "In a bill to substitute an equitable for a legal forum, a prayer for a discovery, without any averment, showing its materiality or necessity, is naught." Armstrong v. Huntons, 1 Rob. (Va.) 323. Plaintiff in the case under consideration clearly shows cause for going into chancery by showing that only through a discovery can he assert his rights.

It was not error to overrule the objections to the filing of plaintiff's amended and supplemental bill, and to the petition of the creditor, the Traders' Building Association. The court has sound discretion in permitting amendment or supplement to fit the developments of a suit in equity, and such discretion as to the propriety of the time of filing the same. Hogg's Eq. Pro. §§ 172, 321 et seq. The rule demands that the identity of the cause of suit be preserved. It was preserved in this instance. And it was quite proper to allow a creditor to intervene by petition. A fund was sought to be recovered by an administrator which that creditor claimed the right to charge with debt. Equity, having acquired jurisdiction to recover the fund, will go on, if asked, to adjust rights of creditors relating to it. Yates v. Stuart's Adm'r, 39 W. Va. 124, 19 S. E. 423; Hotchkiss v. Plaster Co., 41 W. Va. 357, 23 S. E. 576; Barton's Ch. Pr. § 102. The bill sought not only to recover the fund, but also to distribute it properly. The petition was consistent with the object of the bill. "Where a petition, sought to be filed in a pending suit, sets forth such interest in the subject-matter thereof as to make the petitioner a proper party to the suit, and he seeks by such petition to be made a party to it, it is the court's duty to entertain the petition and have him made a party to the suit." Hogg's Eq. Pro. § 227.

Demurrers to the amended and supplemental bill and to the petition were not well taken. What we have said as to the filing of these papers applies here. It may be true that an administrator cannot set aside the act of his decedent on the ground of that decedent's fraud. But the averments in the amended and supplemental bill that, if an assignment of the note to D. S. Plumb was actually made by Mary J. Plumb in her lifetime, it was in fraud of creditors, does not destroy that pleading in its correct particulars. The demurrer to the amended and supplemental bill was to the whole thereof, a part of which bill was good; therefore it was properly overruled, even if part of the bill was bad. Barton's Ch. Pr. § 110. At any rate, the allegation complained of is wholly immaterial, since the decree is sustained by the reasonable purport of the evidence, and the correct inferences therefrom that no assignment of the note ever took place. But the similar allegation in the petition of the creditor was not out of place. A creditor could assert such fraud. Nor are these pleadings multifarious as joining several distinct actions in one and asking relief against separate and distinct defendants. They simply tend to one end—the relief sought by the original bill.

The assignment that the final decree is not sustained by the evidence must also be denied. That decree finds that the note in question belonged to Mary J. Plumb at the time of her death; that Niswander and W. C. Plumb had notice of such fact at the time of their pretended payment thereof, and that the distribution of the proceeds thereof, as is represented in the writing exhibited, was illegal and void, and constituted no payment of the debt by the firm of G. W. Niswander & Co., the makers of said note, to the estate of Mary J. Plumb. It adjudges that the firm pay to the plaintiff administrator the amount of the note, less the funeral expenses and medical services paid therefrom, and refers the cause to a commissioner for ascertainment of the matters proper for a settlement of the estate and distribution of the assets. A thorough consideration of the evidence, a review of all which it will avail nothing to make here, convinces us that this decree is by no means wrong. It is strongly sustained by the formal terms of the contract between D. S. Plumb and W. C. Plumb, which was prepared by the direction and under the immediate view of Niswander. That contract is wholly inconsistent with the claim which all these parties now make in this suit. "Anything said by the party may be used against him as an admission, provided it exhibits the quality of inconsistency with the facts now asserted by him in pleadings or in testimony." 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1048. But it is claimed that this contract was executed by mistake; that it was overlooked that counsel had drawn it so as to denominate the note as belonging to Mary J. Plumb at her decease; that it was not intended to express therein the fact that the fund was "left by M. J. Plumb, now deceased," or that the amount was "received as belonging to M. J. Plumb." And it is insisted that the other indicia which appear in that paper evidencing that Mary J. Plumb was the owner of the note when she died are mistakenly there, and that they were never intended by the parties. The admission in the contract that the note belonged to the estate of Mary J. Plumb, deceased, may be explained or overcome by parol testimony, as was sought to be done by defendants. 1 Enc. of Ev. 396. The contract is introduced solely as evidence of this admission of the parties thereto and Niswander who took part in having them make it. The contract is not invoked as between the parties to it, but as evidence of an admission favorable to the claim of a third party. In other words, it is invoked merely as evidence of an admission, not as a contract under which rights are claimed. Being so offered, merely as evidence, and not as a contract, it may be rebutted by parol or other competent evidence, even to the extent of explaining, modifying, or contradicting its terms. And the same is true notwithstanding the writing is under seal. 1 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 211. The rule against explaining, modifying, or contradicting a written contract by parol does not apply here, since we are not dealing with the contract for the assertion of rights thereunder, but we are dealing with it solely as evidence of an admission. The facts therein admitted may be denied and shown not to have existed. Non-contractual and nonjudicial admissions not made under such circumstances as to constitute an estoppel are not conclusive, but are open to explanation, and may be rebutted or controlled by other proper evidence. This principle generally applies, though such admissions are made under oath. 1 Elliott on Ev. § 242; 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1058. Such admissions are mere evidence which may be rebutted. Their weight depends upon their character, and the circumstances under which they are made. Yet "admissions deliberately made and clearly proved are very strong and satisfactory evidence against the party making them." 1 Enc. of Ev. 611; 17 Cyc. 814. Being of such strong character, deliberate admissions, clearly established, particularly those in writing, can only be explained or overthrown by convincing proof. "Admissions may be explained or qualified, and the party is at liberty to show that the fact admitted by him did not exist, but cogent proof is required in order thus to overcome a deliberate admission, especially a written admission." 17 Cyc. 816. It has been held that written admissions, when made by a party before a controversy arose, outweigh his oral testimony to the contrary given after the controversy has arisen. Moore v. Grayson, 132 Cal. 602, 64 Pac. 1074; Buford v. McGetchle, 60 Iowa, 298, 14 N. W. 790. It is at least consonant with reason to say that when an admission in writing, especially in an instrument executed with the solemnity of seals, is clearly established against a party, he should not be permitted to contradict it by evidence other than that which is clear, full and precise. In re Irvine, 102 Cal. 607, 36 Pac. 1013; Rice v. Bank, 26 Tenn. 39; Spurlock v. Brown, 91 Tenn. 241, 18 S. W. 868. "Language expressing more than a preponderance is generally used in declaring the degree of proof necessary in order to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument by parol evidence." 17 Cyc. 773. Now, the evidence by which it is sought to overcome the admission in the written contract that Mary J. Plumb was the owner of the note at the time of her death is not of such convincing character or degree as to have that effect. Mistake, as claimed, in the execution of that document, signed by father and son and open to Niswander, who had it drawn, has not under the light of the whole case been established. There is no such positive proof as is required to overthrow the plain admission by that writing that the note belonged to Mary J. Plumb's estate. This admission within a sealed instrument was deliberately made. It is clearly proved. The execution and existence of that instrument is admitted. Niswander had direct knowledge of its contents and purport. The admission contained in it likewise binds him. To give this admission in that writing a meaning wholly different from that which its language imports, a positive degree of proof is required. Such degree of proof is lacking in this case. Aside from the recitals of that writing, not satisfactorily explained, that the fund thereby dealt with was "received as belonging to M. J. Plumb," and that it was "left by M. J. Plumb, now deceased," it is indeed significant that W. C. Plumb should therein have released his right to the fund if he had no interest in it, as was true if the note belonged to D. S. Plumb, or that it should have been necessary for D. S. Plumb, if he was the owner of the note as it is claimed, thereby to acknowledge the amount he received as "in full of all claims against the said W. C. Plumb on account of the fund aforesaid." And also significant is it, taken in connection with this writing, that this father and son should have been disputing about the estate in a lawyer's office, the father at one time declaring the will of the wife's property to the son to be a forgery, and later on the very day the note became due entering into a distribution exactly in the proportions provided by statute, after obtaining the note from the depositary with whom they had mutually left it for safe-keeping, evidently until it should become due. The indorsement of the note in blank by Mary J. Plumb in her lifetime is only a circumstance to be considered with the whole of the evidence. Notes are often indorsed, and yet not actually transferred. And the fully proved acts and declarations of D. S. Plumb in taking the writing to the creditor and imparting the information upon which this suit was begun, and the strong rebuttal of his excuse of drunkenness at the time, count mightily in the evidence.

The reference of the cause to a commissioner was appropriate. It was essential to the end sought by the plaintiff and the petitioning creditor.

We affirm the decree, remanding the cause for the execution of the reference, and such further proceedings as may be proper or as to equity may appertain.

Action by Walter O. Duncan against the E. Jones Company. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeals. Dismissed.

E. L. Asbill and Graham & Sturkie, for appellant. Eford & Dreher, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that several causes of action have been improperly united. His honor, the presiding judge, ordered "that the demurrer be overruled for the reason that the complaint appears to state several causes of action jumbled in one." The allegations are set forth in form as a single cause of action, and the ruling of the circuit judge is sustained by the case of Marion v. Charleston, 68 S. C. 257, 47 S. E. 140.

Ex parte FERGUSON.

FERGUSON et al. v. FERGUSON et al. (Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 20, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 95, 107*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER.

An order that certain persons be made parties, that certain other persons comply with an order appointing them trustees, and that the proceeding be referred to a referee to take testimony and report conclusions of fact and law on the issues, except as they are determined by the order, is merely administrative, and not appealable at such stage of the case.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; J. C. Klugh and G. W. Gage, Judges.

Ex parte proceeding by James M. Ferguson, in the case of James M. Ferguson, trustee, and others against John Ferguson and others, heirs at law of Mrs. H. M. Ferguson, deceased. From an order, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

J. J. McSwain, for appellants. F. F. Beatie and E. M. Blythe, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an ex parte proceeding, in re the case mentioned in the record. Upon hearing the petition his honor Judge Klugh made the following order: "That James M. Ferguson and Frank Ferguson do show cause before me at chambers, in Greenville, S. C., on March 24, 1908, at 11 o'clock a. m., or at such time as may be designated by the court, why the sum of $3,965.79, and the further sum of $1,661.66 should not be paid to James M. Ferguson, or his attorneys, and to further show cause why trustees should not be appointed to take charge of the said sum of $2,500, to invest the same and pay over the interest thereof annually to the said James M. Ferguson." The appellants made return to the rule to show cause, whereupon the circuit judge made an order, which concludes as follows: "That John Ferguson, Annie Wardlaw, Janie White, Hattie Valentine, Henry Grady Ferguson, and Mattie Ferguson be made parties to this proceeding, and a copy of this petition be forthwith served upon them; the nonresident parties to be served by publication. Further ordered that James Ferguson and Frank Ferguson do comply with the order of Judge Ernest Gary, appointing them trustees, within 10 days from the date of this order, and that in the event they should fail to do so, the referee do recommend two suitable persons, for the appointment of trustees of the said James M. Ferguson by the court. Further ordered that this proceeding be referred to T. J. Mauldin, Esq., of Pickens, S. C., as special referee, to take the testimony and report his conclusions of law and of fact, upon the issues raised by the petition and return herein, except as to those issues determined by this order, and that said referee have leave to report any special matter." This order was merely administrative, and not appealable at this time. This court is therefore without jurisdiction to determine the questions presented by the exceptions.

Appeal dismissed.

McLEES et al. v. CITY OF ANDERSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 22, 1909.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 816*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS IN STREETS—PLEADING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action against a city for injuries received by one of the plaintiffs caused by a defect in a street, the complaint alleged that "the plaintiffs did not in any way bring about such injuries by their own negligent act, nor did they negligently contribute thereto." Held, that such allegation was a material allegation of fact and dispensed with the necessity on the part of defendant of setting up contributory negligence, and is not demurrable for failure to state facts on which to base the allegation that the injuries were not caused by contributory negligence; for, if the plaintiffs did nothing to cause the injury, there was no necessity for further allegations in order to lay a foundation for proof of a negative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 816.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Anna A. McLees and George R. McLees against the City of Anderson, in which plaintiff filed the following complaint:

"The complaint of the plaintiffs respectfully shows:

"(1) That the plaintiff Mrs. Anna E. McLees is a married woman, the wife of her coplaintiff, George R. McLees, who is joined with her in this action in compliance with the requirement of the statute in such case made and provided.

"(2) That the defendant, the City of Anderson, is a municipal corporation under and by the laws of the state of South Carolina, and is empowered by the act incorporating it to sue and be sued in the courts of this state.

"(3) That, as such municipal corporation, defendant was and is charged by law with the duty of keeping its streets, causeways, bridges, and public ways in proper repair and safe condition for the use of the public on foot and by vehicle.

"(4) That previous to the 11th day of March, 1907, the defendant, the City of Anderson, its officers, agents, servants, and employes, negligent and unmindful of their duty in the premises, negligently and carelessly allowed a defect to become and remain in West Market street, which is a street under the control of the said city, and within its corporate limits, to wit, a long, narrow, dangerous, and deep hole, and allowed the same to remain in the said street in the roadway thereof for many days after the said city, its officers, agents, servants, or employes had notice thereof, or should, with the exercise of ordinary diligence and reasonable care as was their duty, have had notice thereof.

"(5) That on or about the said 11th day of March, 1907, the plaintiff Mrs. Anna E. McLees, and her husband, George R. McLees, and their infant grandchild, were driving in a buggy along said West Market street in the said city of Anderson, S. C., when the front wheel of the buggy dropped into the said deep and dangerous hole, and in consequence of said wheel falling into the said hole, which was a defect in the said street, which was under the control of the said defendant corporation, the plaintiff Mrs. Anna E. McLees was thrown with great violence from the buggy, falling upon the axle thereof between the body and wheel of the buggy, thereby greatly injuring and bruising her leg and other parts of her body. That she hung for a time upon the said axle until she was thrown to the ground where the wheel of the buggy passed over her body, inflicting upon her many grievous bruises, wounds, and hurts.

"(6) That in consequence of being so as aforesaid thrown violently to the ground from said buggy, so as aforesaid caused by the said defect in the said street, the plaintiff Mrs. Anna E. McLees suffered an injury to her leg which was terribly wounded and bruised and hurt, from which there came a virulent running sore or abscess, which threatened the loss of her leg, and which caused her great pain and suffering, and from which she was confined to her bed and house for many months, during which time she was almost wholly incapacitated to attend to her household duties, or to do any work of any kind to her great loss and suffering.

"(7) That plaintiffs were put to much expense for medical attention and attendance for the said Mrs. Anna E. McLees for the hire of help to perform the labors which she was accustomed to do and which she could not do because of the injuries thus inflicted upon her, for the hire of persons to wait upon her and attend her, for medicine, appliances, and other expenses incidental to the treatment of her injuries and made necessary thereby, and suffered much loss because of the loss of time from her accustomed duties.

"That said defect existed before the injuries complained of occurred, but plaintiffs' load did not exceed the ordinary weight, that such defect was occasioned by the neglect and mismanagement of the defendant corporation in allowing the said deep and dangerous hole to be worked into the street and to remain there, and that plaintiffs did not in any way bring about such injuries and damages by their own negligent act, nor did they negligently contribute thereto. That by reason of such negligence and mismanagement of the said defendant corporation, as hereinabove set forth, the plaintiffs have been injured in the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000).

"Wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendant corporation for the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) and the costs of this action."

From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

John K. Hood, for appellant. Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint (which will be set out in the report of the case) on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The first ground of the demurrer was "because the complaint shows on its face that the injury complained of was the result of the plaintiffs' own negligent act, or that they negligently contributed thereto." The complaint alleges that "the plaintiffs did not in any way bring about such injuries by their own negligent act, nor did they negligently contribute thereto." Even in cases when such words constitute no part of the cause of action they are construed as material allegations of fact, and dispense with the necessity on the part of the defendant of setting up in the answer the defense of contributory negligence. Long v. Railway, 50 S. C. 49, 27 S. E. 531. For a stronger reason they must be regarded as material allegations of fact, when, as in this case, they constitute a part of the plaintiffs' cause of action. Walker v. Chester County, 40 S. C. 342, 18 S. E. 936. For the purpose of the demurrer, these allegations must be deemed to be admitted. This ground of the demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

The second ground of demurrer was: "Because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that no facts are pleaded on which to base the allegations that plaintiffs did not, in any way, bring about such injuries by their own negligent act, nor did they negligently contribute thereto." If the plaintiffs did nothing (as they allege) to cause the injury, it is difficult to conceive in what respect there was a necessity for further allegations in laying the foundation for proof of a negative.

Appeal dismissed.

Original application for an injunction by the Sperry & Hutchinson Company and another against the City of Columbia and others. Application denied.

Lyles & Lyles, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a rule to show cause why a criminal proceeding should not be enjoined. The petition does not show upon its face that the petitioner has no other adequate remedy, and the application is therefore refused.

SULLIVAN v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 25, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 69*)—DELAYING DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—LIABILITY FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where the proximate cause for the delay in the delivery of a telegram was a strike by the employees of the telegraph company, punitive damages were not recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 53*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—CAUSE.

Where the direct cause of the delay in the delivery of a telegram was a strike of the employees of the telegraph company, the company was not liable for the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by C. S. Sullivan against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for appellant. Hood & Sullivan, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced in a magistrate's court to recover actual and punitive damages. The following statement is set out in the record: "Plaintiff brought action for $100 damages for delay in the transmission and delivery of a telegram from Newberry, S. C., to Anderson, S. C. He alleges: That the telegram was filed with defendant's agent at Newberry, S. C., between 10 and 11 o'clock a. m., September 10, 1907; that at the time of filing the message plaintiff asked if the message could be got through at once, and was assured that it could be; that the telegram was not delivered until the morning of the 12th of September; and that plaintiff suffered damages, as set out in the complaint. Defendant answered at the trial, admitting the filing and sending and delivery of the telegram as alleged. Further answering, defendant said, if there was any delay, it was not due to defendant's negligence, or its agents, employees, and servants, but was due to strikers or others acting against the law, or to the act of God or the public enemy, and to unavoidable delay, and interruption in the working of its line, and that plaintiff signing the blank, on which the message was written, agreed to the provision on the back of the blank that defendant should not be so liable under such circumstances. At the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, defendant's attorney moved for a nonsuit on the whole case, because there is no evidence tending to show that the damages alleged in the complaint were such proximate damages as were occasioned by the delay in delivering the message. This motion was overruled. At the close of the whole testimony, defendant moved for a nonsuit on the whole case, in so far as the charge of willfulness, wantonness, and recklessness was concerned, on the ground that there was no evidence tending to sustain such allegations. This motion was overruled. The magistrate found for plaintiff $100. Defendant appealed to the circuit court, and Judge Prince sustained the magistrate. In due time defendant gave notice of intention to appeal, and does now appeal from this court from the order of Judge Prince."

The order of his honor, Judge Prince, is as follows: "After hearing the argument on the appeal in the above-entitled cause, it is ordered: That the grounds of appeal be and the same are overruled, the appeal dismissed, and the judgment and verdict of the magistrate sustained. As matters of fact, I find: That a preponderance of the evidence shows neither negligence nor willfulness in the handling of said telegram at Newberry, S. C., nor at Anderson, S. C., but that said telegram was intentionally and willfully intercepted, by one of defendant's operators, who was at the time an agent of defendant company, and said agent's scope of employment by said company included the sending and receiving of telegrams, general authority over one of defendant's telegraph offices, and control of defendant's telegraphic instrumentalities, usually found in connection with such offices; that said agent was at the time also in the employ of a railroad company, being an agent of the said railroad company, as well as an agent of defendant; that by reason of said agent's authority to send and receive telegrams, and general control of defendant's telegraphic instrumentalities as aforesaid, said agent intentionally and willfully intercepted said telegram as aforesaid, and said willful act was within the scope of said agent's employment by defendant. I therefore conclude and find as a matter of law that defendant is liable for its said agent's willful act as aforesaid, because I find that said act was within the scope of said agent's employment by defendant as aforesaid."

We will first consider the exceptions raising the question whether his honor the circuit judge erred in overruling the ground of appeal assigning error on the part of the magistrate in refusing the motion for nonsuit, as to punitive damages. The uncontested testimony, even that of the plaintiff, shows that there was a strike at the time the message was delivered for transmission; and as the circuit judge found as matter of fact that there was neither negligence nor willfulness in the handling of the telegram at Newberry, S. C., nor Anderson, S. C., the only reasonable inference from the testimony is that the strike was the proximate cause of the delay. The case of Oxner v. Tel. Co., 63 S. E. 545, shows that under such circumstances punitive damages are not recoverable. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

The next question that will be considered is whether the circuit judge erred in not concluding that, where a strike is the direct cause of delay in the transmission of a telegram, the company is not liable. The rule is thus stated in section 360 of Jones on Telegraph & Telephone Companies: "Under the ancient rule, carriers were not exonerated for losses caused by the acts of mobs, or other riotous persons; but the stringency of this rule has been somewhat relaxed by the more modern authorities. They are still held liable for all losses caused by such acts, but are not liable for loss in the transportation of goods by any delay caused thereby. There is a difference, however, in the application of this rule to carriers and to telegraph and telephone companies. As a general rule, the latter companies are not liable for losses arising from acts of mobs and other riotous persons. The acts of the mob stand, with respect to these companies, in almost the same category as those of the public enemy. The different means and instrumentalities through which they accomplish their respective corporate purposes bring about the difference in the application of this rule. It is never presumed that mobs intend to take possession of goods and convert them to their own use; and the tangible property to such being in the custody of the carriers, they are more liable to protect and deliver them safely to the consignee; and, as has been said, they are not liable for losses caused by such delay. On the other hand, the main and principal objects of mobs and other riotous persons, who interfere with the business of telegraph companies, is to prevent and obstruct the transmission of news; especially until they shall have accomplished some particular purpose. As has often been said, they are never liable as insurers, unless an express agreement has been entered into to that effect. And for the reason that they are not in possession of the tangible property of the message in transit, they do not have the same opportunity to protect it, as the carrier has his goods. It is the duty, however, of these companies, where they have been thus interfered with, to make a reasonable effort to transmit the telegram by other lines or by other means; and on failure to do so they will be liable for all losses suffered." In section 361 of the same work it is said that "the same rule applies where the mob is composed of employees of the company who are on a strike." The testimony shows that the delay was the result of an unavoidable cause, in so far as the company was concerned. The exceptions raising this question are also sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

MESSERVY v. MESSERVY et ux.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 20, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 325*)—ENTICING AND ALIENATING—RIGHT OF ACTION BY WIFE.

A wife has a right of action for maliciously enticing her husband away from her and depriving her of his comfort, society, and aid.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 330*)—ENTICING AND ALIENATING—ACTION BY WIFE—FARTIES.

In an action by a wife for maliciously enticing her husband away from her and depriving her of his comfort, society, and aid, the husband is not a necessary party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1122; Dec. Dig. § 830.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by Pearl C. Messervy against John W. Messervy and wife. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 80 S. C. 277, 285, 61 S. E. 442, 445.

The following is the order of the court below:

"This is an action to recover damages of the defendants for maliciously enticing the plaintiff's husband away from her and depriving her of his comfort, society, and aid. The defendants demur to the complaint on two grounds: (1) That it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) Because the husband of the plaintiff is not joined with her in the action.

"Upon the right of the wife to maintain an action upon the grounds stated, the authorities are conflicting. It is denied in Duffies v. Duffies, 76 Wis. 374, 45 N. W. 522, 8 L. R. A. 420, 20 Am. St. Rep. 79, where the cases are revised, and some cogent reasons given why the right of the wife to the society of the husband should not be held to be the same in kind, degree, and value as his right to her society. It is shown how the wife is often deprived of the society of the husband from the exigencies of business life, and it is said that to establish this right of action in favor of the wife 'would be the most fruitful source of litigation of any that can be thought of.' That may be so, but it is not sufficient to deny to any person redress for wrongs unlawfully inflicted. The boast of the law is that there can be no wrong without a remedy. Is it wrong for one maliciously to entice a woman's husband away from her and deprive her of his comfort, aid, and society? I apprehend there cannot be two opinions upon that question. It is a legal wrong for which the law ought and does afford a remedy. The right to maintain the action is sustained, in my opinion, by the weight of reason and authority. Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 23 N. E. 17, 6 L. R. A. 553; Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 77 N. E. 890, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 658; Trumbull v. Trumbull, 71 Neb. 186, 98 N. W. 683, 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 813. In Bennett v. Bennett, supra, the point was made, as in this case, that the husband was not made a party plaintiff. The court held that he was not a necessary party, resting the decision partly upon the construction of the New York Code and the long practice that had prevailed under it, and partly upon the ground that the right of action was the separate property of the wife. The word 'property' is defined by Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 445, to include 'things in action.' So that, if the right of action for a tort is 'a thing in action,' in the sense in which those words are used in the Code, then the wife may clearly maintain the action alone. In 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. (1st Ed.) at page 235, it is said in defining the words 'chose in action' 'that it' includes the right to recover pecuniary damages for a wrong inflicted upon the person or property, citing Gillet v. Fairchild, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 80; McKee v. Judd, 12 N. Y. 622, 64 Am. Dec. 515; Wins Per Profs. 4. In Bennett v. Bennett, supra, the court say: 'And while a right of action for a personal injury may not be within the definition, as frequently given, of a chose in action, that term, in its broadest sense, does embrace it.' See, also, the cases cited in note 2, page 4, 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.).

"The law is said to be the 'perfection of reason.' In view of the sweeping changes made by modern legislation in regard to the property and personal rights of married women, I fail to see any reason why the plaintiff's husband should be joined with her in the action. In the first place, under the circumstances alleged, and they are admitted by the demurrer to be true, it is not to be supposed that he would consent to be made a plaintiff. If he refused, all that the plaintiff could do would be to allege his refusal, and make him a defendant, under section 140 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902. What benefit could that be to any of the parties? Nil frustra agit lex.

"It is therefore ordered that the demurrer be overruled, with leave to defendants to answer."

Legare, Holman & Baker, for appellants.
Logan & Grace, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The order of his honor, the presiding judge, is affirmed for the reasons therein stated.

(150 N. C. 627)
BAILLIERE et al. v. ATLANTIC SHINGLE COOPERAGE & VENEER CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 13, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 11*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—MATTER OF HISTORY.

The court knows as a matter of history that the city of Wilmington is one of the oldest municipal corporations in the state, and that the public streets have been laid out and used in its corporate limits for more than a century.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 15, 16; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—STREETS—PLAN OF CITY.

The owners of property in a city petitioned for a sale of a lot and a partition of the proceeds, on which petition a portion of the lot was sold. Thereafter on a like petition the balance was sold. Acts Gen. Assem. 1870-71 (Priv. Laws 1870-71, p. 22, c. 3), directed the aldermen of the city to cause a plan of said city to be made and recorded, which plan mentioned the streets as described in the partition proceedings and was known to petitioners. In the partition proceedings the land was described as bounded by the same streets, and the deed of the commissioner referred to the plan of the city, and the second petition contained the phrase "according to the plan of the city" 30 times. Held, that the owners had dedicated the streets mentioned to the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37-47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

3. DEDICATION (§ 34*)—STREETS—ABANDONMENT OF RIGHTS.

Where by partition proceedings the owners of city property have dedicated certain of the land to the public as streets, at which time there was no public necessity for using the streets, the city 12 years afterwards, there being a necessity to use the streets, may rightfully take control and assert their easement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Bailliere and others against the Atlantic Shingle Cooperage & Veneer Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs for nominal damages, defendants appeal. Reversed, and judgment directed.

Plaintiffs claim title to a strip of land within the corporate limits of the city of Wilmington: Beginning at low-water mark on the eastern shore of the Cape Fear river, A; running thence eastwardly 726 feet to the southern line of Front street, B; thence northwardly along the line of said street 66 feet to C; thence westwardly 726 feet to the low-water mark of said river, D; thence the same course to the channel of the river, E; thence southerly 66 feet, F; thence westwardly to the beginning. Plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, were, prior to August 22, 1892, the owners of a lot in the city of Wilmington. On the said day they instituted a special proceeding in the superior court of New Hanover county for the purpose of obtaining a decree for sale of said lot and making partition of the proceeds. In the petition in said proceeding they described the said lot as follows: "Beginning a stone P. K. D. and T. K. M. at the foot of Meares street; thence S. 89° 5 m. E. 114 chains to a stone, P. K. D. and T. K. M.; thence N. 1 E. 4 chains and 82 links to a stone P. K. D. E. B. D.; thence N. 88° 35 m. W. 103 chains to the western line of Front street at a point 119 feet and 3 inches from its intersection with the southern line of Wright street; thence with said western line of Front street northwardly 386 feet; thence S. 78¾ degrees west about 1,650 feet to the channel of the river; southwardly about 643 feet to a point bearing S. 79¾ degrees west from the stone marked P. K. D. and T. K. M. first above named as the beginning corner; and thence N. 79¾ degrees E. 800 feet more or less to the beginning." This description includes the locus in quo, as will be seen by reference to the map. The petition was duly verified by the plaintiff Evelina M. Bailliere. A decree was duly made in said proceeding ordering a sale of the property and appointing Daniel O'Connor, Esq., a commissioner to make said sale. The portion of the decree material to this appeal is in the following language: "And it is hereby ordered that so much of the said land as is bounded on the north by Wright street, on the south by Meares street, on the east by Front street, and on the west by the Cape Fear river, be sold by the commissioner," etc. On November 5, 1892, the commissioner made report that, pursuant to said decree, he had sold the "land which lies between the Cape Fear river on the west and Front street on the east and Wright street on the north and Meares street on the south" to David C. Gaslin, who transferred his bid to Stephen L. Cowan, etc. Said sale was duly confirmed; the description of the land in the decree is in the language of the report. On November 7, 1892, the commissioner executed a deed for the lot sold to Cowan, containing the following description: "Lying and being in the city of Wilmington aforesaid, and beginning at low-water mark on the eastern shore of the Cape Fear river, at the intersection of the southern line of Wright street with said river, and running thence eastwardly along said line of Wright street sixteen hundred and fifty feet, more or less, to the western line of Front street; thence southwardly along said line of Front street three hundred and ninety-six feet to the northern line of Meares street; thence westwardly along the said line of Meares street sixteen hundred and fifty feet, more or less, to the low-water mark of the Cape Fear river, and thence northwardly with the river three hundred and ninety-six feet to the beginning; the same being all of blocks or squares numbers 15 and 16 according to the official plan of said city, together with, all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining." The commissioner collected the purchase money and paid same to the petitioners, less the cost and expense, filing their receipts therefor. On March 22, 1900, plaintiffs instituted a second special proceeding in said court for the purpose of bringing the remainder of said property to sale for partition. In the petition filed in said second proceeding the land is described in separate lots as bounded by the streets as they are laid out on the official map of said city. Block 29 is described as: "That certain lot or lots beginning at the intersection of the northern line of Wright street with the western line of Surry street, running thence north, along said western line of Surry street, one hundred and fifty-six feet; thence in a westerly or southwesterly direction to the eastern shore of the Cape Fear river, at a point 252 south from the southern line of Dawson street; thence southwesterly along the shore of the Cape Fear river, about one hundred and forty-four feet to the northern line of Wright street; thence eastwardly, along the northern line of Wright street, to the western line of Surry street, the point of beginning, being part of lot 4 and all of lots 5 and 6, in block 29, according to the official plan of said city. That certain lot or lots beginning at the intersection of the northern line of Wright street with the eastern line of Surry street, running thence east with said northern line of Wright street three hundred and thirty feet to the western line of Front street; thence along said western line of Front street two hundred and eight feet; thence west * * * degrees south three hundred and thirty-two feet, more or less, to a point in the eastern line of Surry street, 173 feet north from the northern line of Wright street; thence along said eastern line of Surry street, south, 173 feet to the point of beginning in the northern line of Wright street, being part of lots 3 and 4 and all of lots 5 and 6 in block 30, according to the official plan of said city."

After completing the description of the property, included in said petition, the following language is used: "But so much of the said property as is contained in blocks 15 and 16 of the present plan of the said city are excepted as having been conveyed by one Daniel O'Connor, commissioner, to Stephen L. Cowan." Mr. O'Connor was again appointed commissioner, and made sale of a number of said lots. He reported that he had made sale of the portion of blocks 29 and 30, covered by description in the petition, to Malcolm McKenzie, describing the same as follows: "Beginning at the intersection of the southern line of what is designated on the plan of the city of Wilmington as Wright street and the low-water line of the eastern shore of the Cape Fear river, running thence an easterly course with the southern line of the so-called Wright street as shown on said plan, 1,650 feet, more or less, to the western line of Front street, thence northwardly along the western line of said Front street 266 feet and 9 inches, thence south 78 $\frac{1}{4}$ degrees west about 1,650 feet, more or less, to the channel of the said river southwardly about 247 feet, more or less, to a point in said river channel where it would intersect with the southern line of said so-called Wright street if extended into the river, thence an easterly course to the point of beginning on the eastern shore of said river. The above embraces the two tracts described in the petition as numbers 20 and 21, with the intersecting streets and river channel, which streets have never been laid out." The commissioner, thereafter, reported that: "It has been ascertained that a portion of said property is involved in a complication relative to the ownership of the parties to this proceeding, as to certain lands on what is called Wright street according to the official map of the city of Wilmington, between the river frontage and Front street." He reports that the purchaser is unwilling to take said property until the question is settled, unless a reduction in the price is made. Thereupon a decree was made directing the commissioner to convey to the purchaser the portion of said property exclusive of the "so-called Wright street" at a reduced price. The official map of the city of Wilmington referred to in the petition, and introduced in evidence, was made pursuant to an act of the General Assembly in 1870 (Priv. Laws 1870-71, p. 22, c. 3). It shows all of the streets in said city, with number of blocks and lots in each block. His honor found, in addition to the foregoing, the following facts: "There has been no legal proceeding had by the defendant city to condemn the locus in quo in this action to the public use as a street; and the court finds that the defendant city has never opened the same as a street; that the defendants, or those under whom they claim, have never in fact by any acts accepted the dedication of the same as a public street, unless the deed of Daniel O'Connor, commissioner, to Stephen L. Cowan, bearing date the 2d day of October, 1892, operates by law to dedicate as a public street the locus in quo; and that the public has never used the same as a public street."

The defendant shingle company claims under S. L. Cowan. The defendant has trespassed on said land. His honor upon these findings of fact, was of the opinion that the deed of Daniel O'Connor, commissioner, to Stephen L. Cowan, hereinbefore mentioned, does not operate in law to dedicate the locus in quo as a street; and thereupon adjudges that the plaintiffs are the owners of the strip of land described in the complaint, and that defendant shingle company has trespassed thereon. Judgment was rendered for nominal damages. Defendants excepted and appealed.

H. K. Bryan, for appellant Cooperage Co. M. Bellamy, Jr., for appellant City of Wilmington. Meares & Ruark, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). Judgment was rendered upon the pleadings against the defendant city of Wilmington at a former term of the court, and exception duly noted. The appeal, by both defendants, was argued at this term. Before discussing the merits of the case, it will be well to notice the distinction between this and several cases in our Reports relied upon by the plaintiffs.

In Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539, the plaintiff was seeking to establish a right to a private way. It is true that in the opinion something is said about the manner in which a public right of way could be acquired by prescription, but there was no suggestion that such a right of way in that case was dedicated. In Kennedy v. Williams, 87 N. C. 6, the right to a public pathway was asserted by reason of long user. In both cases the principle was announced and enforced that, before the lands of a private citizen could be subjected to an easement for a public road or highway, the assertion by the public authorities of such claim must be shown by working, etc.

The claim of the defendants in this case is founded upon an alleged dedication by the owners of the land to the public as a street. We know, as a matter of history, that the city of Wilmington is one of the oldest municipalities in the state; that the public streets have been laid out and used in its corporate limits for more than a century. It appears from the evidence in this record that at the session of the General Assembly of 1870-71 (Priv. Laws 1870-71, p. 22, c. 3), an act was passed directing the aldermen to cause a plan of said city to be made on which should be designated the lines of such streets and public alleys as then existed and of such as might be established by them. The act directed that two copies be made, one of which should be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, and the other in the office of the clerk of the superior court of New Hanover county. It further appears, by reference to a copy of the map in evidence, that Wright street, Front street, and Meares street are laid out and run through plaintiffs' property. This was known to plaintiffs in 1892 when they filed their petition for a sale of the land for partition. The beginning point is located at a marked stone "at the foot of Meares street." A line is called for on "the western line of Front street," and another at "the intersection with the southern line of Wright street." In the decree directing the sale, a specific portion of the property is directed to be sold for a fixed sum—"bounded on the north by Wright street, on the south by Meares street, and on the east by Front street." The plat shows that this property thus described consists of blocks 15 and 16. The same description is set forth in the report of the commissioner and the decree of confirmation. The commissioner, in the deed which he executed to Cowan, gives a more specific description, concluding with the words, "being all of blocks, or squares, 15 and 16, according to the official plan of said city." The plaintiffs insist that the use of these words by the commissioner was without authority and did not bind them. Conceding that the commissioner could not, by his deed, extend or change the boundaries as contained in the decree, it is manifest that he has not done so; he has only made more specific and certain the description of the land sold by him. Whatever doubt may have arisen from the language used in the first proceeding is removed by the description contained in the second. The portion of the land not sold is described in separate blocks or squares, each paragraph concluding with the words, "according to the official plan of said city." This language is repeated 30 times in the petition, and in concluding the description it is said: "So much of said property as is contained in blocks 15 and 16 of the present plan of said city are excepted as having been conveyed by Daniel O'Connor, commissioner, to Stephen L. Cowan." Thus we have the most unmistakable recognition of the existence of the official map and the sale of lots described in accordance with it. The land covered by streets is carefully excluded from the description of the lots conveyed. It does not appear what, if any, use or acts of ownership have been exercised over the strip of land 276 feet in length and 66 feet in width, now claimed by plaintiffs, since the sale of blocks 15 and 16 to Cowan in 1892 until the institution of this action in 1904. Conceding the facts found by his honor, what, if any, effect did the conduct of plaintiffs, in respect to the sale of the property, have upon the right of the city to use, whenever the public necessity demanded, the locus in quo as a street?

In Shea v. Ottumwa, 67 Iowa, 39, 24 N. W. 582, it appeared that lots had been sold according to a map "dividing the property into town lots, and dedicating the streets to public use." Thirty years thereafter the city proposed to open the streets. The map was not recorded as the statute required. Plaintiff sought to recover damages from the city for entering upon and grading the streets. Beck, C. J., after saying that the execution of deeds "bounded according to the description of the plat" would establish the animus dedicandi sufficient to establish a way or street, said: "But it is urged that there was no acceptance of the dedication by the public, or by the city for the public, for more than 30 years after the dedication, when the street was graded. It is shown that the street remained uninclosed; that the land was rough and hilly, and, for that reason, it was used but little by the public. It appears that, when the wants of the public demanded it, the city proceeded to grade the street at the point in dispute. It would not do to hold that city streets dedicated to the public over hilly, rough land would revert to the dedicator if they were not improved and used by the public until the wants of the public travel demanded it. * * * They have not been used for the reason that, until graded, they are incapable of use. The dedication will be presumed to have contemplated this state of things, and imposed no condition on the public to use the streets until the public wants demanded and secured their improvement."

Bennett, J., in Schneider v. Jacob, 86 Ky. 101, 5 S. W. 350, says: "These principles apply primarily in the interest of purchasers of lots who invest their money upon the faith of the assurances of the seller that the streets and alleys which are defined in the plat, and which are called for in the deeds of conveyance, are dedicated to the use of the purchasers and to the public. The purchasers invest their money with the assurance that they shall have all the advantages arising from the streets and alleys as defined and delineated in the plat or plan of the newly created town; and that these streets and alleys, as soon as lots are purchased, with clear reference to them, become irrevocably dedicated, not only to the personal convenience and necessities of the purchasers, but to the use of the public. And although they may not be actually opened by the authority of the city or town, although they may be repudiated as public thoroughfares by the city, as in this case, and different streets and alleys opened up in their stead, yet the purchasers of the lots, with clear reference to the streets and alleys as defined in the map or plan, are entitled, as between them and the seller, to the benefits of the dedication. * * * Where the land is laid out in town lots with streets, and the owner sells a lot which fronts on a street, and the deed calls for the street as the front boundary of the lot, he receives a full consideration for the street in the increased value of the lot."

So, in Sherer v. Jasper, 93 Ala. 536, 9 South. 585, it is said: "The general rule that where a landowner lays off his land into blocks and lots, setting apart and designating certain portions as streets, with a view of establishing a town, a sale of lots with reference to a map defining and delineating the streets is a complete dedication thereof to the use of the purchasers and the public, governs when the proprietor of land sells and conveys lots in conformity and with reference to a city map on which his land is so laid off. Such sales and conveyances are a recognition and adoption of the maps, and amount to a dedication of the designated street to public use, of which the purchase of lots is an acceptance. It is not necessary that the street should be opened at the time of the sale and conveyance."

In Trustees, etc., v. Hoboken, 83 N. J. Law, 13, 97 Am. Dec. 696, Depue, J., says: "When, there being a city map on which the land is so laid off, the owners adopt such maps by a reference thereto, his acts will amount to a dedication of the streets."

In Vanatt v. Jones, 42 N. J. Law, 561, the owners of land as tenants in common filed proceedings for partition, adopting and recognizing a map on which streets had been laid out. Partition was made. Held, that the streets were dedicated to public use.

In Derby v. Alling, 40 Conn. 410, streets were laid out on a map, but not opened, and lots sold calling for them. Seymore, C. J., said: "The public enter upon a part in the name of the whole, to enjoy the parts as, from time to time, such enjoyment of them becomes necessary. This is carrying into effect the manifest intent of the grantor, and of those for whose benefit the grant is made, and we see no difficulty in allowing this intent to prevail and to call it a dedication in present, to be carried into effect in futuro." Henshaw v. Hunting, 67 Mass. 203; Mayor, etc., v. Canal Company, 12 N. J. Eq. 547; Wright v. Tukey, 57 Mass. 290.

The decisions of this court, while not exactly in point, are in harmony with the uniform current of the authorities cited in holding that a sale of lots in accordance and recognition of a map or plat in which streets are laid out constitutes a dedication of the streets to the use of the purchasers and the public. In Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681, the streets were laid out and the lots sold by the town. It was held that the owners of lots were entitled to have them kept open. Smith v. Goldsboro, 121 N. C. 350, 28 S. E. 479, and Conrad v. Land Co., 126 N. C. 776, 36 S. E. 282. In Collins v. Land Co., 128 N. C. 563, 39 S. E. 21, 83 Am. St. Rep. 720, the court held that, when the lots were sold and conveyed by referring to a plat in which streets were laid out, the map became a part of the deed as if it were written therein. In Hughes v. Clark, 134 N. C. 457, 46 S. E. 956, 47 S. E. 462, it was held that, where the deeds conveying the lots referred to a map, the purchasers' rights were not affected by the acceptance or nonacceptance of the dedication. It was held in that case that the town authorities could not, as against an abutting owner, by resolution or ordinance, narrow the street as laid out on the plat or map. The more recent decisions of this court cite these cases with approval. The intention to dedicate the land covered by the streets, as indicated on the map, is manifested in the most unmistakable manner. For what other purpose did the parties in the partition proceedings carefully exclude the streets from the description in the deeds? It cannot be contended, with reason, that they intended to sell off town lots and hold the strips of 66 feet between them for the purpose of preventing ingress and egress to and from the lots. Without the streets, lots of 66 feet width were of little value. It will be observed, by referring to the map, that the blocks are 396 feet in width and are divided into six lots making each 66 feet wide. Having sold the lots by reference to the official city map, the dedication is complete and irrevocable. Elliott on Roads and Streets, 131. The dedication is not confined to a mere private way or easement; it is to the public, to be enjoyed under the control of the city authorities who have charge of the streets. Trustees v. Hoboken, supra. The attempt to limit the dedication made in 1892 by the use of the words "so-called Wright street" cannot affect the rights of the city or the owners of the lots.

Upon the facts found by his honor, judgment should have been rendered for defendants. The legal title of Wright street is in plaintiffs, subject to an easement in the city to use the land as and for a public street to be opened and subjected to regulation as the growth of the city demands. The defendant corporation, in using it in the manner described in the complaint, did not commit a trespass. The judgment will be set aside and judgment entered in the superior court of New Hanover that defendants go without day, etc. Let this be certified.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 165*)—TAKING CASE FROM JURY—MOTION FOR NONSUIT — EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

2. EXPLOSIVES (§ 12*)—INJURIES FROM BLASTING—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's house from blasting operations conducted by defendants, evidence held sufficient to warrant the submission of the case to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Thomas Settle and others against the Southern Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wells & Swain, for appellants. J. C. Martin, J. H. Merrimon, and J. G. Merrimon, for appellees.

BROWN, J. This action was originally instituted against the Southern Railway Company and the above-named defendants, Yandle Bros., Chas. Yandle Company, and Charles Yandle, contractors, for damages to plaintiff's house from blasting operations conducted by the said contractors, in constructing a track for the railway company. The suit was not prosecuted against the latter, and judgment was obtained against the contractors. The jury found that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and that the property of plaintiffs had been injured by reason thereof. The only exception is to the refusal of the court to nonsuit the plaintiffs. On such motion the plaintiff's evidence must be accepted as true, and construed in the light most favorable to him. Milhelser v. Leatherwood, 140 N. C. 235, 52 S. E. 782. There is much more than a scintilla of evidence in this case. The plaintiff's house was injured by concussions and vibrations, which were the result of blasting. Rocks weighing 200 pounds were hurled a great distance, and across the French Broad river. No attempt was made to confine the blasts, or to smother them. In making the blasts as much as eight kegs (over 200 pounds of powder) and 20 sticks of dynamite were used at a time. The evidence is much stronger than the evidence in Blackwell v. Railroad, 111 N. C. 151, 16 S. E. 12, 17 L. R. A. 729, 32 Am. St. Rep. 786, and Kimberly v. Howland, 143 N. C. 398, 55 S. E. 778. We are not prepared to say that there is no evidence of negligence sufficient in probative force to be submitted to a jury.

The motion to nonsuit was properly overruled.

No error.

WALKER, J., did not sit on the hearing of this appeal.

FORTUNE et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 346*)—INJURY TO PERSON ACCOMPANYING PASSENGER — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show plaintiff, who accompanied her husband to a train upon which he was to depart, and who was injured in so doing, was not negligent.

2. CARRIERS (§ 304*)—PERSON ACCOMPANYING PASSENGER—DUTY OF CARRIER.

Though plaintiff was not a passenger towards whom the carrier was bound to exercise the highest degree of care, yet, it being a custom to allow persons to accompany passengers to trains, she was on the premises by the carrier's implied invitation, and was not a mere trespasser, and the carrier was bound to exercise ordinary care for her safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1111; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Peebles, Judge.

Personal injury action by Connie E. Fortune and others against the Southern Railway Company. Findings for plaintiffs were set aside and a nonsuit allowed, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff.

Action to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been received by plaintiff Connie E. Fortune caused by the negligence of the defendant. The cause was tried at July term, 1908, of the superior court of Haywood county, his honor, Judge Peebles, presiding. These issues were submitted.

"(1) Was the plaintiff C. E. Fortune injured by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the plaintiff Connie E. Fortune by her own negligence contribute to her injury as alleged in the answer? Answer: No.

(3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff Connie E. Fortune entitled to recover? Answer: Three hundred and fifty dollars."

Thereupon his honor, upon the ground that he had committed an error in not sustaining defendant's motion to nonsuit, set aside the findings of the jury and allowed the motion, from which judgment plaintiff appealed. In this court it was agreed by counsel that, if the opinion of the court should be with the plaintiff, judgment should be entered for the sum assessed by the jury.

W. B. Ferguson, Frank Carter, and H. C. Chedester, for appellants. Moore & Rollins, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The evidence in this case tends to prove that the plaintiff accompanied her husband to defendant's station at Waynesville for the purpose of seeing him off as a passenger for Asheville. For the purpose of accommodating the increased travel in summer, defendant had daily an extra coach left at a certain place on the side track close to the station at Waynesville, which was attached to the train when it arrived at Waynesville from the West. It was customary to open this extra coach some ten minutes before train time, and to permit passengers to enter it. On the date of the injury the car was standing at the usual place on the side track where passengers were accustomed to board it. The plaintiff and her husband stepped on the platform of this car with the view of entering it, about two minutes before train time, but, finding the door locked, they were on the point of stepping off, when the collision occurred which caused the plaintiff's injury. They were not on the platform exceeding two minutes. At this time there was a large concourse of persons at the station waiting for the train. Under these conditions, and just as plaintiff and her husband were about to leave the platform, an engine was run into the side track at a dangerous rate of speed, variously estimated by the witnesses at from 15 to 30 miles an hour, and was caused to strike a car standing at the station platform, and to drive it against the car upon which plaintiff and her husband were standing with such force that the ends of the two cars buckled and rose from the track, and the shock threw the plaintiff down and injured her.

The learned counsel for defendant in his argument before this court rested his defense very largely upon the defense of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff in attempting to enter the car. We do not think there is any foundation for such defense upon the facts of the case. The evidence discloses no negligent conduct upon the part of the plaintiff while on the car which in the least degree contributed to the injury she received. It will not be contended in this day and generation that it is negligence for a wife to escort her husband to the station and to board a car momentarily to bid him good-bye. The defense must properly rest upon the theory that the plaintiff was on the car without defendant's consent, and that, being a trespasser, the defendant owed her no duty except to refrain from willful injury, and therefore as to her is guilty of no negligent conduct. This view of the evidence is properly presented under the first issue. It is undoubtedly true that if plaintiff had been a trespasser, stealing a ride, as in Bailey's Case (N. C.) 62 S. E. 912, or a huckster entering the train to sell his wares, as in Peterson's Case, 143 N. C. 263, 55 S. E. 618, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1240, 118 Am. St. Rep. 799, she could not recover. But plaintiff was not in any sense a trespasser, and under the circumstances of this case her presence on the car platform was neither wrongful nor negligent. Her presence there was not wrongful, because a wife who escorts a husband or a husband a wife to a seat on a railway train is not a mere trespasser to whom the company owes no duty except to abstain from willful injury. It is true plaintiff was not a passenger towards whom the defendant was bound to exercise the highest degree of care, but she was on its premises by its implied invitation, and it was bound to exercise ordinary care for her safety. Railway companies owe this duty at least to those who in practice they allow to accompany passengers in order to see them off on trains without asking special permission. Railroad v. Lawton, 55 Ark. 428, 18 S. W. 543, 15 L. R. A. 434, 29 Am. St. Rep. 48; Packet Co. v. Wilson, 95 Tenn. 1, 31 S. W. 737; Hutchinson on Carriers, § 237; Whitley v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 987, 29 S. E. 783; Morrow v. Railway, 134 N. C. 92, 46 S. E. 12; Moore v. Railroad, 119 Mich. 613, 78 N. W. 666. This implied invitation and consequent duty to those who impelled by ties of relationship and affection go to "welcome the coming or speed the parting guest" is founded on recognized social observances which have become a universal and inseparable concomitant of modern railway traffic.

Nor do we think the husband and wife were wholly unwarranted in attempting to enter the car at the time and under the circumstances in evidence. The car was an extra coach brought up every morning from Asheville, and left at Waynesville for the afternoon train returning there. It usually remained at the station on the side track at the place the accident occurred. It was the defendant's custom to open the car at that place 10 minutes before train time, and passengers for Asheville at once boarded it, and, upon arrival of the train, it was coupled on. In accordance with this custom, inaugurated and permitted by defendant, plaintiff and her husband boarded the car two minutes before train time in order that he might secure a seat. Finding it locked, they started back to the station, remaining on the car platform in all not more than two minutes, but were caught in the collision. There is no evidence that they lingered on the platform unduly long or did any act that a person of reasonable prudence would not be expected to do under the circumstances. We think his honor's first impressions of this case were the best.

The cause is remanded, with direction to enter judgment for the damages ($350) assessed by the jury.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

PARTITION (§ 94*)—PROCEEDINGS—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS—OBJECTIONS.

Commissioners in partition divided the land and filed their report, and within 20 days thereafter defendant notified the clerk that he desired to file exceptions to the report, whereupon the clerk made and signed the following memorandum: "The defendant comes into court and objects to the report of the commissioners in this cause and asks that the same be not confirmed, this the — day of May, 1908." Thereafter amended exceptions setting out various grounds why the report should not be confirmed were filed with the clerk without objection. Held, that it was error for the clerk thereafter to confirm the report upon the ground that no exception had been filed within 20 days from the filing of the report.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Alfred McDevitt against George McDevitt. From an order of the clerk of court confirming a report of commissioners in partition proceedings defendant appealed to the superior court, where the order was affirmed, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded to the clerk, with directions to give notice to the parties fixing a day, and hear the report and exceptions thereto.

W. W. Zachary, for appellant. Cudger & McElroy, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This was a special proceeding begun before the clerk of the superior court of Madison county for the purpose of partitioning land between tenants in common. There was a decree entered up by consent appointing commissioners to divide the land. The commissioners proceeded on the 16th day of May 1908, to divide the lands and filed their report on the 20th day of May, 1908. During the month of May, 1908, and before the 20 days for filing exceptions had expired, the defendant went to the clerk and notified him that he desired to file exceptions to the said report, whereupon the clerk in the presence of the defendant made the following memorandum: "George McDevitt, the defendant comes into court and objects to the report of the commissioners in this cause and asks that the same be not confirmed, this the — day of May, 1908. J. H. White, C. S. C." On July 13, 1908, the defendant, through his counsel, filed amended exceptions setting out various grounds why the report should not be confirmed. The amended exceptions were received by the clerk without objection, and the matter remained in statu quo until October 15, 1908, when the clerk confirmed the report upon the ground that no exception had been filed within 20 days from the filing of the report. The clerk's judgment upon appeal was affirmed by the judge of the superior court.

This court has held in Floyd v. Rook, 128 N. C. 10, 38 S. E. 33, that exceptions must be filed within the 20 days after the report is filed. But we do not construe either the decision or the statute as forbidding amendments to the exceptions after the expiration of that time. Nor are we prepared to hold that the clerk upon good cause shown may not extend the time for filing exceptions. In this case, however, the defendant did except and object to the report within the 20 days, and later on filed amended exceptions without objection. They were received by the clerk and filed by him, thereby signifying his official consent to such amendments. They remained on file for several months, and, when the cause was heard on October 15th, the clerk erred in not considering them on their merits.

The cause is remanded to the clerk, with directions to give notice to plaintiffs and defendants, fixing a day, and hear the report and exceptions thereto.

not be disposed of but shall descend to the children of my above-mentioned daughter." Held, that the fee-simple estate conveyed to the daughter by the first item was not converted into a life estate by the subsequent provision, which gave no devise to the grandchildren, but was simply an attempted restraint upon alienation, void as against public policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Polk County; Adams, Judge.

Action by R. M. Foster and wife against Joseph Lee. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. Gallert and Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. J. E. Shipman, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The sole question presented by this appeal is whether Clara May Foster is owner in fee of the land contracted to be conveyed by her, and can convey a good title thereto. It is agreed that J. M. Hamilton died seised and possessed of the premises. By item 4 of his will he devised the land in question to his daughter "Clara May Foster, wife of R. M. Foster, and her heirs forever." By item 5 he provided that the "above-devised lands shall not be disposed of but shall descend to the children of my above-mentioned daughter." Item 4 gave the plaintiff Clara May a fee simple. The words of item 5 did not convert this into a life estate. There is no devise to the grandchildren. There is simply an attempted restraint upon alienation, which is contrary to public policy and void. This is settled by a long line of authorities, but it is sufficient to refer to Wool v. Fleetwood, 136 N. C. 460, 48 S. E. 785, 67 L. R. A. 444, a recent case in which the subject is fully discussed and authorities cited by Mr. Justice Walker. It is admitted that Clara May Foster has not incumbered or conveyed the premises. His honor properly held that she owned the land in fee, and had a right to convey the same, and rendered judgment against her vendee for the purchase money.

VADEN v. NORTH CAROLINA R. CO.

1. RAILROADS (§ 397*)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's intestate, who was struck by a car shunted onto a switch track, evidence that there was much passing by school children, factory hands, and citizens generally along the street near which the accident occurred, and in the vicinity thereof, was properly admitted, as it tended to show a condition that should have put the railroad company on notice as to the necessity for caution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 365*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—FLYING SWITCH.

To make a "flying switch" on a railroad track across or along a street of a populous town is negligence per se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1256; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Long, Judge.

Action by Chas. E. Vaden, administrator, against the North Carolina Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Wilson & Ferguson, for appellant. W. P. Bynum, Jr., and R. C. Strudwick, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant in apt time entered a motion to nonsuit, which the court overruled, and defendant excepted.

The undisputed evidence tends to prove that the intestate, a boy 13 years of age, was struck and killed on defendant's tracks by a car which had been shunted onto the switch track, and was moving quite rapidly towards Tomlinson street crossing. The car had no brakeman on it, and had been "kicked" onto the track by the engine, thereby making what is called a "flying switch." The switch tracks were located in a populous part of the city of High Point, and the intestate was killed immediately in front of Tomlinson's factory, where he worked. The evidence for plaintiff tends to prove that he was killed about 30 feet from where Tomlinson street crosses the tracks. The evidence for defendant locates him further from the crossing. All the evidence shows that these switch tracks were situated in a populous part of the city, and adjacent to, and close by, factories where many persons of all ages were employed. At the time the intestate was killed, the factory had just closed for the day, and the employes were filling the streets and crossings. The court permitted evidence to the effect that there is much passing by school children, factory hands, and citizens generally along Tomlinson street, and in the vicinity of the accident, to which defendant excepted. We see no objection to this evidence. It tended to establish conditions that should have put the defendant on notice as to the necessity for caution in moving its cars at this point. Railroad v. Smith, 93 Ky. 440, 20 S. W. 392, 18 L. R. A. 66. This case presents none of the features of Bailey's Case (N. C.) 62 S. E. 912. The intestate in that case had wrongfully entered the switching yards, and climbed on the tender of an engine, and was killed in a collision. Making "flying switches" on the railway tracks and sidings running across and along the streets of populous towns is per se gross negligence, and has been so disclosed by all courts in this country, and by text-writers generally. It is stated in one of the best known text-books that the use of a running switch in a highway, in the midst of a populous town or village, is of itself "an act of gross and criminal negligence on the part of the company." Sherman & Red. Neg. (3d Ed.) § 466; Wilson v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 333, 55 S. E. 257; Allen v. Railroad, 145 N. C. 214, 58 S. E. 1081; Bradley v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 742, 36 S. E. 181. In the voluminous notes to Railroad v. Smith, 18 L. R. A. 66, cited above, will be found innumerable cases selected from many courts of last resort, condemning the practice of making flying switches along the streets of towns and cities, and pronouncing such practice per se negligence.

Upon the issue of contributory negligence upon the part of a child 13 years of age we think his honor's instructions are clearly in line with what we have laid down at this term in Baker v. Railroad, 64 S. E. 506, and that in all respects he followed well-settled precedents.

We have examined all the exceptions, and think it would be of no value to discuss them seriatim. It would be traveling over ground that has been much traveled before.

We find in the record no reversible error.

Robertson & Benbow and Busbee & Busbee, for appellant. Shepherd & Shepherd, Fred S. Johnston, and L. O. Bell, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The material points in this appeal are embraced in the second and fourth issues; that is to say, whether there was a contract of employment for the entire year of 1907. The action is brought upon the assumption that there was such a contract of employment, and the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the entire year, although he did no work after the first few days in July, 1907. If there were such a contract, and he was wrongfully discharged, he would be entitled to such damages, less what he might have earned upon reasonable effort. Smith v. Lumber Co., 142 N. C. 26, 54 S. E. 788, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439. His honor instructed the jury that upon the letters and other undisputed testimony there was no such contract for the entire year of 1907, but that the employment was from month to month. It is admitted that the correctness of this ruling is the only question presented.

In contracts for personal service the English rule is that, when no time is fixed and no stipulation as to payment made, it is presumed to extend for a year. In this country, when no time is fixed, and no stipulated period of payment made, the contract is terminated at the will of either party. 20 A. & E. Cy. 14; Solomon v. Sewerage Co., 142 N. The evidence of the contract is wholly in writing, in the form of correspondence, and there is no evidence of any other contract subsequent thereto. We think his honor's interpretation of the letters is correct, and in accord with the case of Edwards v. Railroad, 121 N. C. 490, 28 S. E. 137.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 91*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—SUBSTANTIAL RIGHTS.

No appeal lies from an order permitting parties to withdraw their exceptions to a referee's report and their demand for a jury, under Clark's Code, § 548, allowing an appeal from a judicial order, involving a matter of law or legal inference, which affects a substantial right, or which determines the action and prevents a judgment from which an appeal might be taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by J. M. Greenlee, administrator, against J. Harvey Greenlee and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Avery and W. T. Morgan, for appellant. Pless & Winborne, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The defendants filed exceptions to the report of the referee, and demanded a jury trial. The plaintiff filed exceptions, but made no such demand. The defendants asked leave to withdraw their exceptions and demand for jury trial, and that the plaintiff's exceptions be heard. The plaintiff insisted that, although he had not asked for a jury trial, and had no exceptions which he desired submitted to the jury, yet because defendants had made such demand, and the plaintiff had consented to defendants' having it, the court could not permit the withdrawal of either the exceptions or the demand for the jury, and insisted that, although he was satisfied with the findings of fact, the defendants having said they were not, they had to fight further whether they so desired or not. This is the whole case. The plaintiff withdrew his objection to the defendants' demand for a jury trial. If this had any effect, it was against the plaintiff. It could not estop the defendants from withdrawing their exceptions or their demand for a jury trial. The plaintiff, having excepted to the order permitting the defendants to withdraw their exceptions and their demand for a jury, insisted on an immediate appeal. His honor properly ruled that no appeal lay from such order, but that the plaintiff could note his exception, which would come up for review on this appeal from the final judgment. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 548, pp. 733, 734.

Affirmed.

MORGANTON HARDWARE CO. et al. v. MORGANTON GRADED SCHOOL et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 13*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LIEN—PUBLIC PROPERTY.*

A public school building, title to which is vested in a board of trustees, is not subject to a mechanic's lien for material furnished for its construction; the statute not showing an intention to extend the lien to public property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by the Morganton Hardware Company and others against the Morganton Graded School and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Avery & Ervin, for appellants. Riddle & Huffman, S. J. Ervin, and J. T. Perkins, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The plaintiffs furnished materials to L. W. Cooper, who had contracted to build a schoolhouse for the defendant the Morganton graded school, and they filed and now claim a lien upon the building for the materials so furnished.

The only question for our consideration is whether a public school building is subject to a statutory lien for materials furnished for its construction. This question we must answer in the negative, if we apply the principle declared in former decisions of this court, and are governed by the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions. Snow v. Commissioners, 112 N. C. 336, 17 S. E. 176; Gastonia v. Engineering Co., 131 N. C. 363, 42 S. E. 857. In 27 Cyc. p. 25, it is said that such a lien does not attach to public school buildings, and many authorities are cited in the notes to sustain the proposition. In Neal v. Trustees, 121 Ga. 208, 48 S. E. 978, it is said: "As a general rule, in the absence of some expression in the statute making it evident that the Legislature intended it so to apply, a mechanic's lien statute will not be construed to give a lien upon public buildings or other public property devoted to public use. Thus a lien cannot be acquired or enforced against a public school building or the lot on which it is situated, a courthouse, a city hall, a public bridge which is part of a public highway, or the waterworks of a municipality. In some cases the reason given for this rule is that to hold otherwise would be contrary to public policy, while in others the rule has been considered to be based upon the fact that the ordinary methods provided by statute for the enforcement of the lien cannot be pursued against public property, and hence, there being no mode of enforcing the lien, it cannot exist; and it has also been held that the provisions of the mechanic's lien law could not be applied to public school buildings because the relation sustained by a school district to the school property was not that of owner within the meaning of the statute, and hence a contract with the district could not give rise to the lien"—citing 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. 295, 296. The counsel admitted that, as a general rule, a public building is not the subject of a lien for work done or materials furnished in the absence of some expression in the statute showing the intention of the Legislature to be otherwise; but they contended that the rule did not apply when the title to the property is vested in a board of trustees. This contention is fully answered in the case of Neal v. Trustees, just cited and especially in Trustees v. City Counsel, 90 Ga. 634, 17 S. E. 61, 20 L. R. A. 151, where it is said: "In view of the legislation to which we have referred, there can be no question as to the public character of the institution originally. The property vested in the trustees was public property, and was committed to them for a public purpose. No private interest of any kind was acquired. The beneficial interest was in the public, and the trustees were merely agents of the state for the administration of the fund and the management of the institution. Since that time there has been no legislation changing the public character of the trust or parting with the control of the state over the institution of the fund connected with it. Mere noninterference with the control exercised by the trustees could not affect the rights of the state or divest the institution or the property of its public character."

The question is carefully discussed in Fatout v. Board of School Commissioners, 102 Ind. 232, 1 N. E. 394, where the court, citing Board v. O'Connor, 86 Ind. 531, 44 Am. Rep. 338, says: "In the mechanic's lien law of this state there is no provision to the effect that such a lien may be acquired or enforced upon or against public property held for public use; and, in the absence of such a provision, we must hold in conformity with the weight of authority elsewhere that such a lien can neither be acquired nor enforced upon or against such property held for such use. The doctrine of the case last cited is decisive, as it seems to us, of the question we are now considering adversely to the validity of the mechanic's lien which Fatout claims to have acquired, and is seeking to enforce upon and against the public schoolhouse erected by him in the case in hand; for there is no public property held for a more sacred public use than a public schoolhouse of a public school corporation under the Constitution and laws of this state." In Lessard v. Inhabitants of Revere, 171 Mass. 294, 50 N. E. 533, the same conclusion was reached, which was based upon a full citation of the authorities. Holmes, J., for the court, said that "the general current of decisions is against the lien when the property upon which it [the lien] is asserted is held for public use." We do not find anything in our statute indicating a purpose on the part of the Legislature to change the general rule of law as thus established by the decisions of the courts in other states, and as we think, also, by the decisions of this court.

The court erred in adjudging upon the findings of fact that the plaintiffs had acquired any lien upon the property of the defendant the Morganton graded school, and its judgment as to that defendant is therefore reversed. Reversed.

STATE v. LUNSFORD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 71*) — SUFFICIENCY—CERTAINTY.

The indictment or warrant under which one is prosecuted must set forth the accusation with sufficient certainty to enable the court to determine what offense has been committed, and to know what punishment may be imposed in case of a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information. Cent. Dig. §§ 193, 194; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 198*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—WARRANT—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit and warrant, charging an unlawful sale of liquor in a city before prohibition became effective therein, must allege a sale without a license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 639*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCES—WARRANT AND AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

A prosecution for the violation of a municipal ordinance cannot be sustained, where the warrant and accompanying affidavit do not set forth the ordinance nor describe it, nor refer to it in any way sufficient to identify it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1406-1409; Dec. Dig. § 639.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 198*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—AFFIDAVIT AND WARRANT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the warrant and accompanying affidavit charging an unlawful sale of liquor do not show whether the sale was in violation of the state law or a municipal ordinance, no valid judgment can be pronounced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Ward, Judge.

Jim Lunsford was convicted of selling liquor contrary to law, and he appeals. Judgment arrested.

Indictment for selling whisky in the city of Asheville contrary to law, tried on appeal from police court of the city of Asheville. The procedure under which conviction was had is shown in the affidavit and warrant appearing in the record as follows:

"North Carolina, Buncombe County. City of Asheville, Police Justice's Court. Charge: Violation of Ordinance No. State. E. C. McConnell maketh oath that on the 26th day of September, 1908, in the city of Asheville, N. C., Jim Lunsford did unlawfully and willfully sell spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors to one Zeb D. Grant, in violation of City Ordinance No. State, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. E. C. McConnell.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 26th day of September, 1908. G. S. Reynolds, Police Justice.

"State of North Carolina to the Chief of Police or Any Policeman of the City of Asheville, or Other Lawful Officer of Said City—Greetings: We command you to arrest the body of Jim Lunsford, and him safely keep, so that you have him before me at 9 o'clock, a. m., on the 28th day of September, 1908, then and there to answer the charge above set forth. G. S. Reynolds, Police Justice.

"To the Chief of Police or Any Other Policeman or Other Lawful Officer of the City of Asheville—Greetings: You are hereby commanded to summon the following witnesses to appear before G. S. Reynolds, police justice of the city of Asheville, at the time and place named, for the return of the within warrant and summons, to testify as to the charge contained in the within affidavit and warrant, and to testify on the matters mentioned in the within summons, and not depart from the court without leave: Zeb D. Grant, J. H. Fore, Frankie Davis, W. A. Webb. G. S. Reynolds, Police Justice.

"The within warrant received this 28th day of September, 1908. Executed 28th day of September, 1908, by arresting Jim Lunsford and bringing him before G. S. Reynolds, P. J., for trial at 9 o'clock, a. m., 28th day of September. E. C. McConnell, Policeman."

Under this procedure, the defendant was tried, convicted and sentenced by the police justice to pay a fine of $100. Having appealed to the superior court, defendant was there again convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months, and assigned to work the public roads during his term. From this judgment, defendant, having duly excepted, appealed to this court.

W. P. Brown, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

HOKE, J. While the statutes in this state are full and sufficient to cure all formal defects in the procedure incident to a criminal prosecution, the requirement remains that in any and every such prosecution, whether by indictment or warrant, either alone or in connection with the accompanying affidavit, the defendant shall be informed of the accusation against him; and this accusation must be set forth with sufficient certainty to enable the court to say what offense has been committed, and to know what punishment may be imposed in case of conviction. Hendersonville v. McMinn, 82 N. C. 533; Clark's Criminal Procedure, 150. At the time of this occurrence prohibition had not gone into effect in the city of Asheville; and, in order to constitute a criminal offense in that locality for a violation of either the state or municipal law, it was required that the sale of spirituous liquors should have been without license. The procedure, therefore, under which this conviction was had is fatally defective, in that it contains no allegation of a sale without license. State v. Holder, 133 N. C. 709, 45 S. E. 862. Again, while the warrant and accompanying affidavit give indication that the offense charged was for the violation of some municipal ordinance, the ordinance is not set forth or described, nor is it referred to in any way sufficient to identify it, and, for this reason, a prosecution cannot be sustained under it as an offense against a municipal regulation.

Referring to this position, as well as that first stated, in McMinn's Case, supra, Ashe, J., for the court, said: "The process under which the defendant was arrested is so defective in form and substance as not to warrant the judgment pronounced upon him in the court below. It should have set out the ordinance, but instead of doing so it charges the defendant with the violation of one of the ordinances of the town of Hendersonville —prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors—implying that there was more than one ordinance of the town on that subject. Which did he violate? If it was intended to be a criminal prosecution, the warrant is the indictment; and every indictment must state the facts and circumstances constituting the offense with such certainty, that the defendant may be enabled to determine the species of the offense with which he is charged, in order that he may know how to prepare his defense, and that the court may be in no doubt as to the judgment it should pronounce if the defendant be convicted. Archb. Cr. Pl. 42, 43." Further, in State v. Lytle, 138 N. C. 738, 51 S. E. 66, we have held that, under certain circumstances, one and the same act or sale may constitute distinct offenses, the one being in violation of a state law, and the other of a town ordinance requiring a municipal license; and, if it be conceded that such a condition obtains here, on conviction under this warrant as it now stands, the court is unable to determine whether the punishment should be imposed for the one offense or the other, and therefore no valid judgment can be pronounced.

For the reasons indicated, we are of opinion that the judgment against the defendant should be arrested, and it is so ordered.

Judgment arrested.

McMANUS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—"PUBLIC NUISANCE"—PRIVATE RIGHTS—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

The doctrine that a private citizen can only recover damages by reason of a public nuisance by showing some injury peculiar to himself, and differing in kind and degree from that suffered by the public generally, applies only to that class of nuisances which are, in strictness, public nuisances, without more—i. e., an unlawful interference with a public right, a right enjoyed by the general public, as in case of user of a public highway; but the doctrine does not obtain where the nuisance, though public from its extent and placing, by its very existence involves the invasion of the personal and private rights of individuals.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5799-5804.]

2. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—EVIDENCE—"MIXED NUISANCES."

In nuisances of this second class, sometimes termed "mixed nuisances," an actionable wrong arises in favor of all persons who come within its effects and influence, and whose rights of person or property, are injuriously affected, and it is not required, to sustain such an action, that the person injured should establish damage different in kind and degree from others in like circumstances, however numerous they may be. The right of action in such case is sustained by showing the existence of appreciable damage to the plaintiff, whether such damage be special or otherwise.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4547.]

3. NUISANCE (§§ 4, 71*)—IRREPARABLE INJURY—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

To sustain an action for a nuisance, public or private, which does not involve the physical invasion of the property of another, it is always required to be shown that some appreciable damage has been suffered, or that some serious or irreparable injury is threatened; and, unless this is made to appear, a right to nominal damages does not arise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. §§ 4, 71.*]

4. NUISANCE (§ 76*)—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—ISSUES INSUFFICIENT—JUDGMENT—NEW TRIAL.

In an action to recover damages for a "mixed nuisance," where the defendant answered, denying the existence of the alleged nuisance, and also denying that the plaintiff was the owner or lawful occupant of property adjacent thereto, or within its influence, and two issues were submitted—(1) as to the existence of the nuisance; and (2) as to the existence of special damages—and the verdict on the first issue established the existence of the nuisance and on the second issue negatived the existence of special damage, the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on such a verdict, because no damage to him of any kind was shown to exist, and so far as appears he may not own any property adjacent to the nuisance or injuriously affected by it; nor should the defendant have judgment, for the reason that, in order to sustain his action for the alleged injury, plaintiff is not required to show special damage—that is, damage differing in kind and degree from others injuriously affected by the nuisance—but only that the nuisance exists and that he has suffered damage thereby. The two questions submitted, therefore, did not determine all the essential and issuable facts involved in the action, and the cause should be referred to another jury on issues adequate and fully determinative of the controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

Brown, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Council, Judge.

Action by R. G. McManus against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

There was allegation, with evidence, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that plaintiff was the owner of a dwelling house and tenement property adjacent to the Old Rock Quarry, in the city of Charlotte, and that:

"(3) In or about the year 1890 the said defendant, or its grantors, leased and let the said tract or lot of land in the city of Charlotte for the purpose of opening a rock quarry, and the said defendant has knowingly, carelessly, and unlawfully permitted, allowed, and tolerated its lessee, the city of Charlotte, to open up a rock quarry on said tract or lot of land, and to maintain a nuisance upon said premises, and is now permitting, allowing, and tolerating a nuisance to exist and to be maintained on said premises, as hereinafter set out in this complaint.

"(4) That the city of Charlotte, about the year 1890, commenced to open up a rock quarry on defendant's said tract or lot of land, and continued to so use said premises as a rock quarry until some time during the year 1906, when it ceased to use said premises as a rock quarry.

"(5) That while operating the rock quarry on said premises the city of Charlotte used violent explosives, blasting the rock, throwing large pieces of rock upon the house of this plaintiff, which blasting of rock damaged plaintiff's dwelling by causing the plastering to fall from the walls, by making great holes in the roof, and by damaging the outside walls, the said excavation reaching within a few feet of the plaintiff's premises on South College street, and, at the time of ceasing to use said premises as a rock quarry a large and dangerous excavation was left open, said excavation being from 40 to 50 feet deep, and about 100 yards wide, and about 125 yards long; the said excavation being left exposed and unprotected.

"(6) That since the city of Charlotte abandoned the use of the rock quarry, the defendant has permitted water to collect and remain in said excavation from 5 to 30 feet in depth, much of the water being emptied from different parts of the city, which water in said excavation becomes stagnant, emitting an unwholesome odor, to the discomfort and annoyance of this plaintiff and his tenants.

"(7) That after the city abandoned the use of said rock quarry, the defendant permitted, allowed, and tolerated the city to haul and throw into said excavation street cleanings, rotten eggs, decayed fish, dead chickens, dead cats, and various other filth, and dead carcasses, from all portions of the city, which, together with the stagnant water, sent forth and emitted nauseous and loathsome odors, making the plaintiff's property almost uninhabitable, causing sickness, making the plaintiff's tenants to abandon the property, and greatly reducing the rental value of all the plaintiff's property.

"(8) That besides a good dwelling house, the plaintiff has on said lot a small dwelling house, and several other buildings for business purposes; and, on account of the nuisance allowed and permitted by the defendant on said adjoining lot, as above set out, this plaintiff has been unable to rent or get any substantial income from some of these buildings.

"(9) That the defendant is guilty of a wrongful and unlawful act in maintaining, permitting, and allowing said nuisance, above set out, to exist on its lot or tract of land, on account of which this plaintiff has suffered, and continues to suffer, special and peculiar damages, being an adjoining lot owner, and not only has he been damaged in his health, but he has been, and is, greatly damaged in his property rights and interests, in that the market value of his said property and the income therefrom has been greatly decreased and diminished on account of the maintenance of said nuisance—all to his great damage in the sum of $2,000."

There was general denial on the part of defendant of the essential portions of the complaint, and evidence tending to support same. On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant maintain, or permit to be maintained, on the premises a public nuisance as alleged in the complaint?

"Answer: 'Yes,'

"(2) What special damages, if any, has the plaintiff suffered on account of said nuisance?

"Answer: 'Nothing.'"

On the verdict, both plaintiff and defendant having moved for judgment, the court signed judgment for plaintiff, ordering an abatement of the nuisance within 10 months, and defendant, the Southern Railway, excepted and appealed.

W. B. Rodman and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant. Plummer Stewart and Burwell & Causler, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is very generally held, uniformly so far as we have examined, both here and elsewhere, that in order for a private citizen to sustain an action, by reason of a public nuisance, he must establish some damage or injury special and peculiar to himself, and differing in kind and degree from that suffered in common with the general public. Pedrick v. Ry., 143 N. C. 485, 55 S. E. 877, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 554. This limitation on a right of action, so expressed in many well-considered decisions, must be understood to apply in strictness where the wrong complained of consists in the unlawful interference with some public right, a right held by a plaintiff in common with all members of a community, and does not obtain when a public nuisance involves also the invasion of the private right of the litigant. In these cases a person who is injured in some substantial right of person or property is not deprived of his action because the wrong done is so extensive, and of such a character and placing, that it amounts to an indictable offense. This apparent exception may perhaps be referred to the more general rule, at first stated, by considering that any and all persons, who come within the sphere and influence of a nuisance to an extent that subjects them to an injury of the kind stated, suffer the special or peculiar damage required to the maintenance of an action by the individual. Mr. Wood, in his work on Nuisances, so treats the question (Wood on Nuisances [2d Ed.] § 16), referring cases coming within the exception to the head of mixed nuisances; public "in that they produce injury to many persons, or all the public, and private because at the same time they produce a special and particular injury to private rights, which subjects the wrongdoer to indictment by the public, and also to damages at the suit of the person injured."

The distinction to which we were adverting is very well brought out in the case of Wesson v. Washburn, 95 Mass. 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181, in which it was held: "Private Action for Nuisance General in Its Operation.—Action will lie against owners of a mill for injuring plaintiff's dwelling by shaking and jarring the same, and surrounding it with noisome odors and vapors, although all the other residents of that locality have suffered like injury. The rule that, where the right invaded or impaired is a common and public one, which every subject of the state may use and enjoy, an individual action does not lie does not apply to cases where the alleged wrong is done to private property, or the health of individuals is injured, or their comfort destroyed, by the carrying on of offensive trades, or the creation of noisome smells or disturbing noises, no matter how extensive or numerous may be the instances of discomfort or injury to persons or property thereby occasioned." And in the opinion Chief Justice Bigelow, speaking to this question, said: "Where a public right or privilege common to every person in the community is interrupted or interfered with, a nuisance is created, by the very act of interruption or interference, which subjects the party through whose agency it is done to a public prosecution, although no actual injury or damage may be thereby caused to any one. If, for example, a public way is obstructed, the existence of the obstruction is a nuisance, and punishable as such, even if no inconvenience or delay to public travel actually takes place. It would not be necessary, in a prosecution for such a nuisance, to show that any one had been delayed or turned aside. The offense would be complete, although during the continuance of the obstruction no one had had occasion to pass over the way. The wrong consists in doing an act inconsistent with, and in derogation of, the public or common right. It is in cases of this character that the law does not permit private actions to be maintained on proof merely of a disturbance in the enjoyment of the common right, unless special damage is also shown, distinct not only in degree, but in kind, from that which is done to the whole public by the nuisance. But there is another class of cases in which the essence of the wrong consists in an invasion of private right, and in which the public offense is committed, not merely by doing an act which causes injury, annoyance, and discomfort to one or several persons who may come within the sphere of its operation or influence, but by doing it in such place, and in such manner, that the aggregation of private injuries becomes so great and extensive as to constitute a public annoyance and inconvenience, and a wrong against the community, which may be properly the subject of a public prosecution. But it has never been held, so far as we know, that in cases of this character the injury to private property, or to the health and comfort of individuals, becomes merged in the public wrong so as to take away from the persons injured the right which they would otherwise have to maintain actions to recover damages which each may have sustained in his person or estate from the wrongful act.

* * * The real distinction would seem to be this: That when the wrongful act is of itself a disturbance or obstruction only to the exercise of a common and public right, the sole remedy is by public prosecution, unless special damage is caused to individuals. In such case the act of itself does no wrong to individuals distinct from that done to the whole community. But when the alleged nuisance would constitute a private wrong by injuring property or health, or creating personal inconvenience and annoyance, for which an action might be maintained in favor of a person injured, it is none the less actionable because the wrong is committed in a manner and under circumstances which would render the guilty party liable to indictment for a common nuisance." See Manufacturing Co. v. Railway, 117 N. C. 579, 23 S. E. 43.

The nuisance established by the verdict on the first issue is of the kind considered in the opinion just quoted, and would give a right of action to any and all persons who come within its influence and effect, to the extent of suffering injury to their private rights, either of person or property; but plaintiff is not entitled to the judgment given him by reason of the verdict on the second issue, to the effect that no special damages have been suffered by plaintiff on account of the nuisance, and for the lack of any finding or fact established in the record showing that plaintiff has suffered either injury or damage of any kind done or threatened. There is evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show both, but neither has been authoritatively established, and the court is not at liberty to infer or act upon it till this is done.

Where a nuisance has been established, working harm to the rights of an individual citizen, the law of our state is searching and adequate to afford an injured person ample redress, both by remedial and preventive remedies, as will be readily seen by reference to numerous decisions of the court on the subject. Revisal 1905, § 825; Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 61 S. E. 267; Pedrick v. Railway, supra; Reyburn v. Sawyer, 135 N. C. 328, 47 S. E. 761, 65 L. R. A. 930, 102 Am. St. Rep. 555; Manufacturing Co. v. Railway, supra; City of Raleigh v. Hunter, 16 N. C. 12; Tarboro v. Blount, 11 N. C. 384, 15 Am. Dec. 526; Railway v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. 719, 27 L. Ed. 739. But in wrongs of the kind presented here, not involving any physical interference with the personal or proprietary rights of another, a recovery cannot be had, even for nominal damages, by simply showing that a nuisance has been created or maintained; but plaintiff must go further, and show that it has injuriously affected him in some substantial right, or there is imminent danger that it will do so. Where the essential or issuable facts are referred to a jury for decision, and there are no additional facts admitted in the pleadings, or otherwise, and none of the kind of which a court takes judicial notice, the judgment must follow as a conclusion of law upon the verdict. In the case before us the defendant in its pleadings has denied that plaintiff is the owner of any property adjacent to this alleged nuisance, or that any property of his is injuriously affected thereby; and, while a perusal of the evidence discloses that no debate was made on that point in the trial below, the court, as stated, is not at liberty, in a case of this kind, to act upon the evidence, but can only award or refuse relief upon facts established in some authorized way, and, so far as appears, there are no facts so established which show that plaintiff's property comes within the influence and operation of the alleged nuisance, and no damages, special or otherwise, have been shown which in any way affect him.

Nor do we think that defendant is entitled to judgment on the verdict as rendered, for the reason that the issues are not fully responsive to the pleadings. As we have heretofore endeavored to show, the nuisance alleged in the complaint, and established by the verdict on the first issue, is of a kind and character which involves the invasion of the rights of all owners, or lawful occupants of adjacent property, whose individual rights are injuriously affected; and a right of action on any one of them is in no way impaired because the injury done him is the same, or similar in kind, to that of all others in like circumstances, however numerous. Such owner is not required to establish the existence of damage or injury special and peculiar in reference to the injury generally suffered by other adjacent owners who are similarly situated. As to them, therefore, or any one of them, the second issue imposes a greater burden than is required to establish an actionable wrong against the defendant; and in view of the kind of nuisance alleged and established, we are of opinion that the verdict is not sufficiently full and responsive to entitle either the plaintiff or defendant to judgment, in that it does not determine all the issuable facts embraced in the pleadings, and the cause should be referred to another jury. Bryant v. Ins. Co., 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983.

For the error indicated, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff will be set aside, and the cause remanded that a trial may be had on issues determinative of the rights of the parties involved in the action.

New trial.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). I feel constrained to dissent from the opinion of the court because I am convinced that upon the issues as answered by the jury the action should be dismissed. One question only is presented: Can the plaintiff maintain this action on the complaint, answer, and verdict? In his complaint the plaintiff alleges, in substance, that the defendant is maintaining a public nuisance in respect to a large abandoned rock quarry, in permitting the city of Charlotte to throw filth and refuse into it, whereby plaintiff is damaged. Why plaintiff does not sue the city of Charlotte is not stated. Upon the trial these issues were submitted by consent, without exception or objection, as being the only issues raised by the pleadings:

"(1) Did the defendant maintain, or permit to be maintained, on the premises a public nuisance as alleged in the complaint?"

"Answer: 'Yes.'"

"(2) What special damages, if any, has the plaintiff suffered on account of said nuisance?"

"Answer: 'Nothing.'"

The defendant moved for judgment dismissing the action. The court denied the motion, and defendant appeals, assigning such refusal as error. There is no other question presented upon this appeal.

A plaintiff cannot have judgment abating a public nuisance when the jury have found that he has suffered no special damage. The remedy is by indictment. Pedrick v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 496, 55 S. E. 877, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 554. Special damage is such damage as is not common to the public. Pedrick v. Railroad, supra. In regard to a public nuisance, Mr. Justice Connor says in that case: "It is elementary learning that no private citizen may sue therefor, unless he suffers some damage which is not common to the public; or, to express it affirmatively, he may sue by showing that he sustained some special peculiar injury, different in kind from the public." In Manufacturing Co. v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 587, 23 S. E. 43, the same principle is recognized as well settled in a learned opinion by Mr. Justice Avery, who says in opening: "The most interesting question presented by this appeal is whether the plaintiff in any aspect of the evidence has shown such special damage as would entitle him to redress by civil action for a public nuisance." This special damage, as the learned judge proceeds to demonstrate, need not be confined to one person. It must be unusual, extraordinary, but not necessarily singular. Mr. Wood says: "The rule is well established that no person can maintain an action (on a public nuisance) unless he sustains a special damage therefrom differing from that sustained by the rest of the public." Section 645, Wood on Nuisances. That this has been recognized law from the earliest times to the present is shown by an examination of text-writers and decisions too numerous to quote. Coke Inst. 560; Williams' Case, 5 Coke, 72; Joyce on Nuisances, 267-281; Reyburn v. Sawyer, 135 N. C. 336, 47 S. E. 761, 65 L. R. A. 930, 102 Am. St. Rep. 555. Not only do the averments of the complaint state facts which constitute a public nuisance, but plaintiff admits it by consenting to the force of the first issue. That being so, and the jury having found that plaintiff suffered no special damage, it would seem that ordinarily the action would be dismissed without much controversy.

Although the plaintiff has not excepted or appealed, the court orders a new trial of the whole case because the issues submitted, it is said, are not determinative of the issues raised by the pleadings. And this is done ex mero motu by the court, although neither appellant nor appellee asks for it, and notwithstanding that the cause is before us solely upon the motion of defendant for judgment upon the issues. If defendant is not entitled to it, then the judgment, it seems to me, necessarily stands affirmed. There are two answers to the position of the court which appear to me to be conclusive. The first is that the form of the issues were agreed upon, and if they are not full enough, or if they are not properly worded, it is plaintiff's fault. He should have excepted and tendered others. This has been decided repeatedly. Clark's Code, § 395. In MacDonald v. Carson, 95 N. C. 377, it is held that where issues are submitted, a party cannot be heard to assign error that the court did not submit an issue on a particular question upon which he did not tender an issue. "It is too late," says Smith, C. J., "after the trial to complain that certain issues were not submitted to the jury, if they were not asked for in apt time." In the case at bar neither party complains of the issues submitted, and the form in which they are expressed are in strict accord with the precedents I have cited. But it is said by the court that, as these issues are not determinative of the issues raised by the pleadings, no judgment whatever can be rendered for either party. It is very singular that no such thought seems to have occurred to the counsel for plaintiff or defendant, both of whom were represented in this court by some of the ablest lawyers in the state. I am sure they, as well as the learned judge below, will be surprised to learn that the issues they all agreed upon are deemed so wholly insufficient that no judgment for either party can be rendered upon them.

There are only two questions or issues raised by the pleadings, one is the nuisance, and the other is the damage, and both were submitted to the jury. The court has not pointed out any other issues raised by the pleadings than those I have named. But the court says, in effect, that the damages are not to be confined to special damages, and that the plaintiff may recover judgment if he "has suffered either injury or damage of any kind done or threatened." While this proposition, I submit, is against all of our own precedents (Pedrick's Case, supra) yet, admitting it, the fact remains that an issue in respect to damages was submitted, and the form of it was approved by plaintiff. If it was confined erroneously to special damages, it was plaintiff's own fault, and if he does not complain, why should this court find fault? Surely two issues as to damages should not have been submitted, but if an additional issue in respect to some other kind of damage was proper, it was incumbent on plaintiff to tender it.

It is perfectly evident that the learned and astute lawyers for the plaintiff framed the damage issue in its present form because their complaint specifies with care and particularizes the elements of damage, and each item thereof, and they constitute special damages only peculiar to this plaintiff within every known and accepted definition of that term. Pedrick v. Railroad, supra; Mfg. Co. v. Railroad, supra. It is universally held in this country that, where damages are specified in the complaint, the plaintiff can recover for no other; and all damages must be specially pleaded where, as in this case, they do not necessarily flow to the plaintiff from the wrong complained of. 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 733, and cases cited. In support of his averment that he is peculiarly injured by the nuisance the plaintiff alleges and testifies that he owns property near the rock quarry complained of; that his house was injured by explosions from blasting; that his property was made uninhabitable from nauseous smells, causing sickness to his tenants and himself; that the rental value of his property was reduced; and that, besides a good dwelling house, the plaintiff has on said lot a small dwelling house, and several other buildings for business purposes, and on account of the nuisance allowed and permitted by the defendant on said adjoining lot, as above set out, this plaintiff has been unable to rent or get any substantial income from some of these buildings. These are the only injuries plaintiff sustained, and they not only come within the definition of special damage peculiar to him but the plaintiff classifies them as such, for he sums up his catalogue of grievances in these words: "That the defendant is guilty of a wrongful and unlawful act in maintaining, permitting, and allowing said nuisance, above set out, to exist on its lot or tract of land, on account of which this plaintiff has suffered, and continues to suffer, 'special and peculiar damages,' being an adjoining lot owner, and not only has he been damaged in his health, but he has been, and is, greatly damaged in his property rights and interests, in that the market value of his said property, and the income therefrom, has been greatly decreased and diminished on account of the maintenance of said nuisance—all to his great damage in the sum of $2,000." This court has repeatedly held that it will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in shaping and submitting issues if opportunity is given to present evidence upon the issues raised by the pleadings. Clark's Code, § 396, and cases cited. Opportunity was not only given, but both plaintiff and defendant did introduce evidence under the issues submitted bearing upon each allegation of the complaint. In fact if my brethren will read the evidence, they will find that the whole of it is strictly pertinent to the issues submitted, and that there is none of it applicable to any other issue that could be logically framed as arising upon the pleadings. As no evidence was excluded by the court, we must assume that the plaintiff introduced all he had, and all that he could produce on another trial. We are not to assume that the judge erred in charging the jury as to what constitutes special damages, for there is no exception to the charge. Both sides seem contented with it and it is not before us.

The case of Bryant v. Ins. Co., quoted in the opinion, is no authority here, for in that case no issue at all was submitted covering a material matter in dispute necessary to a decision of the controversy. Here the issue covering the question of damages framed by plaintiff has been submitted, which issue is peculiarly responsive to the allegations of the complaint, and the character of the evidence offered fits it exactly, and would fit no other issue.

The learned judge below and the 12 jurors had better opportunity to judge of the value of plaintiff's evidence than we have, and if the "12" erred in finding the second issue, the plaintiff seeks not to correct it by excepting and appealing, and why should this court undertake to do so? In no event, I submit, is the court justified in setting aside the findings already made and ordering a new trial. They should be permitted to stand, as no error has been assigned by either side affecting them.

If other additional issues are deemed essential and necessary to be determined before any judgment can be rendered for either party, then the court shall follow established precedents. In McDonald v. Carson, 95 N. C. 378, Chief Justice Smith says: "Where in the opinion of the court additional findings are necessary in order to do justice between parties, the case may be sent back for trial of additional issues." But in as much as every allegation of the pleadings and every word of the evidence are directly pertinent to the issues submitted, I fall to see the necessity for any further findings. To my mind it is plain that the jury have already passed upon the entire case, and under such circumstances for the court of its own motion to order a new trial appears to me, with entire deference for my Brethren to be at variance with the practice of the court.

THRASH et al. v. COMMISSIONERS OF TRANSYLVANIA COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—REGULARITY OF ACTS OF PUBLIC OFFICERS—COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION.

The presumption of law is in favor of the regularity of the act of a county board of education, approving a petition of freeholders for an election for the levy of a special tax in a special school district, and of the acts of the county commissioners in ordering the election and confirming the report of the judges of election; and the burden is upon one claiming the contrary to prove it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Transylvania County; Ward, Judge.

Action by J. M. Thrash and others against Commissioners of Transylvania County. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Duckworth and George A. Shuford, for appellants. Shepherd & Shepherd and W. W. Zachery, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This was an action to impeach the validity of a local election for the levy of a special tax in a special school district, held under the provisions of Revisal 1905, § 4115, and the amendment thereto in 1907 (Pub. Laws 1907, p. 119, c. 835). The petition of the freeholders approved by the county board of education was regularly filed before county commissioners who ordered the election. The report of the judges of election was confirmed by the county commissioners. At the close of the evidence, his honor intimating that he would instruct the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiffs had not made out a case, they thereupon took a nonsuit and appealed.

The presumption of law is in favor of the regularity of the conduct of the authorities, and the burden was upon the plaintiff to show the contrary. Quinn v. Lattimore, 120 N. C. 426, 26 S. E. 638, 58 Am. St. Rep. 797. A careful examination of the testimony causes us to concur with the judge below. There being no legal proposition involved, but merely an examination of the evidence, it can serve no purpose to recapitulate it.

No error.

FREE v. CHAMPION FIBRE CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 999*)—REVIEW—VERDICT.

Where the jury under a correct charge accepted plaintiff's version of the facts, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3912-3924; Dec. Dig. § 999.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Haywood County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by J. Dan Free against the Champion Fibre Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On issues submitted the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Was plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant? Answer: 'Yes.'"

"(2) Did plaintiff by his own negligence contribute to his injury? Answer: 'No.'"

"(3) Did plaintiff voluntarily assume the risk? Answer: 'No.'"

"(4) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: '$300.00.'"

There was judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Smathers & Morgan, for appellant. W. B. Ferguson, J. W. Ferguson, and Frank Carter, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. In this case there was plenary evidence, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that he was an employé of defendant company, engaged at the time in the proper performance of his duties, and was injured by reason of a defective equipment or appliance, disclosing a breach of duty on the part of defendant company, and that plaintiff himself was free from blame in the matter. The jury, under a correct charge, have accepted the plaintiff's version of the occurrence, and, under numerous decisions of this court, plaintiff's right of action is established. Fearington v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 80, 53 S. E. 662; Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. 410, 51 S. E. 69. The case, in many respects, is not unlike the one last cited, Pressly's Case, supra. It would serve no good purpose to write a minute and extended description of the machine and the defective appliance which caused plaintiff's injury, and we think it sufficient to say that we have carefully examined and considered the facts appearing in the record, and are of opinion that no error in the trial to defendant's prejudice was committed.

The judgment below is therefore affirmed. No error.

STATE CO. et al. v. FINLEY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. DEDICATION (§ 63*)—ABANDONMENT—VALUATION.

Where streets and alleys in an incorporated town were mapped and laid out by a land company, but were never graded, and no lots facing upon them were sold, and the land company subsequently conveyed the lots to defendant by the acre for farming purposes and quitclaimed the streets and alleys to him, and the town commissioners passed an ordinance vacating such streets and alleys, and the town conveyed to defendant its interest therein, owners of lots in other parts of the town could not compel defendant to open up such streets and alleys.

2. DEDICATION (§ 39*) — ACTION TO OPEN STREETS—DEFENSES—LACHES.

Defendant, having purchased in 1893, fenced the land and used it as a farm, and, the conveyance by the town having been made in February, 1897, the action to compel the opening brought in April, 1907, was barred by laches.

3. DEDICATION (§ 39*)—ESTOPPEL TO ASSERT.

Lot owners, seeking to compel defendant to open up streets and alleys conveyed to him by a land company in connection with the lots bordering such streets and alleys, are estopped to assert any right in such streets and alleys, where they either acquired their lots after the conveyance to defendant, or were officers and stockholders in the land company and parties to the conveyance to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Justice, Judge.

Action by the State Company and others against A. A. Finley to compel the opening up of abandoned streets and alleys. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

In 1890, upon completion of the railroad to a point opposite Wilkesboro, the Winston Land Company purchased the land around the new station and laid it off into lots, streets, and alleys, for a town. They made a map of the new town, which they procured to be incorporated as North Wilkesboro. The streets designated by the letters of the alphabet run east and west; B, C, and D running westwardly to Reddie's river. The streets named by number—1, 2, 3, and so on—run north and south. The town is laid off in the northeast angle formed by the junction of Reddie's river with the Yadkin. Lying between the town and these rivers, on the south and west of the town, is low bottom land suitable for farming and subject to overflow. No lots were ever laid off in this bottom land, save between B, C, and D streets, and no lots were sold west of an alley which was laid off 170 feet west of Tenth street. In 1893 the Winston Land Company laid off an alley 30 feet wide running from A to D streets 170 feet west of and parallel with Tenth street. It laid off the lots on this 170-foot strip lying between Tenth street and this 30-foot alley, facing these lots westwardly on Tenth street. All the land west of this 30-foot alley north of B street the land company sold to the defendant, by the acre, for farming purposes and quitclaimed the streets and alleys which had been laid out thereon. In February, 1897, the town commissioners passed an ordinance vacating the streets and alleys which had been laid out by the land company on the land sold as above to the defendant, and in addition thereto the town executed a deed conveying to the defendant, whatever rights the town had in said discontinued streets and alleys. Upon these discontinued streets, lots, and alleys dwellings and manufacturing plants have since been erected. The streets, lots, and alleys, thus discontinued, had been surveyed, and laid down on the map; but the streets and alleys were never graded, and no lots facing upon them were sold. Upon the conveyance to the defendant in 1893 he fenced off his purchase. The plaintiffs are owners of lots in the other parts of the town, but all these lots except one were acquired by them after the sale to the defendant, and the owners of that lot are the heirs of W. M. Absher, who was a large stockholder and director in the Winston Land Company and in his official capacity party to the deed to the defendant. The only other plaintiffs are the State Company and the Deposit Bank, of both of which W. F. Trogden is president and owner of a majority of the stock. He was secretary, treasurer, and managing agent of the Winston Land Company, and as such was a party to the deed to the defendant. The summons herein issued April 30, 1907. On motion the action was dismissed as on nonsuit.

W. W. Barber, Louis M. Swink, F. D. Hackett, and C. G. Gilreath, for appellants. Manly & Hendren and Finley & Hendren, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This action is to compel the defendant to open the streets and alleys on the land sold to him, and is governed by Church v. Dula, 148 N. C. 262, 61 S. E. 639. This section of the proposed town was, it is true, laid off on the map; but it was cut off, conveyed to defendant, and fenced out before any of the streets and alleys were ever used, and no lot was ever sold in this abandoned section. The land company conveyed this section, including the proposed streets and alleys, to the defendant in 1893, and in February, 1897, the town authorities quitclaimed to the defendant any rights it might have to the streets and alleys in this abandoned and discarded "cut-off." This action began more than 10 years thereafter, April 30, 1907. The plaintiffs have slept on their rights, if any they had. Staton v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 428, 61 S. E. 455, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 949. Besides, the plaintiffs are in no situation to assert any equitable rights. All the lots they hold were acquired after the land company had conveyed this "cut-off" to the defendant, except one held by the heirs of W. M. Absher, who was a party, as an officer of the land company, to the deed to the defendant, and the other plaintiffs are two corporations, the president and owner of the majority of the stock in both of which companies (W. F. Trogden) was likewise an officer of the land company and a party to the conveyance to the defendant.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—DISPOSAL OF STATE LANDS—NORTH CAROLINA—TIME FOR PAYMENT.

Under Code, § 2766, providing that entries of land made in any one year shall be paid for on or before the 31st day of December in the second year thereafter, and all entries not thus paid for shall become void, the entry of land on November 16, 1904, does not lapse if payment is made on December 31, 1906, as the period for payment is computed from the year of the entry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham County; Ward, Judge.

Action by J. A. Barker against J. L. and C. T. Denton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. S. Barnard, for appellants. Dillard & Bell, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff, J. A. Barker, entered the land in controversy on November 16, 1904, and caused a survey thereof to be made, but did not pay the purchase money to the state until December 31, 1906, when a grant was issued to him. The defendants C. T. Denton and J. L. Denton entered the same land on December 7, 1906, and on January 5, 1907, the plaintiff, J. A. Barker, filed a protest against the issuing of a warrant of survey thereon as allowed by the statute. The court sustained the protest, and defendants appealed.

The question presented for our consideration is whether the entry of the plaintiff had lapsed when the defendants laid their entry. In other words, whether the plaintiff had until December 31, 1905, or until December 31, 1906, to pay the purchase money, and this depends upon the meaning of section 2766 of the Code, which is as follows: "All entries of land, made in the course of any one year, shall, in every event, be paid for, on or before the thirty-first day of December, which shall happen, in the second year thereafter; and all entries of land, not thus paid for, shall become null and void, and (the land) may be entered by any other person." The question was decided against the present contention of the defendants in the case of Harris v. Ewing, 21 N. C. 369. The court in that case construed the act of 1808 (Haywood's Manual, p. 200) which was substantially like section 2766 of the Code, the only difference being that, by the act of 1808, the purchase money was required to be paid on or before the 15th day of December, while by section 2766 of the Code it is required to be paid on or before the 31st day of December. In other respects the two statutes are identical. In Harris v. Ewing, supra, the court, by Ruffin, C. J., said: "The act of 1808 (Rev. c. 759) enacts: 'As the standing law in the future, that entries made in the course of any one year shall be paid for on or before the 15th day of December in the (second) year thereafter.' Upon these words the period is not to be computed from the day of the entry, so as to make the price payable in the second December that may succeed the making of the entry. If that had been meant, it would have been easy to express it much more explicitly than it is. We think the year of the entry, and not the day, is the epoch from which the computation of the act begins. The 15th of December of the second year after the expiration of the year of entry is the time, as seems almost necessarily inferable from the words, 'made in the course of any one year,' which make 'thereafter' referable to that whole year, and not the particular day of that year. This construction is so obvious that its correctness was taken for granted by this court in Nunn v. Mulholland, 17 N. C. 381. If it were doubtful, the court would not be at liberty now to depart from it, as we learn upon inquiry at the executive offices that a similar one was adopted there upon the passage of Acts 1804, c. 653, and has been acted on ever since. A very clear wording could alone authorize a construction in opposition to one so long settled by the officers to whom the execution of the act is immediately confided, and under the annual practical sanction of the members of the Legislature, through whose hands, it is well known, their constituents remit a large portion of the purchase money due on entries. Our opinion, therefore, is that the plaintiff's payment was made in due time." This ruling was afterwards expressly approved in Bryson v. Dobson, 38 N. C. 138, and Horton v. Cooke, 54 N. C. 270, and has been understood to be the settled construction of this law. It is true that in several more recent cases there are some expressions indicating that the payment of the purchase money was required to be made under the Code on or before December 31st of the second year after the entry was made, but it is evident that the court or the judge speaking for it was not advertent to the phraseology of the statute, nor to the previous decisions of this court, in which it has been construed. The case upon which the defendants chiefly rely is Wilson v. Land Co., 77 N. C. 445. It will be observed upon reading that case that the court cites Plemmons v. Fore, 37 N. C. 312, for the statement, which appears to be a dictum, that the money should have been paid by G. N. Folk, the enterer, on or before December 31st of the second year after the entry was laid. Referring to Plemmons v. Fore, we find that the question was not presented in the case. The opinion in the latter case was written by Chief Justice Ruffin, who also wrote the opinion in Harris v. Ewing, which is cited by the learned Chief Justice in Plemmons v. Fore as the leading authority for determining the time within which the purchase money should be paid under the act of 1808. In the other two cases cited by the defendants—Gilchrist v. Middleton, 108 N. C. 705, 13 S. E. 227, and Kimsey v. Munday, 112 N. C. 816, 17 S. E. 583—the expressions upon which they rely were dicta contained in a casual reference to the statute without paying any special regard to its wording. We must adhere to the ruling of the court made in cases where the very question was presented and decided, and this requires us to affirm the judgment of the court below by which the protest of the plaintiff was sustained upon the facts as found by the judge.

STATE v. BROWN et al.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 88*)—JURISDICTION—STATUTES.

Acts Gen. Assem. 1907, p. 856, c. 573, creating a recorder's court for the city of Winston, limits its jurisdiction to offenses committed within the city limits. The maximum term of imprisonment for larceny from the person is fixed by Revisal 1905, §§ 3500, 3506, at 10 years. Held, that the superior court, and not the recorder's court, has jurisdiction of a prosecution for larceny from the person, not shown to have been committed within the city limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Ed. Brown and another were convicted of larceny from the person, and appeal. Affirmed.

Indictment for larceny from the person, of a pocketbook of the value of $1. The defendants were convicted and moved in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the recorder's court of Winston had exclusive original jurisdiction of the offense charged in the bill. Motion overruled. Defendants appealed. This constitutes the only assignment of error.

J. S. Grogan, for appellants. The Attorney General, for the State.

PER CURIAM. The motion was properly overruled.

1. Acts Gen. Assem. 1907, p. 856, c. 573, creating a recorder's court for the city of Winston, limits the jurisdiction of that court to offenses committed within the corporate limits of said city, and there is nothing appearing upon the face of this record showing that the offense was committed within those limits.

2. Larceny from the person, regardless of the value of the property, is neither a petty misdemeanor nor a felony the punishment for which cannot exceed one year under section 3506 of the Revisal of 1905. The punishment for such offense, under sections 3500 and 3506, may be as much as 10 years in the state's prison. Of this offense the superior court has exclusive jurisdiction.

1. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*) — DISPOSAL OF STATE LANDS—NORTH CAROLINA—EFFECT OF ENTRY.

Where a valid entry is followed by a survey and grant, a prior grantee, claiming under subsequent entry, will be declared to hold the legal title in trust for the subsequent grantee claiming under the first entry; but, if the entry is void for uncertainty, and is made definite by a subsequent survey, a grant based upon it will be valid as between the state and the grantee, but if the original entry is so vague that it does not give notice of the boundaries of the land, a survey without marking the lines or fixing the monuments could not afford such a notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 469, 470; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—DISPOSAL OF STATE LANDS—NORTH CAROLINA—"FLOATING ENTRY."

An entry of lands in the office of the entry taker of a county, made in the following form: "A. L. Adams enters and locates 300 acres of land in said county and state in district ten, on waters of Little Santeetla creek, beginning on a chestnut tree and runs various courses for complements"—is a "floating entry," being vague and indefinite.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 470; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Graham County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Will Lovin and others against R. Carver and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The facts, as stated in the record, are: One A. L. Adams, under whom plaintiffs claim, on February 6, 1901, laid the following entry in the office of the entry taker of Graham county: "A. L. Adams enters and locates three hundred acres of land in said county and state in district ten, on waters of Little Santeetla creek, beginning on a chestnut tree and runs various courses for complements." A warrant of survey was issued June 29, 1903, and the survey made September 12, 1903. A grant issued October 13, 1903. On February 16, 1903, one Jenkins, under whom the defendants claim, laid an entry No. 1,948, and on March 6, 1903, another entry on land in said county. Both of these entries were surveyed, and land located June 23, 1903, and grants issued June 20, 1904. These entries were also vague and indefinite. It was admitted that the Jenkins' entries covered the land described in the Adams' grant. Plaintiffs had no notice of defendants' survey. Defendants claimed that plaintiffs held the legal title to the land in trust for them. An issue directed to this inquiry was submitted to the jury, and, under instruction of the court, answered in the negative. Judgment was rendered declaring plaintiffs to be the owners of the locus in quo, and removing the cloud from their title, etc. Defendants excepted; assigned as error his honor's instruction. Appeal.

A. S. Barnard and A. D. Raby, for appellants. John H. Dillard, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. It is well settled that, when a valid entry is laid, followed by a survey and grant, a prior grantee, claiming under subsequent entry, will be declared to hold the legal title in trust for the subsequent grantee claiming under the first entry. The decisions in our reports in which this doctrine is held are based upon the well-settled principle that one who lays an entry acquires an equity, or, as sometimes called, a right of pre-emption which, when followed by a survey and grant, ripens into the legal title. If, during the time intervening between the entry and grant, another lay an entry, and acquire a grant prior in date to the grant of the first entry, he shall hold the legal title as trustee for him. This is founded on the well-understood equitable doctrine that he who takes the legal title with notice of an equity takes subject to such equity. In Plemmons v. Fore, 37 N. C. 312, Ruffin, C. J., says: "An entry creates an equity which, upon the payment of the purchase money to the state in due season, entitles the party to a grant, and consequently to a conveyance from another person, who obtained a prior grant under a subsequent entry, with knowledge of the first entry." It is conceded that both entries were vague and indefinite, coming within the definition of a "floating entry." Johnson v. Shelton, 39 N. C. 85; Munroe v. McCormick, 41 N. C. 85; Currie v. Gibson, 57 N. C. 28; Fisher v. Owens, 144 N. C. 649, 57 S. E. 393; Call v. Robinett, 147 N. C. 616, 61 S. E. 578. It is also well settled that an entry, void for uncertainty, may be made certain and definite by a subsequent survey, and that a grant based upon it will be valid. Harrison v. Ewing, 21 N. C. 369; Grayson v. English, 115 N. C. 358, 20 S. E. 478. While this is true as between the state and the grantee, the question still remains open whether a survey of a "floating entry" will put a subsequent enterer and prior grantee upon notice. If the original entry was so vague and uncertain as to fail to give notice of the boundaries of the land intended to be entered, we are unable to perceive how a mere survey, without marking lines or fixing monuments, afford any such notice. The statute did not, at the date of these entries or surveys, require that the survey should be recorded in the office of the entry taker. Merely running the lines, and making a map which the enterer could keep in his possession until he took his grant, certainly could not afford notice of boundaries of the land to be surveyed. The warrant to the county surveyor was no more definite, in its description, than the original entry—it could not be so. If by reason of the vagueness of the first entry no notice is given to a second enterer, who, in ignorance of such entry, proceeded to survey the land, pay his money, and takes a grant from the state, no equity can be invoked against him. He holds the legal title free from any claims of the first enterer. We, therefore, concur with his honor's instruction to the jury. By virtue of Acts 1905, p. 275, c. 242 (Revisal 1905, § 1722), a record of the survey is required to be made and kept in the office of the entry taker. This will give notice of all surveys, and the difficulty experienced by the defendants will not hereafter arise.

Upon a careful examination of the record we find no error.

THORNTON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—POSSESSION OF PLAINTIFF—EVIDENCE.

Testimony in an action for the burning over of land that R. was in possession of it for 50 years, and since then plaintiff, his widow, by tenants, and that L. occupies it as her tenant, is some evidence of possession, though subject to cross-examination as to what constitutes possession.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—EVIDENCE.

There being abundant evidence that, at the time of the burning over of land for which plaintiff sues, she had actual possession of the land, and claimed it as her own, defects in her paper title do not necessarily bar recovery of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by E. C. Thornton, who was the widow of John Rutherford, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following issues were submitted:

"Were the woods, lands, timbered trees of the plaintiff, E. C. Thornton, set fire and burned over by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, the Southern Railway Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"If so, what damage has the plaintiff sustained? Answer: $900."

S. J. Ervin, for appellant. M. H. Yount and John T. Perkins, for appellee.

BROWN, J. There appears to be abundant evidence in the record to warrant the conclusion that the fire originated on the right of way of defendant, and was caused by sparks from its engine. There is also evidence that the right of way where the fire started was in a foul condition.

The assignments of error all relate to the title to the land which had been burned, and more particularly to the ruling of the court admitting in evidence the will of John Rutherford and the McPheeters grant. In the view we take of the case it is unnecessary to discuss those assignments.

There is ample evidence in the record tending to prove that at the time of the fire the land burned over was not only claimed by the plaintiff, but that she and her representatives were in the actual possession thereof. As a sample of the evidence, one witness testifies: "I have heard the description contained in the deeds and grants. I know the boundaries. I have known the land for 50 years. John Rutherford been in possession until he died, then his widow, Mrs. Thornton, ever since." Grant for 100 acres read. "I know where that land lies. John in possession of it all the time, and his widow, Mrs. Thornton, since, for fifty years. The McPheeters grant covers the home place—the residence of John Rutherford located on this tract. John Rutherford has lived on the place 50 years in my recollection. Since death Mrs. Thornton has had tenants on it. Walker Lyerly occupies it as tenant of Mrs. Thornton, and cultivates all that is fit for cultivation." That such testimony is some evidence of possession, although subject to cross-examination as to what constitutes possession, is held in Bryan v. Spivey, 109 N. C. 68, 13 S. E. 766, where the use and meaning of the terms are learnedly discussed by Mr. Justice Shepherd. There being abundant evidence to go to the jury that at the time of the fire plaintiff had actual possession of the land burned and claimed it as her own the alleged defective links in her paper title would not necessarily bar a recovery. As is said by Chief Justice Smith in the oft-cited case of Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 324: "But no harm has come to the defendant by the reception of the copies of the grants, since under the deed from Leak the plaintiff was in law in possession through his tenant of all the land described therein up to the boundaries, and, in the absence of other evidences, prima facie the owner, and he may recover for all the damage done to his possessory and proprietary rights." See, also, Jackson v. Com- missioners, 18 N. C. 177; Ruffin v. Overby, 88 N. C. 369; Osborne v. Ballew, 34 N. C. 373; Lamb v. Swain, 48 N. C. 370.

Upon an examination of the record we find no reversible error.

No error.

WHITE v. HANS REES' SONS.

JUDGMENT (§ 143*) — DEFAULT JUDGMENT — SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

On a motion under Revisal 1905, § 513, to set aside a judgment for excusable neglect, it appeared that the case was called for trial on a designated date, and that the defendant failed to appear. Defendant and his counsel, a firm of three members, were notified by telegram that the case would be called on the next day. The partner having special charge of the case was too sick to attend, and defendant, having sufficient time to consult his counsel and attend court and at least move for a continuance, failed to attend. Held to justify a denial of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Ward, Judge.

Action by J. H. White against Hans Rees' Sons. From a judgment denying a motion to set aside a default judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellants. Gudger & McElroy, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a motion to set aside a judgment upon the ground of excusable neglect under Revisal 1905, § 513. It appears that the case was called for trial on Monday of October term, 1907, and the defendants failed to appear in person or by counsel. The defendants and their counsel, a firm composed of three members, who resided in Asheville, were notified by telegram that the case would be called at all events on the next day, Tuesday. The member of the law firm, who had special charge of the case, was too sick to attend; but no sufficient excuse is shown for the failure of the other two members of the firm to attend, nor does it appear why the defendants did not attend the court. On Tuesday the case was called and tried. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. The defendants at the same time moved to set aside the judgment, upon the very grounds now assigned, but did not prosecute their motion. There was an appeal at that time from the judgment, upon the merits of the case, to this court, which was dismissed here under rule 17 (39 S. E. vi). No further action was taken in the matter until August term, 1907, nearly a year after the judgment was rendered. The court overruled the motion of the defendants to set aside the judgment, and the latter excepted and appealed.

In no view of this case was there any excusable neglect. The attorney having special charge of the case was too ill to look after his clients' interests, but the defendants were in fault. They did not attend the court on Monday and received special notice that their case would be tried on Tuesday. Why did they not consult with their counsel and attend that session of the court and at least ask for a continuance of the case? They had sufficient time to do so. "The least that can be expected of a person having a suit in court is that he shall give it that amount of attention which a man of ordinary prudence usually gives to his important business." Per Rodman, J., in Sluder v. Rollins, 76 N. C. 271. To the same effect are the cases of Waddell v. Wood, 64 N. C. 624; Kerchner v. Baker, 82 N. C. 169. As said by Dillard, J., in Kerchner v. Baker, supra: "The course of the defendant was not the care of an ordinarily prudent man in reference to his own personal interests, nor was it consistent with the proper deference and attention due from the defendant and every suitor to the known and orderly course and practice of the courts in the administration of the law." The defendants have lost their rights, if they had any to protect, by their own inattention and inexcusable neglect.

We have not deemed it necessary to set out all the findings of fact made by the judge, which would perhaps present the case more strongly against the defendants than those we have briefly stated. It is sufficient to say that the judge, upon his findings, committed no error in law in adjudging that the defendants' neglect was inexcusable.

No error.

STATE v. BLACK.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1189*)—APPEAL—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

Where an excessive term of imprisonment was imposed on accused, he was not entitled on reversal to a new trial, but to be remanded for a legal sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3226; Dec. Dig. § 1189.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 7*)—POWER TO DEFINE CRIME—ORDINANCES—CONFLICT WITH STATE LAWS.

A city ordinance, making an act a misdemeanor and imposing a punishment where the same act is a misdemeanor at common law and punishable under the criminal laws of the state, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Ward, Judge.

W. P. Black was convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Brown, Thos. Settle, and Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant, convicted in the police court of Asheville for keeping a disorderly house, appealed to the superior court. Upon a trial de novo he was found guilty by a jury and sentenced to 22 months' imprisonment. He presses but one ground of appeal in his brief, which is that by the charter of Asheville (Priv. Laws 1901, p. 268, c. 100, § 77) keeping a disorderly house in that city is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $50 or imprisonment not exceeding 30 days.

If this exception were well taken, the defendant would not be entitled to a new trial, but to be remanded for resentence in conformity to law. State v. Lawrence, 81 N. C. 522; State v. Crowell, 116 N. C. 1052, 21 S. E. 502; State v. Austin, 121 N. C. 622, 28 S. E. 861. If this had been an ordinance of the city, it would be void because it covers the same acts as are a misdemeanor at common law and punishable under the criminal law of the state. State v. McCoy (from Asheville) 116 N. C. 1059, 21 S. E. 690, and cases there cited. The offense for which the defendant was tried is an offense at common law and has not been repealed. Charter of Asheville, § 77 (chapter 100, p. 268, Priv. Laws 1901), does not purport to repeal it. Its object was evidently to make it an offense against the city in addition to being an offense against the general law of the state. Doubtless the idea was that it might thus be dealt with more promptly and efficiently than in the superior court, where the jurisdiction then lay; but there are no words in said section 77, indicating an intention to repeal it as a common-law offense within the limits of Asheville. It remained as before a common-law offense throughout the state. The defendant was tried and convicted under the common law. The above section 77 (if valid) was not pleaded below nor relied on either by the state or the defendant, and its validity is not presented.

No error.

SUTTLE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS (§ 280*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED.

A passenger on a freight train, to which a passenger coach is attached, is entitled to the highest degree of care of which such trains are susceptible, and while the difference in the character and purpose of the trains should be given due consideration, in reference to their proper management, there is no relaxation as to the degree of care required towards a passenger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1067; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries to a passenger on a mixed train caused by giving the passenger coach a sudden and unusual jolt, evidence held to show the carrier's actionable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1307; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 325*)—PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED OF PASSENGERS.

A passenger on a mixed train must exercise care commensurate with the increased dangers ordinarily incident to the management of such trains, but he is entitled to have his conduct determined in reference to such trains when properly managed, and he is not required to anticipate extraordinary dangers incident to the carrier's negligence.

4. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED OF PASSENGERS.

A passenger on a mixed train who leaves his seat in the passenger coach to get a drink of water while the coach is standing still and cars are being shifted is not negligent as matter of law, but his negligence is ordinarily for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1402; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 332*)—PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED OF PASSENGERS.

Where a passenger on a mixed train left his seat in the coach to get a drink of water while the coach was standing still, and while cars were being shifted, and at a time when there was no reason to expect that any harm would ensue, and no harm would have ensued if the trainmen had properly managed the train, the passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injuries received by the coach receiving an unusual and sudden jolt by shifting cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1383-1384; Dec. Dig. § 332.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Ward, Judge.

Action by D. D. Suttle against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff; defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The evidence tended to show that on or about October 8, 1905, plaintiff was a passenger on a mixed train of defendant company, a freight train having a passenger coach attached, from Shelby to Asheville, N. C., and while in the coach he was knocked down and seriously injured by a sudden and unusual jolt given by defendant's employes in shifting other cars of the train which had been detached. Speaking of the occurrence, the plaintiff testified, in part, as follows: "Q. Did you get hurt at any time while on that trip? A. Yes; we run out six miles to a little station called Washburn, and they stopped, and, after stopping, they cut the coach that I was in loose from the freight—it was a mixed train—and they were shifting some cars out, and, while my coach was standing there, I went to the water-closet to get some water, and just as I was in the act of getting hold of the dipper the freight struck the front end of the coach, and I was standing in about four feet of the corner post of the water-closet, and that post struck me on the side of the head here, and the blood ran down, and there was the back of a seat right to my left and that was shelving towards me, and, when I fell, it bent my back over that, and from there I rolled over into the aisle, and I laid there about a minute and a half, and while I was down I could not move or speak. And there was one of the train hands in there working on his books, and, after I had laid there some time, he asked me if I was hurt, and I did not answer him—I could not answer—and, after I revived a little, I made an effort to raise my right arm up and could not move it, and then I took hold with my left hand and got hold of this seat in front of me and failed to do it, and then I asked him if he would help me up, and he came and helped me up, and as I went back to my seat I noticed most of the cushions off of the seats on the floor, and my seat was that way. The lick was so heavy that it had driven the seats from under the cushions, and many of the cushions were on the floor. After I got in my seat, I was sitting holding to the seat in front of me and they slashed into it again, and I hollered, and the flagman, or whoever it was that was in there with me, jumped up and ran out, and from that on there was no further trouble with the train. Q. You say they 'slashed' into it? A. I mean that the freight cars that were shifting, the cars that were making some change, and while I was standing— Q. You say that they 'slashed' into you. The jury don't know what that means. A. They backed into it with such force. Q. With how much force did they come back the second time? A. Equally as much as the first time or more." At the close of plaintiff's testimony defendant moved to nonsuit plaintiff, motion denied, and defendant excepted. Under a proper charge the question of defendant's responsibility was submitted on the three ordinary issues in actions of negligence: "(1) As to negligence of defendant causing the injury. (2) Contributory negligence on part of plaintiff. (3) Damages." There was verdict in favor of plaintiff, and, from judgment on the verdict, defendant excepted and appealed.

Moore & Rollins, for appellant. Adams & Adams, Frank Carter, and H. C. Chedester, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). There has been no error committed in the trial of this case which gives the defendant any just ground of complaint.

Where a person has been received as a passenger on one of these mixed trains, whether in a passenger coach or caboose or a car temporarily fitted for the purpose, he is entitled to the highest degree of "care and diligence of which such trains are susceptible." While the difference in the character and purposes of the trains may, and should, be given due consideration in reference to their proper management and control, there is no relaxation as to the degree of care required towards a passenger on the part of the company's employes, and for a breach of duty of the kind indicated the company may be held responsible. Miller v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 545, 57 S. E. 345; Railroad v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898; Sprague v. Railway, 92 Fed. 59, 34 C. C. A. 207; Railroad v. Holcomb, 44 Kan. 336, 24 Pac. 467. In Sprague v. Railway, supra, Goff, Circuit Judge, for the court, quotes with approval from Railroad v. Horst, supra, and in reference to this matter said: "The court below seems to have founded its conclusion on the fact that the plaintiffs were traveling in a caboose car, and not on a regular passenger train. But we are of opinion that as the defendant sold tickets to the plaintiffs to be used in said car, which was provided for the accommodation of passengers in general, the plaintiffs were entitled to demand and have of and from the defendant the highest possible degree of care and diligence, regardless of the kind of train they were on. A railroad company is liable for the negligence of its servants, resulting injuriously to its passengers, whether they are traveling in the luxurious cars of the modern train or in the uncomfortable caboose of the local freight; for in all such cases the law requires that the highest degree of care that is practicable be exercised. The reasons for this rule are well known, and are based upon wise public policy and the plainest principles of justice. The Supreme Court of the United States, in alluding to this matter (Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898), said: 'Life and limb are as valuable, and there is the same right to safety, in the caboose as in the palace car. The same formidable power gives the traction in both cases. The rule is uniformly applied to passenger trains. The same considerations apply to freight trains. The same dangers are common to both. Such care and diligence are as effectual and as important upon the latter as upon the former, and not more difficult to exercise. There is no reason in the nature of things why the passenger should not be as safe upon one as the other. With proper vigilance on the part of the carrier he is so. The passenger has no authority upon either, except as to the personal care of himself. The conductor is the animating and controlling spirit of the mechanism employed. The public have no choice but to use it. * * * The rule is beneficial to both parties. It tends to give protection to the traveler, and warns the carrier against the consequences of delinquency. A lower degree of vigilance than that required would have averted the catastrophe from which this litigation has arisen. Dunn v. Railway Co., 58 Me. 187, 4 Am. Rep. 267; Tuller v. Talbot, 23 Ill. 357, 76 Am. Dec. 695; Railway Co. v. Thompson, 56 Ill. 138.'"

This being the correct principle, a mere statement of the testimony above set out affords convincing evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant company causing the injury, and justifies the finding of the jury on the first issue. The defendant did not seriously contend that there was error in this respect, but it was earnestly urged that upon the entire testimony the court should have held as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery, and this on the evidence above stated, and the additional questions and answers appearing in the course of a long cross-examination, as follows: "Q. You know that the jolting and jars on a freight train are rougher than they are on a passenger train, don't you? A. I don't know about the couplings. Q. Did you ever see them handling the trains, the starting and the coupling? A. Yes; I know they are rough. Q. I ask you if you were not simply standing in that car, paying no attention when the coupling was made, and you fell over on the side? A. Of course, I was paying no attention, my coach being standing still, and I was struck and knocked down." There is doubt if this answer should be given any special significance on the subject, coming as it did in the midst of a prolonged examination in which the witness had placed the entire facts before the jury. Clearly the witness did not mean to say that he was at the time entirely unobservant of care for his own safety, but, in reference to the question and by fair intendment, he should be understood to mean that he was not noticing the coupling at the time, nor expecting to be knocked down by any such severe and unusual shock. Certainly he had done nothing to indicate any lack of care, for he had only gotten up to get a drink of water, and the jolt came just as he was getting hold of the dipper. In any event, the authorities are to the effect that getting up for this purpose in the usual way, and on a train of this character, does not import negligence as a matter of law. While a passenger on these mixed trains is held to a degree of care commensurate with the increased dangers which are ordinarily incident to their management, he is entitled to have his conduct weighed and his rights determined in reference to such trains when carefully and properly managed, and he is not required to anticipate such extraordinary and unusual dangers as are incident to the company's negligence. This is the rule as stated by Associate Justice Walker for the court in the case of Marble v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 557, 55 S. E. 355, in which it was held that: "(4) In taking passage on a freight train, a passenger assumes the usual risks incident to traveling on such trains when managed by prudent and competent men in a careful manner." And, in reference to the question directly presented here, it is very generally accepted that standing up, under certain circumstances, or getting up from one's seat for a natural purpose, or going for a drink of water and the like, is not negligence per se, but the question should as a rule be referred to the jury under a proper charge. Tillett v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1031, 24 S. E. 111; Burr v. Railroad, 64 N. J. Law, 30, 44 Atl. 845; Railroad v. Masterson, 16 Ind. App. 323, 44 N. E. 1004; Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1217. In Tillett's Case it was held: "(7) A passenger has a right to presume that the servants of the carrier will properly discharge their duties. Consequently one who enters a railroad passenger car is not guilty of contributory negligence because he fails to rush into the first seat he reaches, although he knows the train is about to be coupled." The case to which we were referred by counsel for the defendant (Smith v. R. R. Co., 99 N. C. 241, 5 S. E. 896) does not conflict with the positions sustained by these authorities. In that case the plaintiff was held guilty of contributory negligence because from his own testimony it appeared that he had taken a position on the arm of the car seat, thus inviting the injury from which he had suffered. Whether in the present and improved methods of control and management of these trains this ruling would now obtain, a question to which we were invited by the argument of plaintiff's counsel, it is not necessary to determine, for in the case before us no such fact appears; the evidence showing that plaintiff, a passenger on defendant's train, got up in a natural way and went for a drink of water at a time when his car was at a standstill, and when there was not reason to expect that any harm would ensue, and when none would have ensued if defendant's train had been carefully and properly managed.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

No error.

MCCOLMAN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in an action against a carrier for damages from vexatious delay, the court submitted the issue of defendant's negligence and the issue of wanton and willful negligence and the single issue of damages, and the jury in answer to the first issue found that defendant was not negligent, plaintiff could not complain that the court erred in not submitting issues framed by him involving the issue of punitive damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Scotland County; Long, Judge.

Action by J. A. McColman against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The record discloses the following case: Plaintiff on July 5, 1904, entered into a contract with defendant company as "charterer" of an excursion train, consisting of one baggage car and not less than five passenger coaches, to be run from Gibson, N. C., to Wilmington, N. C., and return. The schedule was set out in the contract "subject to such changes as may be made necessary for the safe operation of the train by other train schedules of the company, and such unavoidable delays as may be occasioned by damages to the equipment of the company." The other provisions of the contract are not material to the decision of this appeal. The train was furnished in accordance with the contract and the excursion run on July 27, 1904. It seems that, by reason of the weight of the rails on the portion of the road from the main line to Gibson, it was necessary to use a light engine which was exchanged at Fayetteville for another of heavier weight. On the return trip, when the train reached Fayetteville, some difficulty was experienced in making the exchange and a delay occurred of some five hours from 11 o'clock p. m. until some time the following morning. The plaintiff alleged that the engine was defective and of insufficient capacity, that the cars were not supplied with water, and that in this and other respects the defendant company was guilty of reckless, wanton, and willful negligence, whereby he sustained large damages, etc.

The plaintiff in apt time requested the court to submit the following issues to the jury:

"(1) Did the defendant wrongfully fail to transport the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint?"

"(2) Was the failure to transport the plaintiff willful and wanton?"

"(3) What compensatory damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"

"(4) What exemplary damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover?"

The court declined to submit the issues, and the plaintiff excepted. The following issues were submitted to the jury:

"(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint?"

"(2) Was the plaintiff injured by the wanton and willful negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint?"

"(3) What damages, if any, has plaintiff sustained?" Plaintiff excepts. The jury responded to the first issue "No," and did not answer the second and third. Judgment was rendered upon the verdict for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed. The exceptions are discussed in the opinion.

Gibson & Russell, for appellant. McLean, McLean & Snow, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiff noted a number of exceptions to the ruling of his honor upon the competency of testimony. They were not pressed on the argument, and we find no merit in them. It was conceded that plaintiff did not sustain any substantial damage other than inconvenience and discomfort. The portion of the charge to which exception was taken and pressed upon our attention is as follows: "The plaintiff must also show that he received injuries as the direct and proximate cause of the alleged negligence by the defendant. Has the plaintiff satisfied you, by the greater weight of evidence, that the defendant was negligent, and has he also satisfied you by the greater weight of evidence that as the result and proximate result of that negligence that he himself suffered the injuries of which he complains? If so, your answer to this issue would be 'Yes.' But, if he failed to so satisfy you by the greater weight of evidence, your answer to the first issue would be 'No.'" The learned counsel earnestly contends that if his honor had submitted the issues tendered by him, and the jury had found that defendant was guilty of a breach of the duty which it owed him as a passenger, he would have been entitled to nominal damages which would have entitled him to ask for punitive damages upon the theory that the negligence was willful and wanton. The difficulty which he encounters is found in the fact that upon a properly framed issue the jury acquit the defendant of any breach of duty or negligence. It is difficult to see how the question of punitive damages can arise when no cause of action is established. The plaintiff's rights and the defendant's duty are fixed by the terms of the contract, and this the jury finds has not been broken. This put an end to the action.

We have examined the record, and find no error.

RIDDLE v. BRIDGEWATER MILLING CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT DEMANDED—INTEREST.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1419, limiting the jurisdiction of a justice to a case in which the sum demanded, "exclusive of interest," does not exceed $200, he has not jurisdiction where the demand is for $200 and interest on a greater sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. PAYMENT (§ 42*)—APPLICATION.

A payment must always be applied first to extinguish the interest, and then on the principal.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—"DEMAND."

The "demand," what plaintiff could recover on the face of the summons, in the absence of defense, determines the jurisdiction under Revisal 1905, § 1419, limiting the jurisdiction of a justice to a case wherein the sum demanded does not exceed a certain amount, so that such demand being for a greater amount, and there being no remitter of the excess before the justice, he has no jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by J. B. Riddle against the Bridgewater Milling Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Riddle & Huffman and J. T. Perkins, for appellant. Avery & Ervin, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This was a civil action, begun before a justice of the peace and dismissed on appeal in the superior court, upon the motion of the defendant for want of jurisdiction in the justice's court.

The complaint of the plaintiff as set out in the summons was "for the nonpayment of the sum of $200, with interest on $938.18 from 22d day of February, 1907, due by promissory note, being the balance unpaid, and demanded by said plaintiff." The demand for interest on a greater sum than $200 defeats the jurisdiction of the justice. In Hedgecock v. Davis, 64 N. C. 650, where the interest is held to be "a mere legal incident," it is evident that interest on the jurisdictional amount of $200, or less, is meant, and not on any sum in excess of $200, and therefore that case has no application where interest on a larger sum is claimed. The constitutional limit of the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in civil action founded on contract is "wherein the sum demanded shall not exceed $200." Const. art. 4, § 27, and Revisal 1905, § 1419 (1) limits such jurisdiction in such cases "wherein the sum demanded, exclusive of interest," does not exceed $200. This does not include interest on a larger sum. The note here was $938.18. As the payment amounts to $738.38, the interest should have been calculated and added to the principal, and the payment deducted, leaving the difference as a new principal. As this new principal was much in excess of $200, it was necessary to remit such excess if the plaintiff desired to bring action before a justice of the peace. The plaintiff conceived the idea that he could avoid that requishment by applying all the payment to the principal, leaving the balance due on principal $199.80. He therefore sued for $200 principal and interest on $918.33." This was beyond the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, who cannot adjudge recovery of interest on a sum greater than $200. Besides, a payment must always be applied first to extinguish the interest, and the remainder only upon the principal. It is the "demand," i. e., what the plaintiff could recover on the face of the summons if there is no defense, which determines the jurisdiction. Knight v. Taylor, 131 N. C. 85, 42 S. E. 537; Noville v. Dew, 94 N. C. 45; Allen v. Jackson, 86 N. C. 321. There being no remitter of the excess before the justice, he had no jurisdiction, and the action was properly dismissed on appeal.

GARRISON et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 408*)—COMPLAINT—WAIVER OF DEFECT BY ANSWER.

Where a complaint states no cause of action, the defect is not waived by answering; but defendant may demur ore tenus, or the Supreme Court may take notice on its own motion of the insufficiency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1366; Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—ENTRY—PROTEST—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

Code, § 2766, provided that entries of land made in the course of any year should be paid for on or before December 31st, which should happen in the second year thereafter, and all entries of land not thus paid for should be void and might be entered by any other person. Under section 2765, if the land was not subject to entry, any person claiming an interest therein could file a protest with the entry taker against the issuing of a warrant of survey thereon, and the entry taker thereupon certified the entry and protest to the superior court for trial of the issue of validity of the entry, but the protest was required to be filed within 10 days after the posting of notice of entry by the entry taker. Held, that the statute contemplated that the posting of notice of entry should be made, not by the enterer, but by the entry taker, and that the protest should be filed within the 10 days during which the notice of entry was posted; the provision for filing the protest being mandatory, and a condition annexed to the right of protest, not a statute of limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 406*)—DEFECTIVE STATEMENT OF CAUSE—WAIVER.

In an action by a person who had entered public land against others alleged to hold under a subsequent wrongful entry to have them declared trustees thereof for plaintiff, a complaint alleged that on August 14, 1900, plaintiff duly entered the land in the entry taker's office, that on December 22, 1902, nine days before the time limited for plaintiff to take out her grant, defendants protested her entries, and thereby prevented her from having a grant issued during pendency of the proceedings to determine the validity of the protest, and that defendants obtained the grants while the proceedings were pending. Held, that if it was necessary for plaintiff to allege that the notice of plaintiff's entry had not been seasonably given by the entry taker, so that the protest was filed in time, and she thereby prevented from obtaining her grants, her failure to do so would constitute only a defective statement of her cause of action, and, defendants having answered instead of demurred, they waived the defect.

4. PLEADING (§ 211*)—DEMURRER ORE TENUS—NATURE.

The omitted allegation, if a defect, could not be availed of by a demurrer ore tenus, since such a pleading is only equivalent to a motion to dismiss after answering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 472, 481; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Burke County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Ida E. Garrison and others against Richard Williams and others. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. M. Mull and S. J. Ervin, for appellants. Avery & Ervin and Avery & Avery, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs for the purpose of having the defendants declared trustees for the feme plaintiff, Ida E. Garrison, of certain tracts of land described in the amended complaint, containing about 1,500 acres. She alleged: That on August 14, 1900, she duly entered said land in the office of the entry taker of Burke county; that in the year 1902 the defendant Richard Williams entered the same land, and his rights under said entry, if any, have passed to his codefendants with notice of the prior entry of the feme plaintiff; that on December 22, 1902, just nine days before the time limited for the feme plaintiff to take out her grant, the defendants protested her entries, and thereby prevented her from having a grant issued during the pendency of the proceedings to determine the validity of the protest; that while said proceeding was pending, and during the year 1904, the defendants caused grants to be issued upon the entry laid by the said Richard Williams and thereby acquired, though unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently, the legal title to the premises; that the protest of the defendants was at August term, 1905, of the superior court decided against them, and the feme plaintiff thereupon, and within nine days after the rendition of the judgment of the court in the said proceeding, obtained warrants of survey and received grants from the state for the said lands. Answers were filed by the defendants denying the fraud alleged in the complaint and asserting title to the land in dispute. When the case was called for trial, the defendants demurred ore tenus to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiffs excepted and assigned the following errors: "(1) That the court permitted the defendants, who had filed an answer, to demur ore tenus to the amended complaint, when the cause was upon the calendar for trial and had been reached and called for trial. (2) That the court refused to tax the defendants with the cost of the witnesses subpoenaed and in attendance upon the court for the trial of the cause; the same being upon the calendar and having been reached and called for trial upon the pleadings. (3) That the court sustained the defendant's demurrer ore tenus and ruled that the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action. (4) That the judgment rendered was erroneous."

Disposing of the question of procedure in limine, we have repeatedly held that, where a complaint states no cause of action, such a defect is not waived by answering. The defendant may demur ore tenus, and furthermore this court may take notice, ex mero motu, of the insufficiency of the complaint in this respect. If the cause of action, as stated by the plaintiff, is inherently bad, why permit him to proceed further in the case, for, if he proves everything that he alleges, he must eventually fail in the action? Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 212, 56 S. E. 874; Elam v. Barnes, 110 N. C. 73, 14 S. E. 621. Our decisions upon this matter are in strict accordance with the very letter and spirit of the law. Revisal 1905, § 478.

The real question in the case is whether the feme plaintiff was, in contemplation of the law, prevented by the action or conduct of the defendants, or any one of them, from obtaining grants, upon her entries, from the state. It was provided by Code, § 2766, which was in force when the entries of Mrs. Garrison were made, that "all entries of land, made in the course of any one year, shall, in every event, be paid for, on or before the thirty-first day of December, which shall happen, in the second year thereafter; and all entries of land, not thus paid for, shall become null and void, and may be entered by any other person." Revisal 1905, § 1731, makes a different provision and requires that all entries of land shall be paid for within one year from the date of entry, unless a protest be filed to the entry, in which event the payment shall be made within 12 months after final judgment on the protest, and, if the payment is not made within the said time, the entry shall be null and void and the land may be entered by any other person. This case, of course, is governed by the law as contained in the Code. If the land was not subject to entry, any person claiming title to or an interest in the same, or any part thereof, was authorized to file a protest with the entry taker against the issuing of a warrant of survey thereon, and the entry taker thereupon certified the entry and protest to the superior court, where the issue as to the validity of the entry was tried, but the protest was required to be filed within 10 days after the posting of the notice of entry by the entry taker. Code, § 2765. It was evidently contemplated by the Legislature that the posting of the notice of entry should be made, not by the enterer, but by one of its officers, namely, the entry taker, and that the protest should be filed within the 10 days during which the notice of the entry was posted. This provision of the law we regard as mandatory. The protest must be filed within the time fixed by the statute. It is a condition annexed to the right of protest, and not a statute of limitation. The time for paying the purchase price and taking out a grant had not expired when the protest was filed. It does not appear by any allegation in the pleadings whether the entry taker ever posted notice of the plaintiff's entries. If it was necessary for the plaintiff to have alleged that the notice had not been seasonably given by the entry taker, so that the protest was filed in time, and she was thereby prevented from obtaining her warrant of survey and her grants, her failure to do so would constitute only a defective statement of her cause of action, and the defendants, having answered, instead of demurring, waived any such defect. They cannot avail themselves of the omitted allegation, if it is a defect, by demurring ore tenus, which is equivalent, to a motion to dismiss after they have answered. Masten v. Marlow, 65 N. C. 695; Halstead v. Mullen, 93 N. C. 252.

We need not now consider the question argued by counsel whether, in law, the protest delayed action on her part in perfecting her entry and procuring her grants, so as to entitle her to the relief she demands. We will decide that question when the facts of the case are before us. The complaint sufficiently alleges a cause of action, even if it is defectively stated, and is good as against a demurrer ore tenus or motion to dismiss under the circumstances of this case. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

Error.

DARIEN & W. R. CO. v. MCKAY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 15, 1909.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—RELIEF AWARDED.

The jury, in the case of an appeal from the award of assessors in a statutory condemnation proceeding, have no authority to give compensation in anything but money. A verdict which awards the landowner a sum of money, and also reserves to him the privilege of moving improvements from the right of way sought to be condemned, is erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—VERDICT.

On appeal from the award of assessors in a statutory condemnation proceeding, the verdict should be for a given sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The particular proposals and declinations of the respective parties in their unsuccessful negotiation to agree upon the amount of damages prior to the condemnation proceeding are irrelevant on the trial of an appeal from the award of the assessors.

4. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INTIMATION OF OPINION.

A charge which intimates an opinion as to the amount of recovery, where the evidence is conflicting, is erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Darien & Western Railroad Company against H. F. McKay. From the award of the assessors, McKay appealed to the superior court. From the judgment there rendered for McKay, the railroad company brings error. Reversed.

Hitch & Denmark, for plaintiff in error. Garrard & Muldrim, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Under the statutory proceeding to condemn a right of way for railroad purposes the assessors awarded the landowner, H. F. McKay, $300 damages and the right to remove the house off the land condemned within four months. From this award McKay appealed to the superior court. The jury, on the trial of the appeal, returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for H. F. McKay the sum of $700, with the right to move all his improvements off the right of way." The railroad company moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the verdict was illegal and unauthorized by the pleadings, and also moved for a new trial. Both motions were denied, and exceptions taken.

1. The attack on the validity of the verdict is made both in the motion in arrest of judgment and in the motion for a new trial. At common law the usual mode of attack on an illegal verdict was by a motion for a venire de novo. Under our practice, a verdict of a jury which is illegal and void, and cannot be enforced, is a ground for granting a new trial. Mitchell v. Printup, 27 Ga. 469. So we will consider the legality of the verdict along with the other grounds of the motion for new trial.

One of the reasons assigned for its invalidity is that the verdict is not responsive to the issues, nor authorized by the pleadings. The notice of condemnation specified that the railroad company sought to condemn for railroad purposes a specifically described strip of land 150 feet in width. It appeared from the evidence that the improvement referred to in the verdict was a dwelling house which rests in part upon the land sought to be condemned as a right of way. The statute prescribes that the issue to be made and tried by a jury on appeal is "the value of the property taken or the amount of damage done." Civ. Code 1895, § 4678. The law contemplates that the verdict shall be for a definite sum, and the jury have no authority to annex any condition. See 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 506. The notice of condemnation does not ask that the condemnor be permitted to pay the compensation to be awarded in any other way than in money. As soon as the assessors make their award, the railroad company, upon paying or tendering the amount awarded, may immediately proceed to use the property for railroad purposes; and this is so, even though an appeal be taken. Civ. Code 1895, § 4679; Oliver v. Union Point, etc., R. Co., 83 Ga. 257, 9 S. E. 1086. If the landowner may be given by the verdict the right to remove his house, this would mean that he could move it in a reasonable time; and this privilege would be inconsistent with the condemnor's right to immediate possession. We think the verdict was void.

2. On the appeal from the award of the assessors the form of the verdict intended by the statute is the recovery of a gross sum, the amount of which is to be arrived at by a consideration of the various elements enumerated in Civ. Code 1895, § 4675. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Postal Tel. Co., 120 Ga. 268, 48 S. E. 15.

3. The landowner was allowed to testify, over objection, that the testimony was irrelevant, that he tried to get the railroad company to remove the house, and it refused. The testimony was irrelevant. The issue to be submitted to the jury, in a case like the present one, is the value of the property taken and the consequential damages sustained; and proposals of the parties, and their declination, pending a prior unsuccessful negotiation of settlement of the damages, are immaterial.

4. The court charged: "In order that there may not be any confusion, you can let your verdict state the full amount that you find, and the $300 already paid can be deducted from the amount that you find." This charge is open to the criticism made that it was an intimation of opinion that the amount of recovery should exceed the amount awarded by the assessors and paid by the railroad company. There was evidence from which the jury could find a less amount, and the charge was therefore harmful.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CLARKE BROS. v. STOWE.

1. REPLEVIN (§ 96*)—VERDICT—VALIDITY.

Suit was brought for the recovery of personality, which was alleged to be of the value of $577.30, and the amount of hire claimed was $100, with no other allegation of damages. The undisputed evidence showed that the value of the property at the time of the conversion was $577.30. The pleadings of the plaintiff showed that at the time when the suit was brought the property was of the same value. Bail process was sued out in connection with filing the suit, and on failure of the defendant to give bond the plaintiff did so and received possession of the property. It did not appear that the plaintiff elected to take a money verdict alone. Held, that a verdict "for plaintiff for 125 with 7% interest," if construed as a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the property and also for $125 and interest, was not supported by the evidence, and in any event such verdict did not accord with the evidence, and in view of the pleadings and evidence was vague and uncertain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—REQUESTED CHARGE NOT APPLICABLE.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the judge did not err in refusing to charge, on request, that "the plaintiff must clearly prove his title to the property in dispute, and if he cannot do this, whether such inability arise from mingling of the goods or any other cause, the verdict must be for the defendant."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—LEASE—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A timber lease, which authorized the cutting and manufacture of lumber and shingles for one year, but which contained no other description of the timber or land included in the lease, except "all that tract or parcel of land known as lot 162½ acres of lot 169 in the 6th district of Montgomery county, Ga.," was too vague and indefinite in point of description to be admissible in evidence as a muniment of title.

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—AMENDMENT.

Where a motion for a new trial was made, and thereupon an order was taken setting it for a hearing and allowing the movants 60 days within which to file a brief of the evidence, "which may be approved at the hearing," and granting leave to amend the motion and brief of evidence up to the time of the hearing, which might be had in term or vacation, and where the movants within 60 days made a bona fide effort to comply with such order and filed a brief of the evidence, though it was not complete and perfect, on the hearing of the motion there was no error in allowing such brief to be amended and perfected; and if in the opinion of the presiding judge this could better be done by substituting for the brief which had been filed another which covered the same ground, with additions and alterations necessary to make it a complete brief, he could permit this to be done, without specifically referring in his order of approval to the brief which had first been filed, or requiring it to be incorporated or referred to in the substituted brief.

Error from Superior Court, McIntosh County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Trover by J. A. Stowe against Clarke Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error, and plaintiff assigns cross-error. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

W. L. Clay, for plaintiffs in error. Harry E. Dunwoody, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. On the 6th day of November, 1906, J. A. Stowe brought an action of trover against Clarke Bros., to recover certain described pieces of sawn pine timber or lumber. The petition alleged that "the present value of said personality is five hundred and seventy-seven dollars and thirty cents ($577.30)." On the 5th of November he had made an affidavit to obtain bail process. He stated that "the value of said property [is] five hundred and seventy-seven dollars and thirty cents ($577.30), and the amount of hire claimed is one hundred dollars ($100)." The defendants did not make bond, but delivered the property to the officer. On November 9th the plaintiff executed a bond in terms of the statute and received possession of the property. On the trial a verdict was rendered in the following words: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff 125 with 7% interest, May 23, 1907." A motion was made for a new trial, which was overruled, and the defendants excepted.

1. The verdict which was found by the jury cannot be sustained. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the evidence showed that at the time of the conversion in June the property was worth $577.30; that testimony was admitted without objection that between the date of conversion and the time when the plaintiff obtained possession under the bail proceeding there had been a depreciation in value to the extent of $125, and therefore that the verdict, in the light of the evidence, construed as finding for the plaintiff the property and in addition the sum of $125 as damages on account of the depreciation, could be sustained. The plaintiff testified: "When they received it on the boom, it was worth $577. When I gave bond and got it back, it was worth $125 less. The market was down. It fell between the time they got it in August, and I did not get it till November." There was no evidence of a depreciation to the extent named between the beginning of the suit and the giving of the bond and obtaining possession by the plaintiff. The affidavit which he made in order to obtain bail was dated November 5th, and stated the value of the property to be $577.30; and the petition which he filed (apparently on November 6th, as the process bears that date), stated that the "present value of said personalty is" $577.30. He is bound by the admission in his pleadings, and cannot recover on the basis of a depreciation in value prior to and existing at the time of the commencement of the suit, in the face of his allegation showing that there was none. After the making of the affidavit to obtain bail the defendant did not give bond, and the plaintiff did so, and took possession of the property. See Moomaugh v. Everett, 88 Ga. 67, 13 S. E. 837. In the briefs of counsel for both parties the verdict was discussed as being a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the property and also for $125 and interest. So considered, we have shown that it could not be sustained. This is probably what the jury intended to find, as the undisputed evidence was that the value of the property was $577.30, and no evidence refers to the sum of $125 as being the entire value of the lumber, but only as the amount of depreciation in value, and also in view of the fact that the plaintiff had obtained possession of the property itself by giving bond. In view of these facts it is hardly probable that the jury intended to find 125 (dollars [?]) and interest as the entire value of the property which the plaintiff could recover. At any rate, the verdict is not adjusted to the evidence and in view of the pleadings and evidence it is vague and uncertain. It does not appear that the plaintiff elected to take a money verdict alone. What is here said in no way conflicts with the ruling in Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Mote, 131 Ga. 166, 62 S. E. 164, where, in a suit for personal injuries, the damages were laid at $20,000, the evidence was sufficient to authorize a verdict for $10,000, and the jury found for the plaintiff "the sum of ten thousand (10,000.00) and costs of suit," which was sustained as being a verdict for $10,000.

2. One ground of the motion for a new trial complained that the court refused a request to charge the following: "The plaintiff must clearly prove his title to the particular property in dispute; and if he cannot do this, whether such inability arise from a mingling of the goods or any other cause, the verdict should be for the defendant." The plaintiff carries the burden of making out his case by a preponderance of evidence; but it is stating the proposition rather strongly to inform the jury that he must "clearly prove his title." It was also not applicable to the facts of this case to instruct the jury in regard to the effect of mingling goods as stated in the request. Under the evidence there was no error in refusing to give this request in charge.

3. The defendants offered in evidence certain instruments for the purpose of proving title to the lumber in themselves. The first of these was executed by J. E. McAlum as party of the first part and Pitman, Claxton & Co. as party of the second part. It stated that the party of the first part, in consideration of certain rents to be paid and covenants to be performed by the other party, had "demised, leased, and to farm let, and by these presents does demise, lease, and to farm let, unto the said parties of the second part, to their heirs and assigns, all that tract or parcel of land known as lot 162½ acres of lot number 169 in the 6th district of Montgomery county, Ga.," with right of ingress and egress, to be used, worked, and operated for the purpose of manufacturing lumber and shingles for one year. The other papers were offered to show a chain of transfers carrying the rights covered by this lease down to the defendants. These instruments were excluded from evidence. The grounds of objection are not stated. One which might have been very properly made, and sustained, is that the description was too vague and indefinite to identify any particular property. Merely to mention 162½ acres of lot No. 169 does not indicate any particular part of that lot, or give any indicia by which the tract to which reference was intended to be made could be located. It does not appear whether McAlum only owned 162½ acres of the land lot, or that the tract sought to be conveyed was known by any particular name, or that there was any other circumstance or fact by which it could be located. Luttrell v. Whitehead, 121 Ga. 699, 49 S. E. 691; Tippen v. Phillips, 123 Ga. 415, 51 S. E. 410. There may have been other good reasons for the rejection of this instrument; but this one appears to be sufficient. If this conveyance was inadmissible, the other writings, which were offered as transfers under it, were inadmissible for the same reason. Some of them were also objectionable for other reasons.

4. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial the respondent made a motion to dismiss it on several grounds. They all involve the proposition that, when the motion for a new trial was made, it was ordered that the defendants should have 60 days within which to file a brief of evidence, "which may be approved at the hearing," and that they should have leave to amend their motion and brief of evidence up to the time of said hearing, "which may be had in term or vacation"; that within the 60 days thus allowed the movant had filed what purported to be a brief of evidence, but it was not approved by the presiding judge; and the respondent contended that it was not in fact a brief of evidence in compliance with the order, but was a mere skeleton brief. At the hearing a complete brief was tendered, and approved by the judge, and ordered to be filed as a part of the record, and he thereupon overruled the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial. Complaint is made of this ruling by a cross-bill of exceptions. The first brief of evidence was filed within the time limited by the order, the terms of which did not require that it should be presented for approval or be approved within that time; on the contrary, an opportunity was allowed to amend the brief of evidence up to the time of the hearing. The presiding judge evidently thought that there had been a bona fide effort to comply with his order, and that the paper filed was not a mere skeleton or mockery of a brief, but was sufficient to be perfected by amendment. We cannot say that he erred in this. It was contended, however, that the brief originally filed was not perfected by additions and alterations, and then approved, but that a new and complete brief was substituted in lieu of it. If there was not a mere trifling with the order of the court, but such a brief was filed as authorized amendment and perfection, we perceive no reason why this result could not be reached by substituting a complete brief for an imperfect one, instead of erasing, altering, interlining, and adding to that which was originally filed. If, in the opinion of the presiding judge, a clearer and more consistent result could be reached than by using the original brief as a basis or as a part of a new brief, together with such additions or alterations as were necessary, no sound objection is presented against such a course. The point is covered by the decision in Co-operative Mfg. Co. v. Andrews, 105 Ga. 506, 31 S. E. 40 (2).

Judgment reversed on main bill, and affirmed on cross bill, of exceptions. All the Justices concur.

DICKS v. ANDREWS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 434*) — PROMISE TO PAY DEBT—DISCHARGE—EFFECT.

A promise to pay a pre-existing debt, made by a bankrupt after his adjudication as such, but before his discharge, will not be impaired by a subsequent discharge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 861; Dec. Dig. § 434.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 92*)—CONSIDERATION.

If a note was made and delivered to an attorney for his client, and delivered by him to the client, being payable on its face to the attorney or bearer, the absence of a consideration between the attorney personally and the maker of the note would not affect its status, but the question would turn upon whether there was a valid consideration as between the client and the maker.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

3. COMPOSITIONS WITH CREDITORS (§ 13*)—VALIDITY AND ENFORCEMENT OF AGREEMENTS FOR PREFERENCE.

If a bankrupt gave to one of his creditors a note for the balance of the debt due such creditor in excess of the amount which was to be accepted by creditors in a composition, in consideration that such creditor would join in the composition and not oppose it or its confirmation, and the transaction was withheld from the knowledge of the other creditors, such consideration would be illegal, and the creditor receiving the note could not enforce its payment by suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compositions with Creditors, Cent. Dig. § 26; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. COMPOSITIONS WITH CREDITORS (§ 13*)—VALIDITY AND ENFORCEMENT OF AGREEMENTS FOR PREFERENCES.

If such an agreement for a secret preference was made, and a note was given in consideration and consummation thereof, it was not rendered valid by being signed before the composition, but dated in advance and left with another person to be delivered after the composition was completed, and so delivered.

5. TRIAL (§ 250*) — INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICATION TO CASE.

Under the facts disclosed by the evidence, it was error to charge that, if the jury believed that the debt of the creditor to whom the note was given was bona fide claimed to be a fiduciary debt—that is, one against which a discharge in bankruptcy would not be a protection—and that the attorneys of the bankrupt, in view of that contention, advised him to pay the debt as a fiduciary one, and that thereupon he signed the note, and the fiduciary character of the debt was the moving consideration, then the note was not illegal, but was valid.

(a) There was no evidence on which to base a hypothesis that the debt was in fact of a fiduciary character.

(b) The charge made the validity of the note depend upon whether there was a bona fide contention that the original debt was fiduciary in character, and whether this was the moving consideration for giving the note, and neither here nor elsewhere in the charge was the question submitted to the jury as to whether the note was given in consummation of an agreement for a secret preference to one creditor of the bankrupt, in consideration that he would join in a composition and not oppose its making or confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 584-586; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Julia Andrews, administratrix, against J. J. Dicks. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

B. B. McCowen, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Fleming, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. A suit was brought on a promissory note. The presiding judge held that the defendant's answer raised no issuable defense, and entered judgment against him. This judgment was reversed. 129 Ga. 756, 59 S. E. 782. On the second trial, the defendant amended his answer and set up several pleas. A verdict was rendered against him, a new trial was refused, and the case is again here for review.

1, 2. The ruling made in the first headnote is controlled by the decision in Moore v. Trounstone, 126 Ga. 116, 54 S. E. 810, where the case of Thornton v. Nichols, 119 Ga. 50, 45 S. E. 785, is considered and explained. The second headnote requires no elaboration.

3. The controlling question in the case is whether the consideration of the note was illegal, and therefore the note was uncollectible. The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: "I charge you that if you believe from the evidence that the debt due Andrews was bona fide claimed to be a fiduciary debt—that is to say, one against which a discharge in bankruptcy would not be a protection—and that the attorney of Dicks & Bro., in view of that contention, advised Dicks to pay the debt as a fiduciary one, and that thereupon Dicks signed the note sued on, and that the fiduciary character of the debt was the moving consideration, then the note in this case is not illegal, but is valid." Nowhere in his charge did he submit to the jury the question whether the note was given in consideration of an agreement under which Andrews was to receive a secret preference or advantage over other creditors who were parties to the composition in bankruptcy, or was delivered in consummation of such an agreement, although that question was raised by the pleadings and evidence. He made the entire case turn on whether there was a bona fide claim that the debt due to Andrews was of a fiduciary character, and whether, in view of that contention, Dicks was advised to give the note, and did so. There was no evidence whatever that the debt due by Dicks & Bro. to Andrews was in fact of a fiduciary character, within the meaning of the bankrupt law. Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 17, 30 Stat. 550 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3428); Bump on Bankruptcy (11th Ed.) 71; Id. 691, 693. See, also, Collier on Bankruptcy, p. 229, § 17, par. 4; Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 25 Sup. Ct. 9, 49 L. Ed. 147; Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 4 Sup. Ct. 576, 28 L. Ed. 565. If the expression employed by the judge, "and that the fiduciary character of the debt was the moving consideration," referred to an actual fiduciary character, it was without evidence to support it. If it meant that a mere claim that the debt was of a fiduciary character, whether it was so or not, would render the note valid, without regard to whether the giving of a secret preference to one creditor over others, in order to carry through a composition, entered into the consideration, it was not a correct statement of the law. Mere claims of a creditor, whether bona fide or not, that a debt is fiduciary in character, do not make it so. The charge left out of view a vital question in the case, and it was nowhere else submitted to the jury.

Section 12, par. "b," of the bankrupt act of 1898 provides that "an application for the confirmation of a composition may be filed in the court of bankruptcy after, but not before, it has been accepted in writing by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims have been allowed, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims, and the consideration to be paid by the bankrupt to his creditors, and the money necessary to pay all debts which have priority and the cost of the proceedings, have been deposited in such place as shall be designated by and subject to the order of the judge." Paragraph "d" provides that "the judge shall confirm a composition if satisfied that * * * the offer and its acceptance are in good faith and have not been made or procured except as herein provided, or by any means, promises, or acts herein forbidden." See, also, section 29. This contemplates the payment of debts which have priority, and the payment to creditors not having priority of the amount agreed upon in writing to be accepted by the creditors and approved by the court. Creditors claiming to have securities or priorities can only prove such debts and have them allowed, for the purpose of receiving dividends, for such sums as may seem to the court to be owing over and above the value of their securities or priorities. Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 57e, 30 Stat. 560 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3443). The fiduciary character of a debt does not ipso facto create a lien. Fiduciary debts are not discharged in bankruptcy. But this is not a suit brought upon the original debt as being of a fiduciary character, and hence not discharged. It is a suit on a note, given for the balance of the creditor's claim in excess of the amount received by him under the composition. The debt appears to have been proved in bankruptcy as an ordinary debt, and the statement of "the consideration thereof" in making proof of the claim does not seem to have made reference to anything which would indicate that the debt was of a fiduciary character. Bankr. Act 1898, § 57.

In Austin v. Markham, 44 Ga. 161, it was held that "a promise to pay a debt due by an applicant to be declared a bankrupt, in consideration that the payee will withdraw his objections in the bankruptcy court to the discharge of the bankrupt, is illegal and void, and no action can be sustained on such promise." See, also, Burgess v. Simpson Grocery Co., 128 Ga. 423, 57 S. E. 717; Brown & Franklin v. Everett-Ridley-Kagan Co., 111 Ga. 404, 36 S. E. 813. In Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 79, a promissory note secretly given to the plaintiff, in addition to the composition notes, as an inducement to sign, was held void. In Morrison v. Schlesinger, 10

Ind. App. 635, 38 N. E. 493, an assignment was made by a debtor for the benefit of creditors, and a composition with the creditors arranged. One creditor, without the knowledge of the others who were unsecured, procured, in consideration that he should sign the composition, a guaranty securing his existing claim and providing for future credit. It was held that such a guaranty was unenforceable, both as to existing and subsequent indebtedness, and that the debtor himself might set up this as a defense to an action brought thereon. In Willis v. Morris, 63 Tex. 458, 51 Am. Rep. 635, it was held that, where a debtor had procured a composition from all his creditors, a note secretly given by him to one of them, for the balance of his debt, to induce him to join, was void and could not be enforced. In Russell v. Rogers, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 479, 25 Am. Dec. 574, Nelson, J., said that "any security taken for an amount beyond the composition agreed upon, or even for that sum, better than that which is common to all, if unknown at the time to the other creditors, is void and inoperative." See, also, note to Bank of Commerce v. Hoeber, 88 Mo. 37, 57 Am. St. Rep. 359; In re Chaplin (D. C.) 8 Am. Bankr. Rep. 121, 115 Fed. 162; Batchelder & Lincoln Co. v. Whitmore, 122 Fed. 355, 58 C. C. A. 517; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 395.

"If the consideration be good in part and void in part, the promise will be sustained, or not, according as it is entire or severable, as hereinafter prescribed. But if the consideration be illegal in whole or in part, the whole promise fails." Civ. Code 1895, § 3662. If the consideration of the note was illegal, dating it as of a later date, or leaving it with an agreed person, to be held and delivered after the composition and consequent discharge, would not change the result. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the question of the time when a promissory note takes effect—whether from the date of its signing or from the date of its delivery, or whether the doctrine of delivery in escrow and treating the final delivery as relating back to the date of the deposit applies to a note. Nor, in view of the facts of this case, is a question involved as to whether the doctrine of a bona fide purchaser of a negotiable note before due and without notice could have any application, under the stringent terms of the bankrupt act of 1898.

It was earnestly urged by counsel for defendant in error that courts are not inclined to aid one who sets up illegality in his own conduct. But, where a suit is brought, the law allows the defendant to set up such defense as is here made, and, if it is sustained by the evidence, to prevent a recovery, not as a matter of aiding him, but as a matter of upholding the mandates of the law. It may be doubted whether, under the evidence as it appears in this record, a recovery by the plaintiff could be allowed to stand, had the case been submitted without error in the charge. But, as it was made practically to turn on a single question, and the important issue above discussed was not submitted to the jury, or passed upon by them, we deem it best to remand the case for a new trial, without ruling distinctly upon the evidence.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(132 Ga. 630)

DIX v. DIX.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 956*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—JUDGMENTS.

Where a year's support was set apart to a widow, and the judgment of the ordinary recited the return of the appraisers, the issuance of citation, and that "objections in the nature of a claim" were filed by a named person, and ordered that the objections be "disallowed" and the return of the appraisers be affirmed, in a subsequent suit by the widow against the person thus mentioned in the judgment of the ordinary, to recover personal property included in the year's support thus set apart, it was error to reject testimony that the ordinary did not in fact hear evidence on the subject of title, or pass upon that question, but refused to do so, because of lack of jurisdiction to adjudicate the question as a court and an unwillingness to act as an arbitrator, and that the property in fact belonged to the defendant, and not to the decedent before his death, or to his widow by virtue of the setting apart of the year's support out of her deceased husband's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1824, 1824½; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 194*)—COURT OF ORDINARY JURISDICTION IN PROCEEDINGS FOR WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—TITLE TO PROPERTY.

A court of ordinary has no jurisdiction to try and determine conflicting claims of ownership of property, arising between a widow applying for the setting apart of a year's support and a person asserting title adversely to the estate of her deceased husband.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 660½*) — CONCLUSIVENESS—JURISDICTION.

If a court is wholly without jurisdiction of a given subject-matter, or power to pass upon issues in respect thereto, an attempted decision of issues on that subject is invalid, and will not operate as res adjudicata in a subsequent suit concerning the subject-matter in a court of competent jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1171; Dec. Dig. § 660½.*]

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 1*)—INVOKING DECISION OF COURT BEYOND JURISDICTION—EFFECT.

If, upon an application by a widow to have a year's support set apart to her, another person, who claims title to the property adversely to the estate of the decedent, files objections to the grant of the year's support, and mistakenly invokes a decision of the court of ordinary as to matters which it is without jurisdiction to hear and determine, this will not, by legal construction, be treated as the submission of the issue by consent to the ordinary as an arbitrator; and if the court of ordinary undertakes to decide an issue as to which it has no jurisdiction, such decision will not be considered as the award of the ordinary acting as an arbitrator, merely because a question beyond the jurisdiction of the court to determine was raised and no objection was urged thereto by the other party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]
(Syllabus by the Court.)

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"DISALLOW."

The word "disallow" is defined by Webster's Dictionary to mean "to refuse to allow; to deny the force or validity of; to disown, or reject."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2082.]

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Suit by Mary E. Dix against Charles Dix. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mary E. Dix brought suit against Charles Dix to recover certain personal property, which had been set apart to her as a year's support from the estate of her deceased husband. The defendant was a son of the deceased by a former wife. On the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence the proceedings of the court of ordinary setting apart the property in dispute as a year's support for her. The pleadings are not set out in the bill of exceptions in the present case; but the judgment, which is copied in full, recites the return of the appraisers, the issuance of citation, and that, "objections in the nature of a claim being filed by Charles Dix, it is ordered that said objections be disallowed, and the return of the appraisers is hereby affirmed." The defendant offered evidence tending to show that the property in dispute formerly belonged to his mother, the first wife of the decedent, and was given to him, by her, and also that, on the hearing of the application for the year's support, when Dix filed objections in the nature of a claim, the ordinary refused to act as arbitrator, to hear evidence of title, or to pass upon the question of title, and that in fact he did not pass upon the question of title in that proceeding. The court rejected this evidence, held that the judgment of the court of ordinary, setting apart the year's support, was an estoppel, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted.

Donald Fraser, for plaintiff in error. Edwin A. Cohen and Shelby Myrick, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The court of ordinary had no jurisdiction to pass upon a question of conflicting claims of titles on the hearing of the application for a year's support. His judgment does not show that he did so, but recites that, objections having been filed by Dix "in the nature of a claim," it was ordered that they be "disallowed." This was not a statement that the ordinary heard evidence and passed upon the question of title. The word "disallow" is defined to mean "to refuse to allow; to deny the force or validity of; to disown or reject." Webster's Dictionary. It is often applied to a refusal to allow an amendment to pleadings, as indicating a holding, as matter of law, that such offered amendment is improper, and not that the judge heard evidence in regard to the allegations and passed upon the merits of them. Civ. Code, 1895, § 3743, provides that "parol evidence is admissible to show that a matter apparently governed by the judgment was really not passed upon by the court." We do not know of any case where this section could be more aptly applied than one where the court had no right to pass upon the question, ought not to have done it, and used language in his judgment which does not necessarily imply that he did so. The presiding judge erred in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant.

The cases relied on by counsel for defendant in error, and those on which they are based, furnish a striking illustration of how an obiter dictum or inadvertent expression may sometimes acquire strength by repetition until it may be in danger of developing into a formal erroneous ruling. It is rudimentary law that parties cannot, by consent express or implied, give jurisdiction to a court; that as to the subject-matter the court is limited by the powers conferred upon it by law, and cannot be given additional power or jurisdiction by consent of the parties or by waiver; but that as to the jurisdiction of the person the point may generally be waived, so far as the rights of the parties are concerned, but not so as to prejudice the rights of third persons. Civ. Code, 1895, §§ 5079, 5080. The language in the latter part of section 5079 does not mean that parties can confer upon a court, by agreement or waiver, jurisdiction as to a subject-matter. That section was a codification of the pre-existing law, and it has been declared that it was the same in effect after the adoption of the Code as before that time. Suydam v. Palmer, 63 Ga. 546, 548. In Towns v. Springer, 9 Ga. 130, it was held that "a judgment rendered by a court without jurisdiction is a mere nullity, and may be so held wherever and whenever and in whatever way it is sought to be used as a valid judgment." In that case a rule against the sheriff was issued by the superior court, based on an execution which was returnable to the inferior court, and it was held that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. In Central Bank of Georgia v. Gibson, 11 Ga. 453, it was held that "when the court has jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, and the defendant has some privilege which exempts him from the jurisdiction, he may waive the privilege, and in so doing will be bound by the judgment." In Raney

v. McRae, 14 Ga. 589, 60 Am. Dec. 660, it was said: "Parties, by consent, express or implied, cannot give jurisdiction to the court, as to the persons or the subject-matter. It may be waived, however, as to the person, so far as the rights of the parties themselves are concerned, but not so as to prejudice third persons." See, also, Bostwick v. Perkins, Hopkins & White, 4 Ga. 47; Adams v. Lamar, 8 Ga. 83 (3).

These cases were all decided before the adoption of the original Code, and show how the law was construed at that time. They are in substantial accord with the rulings in other jurisdictions. 11 Cyc. 673, 676; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1057, 1060, 1061. Since the adoption of the Code the distinction between a privilege or right which a person may waive as against himself, though not against third parties, and an inability to confer jurisdiction over subject-matter upon a court by consent or waiver, has been generally recognized and applied. In Smith v. Ferrario, 105 Ga. 51, 53, 31 S. E. 38, Simmons, C. J., said: "Consent of parties, however, cannot give a court jurisdiction of a subject-matter when it has none by law, and when this court discovers from the record that a judgment has been rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the case is brought here for review upon writ of error, this court will of its own motion reverse the judgment." See, also, Cutts v. Scandrett, 108 Ga. 620, 34 S. E. 186. "A suit in a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, resulting in a judgment for the defendant, is a nullity." Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 11 S. E. 396, 8 L. R. A. 189 (2). This has been the general trend of decisions in this state.

The case of Wells v. Hawkins, 130 Ga. 524, 61 S. E. 121, may apparently conflict with these rulings, in view of the fact that decisions which will presently be mentioned were there cited. But the conflict is apparent rather than real. There a statutory proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on realty was brought, and the mortgagor in his answer to the rule nisi set up, as cause why the rule absolute should not be granted, that a homestead had been set apart to him, as the head of a family, in the mortgaged premises, and the issue thus raised was tried and found against him. It was held that he could not subsequently prevent the sale of the land under the levy of the execution issued upon the judgment rendered in the foreclosure proceeding by an affidavit of illegality in which the sole ground alleged the setting apart of such a homestead in the land. The superior court is a court of general jurisdiction. It has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of foreclosing mortgages, and also that of determining whether a homestead is subject to a mortgage. Possessing power to deal with and decide both these questions, and thus having jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject-matter, though the more orderly procedure might be to determine the matters separately, yet if a party by pleadings and evidence invokes and obtains, without objection, a ruling on both issues at once, he cannot afterward set up the same ground by affidavit of illegality. There is a wide difference between mere irregularity of procedure before a court of competent jurisdiction, and entire absence of jurisdiction. Moreover, the statutory proceeding to foreclose a mortgage by rule nisi and rule absolute may ordinarily be used instead of a proceeding by equitable petition to foreclose. Even before the Code it was held that when there was jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter in the court in which the suit was brought, and where suit was brought at law for a matter more properly cognizable in equity, and the defendant acquiesced in the proceeding on the law side of the court, without appealing to its equitable jurisdiction (the superior court having both jurisdictions), a judgment confessed by him would not be set aside after the lapse of five years. Bostwick v. Perkins, Hopkins & White, 4 Ga. 47. supra.

The court of ordinary is a court of general jurisdiction with respect to particular subject-matters; but it is not so in the sense of having jurisdiction generally over every possible subject-matter, question, or issue. Thus the Constitution provides that "the superior court shall have exclusive jurisdiction in cases of divorce; in criminal cases where the offender is subjected to loss of life, or confinement in the penitentiary; in cases respecting titles to land, and equity cases." Civ. Code 1895, § 5842. The superior court has concurrent jurisdiction of other subject-matters; and other courts have jurisdiction of particular subjects. Where the court of ordinary is without jurisdiction to deal with a particular subject-matter, or to make a decision in regard to it, an effort to do so is ineffectual; and this is true, whether want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter is urged before that court or not. Craddock v. Kelly, 129 Ga. 818, 825, 60 S. E. 193. In order for a year's support to be set apart to a widow, it should appear prima facie that the money or property sought to be set apart forms a part of the estate of the applicant's deceased husband. If, by way of illustration, a widow should state in her application for a year's support that the property sought to be set apart was never owned or claimed by her husband, and formed no part of his estate, that he had no interest in it, the application would be denied. But, where a prima facie showing is made by an applicant to have a year's support set apart to her from property forming part of the estate of her deceased husband, there is no provision of law by which third parties can file claims, or objections to the grant of a year's support in the nature of claims, and thus form an issue as to title, to be tried by the court of ordinary. That court is without jurisdiction to try or pass upon such an issue. Suppose the property sought to be set aside for a year's support were real estate, under the constitutional provision above quoted how could the ordinary adjudicate the question of title between the estate of the decedent and a third party? If it were sought to have notes or choses in action set apart, to permit the apparent debtors to file objections on the ground that they did not owe the debts, and thus try the issue between the debtor and creditor, would be to give to the court of ordinary jurisdiction by consent or waiver which has not been conferred upon it by law. When property is set apart to a widow as a year's support, she receives just such title as her deceased husband had, and acquires no greater title by reason of the setting apart of the property to her.

The confusion which has grown up on this subject originated in regard to cases of setting apart homesteads. As far back as Chambliss v. Phelps, 39 Ga. 386, it was held that "a creditor, though his claim may be one of the exceptions provided for in the homestead act, cannot set it up to prevent the laying off of the homestead. Other conditions having been fulfilled, the homestead ought to be set off, leaving to the creditor his right to go on under the exceptions at his discretion." In Harris v. Colquit & Baggs, 44 Ga. 663, in which two judges presided, factors, who made advances to a person for the purpose of making a crop and took a lien thereon, foreclosed it, and the execution was levied upon a part of the property. The wife of the debtor applied to the ordinary and obtained an exemption of certain property, including that on which the levy was made. She interposed a claim. It appeared that the factors were represented by counsel before the ordinary, and no appeal was taken from his judgment setting apart the homestead. What questions were made before the ordinary did not appear. Under these facts it was submitted to the decision of the judge whether the property was subject to the execution. He held that it was, and this was assigned as error. The judgment was affirmed. It was held that "parties who appear before the ordinary to contest the granting of a homestead are concluded by the judgment upon all questions which it is necessary for the applicant to prove, and upon all questions which the statute provides the creditors may make; but they are not concluded upon questions over which the ordinary has no jurisdiction, unless it appears that they actually made such questions, and that they were in fact decided." The last clause was unnecessary to the decision of the case, and it was an obiter dictum to state what might have been the law on a different case from that before the court. In the opinion of McCay, J., he made use of a similar statement, saying: "The judgment concludes on all the facts necessary to appear before the court can give a judgment. But the title to the land, and whether, notwithstanding the judgment setting aside the homestead, the debt of the objector may not still levy on it, is not an issue in the case, unless the parties actually make it and it is decided. In that case the parties have by mutual consent waived the objection to the jurisdiction, and a judgment binds them."

As it has already been held by this court that the question of whether a homestead, when granted, would be subject to a particular lien, was not only not a proper question for determination on the application for a homestead, but could not be made, and, if made, could not prevent the grant, clearly that portion of what Judge McCay said was obiter. Nevertheless, in Patterson v. Wallace, 47 Ga. 452, 455, a similar view was taken, and Montgomery, J., said: "If the ordinary granted the homestead on demurrer, as it were, to the proof showing that the plaintiff's debt was created for the purchase money, thus declining to take jurisdiction of that issue, then the principle laid down in Chambliss v. Phelps, 39 Ga. 386, would seem to warrant the plaintiff in proceeding with his execution so far as the homestead may present an obstacle; but, if the ordinary decided that the debt was not created for the land, it would be res adjudicata." Inasmuch as it made no difference at all whether the debt was created for the purchase money of the land, and such fact formed no legal ground of objection, but the homestead would be granted, regardless of how that question might be decided, leaving the matter of subjecting the property for future determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, the statement that a decision of the question would be res adjudicata is not convincing. In Gunn v. Petty-grew, 93 Ga. 327, 20 S. E. 323, the only question made which was dealt with in the fourth headnote was as to the form of the verdict.

In Smith v. Smith, 101 Ga. 296, 28 S. E. 665, a year's support was granted to a widow, being set apart to her in a city lot. No objection was filed to the return of the appraisers, and it was duly recorded. After this three persons, who alleged themselves to be the children and heirs at law of the decedent, and to be in possession of the lot, entered what purported to be an appeal to the superior court. The widow filed an equitable petition praying for the appointment of a receiver. The judge of the superior court appointed a receiver ad interim. Before the trial the defendants dismissed their appeal from the judgment setting apart the year's support. The widow moved for a decree that the receiver deliver to her the house and lot and the accrued rentals, less the cost of the proceedings, as her year's support under the judgment of the ordinary, and that the petition abate and be dismissed. The court granted such a decree. That judgment was reversed. The decision necessarily rested upon this statement in the opinion: "Upon the plaintiff's voluntarily dismissing the petition in this case, the court should have passed an order restoring the status as it existed at the time the court first sanctioned the application for a receiver. This would have placed the defendants in possession, would have turned over to them the rents which had been collected pending the case, and would have left the parties to their remedies at law to determine the question of title." It was, however, also said that "a judgment of the ordinary approving a return made by appraisers setting apart specified realty as a year's support did not, as against third persons claiming title to the property, but who had not filed with the ordinary any objection to the allowance of such return, adjudicate that the title was in the estate of the applicant's deceased husband." In the opinion Mr. Justice Cobb substantially reiterated the obiter dictum of Judge McCay, saying that "it seems that" a person filing an objection raising the question of title, and having it passed on would be concluded. He cited the case of Harris v. Colquit & Baggs, supra, and also Newton v. Summey, 59 Ga. 397, and Robson v. Harris, 82 Ga. 153, 7 S. E. 926. In neither of the last two cases was any question made as to the jurisdiction of the ordinary in regard to such issue. In fact, in none of the cases up to this point does the question of ability to confer jurisdiction by agreement appear to have been considered.

In Durham v. Durham, 107 Ga. 285, 33 S. E. 76, appraisers set apart to a widow and her minor children a year's support, consisting of an article of personalty, an account against a named person, and a one-half interest in described realty. The alleged debtor filed a caveat on the ground that the deceased did not own the property and the caveator did not owe the debt. A demurrer to the caveat, on the ground that it was in effect a claim to the property, and that the ordinary had no jurisdiction to pass upon the question of title thus attempted to be raised, was sustained by the judge, and the judgment was affirmed. It was said that the issues thus tendered, even treating the caveat as a claim to the realty and personalty set apart, were such as should have been determined elsewhere. Mr. Justice Cobb, who wrote the opinion, declared that the court of ordinary was without jurisdiction to try the question of title, and that therefore the demurrer to objections seeking to raise that question was properly sustained. It was unnecessary to go further, and discuss what might have been the result if no objection had been raised by demurrer, and what was said on that subject was obiter dictum. Nevertheless, the learned justice who prepared the opinion saw the anomalous situation arising from what had previously been said in some of the opinions, indicating that, although the court of ordinary had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it might be conferred by agreement or waiver, and endeavored to reconcile those statements with the law. He said: "Neither the ordinary nor the court of ordinary has, under the law of this state, jurisdiction to try cases involving the title to property either real or personal, or to decide questions arising between the representatives of estates of decedents and persons who may be indebted to the same. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4232, 4951, 5870. Parties may by consent submit such questions to the decision of the ordinary; but when this is done the decision made is not a judgment of the court of ordinary, but simply an award by the individual who is ordinary, as an arbitrator between the parties." And again, after referring to language used in some of the cases, which he stated was probably not entirely accurate, he said that the conclusion reached by this court in the case under consideration was not in conflict with those decisions. "That conclusion is that the court of ordinary has no jurisdiction to try questions of title to property; but if those questions are presented to the presiding officer of that court, and are passed upon without objection from either party, the decision rendered is binding upon the parties submitting the question to his judgment; not, however, because it is a judgment of the court of ordinary, but because he has a right as an individual, when parties consent thereto, to determine, if he sees proper, any question submitted to him."

As already stated, this was not essential to the decision of the case then under discussion. The language of the previous cases did not indicate any idea of the submission of the question to arbitration, but treated the matter as a waiver of objection to jurisdiction, apparently overlooking the inability to confer jurisdiction as to subject-matter on a court by consent or waiver. If the court had jurisdiction to try and determine the subject-matter, the judgment was binding. If it had not, the judgment was invalid, and had no binding force. Undoubtedly parties may submit questions to arbitration, and if they select an ordinary as an arbitrator, and he consents to act as such, there would seem to be no reason why an award by him would not stand like an award by any other arbitrator. But we cannot assent to the proposition that where the proceeding is one before a court of ordinary, and an effort is made to invoke a judgment of that court on a subject-matter over which it has no jurisdiction, the judgment rendered is to be treated as a void judgment for want of jurisdiction, but as a valid and binding award by an arbitrator. Arbitration is a matter depending upon consent and agreement to arbitrate, not upon merely proceeding to litigate before a court.

We have gone at some length into a review of the cases, because much reliance was placed upon the decision in Durham v. Durham, supra. A judgment granting an injunction against a claim for a year's support and dower, based on adverse title, has been reversed. Burks v. Beall, 77 Ga. 271, 3 S. E. 155. Whether an effort to prevent a cloud from being placed on a title, without any justification therefor, would authorize equitable interference was not discussed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CLARKE BROS. v. McNATT.

1. SALES (§ 462*)—CONTRACTS (§ 35*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—SIGNING BY SELLER—SIGNING BY BOTH PARTIES.

Where a vendor of personal property delivers possession of it to the vendee, but receives from the latter a promise to pay a stipulated amount therefor and an agreement that the title shall remain in the vendor until payment has been made, it is not generally necessary to the validity of such a contract, as against the vendee or one purchasing under him, that it should be signed by the vendor.

(a) Where a contract on its face provides or shows that the parties intended for both to sign before it takes effect, it is not complete until both do so.

2. SALES (§ 472*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—PURCHASERS FROM BUYER—CHANGE IN TERMS.

Where a contract of sale of personal property, with the title retained in the vendor till payment of the purchase price, provided that the vendee might sell such property to a purchaser or purchasers, who should make the check or checks payable to the vendor, and that the latter should apply one-half to his vendee to pay for the expense of preparing and marketing the product, and such contract was recorded, if a purchaser from a vendee was affected with notice of such terms, as against him they could not be varied by the subsequent parol agreement between the original vendor and vendee under which one-half of the amounts received from sales of the lumber was not applied to the purchase price, but to another indebtedness of the vendee to a firm of which the vendor was a member for supplies furnished to the vendee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1371; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—SALE OF PERSONALTY OR REALTY.

A contract of sale in regard to timber which is attached to the soil, but which is presently to be severed therefrom and converted into personalty before the title is to pass to the purchaser, is an executory sale of personalty, and not of an interest in land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6, 7; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

4. SALES (§ 473*)—CONDITIONAL SALE—CONDITIONS—PURCHASERS FROM BUYER.

If a vendor of personal property retains title under a written and recorded contract until payment of the purchase money, but it is also provided in such contract that the vendee may sell the property, consisting of lumber to be cut and carried to market, the vendor cannot impose on a bona fide purchaser or purchasers from his vendee, without notice of such limitations, other than the mere recording of the contract, the duty of seeing that he receives the proceeds of the sale or sales; nor, as against such a bona fide purchaser without notice, can he accomplish such result by stating in the contract that the sales shall be made to a purchaser who will make the checks payable to him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, McIntosh County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Bail trover by James McNatt against Clarke Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

James McNatt brought an action of bail trover against Clarke Bros., seeking to recover two rafts of timber. The defendants denied the plaintiff's title to the property, and contended that it belonged to them. McNatt was the owner of certain timbered lands. T. P. McBride and W. D. Petersen executed and delivered to him the following written contract, which was recorded:

"State of Georgia, Montgomery County. This indenture and contract of lease, made and entered into this the 22d day of January, 1903, between James McNatt, of the first part, and T. P. McBride and W. D. Petersen, of the second part, all the parties of the county and state aforesaid, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of two thousand and thirty-six and $\frac{42}{100}$ dollars, to be paid as hereinafter provided, as the purchase price of all the sawmill timber on the following tract of land [describing it]. The aforesaid condition [consideration?] of two thousand and thirty-six dollars and $\frac{42}{100}$ is to bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum for the above date, and is to be paid as follows: The said parties of the second part hereby agree, in order to pay the aforesaid sum of two thousand and thirty-six and $\frac{42}{100}$ dollars and all interest that may accrue thereon at the said rate of 8% per annum, to cut, haul, and saw square all the sawmill timber on the land aforesaid, and when the same is ready for the Darien market then the same is to be sold to a buyer who will make the check payable to the said James McNatt, who hereby agrees to return to the said party of the second part one-half of the proceeds of said check, in order that the said parties may defray the expenses incurred by reason of preparing the said timber for market. It is further agreed by the parties to this contract that the said James McNatt reserves the title to the aforesaid sawmill timber and control and sale thereof until the purchase price aforesaid is paid. In order to further secure the aforesaid sum of two thousand and thirty-six and $\frac{42}{100}$ dollars we hereby mortgage and create a lien on the following personal property to wit: [Describing it.] It is further agreed that the above sum of two thousand and thirty-six and $\frac{42}{100}$ dollars, to become due and collectible in six months from the above date; and should we fail to pay the aforesaid sum of two thousand and thirty-six and ⁴²/₁₀₀ dollars, we hereby constitute the said James McNatt our lawful authorized agent to sell said mules heretofore described and to execute titles thereto in our names after having advertised the same for ten days at the courthouse in Montgomery county, Ga., said county, and appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the aforesaid sum and all interest and costs that may accrue thereto. And we hereby waive and renounce for ourselves and families all the rights to the homestead or exemption laws which we may have under or by virtue of the Constitution or laws of the state of Georgia or of the United States, as against this note or any renewal thereof. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals the day and year first above written. T. P. McBride. [L. S.] W. D. Petersen. [L. S.]

"Recorded January 28, 1903. D. B. Graham, Clerk."

On this were entered four credits, of $90.82, $462.97, $440.64, and $366.67, respectively. McBride and Petersen cut timber from the property and caused it to be sold. Some of the drafts or checks given in payment were made payable to McNatt, and some to the order of McBride and Petersen. In order to carry on the business, McBride and Petersen purchased supplies from merchants, a large part of them from E. T. McBride & Co., which firm was composed of E. T. McBride and the plaintiff, McNatt. The plaintiff testified that that firm would not furnish McBride and Petersen with supplies until he agreed that the indebtedness due them should first be paid from the proceeds of the timber as cut and sold, and then the balance should be paid to him on account of the purchase price; he saying: "If anybody loses, let it be me." He admitted that $2,037.42 had been by consent delivered to E. T. McBride & Co., and said that, after settling the account of that firm, he received certain payments for which he gave credit on the contract with McBride and Petersen. He testified that these applications of payments were made by agreement between himself, E. T. McBride & Co., and McBride and Petersen. He indorsed drafts which were payable to him. Finally Clarke Bros. bought the timber now in controversy from McBride and Petersen, and gave drafts which were not payable to McNatt. These drafts did not come into the hands of the plaintiff, and he sought to recover the timber. There was also testimony tending to show notice to Clarke Bros. of a claim to the property by the plaintiff. On behalf of the defendants there was testimony that the consideration for the entire timber had been paid to McNatt, and that nothing was due him on account of it when the sale was made to Clarke Bros. There was also evidence conflicting in some respects with that of the plaintiff as to any agreed application of the proceeds of timber first to the account of E. T. McBride & Co. There was much other evidence which it is unnecessary to set out. The jury found for the plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was refused, and they excepted.

W. L. Clay, for plaintiffs in error. E. J. Giles, Chas. M. Tyson, and Hines & Jordan, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Objection was made to the admission of the contract in evidence, on the ground that it was not signed by McNatt. Section 2776 of the Civil Code of 1895, on the subject of conditional sales, declares that "every such conditional sale, in order for the reservation of title to be valid as against third parties, shall be evidenced in writing, and not otherwise. And the written contract of every such conditional sale shall be executed and attested in the same manner as mortgages on personal property." It is not required that the vendor as well as the vendee shall sign the written instrument. Smith v. De Vaughn, 82 Ga. 574, 9 S. E. 425. If the personal property is delivered into the possession of the vendee, the object is to provide a method of putting third parties on notice that the apparent title thus evidenced by possession is not in fact such, but that the title rests in the vendor until the condition of the sale shall be fulfilled. As against creditors or persons claiming under the vendee it does not require the signature of the vendor. The contract is in some degree analogized in the section of the Code to a mortgage. An instrument of the latter kind is signed by the mortgagor, and a bill of sale to secure a debt is signed by the debtor. If the property should remain in the possession of the vendor, and it were sought to set up notice as against his creditors or persons holding under him, a different question might be presented.

The instrument in the present case contains some indication that the vendor should have signed it, as agreements by him are stated in it; but in the latter part it apparently contemplates only the signature of the vendees. If a contract is intended to be signed by both parties, and so appears on its face, it is not complete until thus signed. Delaware Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co., 126 Ga. 388, 55 S. E. 330, and citations. But as it is not clear that both vendor and vendees intended to sign the contract before it should become effective, and as both have acted under the instrument, and the lumber has been cut and sold by the latter, a failure of the vendor to sign will not be held to operate so as to convey complete title to the vendees, who did sign the instrument, which was duly attested and recorded.

2. The court charged the jury as follows: "If, however, notwithstanding the original agreement between McNatt and McBride and Petersen, [another was made] by the terms of which the original agreement in that respect was varied, and that McNatt should take the money, and did take the money received from timber sold by McBride and Petersen, and by their direction or consent applied it first to the extinguishment or partial payment of any debt due to McBride & Co., why McNatt would have the right to so apply it, if it was with the consent and direction of McBride and Petersen, and if he did so apply it, whatever portion was left after being so applied to the indebtedness of McBride & Co., the rest would be applied to the payment of the lien. You will ascertain how much has gone to the payment of the original price of the timber. If sufficient to discharge it, why, as I say, the plaintiff cannot recover. If not sufficient to discharge it, provided that you find that the subsequent contract has been satisfactorily proven, why then the plaintiff should recover, because his lien would still be in existence. He would have a right ahead of the rights of Clarke Bros., or any other purchaser of timber."

This charge was erroneous. If the reservation of title was good as against purchasers of the timber from McBride and Petersen, and if they were charged with notice of the contents of the contract, and the conditions and agreements contained therein, to allow those conditions and agreements to be varied as against them by a parol agreement between McNatt and McBride and Petersen would be substantially to allow a parol reservation of title instead of a written one. The nature of this contract of conditional sale will be considered later; but for the present it is enough to say that, if McNatt could rely on the written contract as affecting the rights of purchasers from McBride and Petersen, he could not also injuriously affect those rights by means of a subsequent parol agreement or understanding with his immediate vendee. Suppose that Clarke Bros. had bought enough of the timber to have paid the entire purchase price to McNatt after deducting what should go to the payment of expenses, and had made a check payable to McNatt in strict accordance with the terms of the written agreement between him and McBride and Petersen. McNatt could not, with the assent or agreement of McBride and Petersen, have applied such a payment to other indebtedness than the purchase money of the timber, and still have recovered the timber from Clarke Bros. Under the charge of the court above quoted, this would have been possible. That payments by purchasers from McBride and Petersen were made at different times, or that McNatt treated checks not made to his order as sufficient by accepting and applying them, would not authorize him to insist on the terms of the written instrument as against purchasers from McBride and Petersen, even though bona fide and without notice other than such as the record of the paper might carry, and at the same time vary the terms of such instrument by parol agreement with McBride and Petersen, and set up the variance also as against the rights of such purchasers, who were not shown to have had any knowledge thereof or to have acquiesced therein.

The error contained in the charge above set out entered into several other portions of the charge which were made grounds of the motion for a new trial. It was not an ordinary question of application of payments between debtor and creditor, which could be controlled by agreement, or where in the absence of agreement the creditor could make the application, or in the absence of this the law would make it for the parties. Civ. Code 1895, § 3722. It was an effort to set up the strict terms of a written contract between the vendor and vendee, with reservation of title in the former, against third persons, but to bind such persons also by a departure from the contract. If McNatt received enough from sales of timber by McBride and Petersen to pay the purchase money in full in accordance with the terms of the written agreement, he could not set up as against third parties an agreed diversion of such purchase money to the payment of other indebtedness of McBride and Petersen to him or to the firm of which he was a member.

3, 4. It was urged that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, because, under the undisputed evidence and under the written instrument which was introduced, McNatt was not authorized to recover. In Jordan v. Jones, 110 Ga. 47, 35 S. E. 151, where a landowner agreed with a laborer to allow the latter to cut timber from the land and transport and deliver the logs to a second person, who, by agreement, was to reserve from their sale a certain amount per thousand feet for the landowner, the contract was sustained, and it was held that the title to the logs did not pass to the laborer, and that when he abandoned the contract, and left on the land certain logs which had been cut by him, they were not subject to levy as his property. It was said that the contract was a peculiar one, and that the relation between the landowner and the laborer had some of the elements of an executory agreement, some of a partnership, some of a conditional sale, and some of a bailment. A contract of sale of growing trees concerns an interest in realty. Corbin v. Durden, 126 Ga. 429, 55 S. E. 30. An agreement for the sale of property attached to the soil, but which is to be severed therefrom and converted into personalty before the title to the property is to pass to the purchaser, is an executory sale of personal property, and not of an interest in land. Graham v. West, 126 Ga. 624, 55 S. E. 931. Under these rulings, the contract now before us should be treated as dealing with personal property rather than with realty, at least as to the timber which was to be cut and sold. It was not a bailment, but a sale. It was not a method of paying persons, who should cut the timber and prepare it for market, for their services, as in Jordan's Case, supra.

Aside from legislative acts regulating conditional sales and their record, such sales have been productive of much litigation. Starting with the maxim that no one can convey a title which he does not own, a variety of modifications and limitations of its application have resulted from the conduct of the parties. It was at one time a subject of controversy as to whether an owner of personal property, who placed it in possession of another under a contract of conditional sale, and thus invested the purchaser with prima facie evidence of ownership, could assert his title as against a bona fide purchaser without notice from such person, or against a creditor of the person so intrusted. As to bailments, it was clear that the bailor could not be held to have lost his property by merely intrusting it to the bailee for a specific purpose. As to conditional sales, the view generally prevailed that, while possession of personalty was prima facie evidence of ownership, it was only prima facie so, and was subject to be rebutted by proving the actual title, and that therefore, where a conditional sale was made with reservation of title in the vendor until the condition should be performed, such as the payment of purchase money, the mere delivery of possession to the vendee, without more, did not destroy the right of the vendor to assert his title, even as against bona fide purchaser without notice from the vendee. But if the vendor went further, and conferred upon the vendee the actual or apparent right of sale, the right of a bona fide purchaser without notice would prevail. Thus in Leigh v. Mobile & Ohio R. Co., 58 Ala. 165, Brickell, C. J., said: "Another class of cases forming an exception to the general rule is when the owner, by his own act or consent, has given another such evidence of the right to sell or otherwise dispose of his goods as, according to the customs of trade or the common understanding of the world, usually accompanied the authority of sale, or of disposition. Then, if the person intrusted with the possession of the goods, and with the indicia of ownership, or of authority to sell or otherwise dispose of them, in violation of his duty to the owner, sells to an innocent purchaser, the sale will prevail against the right of the owner. He ought to bear the loss which may follow from his misplaced confidence, rather than the bona fide purchaser, who relied on the evidence of property or of authority with which he clothed the possessor."

In 1 Mechem on Sales, § 601, it is said: "But the rule permitting the conditional vendor to retake his goods in case of default, even from a bona fide purchaser from his conditional vendee, very obviously should not, and does not, apply in those cases in which the goods have been delivered to the conditional vendee for the very purpose of being resold to such a purchaser, as where a retail dealer obtains goods from a wholesale dealer upon the agreement that the title to the goods as a bulk shall remain in the latter, but the retail dealer is impliedly, if not expressly, permitted to sell from the bulk in the usual course of trade. A sale of the goods in bulk might be deemed unauthorized and pass no title; but the retail purchaser in the usual course of business would, where such resales were expressly or impliedly authorized, obtain a good title, though the retail dealer might fail in paying for the goods." See, also, on the general subject, Winchester Wagon Works & Mfg. Co. v. Carman, 109 Ind. 31, 9 N. E. 707, 58 Am. Rep. 382 (a case involving a conditional sale of a car load of 20 wagons by a manufacturer to a dealer); Columbus Buggy Co. v. Turley & Parker, 73 Miss. 529, 19 South. 232, 32 L. R. A. 260, 55 Am. St. Rep. 550; Fitzgerald v. Fuller, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 189; Ludden v. Hazen, 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 650; Wildner v. Wilson, 16 Lea (Tenn.) 548; Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222; Devlin v. O'Neil, 6 Daly (N. Y. Com. Pl.) 305; Brinton v. Gerry, 7 Ill. App. 238; McCombs v. Guild, Church & Co., 9 Lea (Tenn.) 81; Pickering v. Busk, 15 East, 38 (a case which has been thought to go quite far as to what would constitute an implied authority to sell); Loving Pub. Co. v. Johnson, 68 Tex. 273, 4 S. W. 532. Some of these authorities apply the rule in favor of creditors as well as bona fide purchasers.

Under our present law in regard to the execution of contracts of conditional sale (codified in section 2776 of the Civil Code), it is provided as follows: "Whenever personal property is sold and delivered with the condition affixed to the sale that the title thereto is to remain in the vendor of such personal property until the purchase price thereof shall have been paid, every such conditional sale, in order for the reservation of title to be valid as against third parties, shall be evidenced in writing, and not otherwise. And the written contract of every such conditional sale shall be executed and attested in the same manner as mortgages on personal property; as between the parties themselves, the contract as made by them shall be valid, and may be enforced, whether evidenced in writing or not." By section 2777 conditional bills of sale are required to be recorded within 30 days from their date. This law provides for the making of a sale with reservation of title in the vendor until the purchase money shall have been paid, and that such contracts may be good, not only between the parties, but also against third parties, even innocent purchasers without actual notice, if they are executed and recorded in accordance with the statute. It does not provide generally for affecting the world with notice of all contracts of bailment, agency or partnership. A contract for the retention of title in a vendor until payment, though the possession of the chattel is delivered to the vendee, normally contemplates a lack of authority in the vendee to sell until payment, at least to sell more than such interest as he has. Authority to sell the entire title to a third party is inconsistent with its retention by the vendor. Where, therefore, a vendor, who reserves title until payment, confers upon his vendee the power to sell the chattel, he confers a power to destroy his retention of title.

Can a vendor of personalty, who retains title until payment of the purchase money, authorize the vendee to sell all or a part of the property, and impose upon the purchaser the duty of seeing that he is paid the proceeds of the sale? And will it bind a bona fide purchaser, without notice, from the original vendee, if such a provision is inserted in and recorded as a part of the contract of conditional sale? In Guill v. Northern, 67 Ga. 345, a deed conveyed land to the wife of the grantor for her use for life, together with her children, and provided that at her death it should be divided among the children. It contained a power in the wife "at any time in her discretion to sell and convey the said property by deed, provided the proceeds of such sale are invested in other real estate for the uses expressed." It was held that a bona fide purchaser from the wife acquired a good title, and was not bound to see to the application of the proceeds. In Tucker v. Mann, 124 Ga. 1003, 53 S. E. 504, one person executed to another a promissory note which contained a clause conveying to the payee the title to a certain mule as security. The payee had the note duly recorded. Before it was fully paid he authorized the debtor to sell the mule and turn the proceeds of the sale over to him. The debtor sold the mule, but failed to pay the proceeds to the creditor, and the latter brought an action of trover against the purchaser. The court charged that if the plaintiff gave the maker of the note permission to sell the mule, coupled with the condition that the maker was to pay him the money received from the sale, and the defendant bought the mule in good faith without knowledge of this condition, then the plaintiff could not recover, and that the defendant would not be required to see that the condition was complied with, and would get a good title to the mule regardless of it. This court held that the charge was not erroneous, and that, the evidence showing the facts as stated, a verdict for the defendant was proper.

It will be seen that in the case of Guill v. Northern, supra, the recorded deed included the power of sale and conveyance, "provided" the proceeds should be reinvested. But this attempt to place the burden of seeing to the reinvestment upon the purchaser was held not to accomplish that result. In the case of Tucker v. Mann, supra, the recorded contract, in the nature of a bill of sale to secure payment of a debt, contained no power of sale at all. The debtor, therefore, had no authority to make any sale except such as was given him outside of the writing. The creditor undertook to make the authority to sell conditional upon his receiving the money. But this court held that, as against a bona fide purchaser without notice, he could not do so. In the case before us the effort was made to authorize the vendee in a conditional sale to prepare the lumber and carry it to a distant market and there sell it, but to impose on the purchaser substantially the duty of seeing that the original vendor received the proceeds. This was not stated in so many words, as in the two cases above cited; but the effort was made to accomplish the same result by saying that the vendees under the conditional sale might sell to a buyer who would make the check payable to the original vendor. The law does not contemplate that one who reserves title as security can authorize his vendee to sell the property, but charge a bona fide purchaser without notice with the duty of seeing that he received the proceeds; nor does the record of the contract of conditional sale convey notice to purchasers under the original vendee of any such duty or impose it upon them. If McNatt could, by inserting such a provision in his contract, make the validity of the title acquired by purchasers under McBride and Petersen depend on their making payment in the form of a check to him, there would seem to be no reason why he could not say that they would acquire title if they made payment in gold, or in bills of the denomination of $100, or in any other form which he might think likely to reach him through the hands of the vendees whom he had authorized to make the sale.

It also appears from the evidence that McNatt did not require of McBride and Petersen a strict compliance with this portion of the agreement, even as between themselves, but recognized drafts or checks not payable to him as sufficient in sales of other portions of the lumber. It may be a question as to whether he did not waive a strict compliance, even as between him and his vendees. Whether Clarke Bros. were bona fide purchasers without notice, aside from the mere record of the contract, is a question of fact, and we deem it best to return the case for a trial upon the issues, under proper instructions from the court.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

192 Ga. 648)

HANSEN v. OWENS et al.

Supreme Court of Georgia. May 15, 1909.)

1. DEATH (§ 2*)—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO CONTINUANCE OF LIFE.

The presumption of the duration of life, with respect to persons of whom no account can be given, ends at the expiration of seven years from the time when they were last heard of as living.

2. DEATH (§ 2*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where it is sought to raise a presumption of death by reason of the absence of a person from his known place of residence or domicile for seven years without being heard from, by the testimony of a witness who merely makes inquiry to lay the foundation for such proof, and who himself is not cognizant of any of the facts, the evidence must show that there has been an unsuccessful effort to find the absent person by search and diligent inquiry at his last known place of residence and among his relations or acquaintances, if any, and it must appear that the absent party has not been heard from for seven years or more by those who would be most likely to hear from him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

3. DEATH (§ 2*)—PRESUMPTION AS TO DEATH FROM ABSENCE.

Evidence of absence of a person from his original place of residence will not raise the presumption of death, where it appears that he has moved to another place and there located.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

4. DEATH (§ 4*)—EVIDENCE.

Where a deed was executed by some of the children of a deceased person as his heirs at law, and it appears that there were other children and descendants of children, but it is sought to show that those who executed the deed inherited the entire estate by virtue of the death of the other descendants of the testator, presumed to arise from their absence unheard from for more than seven years, there must be some evidence as to their status when last heard from, in respect to their being married or having other heirs.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Although plaintiffs may claim the right to recover land by virtue of prescriptive title and prior possession, as well as on account of a paper chain of title, yet where it was necessary, in order to sustain such a chain, to show inheritance by certain persons from others, and the proof on that subject was inadequate at least as to some of them, a charge in reference to a presumption of death, which was not properly adjusted to the evidence and which was calculated to mislead the jury, was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

6. DEEDS (§§ 193, 199*) — SIGNATURE — PRESUMPTION OF GENUINENESS — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY — PRESUMPTION OF REQUEST TO SIGN.

If a deed purports to be executed in the presence of, and is attested by, an officer authorized to make such attestation and another witness, and is recorded, presumptively the signature is genuine; but this may be disproved, and the signature shown to be a forgery.

(a) Evidence that the person who purported to sign the deed could not write is admissible for that purpose, and is for the consideration of the jury.

(b) In such a case, if the jury believed from the evidence that the person whose name appeared to be signed to the deed in writing could not write, and therefore did not in fact personally sign it, no presumption of law would arise that he had authorized some other person to sign it for him. One who sought to set up such fact would carry the burden of proving it. Atkinson, J., dissenting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 562-573, 595-600; Dec. Dig. §§ 193, 199.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 71*) — DEEDS (§ 111*)—COLOR OF TITLE—ESTATE CONVEYED — FRACTIONAL PART.

In order for a deed to convey perfect title, it must be signed by all the persons owning the land as tenants in common; but a deed which purports to convey the entire title may operate as color of title although it is not signed by all the owners, but as against the other owners it must be accompanied by adverse possession of such a character as would affect them.

(a) The deed from certain persons, purporting to convey as the heirs of Hiram Waller, deceased, did not on its face indicate a conveyance of a fractional part of the lot, or less than the whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 415-429; Dec. Dig. § 71;* Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

8. EXPENSES OF LITIGATION.

The evidence did not authorize a recovery in this action of expenses of litigation against the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

9. WORDS AND PHRASES—"SIGNATURE."

Ordinarily, to sign an instrument indicates the signing with one's own hand.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; U. V. Hill, Judge.

Action by John S. Owens and another against F. J. Hansen. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jay & Jay, Haygood & Cutts, and O. J. Wimberly, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Ryman and Edgar Latham, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. John S. Owens and Edgar Latham brought an action against F. J. Hansen to recover certain land, together with mesne profits and expenses of litigation, including attorney's fees. They obtained a verdict for the land, and also for $445 for expenses of litigation. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1-5. The plaintiffs relied on a paper chain of title coming down from the state to them, upon title by prescription, and upon prior possession. The state granted the land lot including the land sued for to Hiram Waller. One link in the chain of title set up by the plaintiffs was a deed from four persons, described as heirs at law of Hiram Waller, deceased, to E. H. Moore. In order to support the contention that their chain of title was complete, it was necessary to show title from Hiram Waller. He did not make a conveyance to them; but they contended that he died intestate, and that they held a deed executed by all of the heirs of Hiram Waller. The date of his death does not appear; but there was testimony tending to show that he died in Bryan county, intestate, at the advanced age of 90 years, leaving surviving him three daughters and five sons, all of whom, at the time of the trial of the case, were claimed to be dead, except one son and one daughter. The dates of the death of those deceased nowhere appear. The deed relied upon by the plaintiffs as a conveyance by all of the heirs at law of Hiram Waller was executed in 1884, and was signed by only three of the sons and one daughter, who, it was contended, were the only sons and daughter of Hiram Waller then in life. The several sons and daughters who had died previously to that time had all been married and had had children; but the evidence does not disclose where they lived, or whether any of them survived their respective parents. Under these facts, it could not be said that the deed under which the plaintiffs claimed was the deed of all of the heirs of Hiram Waller. The evidence does not affirmatively show that the title of the deceased sons and daughters of Hiram Waller descended by inheritance to the surviving sons and daughters who executed the deed in 1884, or that the latter otherwise acquired the title of the said sons and daughters. See 14 Cyc. 100; Skinner v. Fulton, 39 Ill. 484.

In order to account for the descendants of Hiram Waller, other than those who signed the deed, and to raise a presumption of death of such descendants, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff testified that he went to Bryan county, and to Savannah, Chatham county, and undertook to locate all of the descendants of the children of Hiram Waller who had died before the deed was made by the four heirs to Moore in 1884; that he could not find anybody who had heard of them in years and years—he thought it was about 15 years since anybody had heard of where they were. A son and a daughter of Hiram Waller testified by interrogatories. The son testified that in 1884 two daughters and a son of Hiram Waller were dead, and that he thought another son, named James, was also dead, but did not know; that the deceased son first mentioned left three children living, whose names he gave; that one of the deceased daughters left four children, whose names he stated; that he thought that the other daughter had one or two children; that he did not know where any of these children "live now"—that is, at the time the testimony was delivered; and that James had no living children "in this country." The daughter of Hiram Waller, who was a witness, testified that in 1884 she and three of her brothers were living; that "James went to California when he was 21, and has since been reported dead"; that one of her deceased brothers and two sisters had living children at the time of their death. Neither of these witnesses was asked as to the residence of the descendants of Hiram Waller when last heard from, nor did they testify that they had not heard from them within several years, or that they did not know what had become of them, except that the son stated that he did not know where they lived at the time of the trial. Neither was it shown that any inquiry had been made of these two witnesses, or of any particular person, or of what person or persons, to ascertain where these descendants lived, or what was their last known place of residence. In general terms, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, as above recited, stated that he had made inquiry in Bryan county, and in Savannah, and could not find anybody that had heard of them in about 15 years. Why the inquiry was made in Chatham county is not apparent; nor in Bryan county, except that Hiram Waller and some of his children seemed to have lived there. Whether those who had died leaving descendants continued to live there until their death, or whether their descendants ever lived there, was not proved.

The presiding judge on this subject gave the following charge: "I charge you, in connection therewith, that the death of a party is presumed by the law when he has been absent seven years without being heard from—absents himself. The absence means from the locality where such party has lived before, and is away from, and not being heard from means not heard from in the locality which had been his home and where he had lived; and wherever, under such circumstances, a party has not been heard from in seven years since last heard from, the law presumes him to be dead." As to James, it is not very clear whether he went to California and located there at some particular point as his home, or whether he merely went away. There was some evidence that it had been reported that he had died, and perhaps the testimony of his brother and sister might have authorized a finding as matter of fact that he was dead; or if he merely went abroad, and had not been heard from at his former home in more than seven years, this might raise a presumption that he was dead. But we are now dealing, not with the sufficiency of evidence to authorize a finding of the fact of death, but with the question of whether a presumption of death has arisen.

As to the other descendants of Hiram Waller there was no statement of reputed death in the family, but it was only as above set out. Under this testimony we think that the charge quoted was calculated to mislead the jury, and to lead them to infer that they might find that a presumption of death as to all of the descendants of Hiram Waller, except those who signed the deed, had been raised. A presumption of death may arise where a person has been absent from his known place of residence or domicile for seven years without being heard from. In order to show that he has not been heard from by a witness who merely makes inquiry for the purpose of making proof which will raise a presumption of death, and who himself is not cognizant of any of the facts, the evidence must show that there has been an unsuccessful effort to find the absent person by search and diligent inquiry at his latest known place of residence and among his relations or acquaintances, if any; and it must appear that the absent party has not been heard from within seven years by those who would be most likely to hear from him. Mere absence is not sufficient to raise the presumption. A person may be absent from his home or from his last place of residence in this state for many years on business or for other sufficient reason, but he may have been heard of by his family or friends; or a person may move from one locality and establish a residence or domicile in another. Evidence of absence from his original place of residence will not raise the presumption of death, where it appears that he has moved to another place. Gray v. McDowell, 6 Bush (Ky.) 475; Keller v. Stuck, 4 Redf. Sur. (N. Y.) 204. See, on the general subject, Cofer v. Flanagan, 1 Ga. 538; Adams v. Jones, 39 Ga. 479; Watson v. Adams, 103 Ga. 786, 30 S. E. 577; 13 Cyc. 301.

Furthermore, the object of evidence introduced for the purpose of raising a presumption of death as to the descendants of Hiram Waller must have been to show that those of his sons and daughters who executed the deed to Moore acquired by inheritance a complete title to the land. In order to show this, it would be necessary for the evidence to indicate that they died under such circumstances as would make the four signers of the deed their sole heirs; they having died after Hiram Waller's death. If the descendants thus sought to be accounted for married or left children or other heirs, the four signers of the deed would not be the owners of the entire title by inheritance. There was no evidence at all as to whether the descendants referred to were married, or single, or childless when last heard from, or whether they still lived.

It was contended on behalf of the defendants in error that the evidence authorized a recovery of the land by them on the grounds of prescription and of prior possession; but, as above stated, they did not rely on those grounds exclusively. They also relied on the existence of a chain of title coming down to them under Hiram Waller through persons claiming to have inherited the entire land. As to this contention it was necessary that there should be some proper evidence and a proper submission of the question to the jury so far as the evidence authorized. We cannot tell how far the jury may have been influenced in finding their verdict by the theory that the four persons who signed the deed as heirs of Hiram Waller thereby conveyed the entire title which he had acquired by grant from the state. The charge on this subject, which the court gave broadly, as above stated, was not warranted by or appropriate to the evidence in the case, and, under all the evidence, the error was substantial and harmful.

6. One ground of the motion for a new trial complains of the following charge: "I also charge you in that connection that wherever such an issue is made, and the jury should believe from the testimony, under the rules as I have given them, that if a particular grantor of the defendant could not write at the time the deed was made—is alleged to have been made—and the jury should further find from the evidence that the deed so attacked as having been alleged to have been made by him is in fact signed in writing, that fact of itself would be a circumstance that the jury would be authorized to consider, along with all the other evidence in the case upon that point, in determining what is the truth of that issue. And wherever the jury believe from the evidence that a grantor could not write, and a deed is introduced, and after being introduced is attacked, where it is signed by him in writing, then there is no presumption of law that such deed was signed by some party authorized by said grantor; but the burden would be upon the party offering the deed to show that such was the case, if the case all of which is to be passed upon by the jury." As to the correctness of this charge the court is not unanimous in opinion, though they are in accord as to all other points involved in the case. In regard to the question involved in this charge, the opinion of the majority of the court, as prepared on their behalf by Justice LUMPKIN, is as follows:

An affidavit of forgery may be filed and a special issue made on a recorded deed, and, if found against the deed, such deed cannot be admitted in evidence; or if no affidavit is made, and the deed is apparently regular and properly attested and recorded, it may be put in evidence. Nevertheless the adverse party may then attack it by evidence as a forgery. The exact question is this: If the deed appears to be regularly signed by the purported grantor, and is introduced in evidence, but under the evidence introduced the jury should find that the purported grantor could not, and therefore did not sign his name to the deed, will it be presumed, because of the "attestation" of a notary public, that the purported grantor authorized some other person to sign for him, or is that a matter for determination under the evidence, rather than as a matter of presumption?

As the term is ordinarily understood, to sign an instrument indicates the signing with one's own hand. Among the definitions of the word "sign," given in Webster's Dictionary, are "to affix a signature to; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting." And among the definitions of the word "signature" are the following: "A sign, stamp, or mark impressed, as by a seal, especially the name of any person written with his own hand, employed to signify that the writing which precedes accords with his wishes or intention; a sign manual; an autograph." In Pol. Code 1895, § 5, it is said that "signature, or subscription, includes the mark of an illiterate or infirm person." If a witness should testify on the stand that he saw a grantor sign a deed, in the common use of language every man would understand him to mean that he saw the grantor himself subscribe his name or make his mark. From this statement no one would understand the witness to mean that he saw the grantor call in some third person and authorize such person to write the name of the grantor or make a mark for him in his presence. Whether a signature made by another in the grantor's presence and at his request or with his authority would be sufficient to bind him, if proved, has caused some discussion. The case of Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 483, 52 Am. Dec. 740, is the leading case holding that it would be so, and it has been followed by the current of authority, though not without criticism. See Browne, Stat. Frauds (5th Ed.) §§ 10-12b; Wallace v. McCollough, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 426. It has been so held in Georgia (Ellis v. Francis, 9 Ga. 325), where a constable who wrote a poor hand requested a justice of the peace, in his presence, to make an entry of "No property" on two justice court executions; the constable knowing the return to be true of his own knowledge. In Merchants' & Farmers' Bank v. Johnston, 130 Ga. 661, 61 S. E. 543, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969, where an agent, at the instance and in the presence of a member of a partnership, signed the firm name to a promissory note, it was held binding.

We are not contesting, therefore, the fact that a signature, if proved to have been thus made, would be binding; but we deny that the existence of such a state of facts can be assumed as a presumption of law. The leading case of Gardner v. Gardner, supra, furnishes an apt illustration. The signature to the deed there under consideration was "Polly Gwinn, by Mary Gardner." The attesting witnesses testified that, when it was time for the grantor to sign, her daughter, Mary G. Gardner, offered to sign for her, and did so in her presence and with her assent, expressed by a nod of the head. This was held sufficient to bind the grantor; but certainly these facts would not have been presumed without evidence, nor in this state would such a signature, though attested by a notary public, be presumed to have been authorized by being done in the presence of the grantor or by reason of an unproduced power of attorney. In the two cases in this state above cited, if nothing more had been proved than that the name of the officer in the one case, or that of the firm in the other, was not in the handwriting of the officer or a partner, the law would not have presumed other affirmative facts which would have made the signature binding, because of the general legal presumption that all men perform their legal and social duties. The existence of such facts is matter of proof, not of presumption.

So far as our examination of authorities has gone, wherever it has been held that the signing of the grantor's name in his presence and at his request by another would suffice, the facts have been proved, not presumed. The only case which has come to our notice in which the word "presumption" is used at all in that connection is Hogans v. Carruth, 19 Fla. 84. In that case an ancient deed was offered in evidence, and objection was made to its admission. It was shown that the deed came from the proper custody, that some of the parties could not write, and that their names were signed in the handwriting of a person present at the time, and not a party in interest. It was held to be admissible in evidence, and it was said that under these facts, and there being "neither charge nor evidence of fraud," the presumption was that the signatures were made at the request of the purported makers. Strictly this was inferable, rather than a presumption, and only arose after evidence of the facts. In 2 Jones on Real Property, § 1014, it is said: "The fact of the execution of the deed by the hand of another, under the immediate direction of the grantor and in his presence, must be affirmatively shown by the party relying upon the deed. The proper execution of the deed cannot be left to inference." In Videau v. Griffin, 21 Cal. 389, it was held that "the fact that the execution was in the presence of the principal must be affirmatively established by the party who relies upon it as an excuse for the absence of a power in writing and it is not to be inferred from any coincidence between the date of the deed and an acknowledgment of the principal that it was executed by his attorney." In that case the deed was signed by "John A. Clark, by his Attorney, Henry Sparks," and on the same day a notary public made a certificate, "Personally appeared before me John A. Clark, to me known, and who executed the within deed and acknowledged the same to be his free act and deed, by his attorney, Henry Sparks," which was signed by the notary, but not by the grantor.

A signature actually made by a grantor himself is good. If shown to have been made by another in his presence and at his request, it will bind him, especially when he delivers the deed as his own. Although a signature may not be made in either of these modes, but the grantor's name may have been signed by another not in his presence, he may adopt such signature as his own, and may acknowledge it as his signature before a proper officer, or he may estop himself from denying it by allowing others to act on it. 1 Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 235; Bartlett v. Drake, 100 Mass. 174, 97 Am. Dec. 92, 1 Am. Rep. 101; Vickers v. Hawkins, 128 Ga. 794, 58 S. E. 44; McCalla v. American Freehold, etc., Co., 90 Ga. 113, 15 S. E. 687. Again, where a deed is executed by an agent, the advisable and most correct mode for the agent to adopt is to sign the principal's name by himself as attorney in fact. In some of the earlier cases it was held that this must be done; but in a number of later cases the disposition has been towards relaxing this rule, and holding that, if the attorney has due authority as such to execute a deed in the name of his principal, "it cannot be said that it is indispensable to the valid execution of his power that he should add his own name to the instrument which he executes for his principal," and that his signing of the principal's name alone, though not desirable, is not invalid. 1 Devlin on Deeds, §§ 377-380. Thus, although the grantor may not sign his own name to a deed, there are several circumstances which will render the signing of his name by another as valid and binding upon him as if signed by his own hand.

If the contrary argument on this subject is sound, when a deed is attested by a notary public or other officer authorized so to do, and recorded, although it may be shown that the purported grantor did not in fact himself sign it, this would not suffice to rebut the general presumption in favor of official conduct, but the burden would rest upon the party denying the genuineness of the deed to go further and negative the possibility of the existence of any of the other circumstances to which reference has been made. Thus he must disprove the possibility that the grantor authorized another to sign in his presence; and, logically, he should also be required to show that the grantor never adopted the signature of another, or that he never estopped himself by allowing others to act upon the faith of the signature being genuine, or that the deed was not executed by an attorney in fact who held a power of attorney, but failed to note the existence of the agency. We do not see how the argument adverse to the position here taken can logically stop short of requiring disproof of all these possible modes by which a signature written by the hand of another than the grantor might be binding on him. We think that where a recorded deed has been introduced in evidence, and where the signature purports to have been written by a certain person, and the jury are satisfied from the evidence that it could not have been, and therefore was not, so written, then, if it is nevertheless claimed to be binding for any of the reasons which might legally make it so, aside from the manual execution by the grantor himself, and which would be held in law to be equivalent thereto, this would be a matter of proof, not presumption. Any other rule would in many instances place upon a person attacking a recorded deed, after its introduction in evidence, practically an impossible burden to negative conjectural occurrences.

The entire argument to support a different ruling rests upon the presumption in favor of a proper discharge by an officer of his official duty. This is a branch of, or closely allied to, the broader presumption that every man obeys the mandates of the law and performs all of his official and social duties. 4 Wig. Ev. § 2534; Doe ex dem. Truluck v. Peeples, 1 Ga. 5, infra. But that presumption, as to nonofficial persons, has never been carried to the extent of taking the place of necessary evidence of matters in pais. As to officers, the presumption is somewhat stronger, partly, no doubt, because more specific duties are imposed upon them by law, and partly because they are sworn and commissioned to discharge such duties. The law authorizing the recording of deeds in this state is somewhat different from that in force in many other states. It declares that, "in order to authorize the record of a deed to realty or personalty, if executed in this state, it must be attested by a judge of a court of record of this state, or a justice of the peace, or notary public, or clerk of the superior court, in the county in which the three last-mentioned officers respectively hold their appointments; or if subsequent to its execution the deed is acknowledged in the presence of either of the named officers, that fact, certified on the deed by such officer, shall entitle it to be recorded." Civ. Code 1895, § 3620. This section of the Code provides two modes under which a deed may be recorded: First, if it be "attested" by any of the officers named; second, if it be acknowledged in the presence of such an officer. Section 3623 provides that, "if a deed is neither attested by, nor acknowledged before, either of the officers aforesaid, it may be admitted to record upon the affidavit of a subscribing witness, before either of the above named officers, testifying to the execution of the deed and its attestation according to law." The rule in many other states is to require an acknowledgment before a designated officer, and not merely that the instrument be "attested."

If there were an acknowledgment of a signature as genuine, a different question would be presented. Of course, the presumption is that such certificate of acknowledgment is true. When, likewise, the officer signs a statement that he saw the grantor sign, seal, and deliver a deed, the presumption is that that is true, unless the contrary appears. But if it be established by the evidence to the satisfaction of the jury that in fact the grantor did not sign the deed personally, the presumption of the discharge of official duty by the attesting officer will not suffice to prove that the grantor authorized some other person to sign the deed for him either in his presence or in his absence. That is an affirmative fact to be established by proof, not a matter in which a presumption of discharge of duty by an officer can take the place of evidence. None of the authorities cited in support of that position go to such an extent, and we have found none which do so. In Doe ex dem. Truluck v. Peeples, 1 Ga. 3, a deed had the attesting clause, "Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of," and was signed by the grantor, with his mark, and by two attesting witnesses. Immediately under these signatures were the words, "Acknowledged in the presence of me," followed by the signature of a justice of the peace. It was held that, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, the presumption was that the acknowledgment before the magistrate was made where the deed itself purported to have been executed. In Rushin v. Shields & Ball, 11 Ga. 636, 56 Am. Dec. 436, a deed was probated for record by a subscribing witness, who made affidavit that he saw the grantor sign and seal that deed for the purposes therein named, and that he saw also the other subscribing witnesses sign. It was held that this was not a sufficient proof of delivery and execution to authorize the deed to be recorded. And see Stanley v. Suggs, 23 Ga. 137.

In Dinkins v. Moore, 17 Ga. 62, a deed concluded with the statement that the grantor had thereto set his hand and seal, and had delivered the property by the symbolic tradition of a penknife. Below this were the words, "In the presence of," followed by the signature of two witnesses, one of whom was a justice of the peace. It was held that the deed was sufficiently attested to admit it to record, "and the conclusion of law, from this general form of attestation, is that the subscribing witnesses saw the grantor sign, seal, and deliver the deed, for the purposes therein mentioned." In the opinion the case was distinguished from that of Rushin v. Shields & Ball, supra, by saying: "To make the cases parallel, the form of attestation in the deed before us should have been signed and sealed in our presence, or in the presence of, etc. The inference would then have been that the subscribing witnesses did not see the deed delivered." The opinion concluded with the following general statements: "Our opinion is that, under such an attestation clause, if neither of the witnesses be an officer, any one of them may prove its execution by making the usual oath; and, if one of them be a magistrate, the officer appointed by law to perform this duty, the conclusion of law is that he saw the instrument legally executed—that is, signed, sealed, and delivered." Considering this in the light of the facts, it was equivalent to saying that a certificate which in effect stated that the magistrate saw the grantor set his hand and seal to the paper and deliver it was presumptively true. In Highfield v. Phelps, 53 Ga. 59, it was held by two judges that, if one of the attesting witnesses to a deed be a magistrate, the presumption of law is that he saw the instrument legally executed—that is, signed, sealed, and delivered—so as to authorize the same to be admitted to record. Warner, C. J., cited Dinkins v. Moore, supra, as authority for this position, though in the case then being considered there was no statement of delivery.

Perhaps, on the theory that a complete execution includes delivery, the attestation by a proper officer of "the execution" of a deed may include its delivery. The writer, however, would suggest that it may be doubted whether there is any law which imposes upon the officer the duty of seeing that a deed which he attests is actually delivered to the grantor; and it is common knowledge that a very large part of the instruments which are signed before and attested by an officer are not in fact then delivered to the other party, and some of them are never delivered. Due attestation by an authorized officer and another witness will suffice to admit a deed to record, and by that decision this is true, even without the use of the word "delivered." The record itself is evidence of delivery. Stallings v. Newton, 110 Ga. 875, 36 S. E. 227. But the decision in Highfield's Case does not extend to presuming any such state of facts as is now sought to be covered by a presumption. In Granniss v. Irvin, 39 Ga. 22, a deed appeared on its face to be regularly attested; one of the witnesses being a justice of the peace. The ink used in writing his name was different from that used in writing other parts of the paper, and on the back of the deed were the words of an affidavit for probating it, but not executed. The deed was recorded. When offered in evidence, objection was made on the ground that the circumstances mentioned indicated that the justice had signed the deed at a time different from that of its original execution. This court held that it was admissible. McCay, J., said: "The presumption of law is that the magistrate signed it in the county and at the time appearing on the face of the deed. Prima facie, also, the signatures are genuine. The deed appearing to be properly attested and admitted to record, the presumptions are in its favor." None of these cases deal with any presumption of a signing for the grantor by another in his presence and at his request.

In Walker v. Logan, 75 Ga. 759, an affidavit of forgery was made, and the issue tried separately. The jury found the deed to be a forgery, and this verdict was sustained. The only facts mentioned by Jackson, C. J., who delivered the opinion, were that the deed was executed in 1835, and not recorded till 1883, which he said was a very strong evidence or circumstance of want of genuineness, "and the fact that the grantor could not write his name, which is in writing on the deed, is stronger—I had almost said conclusive—evidence of forgery, and the additional evidence that he swears by interrogatories, signed only by his cross-mark, that he did not sign or make any such deed, would seem to clinch the truth of the verdict which pronounced it a forgery. On the other side, to overcome this overwhelming evidence is testimony that the witnesses delivering it on the stand believe that the handwriting of the two dead witnesses to the deed is genuine. It is a feather weighing in scales against a ton of iron." In the present case there was no affidavit of forgery; but to rule otherwise than we do would result in holding that absolute proof, satisfactory to the jury, that the grantor could not sign his name, and therefore did not do so, would not at all suffice to rebut a mere presumption arising from the attestation of a notary public. This would seem to reverse the idea of Chief Justice Jackson, and hold that proof that the grantor could not write was a feather of evidence weighing in the scales against a ton of presumption.

The trial judge charged, in effect, that if the jury believed that the purported grantor could not, and therefore did not, write his name, whether or not he authorized some other person to do so was not a matter of presumption. We think he charged correctly. The views of Justice ATKINSON in regard to the charge quoted above are as follows:

The charge has reference to a deed conveying land with the name of the grantor signed thereto and attested by two witnesses (one of whom was an officer authorized by law to attest deeds), and duly recorded. No affidavit of forgery was made under Civ. Code 1895, § 3628, so as to cast the burden of proving the genuineness of the deed upon the party relying on it. Such a deed was admissible in evidence without further proof of its execution, and all presumptions were in favor of its genuineness. Grannis v. Irvin, 39 Ga. 22, 24. The attesting clause recited, "Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of" the witnesses. If the grantor did not sign with his own hand, but stood by and directed another to sign for him, and it was signed in his presence, such act of signing would not in law be the act of an agent, but would be signing by the grantor. Ellis v. Francis, 9 Ga. 325; Vickers v. Hawkins, 128 Ga. 794, 799, 58 S. E. 44. In dealing with this rule the Supreme Court of Massachusetts at an early date, in the case of Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 483, 484, 52 Am. Dec. 740, Chief Justice Shaw, rendering the opinion, among other things said: "The name being written by another hand, in the presence of the grantor and at her request, is her act. The disposing capacity, the act of mind, which are the essential and efficient ingredients of the deed, are hers, and she merely uses the hand of another, through incapacity or weakness, instead of her own, to do the physical act of making a written sign. * * * To hold otherwise would be to decide that a person having a clear mind and full capacity, but through physical inability incapable of making a mark, could never make a conveyance or execute a deed; for the same incapacity to sign and seal the principal deed would prevent him from executing a letter of attorney under seal." See, also, Devlin on Deeds, §§ 232, 233; Jones on Law of Real Property in Conveyancing, §§ 1014, 1015. In the light of the rule above announced, the attesting certificate quoted from the deed now under consideration would not be inappropriate, although the deed was not signed by the grantor himself, but by another in his presence, at his request. The fact that the grantor could not write would not contradict the certificate; nor would it necessarily follow, merely because the grantor could not write, that the signature to the deed was placed there improperly, or was a forgery.

There was no attempt to show that the signature of the attesting officer was forged. It stands unchallenged and prima facie genuine. All the presumptions are in favor of his having done his duty. Scott v. McDaniel, 64 Ga. 780; Wiggins v. Gillette, 93 Ga. 22, 19 S. E. 86, 44 Am. St. Rep. 123; Kirk v. State, 73 Ga. 628; City Council of Augusta v. Pearce, 79 Ga. 100, 4 S. E. 104; McRae v. Adams, 36 Ga. 444; Throop on Pub. Off. § 558; Ford v. Ford, 27 App. D. C. 401, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 442, 7 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 245, and notes at page 250. If he did his duty, he would not have placed his signature to the attestation of the deed, unless it had been executed by the grantor in such manner as to have made the act of signing the deed the act of the grantor himself. Conceding the genuineness of the signature of the attesting officer, to hold that he was derelict in duty in the manner contended for would in effect be to impeach his official act by a mere circumstance which did not necessarily conflict with what his signature purported to attest. The circumstance relied on to impeach the verity of the officer's certificate, namely, that the grantor could not write, is at most equivocal, and is consistent with either the theory that the instrument is a forgery or that it is genuine. To impeach the certificate of the officer there should be no equivocation, but the evidence should affirmatively and necessarily contradict it. All the presumptions being in favor of this duly recorded deed, there is a presumption that it was the genuine deed of the grantor, and it was inaccurate for the judge to instruct the jury as a matter of law that the presumption in favor of the genuineness of the deed was destroyed by mere proof of the fact that the grantor could not write. Such in effect was the charge of the court to which exception was taken.

In the case of Walker v. Logan, 75 Ga. 759, 760, Jackson, Chief Justice, said: "The verdict that the deed is a forgery, and not the genuine deed of the grantor, is supported by the evidence. The fact that, though executed in 1835, it was not recorded until 1883—nearly a half century thereafter—is a very strong evidence or circumstance of want of genuineness; and the fact that the grantor could not write his name, which is in writing on the deed, is stronger—I had almost said conclusive—evidence of the forgery." This language imports that the writer, though giving great weight to the circumstance, did not consider the fact of the grantor's inability to write sufficient to prove forgery "conclusively," so as to authorize the court to take the question from the jury and decide it as a matter of law. Moreover, in that case an affidavit of forgery was filed, under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3628, which, under the ruling in Holland v. Carter, 79 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 690, cast the onus upon the party relying on the deed to prove its genuineness.

The case of Anderson v. Cuthbert, 103 Ga. 767, 30 S. E. 244, referred to a paper (a certificate dated January 10, 1891), which was not the foundation of the action, and was not attested by an officer, and was not recorded or entitled to record, so as to authorize its introduction in evidence without proof of execution. Dealing with the question of forgery relative to that paper, it was said by Little, J. (page 773 of 103 Ga., page 246 of 30 S. E.): "The law presumes nothing whatever until the signature to the instrument is proven genuine. This being done, the law then presumes that the instrument in all its parts is genuine also, when there are no indications to be found upon it to rebut such a presumption." As the paper there under consideration was not recorded or attested by an officer authorized by law to attest deeds, there was no question before the court which authorized a ruling relative to presumptions in favor of the acts of public officers or presumptions relative to the genuineness of duly recorded deeds attested by an officer authorized by law to witness deeds. The language of the court in dealing with the law of presumptions is somewhat equivocal; but, as it was obiter, its construction is not of supreme importance in the present case.

7. The defendant requested the court to give in charge certain instructions. The substance of all of them was that if Hiram Waller had several heirs or descendants, and if only four of his sons and daughters joined in an effort to convey his title as being his heirs, and under this deed a chain of conveyances came down to the plaintiffs, they acquired no more than the interest which the four heirs of Waller could convey, and in no event could recover more than that. There was no error in refusing these requests. The plaintiffs relied, not merely upon a paper chain of title, but also upon prescriptive title and prior possession. In so far as their claim of title rested upon a paper chain, they could only recover what that chain conveyed to them; but, in so far as it rested upon prescription or prior possession, it was possible for them to recover, although they might not have had a perfect title by the chain of conveyances to the entire estate. Where prescriptive title is claimed under possession and color of title, the color does not have to be perfect title in order to ripen by prescription. The instrument on which the prescription is based must purport to convey the title prescribed for; but, if it were essential that it should actually convey a good title, the difference between perfect title by chain and title by prescription would practically be valueless, and title and color of title would become synonymous. Street v. Collier, 118 Ga. 470, 45 S. E. 294. This is not a contest with the other descendants of Hiram Waller, or persons claiming under them; and hence no question of ouster or notice of adverse holding arises. Some of the requests to charge seem to proceed on the theory that the deed from Waller's heirs purported to convey a fractional part of the lot. But such was not the case.

8. One ground of the motion for new trial was that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence. As the case must be returned for a new trial, we deem it best not to discuss the evidence further than to say that a careful examination of it as contained in the record falls to show sufficient facts to authorize a finding of $445 for expenses of litigation. See Civ. Code 1895, § 3796. Whether or not some of the deeds in the chain of title under which he claimed were forgeries, the evidence did not make such a case against Hansen as authorized a recovery for expenses of litigation. It was urged that, if the verdict for attorney's fees and expenses was not authorized, this portion of the finding was not specially signaled out and complained of. But we cannot say that a verdict is sustained in whole by the evidence if some part of it is not so sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WRIGHT v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON. (No. 1,282.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. COURTS (§ 217*)—JURISDICTION—COURT OF APPEALS — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ORDINANCE.

The Court of Appeals has full power and authority to determine whether municipal ordinances are unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 11*)—POWER TO CONTROL—CONFLICTING REGULATIONS BY STATE AND MUNICIPALITY.

The General Assembly having by the general tax act expressed and established the general policy of the state with reference to the existence of "locker clubs," a municipal ordinance, inconsistent with the general policy of the state as declared by the Legislature, is void. Unless it is shown that intoxicating liquors are sold by the club or its employes, the mere assembling of liquors in a bona fide private club (whose membership is not open to the public at large) cannot be controlled by municipal regulation, if the tax imposed by the state has been paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

3. CLUBS (§ 1*)—NATURE AND STATUS.

A club is defined to be an association of individuals for pleasure or profit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Clubs, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1235.]

4. WORDS AND PHRASES—"LAW."

The word "law" does not ordinarily include a municipal ordinance.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

C. R. Wright was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Macon for violation of the "locker ordinance" of that city. He excepted by certiorari to the superior court, and, the certiorari having been dismissed, brings error. Reversed.

B. C. Jones and John P. Ross, for plaintiff in error. C. H. Hall, Jr., and N. E. Harris, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the recorder's court of the violation of what is called in the record the "locker ordinance." This ordinance is as follows:

"Be it ordained by the mayor and council of the city of Macon, and it is hereby ordained by the authority of same:

"Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any club, corporation, or association of persons, or number of persons, in this city, whether incorporated or otherwise, to keep or to permit to be kept, in any room or place, or in any place connected therewith directly or indirectly, in which the members of such club, corporation, association of persons, or number of persons assemble or frequent, any alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication.

"Sec. 2. Be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that any person, member, officer, agent or servant of any such club, corporation, or association, or other number of persons violating the provisions of this ordinance, upon being arrested, tried, and convicted before the recorder, shall be punished as provided in the act creating the recorder's court of the city of Macon, and the amendments thereto; and that each day in which this ordinance shall be violated by any person or persons shall be held and deemed a separate offense."

The case was submitted to the recorder's court upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America was organized in the city of New York in May, 1868, and since its organization has been in continuous existence throughout the United States. Beginning as a voluntary fraternal association, lodges of the order were organized in various cities in various states of the Union, which lodges created and established, by mutual consent and voluntary allegiance, a supreme governing body of the order, known and designated as the Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, and as such fraternal order was incorporated by an act of the Senate and Assembly of the state of New York on March 10, 1871. On June 19, 1895, said order of Elks filed articles of incorporation in the District of Columbia, pursuant to the laws of the United States, providing for the filing of such articles of incorporation by fraternal associations. The objects of said order of Elks are, to inculcate the principles of charity, justice, brotherly love, and fidelity, to promote the welfare and enhance the happiness of its members, to quicken the spirit of American patriotism, to cultivate good fellowship, and to perpetuate itself as a fraternal organization. By its laws it is provided that a subordinate lodge of the order may establish and maintain a club for the social enjoyment of its members, bearing the name of the order, and subject to the limitations and restrictions provided by the laws of the order; and it is provided by its laws that the membership of such club shall be limited exclusively to members in good standing in the lodge establishing and maintaining such club, and that such club shall be managed and controlled by the officers or trustees of the lodge, or by a house committee appointed by the presiding officer of the lodge for that purpose, under such rules and regulations as may be adopted by the lodge and approved by the committee on judiciary of the Grand Lodge.

"Macon Lodge, No. 230, of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America was organized in the city of Macon, Ga., in March, 1892, by authority of and pursuant to the laws of said order of Elks, as adopted and promulgated by said Grand Lodge of said order, and since said date has maintained a continuous existence in said city by virtue of a charter granted to it by said Grand Lodge, and under and subject to the laws of said Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America. Pursuant to the laws of said fraternal order, the said Macon Lodge established, and for many years past has continuously maintained, a club in said city of Macon, which has been and now is known as the 'Elks' Club,' which club is maintained for the social enjoyment of the members of said Macon Lodge. The said Macon Lodge, for more than two years last past, has occupied and now occupies the entire seventh floor of what is known as the 'Grand Building,' on Mulberry street, in said city of Macon, the same being the topmost floor of said building, by absolute lease from the owner of said building, for its lodge room and club quarters, in which leased premises, to wit, the room on the seventh floor of said Grand Building, the members of said Macon Lodge assemble, frequenting at will the said lodge room and club quarters under the laws, rules, and regulations of said order of Elks and said Macon Lodge for the government of the same.

"No male persons are now or ever have been authorized or permitted to enter, assemble in, or frequent the rooms and premises of said Elks' Club, except members in good standing of said Macon Lodge, No. 230, and members in good standing in other subordinate lodges of said Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America (there being no other lodge of said order in Bibb county, except said Macon Lodge), and residents outside of the county of Bibb, who, by special invitation of some member of said Macon Lodge, may by such member be carried to said quarters of said Elks' Club and granted temporarily the social privileges thereof. No member of the lodge is permitted to invite or carry any male citizen of Bibb county to said lodge and club quarters not a member of the lodge. Any member of said Macon Lodge may invite or carry any lady relative or friend to the parlor and reading room of said club, and to the lodge room when the lodge is not in session. The employed servants of said Macon Lodge of Elks and its club are authorized and permitted to be and to serve in said Elks' Club quarters, but not to enjoy any of the privileges of said club, and said servants are subject to the control and discipline of the house committee of said club, under the rules and regulations governing the same.

"On the 4th day of February, 1908, the said Macon Lodge No. 230 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, having theretofore caused said Elks' Club to be registered with the ordinary of Bibb county, and paid to the tax collector of said Bibb county $500 for special tax as required by the law of Georgia, did permit members of its said Elks' Club, which membership is limited exclusively to members in good standing in said lodge, to keep in a room and place forming a part of and connected directly with the aforesaid leased premises of said Macon Lodge and its club, on the seventh floor of said Grand Building, in the city of Macon, in which the members of said lodge and club are accustomed to assemble, alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication. And certain members of said lodge and club, pursuant to said permission, did, on the date aforesaid, keep such liquors, bitters, and drinks in the place aforesaid for their own private use and control. The defendant knew of, and, as a member of said lodge, took part in granting, and assented to the grant of, said permission, and has knowledge that some members availed themselves of said permission. Such liquors were the private, personal property of each member of said lodge and club who saw fit to keep them, by the permission aforesaid, in the premises leased, occupied, and controlled by said lodge and club as aforesaid, and were so kept as to be readily identified and distinguished as the individual property of the member placing same there. No such liquors or bitters were sold or permitted to be sold or kept for sale in or about said club and lodge quarters, either directly or indirectly by any persons to any person.

"On the date aforesaid, when said members were permitted to keep and did keep such liquors as their own private personal property and for their own private personal use in the premises as aforesaid, the said defendant, C. R. Wright, was a member and officer of said Macon Lodge No. 230 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, being secretary of said lodge, and was a member of said Elks' Club."

The recorder found the plaintiff in error guilty, and he excepted by certiorari to the superior court. Upon hearing the certiorari was dismissed. In the petition for certiorari error is assigned upon the ground that the ordinance passed by the mayor and council of the city of Macon, for the violation of which the plaintiff was convicted, is unconstitutional, illegal, and void:

(a) Because the mayor and council of the city of Macon had no corporate or charter right, power, or authority to pass said ordinance, and the state has not granted such power to said municipal corporation, nor is the power to pass said ordinance incident to any power which has been granted to said municipal corporation.

(b) Because said ordinance is contrary to the public policy of the state of Georgia, as shown by the laws of the state duly enacted, and seeks to take from the petitioner and his associates and fellow citizens a right expressly granted by the state in section 2, subd. 47, of the general tax act, approved August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 35).

(c) The ordinance seeks to take from the state the power to raise revenue.

(d) The state, by general law, has regulated places where and upon what conditions in intoxicating liquors may be kept, and has levied and provided for the collection of a tax upon every club, corporation, or association of persons who shall keep or permit to be kept any intoxicating liquors in any place connected directly or indirectly with any room or place in which the members of such club, corporation, or association assemble or frequent. And the said municipal corporation has no power, right, or authority to prohibit the keeping of intoxicating liquors in conformity to the general law of the state, and has no power, right, or authority to amend or annul the said general law of the state.

(e) The ordinance is not a reasonable exercise of police power of said municipal corporation, and the right to pass the aforesaid ordinance is not within the police power granted to said municipal corporation by the state, and there is no evidence or facts in the record to indicate that said ordinance was or is necessary for the preservation of health, good order, and morals in said city of Macon.

(f) The ordinance is contrary to the Constitution of the state of Georgia, and to the preamble of said Constitution, which provides that said Constitution is ordained to perpetuate the principle of free government and transmit to posterity the enjoyment of liberty; whereas said ordinance violates the principles of free government and strikes down the liberty of American freemen.

(g) The ordinance is contrary to article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of said state of Georgia, which provides that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by any existing general law. Petitioner shows that provision has been made by existing general law for the places where, and the conditions under which, intoxicating liquors may be kept in said city of Macon, and the said ordinance seeks to vary and annul said existing general law.

(h) The ordinance is contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no state shall make or enforce any law that shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and, a fortiori, that no municipal corporation shall make or enforce any such law. The petitioner further excepts to the judgment and sentence as contrary to the evidence and contrary to law, because the sentence is excessive and unjust, and violates article 1, § 1, par. 9, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, and the eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

1. It is unnecessary to certify to the Supreme Court any question involving the constitutionality of the ordinance under which Wright was convicted, because this court, by the terms of the constitutional amendment creating it, has full power to determine the constitutionality of any law or ordinance which does not involve "the construction of a provision of the Constitution of this state or of the United States, or the Constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly." The constitutionality of municipal ordinances can be determined by this court as well as by the Supreme Court.

2. The general question raised in this case is whether a social club shall be permitted to keep intoxicating liquors, the private property of its members, for their own use, at a place which is neither a public house nor a place of business. We do not know that a club may not have a place of business. We do not pass upon this question, because it is not involved in the present case; for, if it is a public place of business, the state, and not the city of Macon, would have sole jurisdiction to deal with the offense, if any was committed. A club is defined to be an association of individuals for pleasure or profit. Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34. In Eichbaum v. Irons, 6 Watts & S. (Pa.) 67, 69, 40 Am. Dec. 540, it was held that "a club is a definite association organized for indefinite existence; not an ephemeral meeting for a particular occasion, to be lost in a crowd at its dissolution." The rules applicable to such private clubs as keep on hand intoxicating liquors for the use of their membership have been discussed by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Commonwealth v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144, and Commonwealth v. Pomphret, 137 Mass. 564, 50 Am. Rep. 340.

In the latter case, Judge Field, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The word 'club' has no very definite meaning. Clubs are formed for all sorts of purposes, and there is no uniformity in their constitutions and rules. It is well known that clubs exist which limit the number of the members and select them with great care, which own considerable property in common, and in which the furnishing of food and drink to the members for money is but one of many conveniences which the members enjoy. If a club were really formed solely or mainly for the purpose of furnishing intoxicating liquors to its members, and any person could become a member by purchasing tickets which would entitle the holder to receive such intoxicating liquors as he called for, upon a valuation determined by the club, the organization itself might show that it was the intention to sell intoxicating liquors to any person who offered to buy, and the sale of what might be called a temporary membership in the club, with a sale of the liquors, would not substantially change the character of the transaction. One inquiry always is whether the organization is bona fide a club with limited membership, into which admission cannot be obtained by any person at his pleasure, and in which the property is actually owned in common, with the mutual rights and obligations which belong to such common ownership, under the constitution and rules of the club, or whether either the form of a club has been adopted for other purposes, with the intention and understanding that the mutual rights and obligations of the members shall not be such as the organization purports to create, or a mere name has been assumed without any real organization behind it."

In the Smith Case, supra, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts ruled that "if the liquors really belonged to the members of the club, and had been previously purchased by them, or on their account, of some person other than the defendant, and if he merely kept the liquors for them, and to be divided among them according to a previously arranged system, these facts would not justify the jury in finding that he kept and maintained a nuisance, within the meaning of the statute under which he is indicted. There would be neither selling nor keeping for sale. On the other hand, if the whole keeping were a mere evasion, and the substance of the transaction were a lending of money to the defendant, that he might buy intoxicating liquors to be afterwards sold and charged to the associates, or if he was authorized to sell, or did sell, or keep any of the liquors with intent to sell, to any persons not members of the club, he might well be convicted."

There is nothing in the agreed statement of facts to show that the Elks' Club room at Macon was other than a private place. Clearly, then, this club would come under the provisions of subdivision 47 of section 2 of the tax act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 35), unless the mayor and council of the city of Macon has power to supersede, exclude, or annul, by ordinance, that provision of law. By the tax act of 1907, supra, the Legislature levied a tax "upon every club, corporation, or association of persons who shall keep or permit to be kept in any room or place, or any place connected therewith directly or indirectly, in which the members of such club, corporation or association assemble or frequent, any intoxicating liquors, the sum of five hundred dollars." The Elks' Club of Macon, according to the agreed statement of facts above quoted, kept and permitted to be kept intoxicating liquors in a "place connected" with the "place in which the members of the club assembled or frequented," and it is admitted that the tax of $500 has been paid. The simple question raised, therefore, is whether the license of the state, for which the fee of $500 has been paid, or the ordinance of the city forbidding this assembling of liquors, shall prevail.

The city of Macon is but the creature of the state. All its powers of legislation are the gift of the sovereign state, and each and every power conveyed may be withdrawn at the pleasure of the state. But for the passage of the license tax by the state there could be no question in our minds that the mayor and council of the City of Macon, under the provisions of the charter, could have adopted the ordinance in question. The general welfare clause of the charter of Macon vests the mayor and council with "full power and authority from time to time to make and establish such rules and ordinances * * * as they shall deem requisite and proper for the security, welfare, health, and convenience of the city, and for preserving the peace, order, and good government of the same." It is now universally recognized that regulation of the liquor traffic, even amounting to total prohibition, is but the exercise of police power. It is likewise recognized that municipal corporations, in the exercise of police power, may pass ordinances in aid of the criminal statutes of the state, and, following the trend of the state's general policy, may extend them to subject-matters not included within the exact terms of the state's legislation; that is to say, that the municipal corporation, in aiding the state to carry out its general policy upon a certain subject-matter, may reach and control matters which have not been dealt with by the state. It is evident that the general policy of the state, in the passage of the general prohibition act of 1907, was to stop, or at least to decrease, the drinking of intoxicating liquor; and, the ordinance of the City of Macon now before us being in aid of that general policy, we think it could be extended to preventing the assembling of liquors at a place where drinking, instead of being decreased, would be increased, although the possession and property right in such liquors was legal, and the place at which such liquors were assembled was not a public place; and, although it is always to be borne in mind that delegated powers are to be strictly construed and reasonably exercised, we think the passage of the ordinance in question by the Mayor and Council of the city of Macon, prohibiting the assembling of intoxicating liquors at clubs, is not an unreasonable exercise of the police power, and is fully warranted by the general welfare clause which we have quoted above.

It was insisted on the argument that the purchase and the possession of intoxicating liquors for private use by the citizen is an inalienable right, and that the same right would exist as to a number of citizens lawfully assembled and not otherwise acting in conflict with the provisions of the prohibition law. Without expressing our individual views upon this subject, the argument is plainly answered by the opinion in Plumb v. Christie, 103 Ga. 692, 30 S. E. 759, 42 L. R. A. 181. In that case, the lamented Justice Lewis, delivering the opinion of the court, uses the following striking language to enforce an irresistible argument: "It is idle, in a court of law created for the purpose of declaring legal principles or passing upon legal rights of litigants at issue, to discuss 'inherent and inalienable rights,' supposed to exist in the enlightened conscience or consciousness of mankind, yet undefined by any rule known to the organic or statute laws of a state. In discussing the validity of an act passed by the legislative branch of the government, no light can be gathered by an attempt to show that it contravenes the general purpose for which a free government is established. In all independent states and nations absolute power rests somewhere. In this country it is neither lodged with the executive, nor the legislative, nor the judicial branches of the government nor with all combined; but sovereignty rests with the people of the several states. The ultimate source of legislative power is traceable to them; and in their sovereign capacity they have a right to frame laws for their own government, and for the regulation of human conduct on all matters over which exclusive power has not by them been delegated to the federal government. Acting in their organized capacity, and under the forms of existing laws, they can rend assunder all bonds that are thrown as restraint around individual action, unbridle liberty, and make license as free as the winds of heaven and as wild as the waves of the sea. They can, on the other hand, so frame their organic and statute laws as to place upon their own necks a yoke as galling as ever serf carried under the edict of a despot. It is eminently in this sense that we live under a free government, which simply means a government created by the people, and which they are absolutely free to change or modify at their pleasure. It is worse than useless, then, for the courts to undertake to pass upon the validity of a statute by an inquiry as to whether or not it is just or oppressive. To enter into such a field of investigation would be like embarking upon the sea without rudder or compass. A law is not necessarily unconstitutional or otherwise invalid because it is unjust. We live under a constitutional government and written laws; and the courts can enforce only such rights as they protect, and remedy such wrongs as they redress." This authority binds this court.

It was held in Fears v. State, 102 Ga. 279, 29 S. E. 463, that a municipal corporation could not pass an ordinance which would destroy all rights in property legally held in possession, by making it unlawful to hold it; and in Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 373, 34 S. E. 590, 47 L. R. A. 366, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384, it was held that the general welfare clause in a municipal charter did not authorize the passage of an ordinance making it penal to receive alcoholic liquors, legally purchased, unless the specific tax for so receiving was paid. Both of these cases originated in prohibition counties. In the Fears Case it was sought to enjoin the sheriff from selling, under judicial process, a stock of liquors which had been levied upon under a mortgage foreclosure. The reasoning of the court bears some similarity to that by which we are controlled in the present case; that is, that the general sovereign power of the state to control cannot be affected by the provisions of enactments affecting merely inferior subdivisions of the state. The decision in the Henderson Case, supra, is not applicable in the present instance, because in that case the court was dealing with the fact that no law had been passed which prohibited the purchase of intoxicating liquors. Since the decision in the Henderson Case the general prohibition law of 1907 has been passed, designed, as we have stated above, to prevent, as far as possible, the evil of social drinking; and we therefore conceive that an ordinance which prevents the assembling of liquors for drinking purposes is in accord with the general trend of the state's policy, as evidenced by the state prohibition law, and is directed more towards the method in which intoxicating liquor is used than designed to affect the intrinsic private property right in such liquor.

A statute prohibiting the citizen from carrying a pistol concealed, or from carrying a pistol to a public gathering, is not violative of the constitutional right of every citizen to have and bear arms. The state, either itself directly, or by the delegation of appropriate powers to municipalities, may prescribe the regulations under which the property right in whisky or any other form of property may be exercised, without infringing upon the property right in such articles. Nay, the state may go further, as a matter of police regulation, in carrying out its paramount duty of protecting the peace, good order, and dignity of its citizens, and prohibit altogether the exercise of a property right in such articles as it adjudges to be dangerous to the welfare of its citizens. This is the theory of the decision to which we have referred; but it is unnecessary for us to decide at this time how far this ruling is applicable, for the reason that by the tax act of 1907 the Legislature took from the city the power to regulate clubs and associations, that might permit their members to have and use intoxicating liquors at their meeting places, by expressly licensing such clubs and authorizing them to do the very things prohibited by this city ordinance. The general prohibition law (Acts 1907, p. 82) is exclusive of municipal legislation upon the subject of where liquor may not be kept, so far as it deals with the subject; and the Legislature having adopted certain specific regulations, the power was taken from the city of doing more than aiding the state in the enforcement of these regulations.

The prohibition law covers (1) the sale or barter of intoxicating liquors; (2) the giving away of such liquors to induce trade at the place of business; (3) the keeping or furnishing them at any public place; (4) the manufacture; (5) the keeping on hand at the place of business of the owner. The city could not punish for a violation of the prohibition law in any of these five respects, because the power of the state to deal with them has been exclusively retained. In this state of the law, we think a municipal corporation might have imposed regulations as to the keeping of liquors at private places, in the exercise of their police power, and perhaps it may still do so, provided the private place is not one of the clubs mentioned in subdivision 47 of section 2 of the tax act of 1907. Having passed a general prohibition bill, which did not deal with intoxicating liquors in a private place, the Legislature proceeded to deal with that subject in a tax act, as we have stated above, expressly licensing the assembling of liquors at certain places designated. This was tantamount to a withdrawal from all of the subdivisions of the state of the right to enforce any prohibitory ordinance in conflict with the policy declared by the state in the tax act, because no local exception was expressed. "The courts will not infer that the Legislature intends to authorize a local departure from the general policy of the state, unless the local exception is expressed in specific terms. Sanders v. Butler, 30 Ga. 679; Ordinary of Baldwin County v. Retailers, etc., 42 Ga. 325; Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 53 S. E. 335; Watson v. Thomson, 116 Ga. 549, 42 S. E. 747, 59 L. R. A. 602, 94 Am. St. Rep. 137; Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 378, 380, 34 S. E. 590, 47 L. R. A. 386, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384; Fears v. State, 102 Ga. 274, 29 S. E. 463; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 378, 380.

In the Watson Case, supra, the court deals fully with the principle that a municipal corporation, under the general welfare clause of its charter, may pass ordinances in aid of the enforcement of state laws, and yet that it is not to be presumed that the General Assembly intended that the general welfare clause, though broad in its terms, should be construed as authority for the municipal corporation to interfere with one doing something lawful for him to do under a settled policy of the state, expressed in its laws. By the imposition of the $500 tax upon clubs the state declared its policy with reference to such keeping of liquor as is dealt with in the tax act; and any departure from this policy must commence with the General Assembly itself, either by direct law to this effect, or by granting some subordinate public corporation express authority to make such departure.

Counsel for the defendant in error recognized the force of this principle, and contended that the express authority to pass the ordinance in question is conveyed by the proviso contained in the tax act. The proviso to subdivision 47, quoted above, is in these words: "Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to license or permit the keeping of any intoxicating liquors in any place now prohibited by law or which may hereafter be prohibited by law." The contention of counsel for the defendant in error is that the prohibition contained in the ordinance of the city of Macon in question is prohibition by law within the terms and meaning of the proviso in the tax act. We cannot concur in this contention. It is clear that the Legislature, in providing that the license specified in the tax act should not permit the keeping of intoxicating liquors in any place now prohibited, referred to those places, mentioned in the prohibition act, to which we have adverted—public places and places of business, these being the only places where the keeping of liquor was prohibited—and that the concluding clause, referring to places which may hereafter be prohibited by law, was an expression on the part of the Legislature of its reservation of the right hereafter to prohibit the keeping of intoxicating liquors at such additional places as it might see fit.

The contention that municipal ordinances are necessarily included or intended by the use of the word "law," in the proviso to the tax act, cannot be sustained. Ordinances are mere rules or by-laws of a municipal corporation. In Bearden v. Madison, 73 Ga. 184, it was held that the ordinances referred to had the force of laws, and yet they are distinguished from the law of the land. As stated by Blackstone, any rule of conduct is, in one sense, a law. But it cannot be presumed that the Legislature, in using the word "law," in the proviso to subdivision 47 of section 2 of the tax act, had in mind the by-laws of a municipality, any more than it was considering the laws of nature; for the courts do not take judicial cognizance of municipal ordinances. Mayson v. Atlanta, 77 Ga. 663 (5). If the courts are not presumed to know the municipal ordinances of the various municipalities, can it be presumed that the Legislature knew? And, if not, can it be presumed that the Legislature had them in mind? And if the Legislature intended municipal ordinances to conflict with the tax regulations which it was passing, and intended to except such municipalities as saw fit to prohibit all keeping of intoxicating liquors for any purpose whatever, we are of the opinion that the Legislature would have added to the word "law," in the proviso, the words, "or by the municipal ordinances of any city or town in this state," so that the proviso would have read, "provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to license or permit the keeping of any intoxicating liquors in any place now prohibited by law, or which may hereafter be prohibited by law, or by the ordinance of any city or town in this state." In Haywood v. Savannah, 12 Ga. 410, Judge Lumpkin said: "If, then, the act of 1809 (Laws 1801-1810, p. 540) is not repealed, either directly or by implication, by the act of 1849 (Laws 1849-50, p. 88), surely it will not be seriously contended that such a construction should be put upon the general powers granted to this corporation under the latter act as would enable them to repeal, by an ordinance, a law of the state. We deny the right of the Legislature to confer such a power upon a subordinate authority." It is held that "the General Assembly cannot confer upon a corporation the power by ordinance to repeal a statute of the state. A by-law of a corporation, repugnant to the Constitution, or common or statute law of the state, is void." Id. 405 (5).

We cite this for the reason that it affords additional ground for supposing that the Legislature did not intend municipal ordinances, when the term "law" was used in the ordinance. That the word "law" does not ordinarily include municipal ordinances, see 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 947; 29 Cent. Dig. 834, § 122; Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga. 513; Mabra v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 679, 4 S. E. 154; Haywood v. Savannah, supra. In Hill v. Dalton, 72 Ga. 319, where the right of trial by jury was being insisted upon in a trial for a violation for a municipal ordinance, Chief Justice Jackson held that the right of jury trial could not be maintained, because the offense was against the city, and not against the laws of the state; thus clearly distinguishing the ordinance of the city from the law of the land, and, by implication, holding that city ordinances are not included within the term "law" as used in this state. In Mabra v. Atlanta, supra, Justice Hall draws the same distinction, and cites, as pointing out the distinction between infraction of municipal ordinances and violation of the public law. Floyd v. Commissioners, 14 Ga. 354, 58 Am. Dec. 559; Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Hussey, 21 Ga. 80, 68 Am. Dec. 452; McRae v. Americus, 59 Ga. 168, 27 Am. Rep. 390; Rothschild v. Darien, 69 Ga. 503. The Code (Pol. Code 1895, § 1) specifically declares what are the laws of this state, and the only "ordinances" mentioned are those of the convention of 1877.

Aside from any other consideration to which we have adverted, our judgment is controlled by the forty-seventh subdivision of the tax act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 35), which we have already quoted, and the decision of the Supreme Court in Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 53 S. E. 335, in which the Supreme Court, in passing upon the "bucket shop tax," said: "The licensing of the business of speculating in 'futures' does not necessarily imprint sovereign approval upon that occupation, but it enables persons who are thus permitted to engage in the business to escape the consequences which would ensue, were they warned not to pursue their calling upon peril of being subjected to a deterring penalty, to be enforced by a criminal proceeding, or both. It is undoubtedly within the province of our General Assembly to divide those who hazard their money upon chance into two distinct classes; one to be known as 'gamblers,' the others as 'financiers.' It may not be equally apparent that the interests of the commonwealth are best conserved by sending the gamster to the chain-gang and licensing the professional speculator to open a place of business and invite the public at large to there call upon him and place their bets upon the probable rise or fall in the stock market. But, be this as it may, the General Assembly has advisedly adopted, and has for many years pursued, this definite business policy, and we cannot defeat it. The general tax acts above referred to are purely revenue measures, though enforceable by penalty for failing to pay the imposed tax, as distinguished from police measures designed to regulate internal affairs. Racine Iron Co. v. McCommons, 111 Ga. 542-3, 36 S. E. 866, 51 L. R. A. 134." In support of the ruling the cases of Houghton v. State, 41 Tex. 136, Overby v. State, 18 Fla. 178, and Rodgers v. State, 26 Ala. 76, are cited.

When the Legislature, as a revenue measure, imposed a tax of $500 upon "locker clubs," and especially when attention was called, by the proviso, to the contents of the previous prohibition bill, a general policy was fixed by the General Assembly; and the courts will not infer that the Legislature intends to permit any departure on the part of the subordinate local municipal governments from the general policy which has been adopted by the state, unless the exception is specifically and expressly denominated. Sanders v. Butler, Ordinary v. Retailers, Miller v. Shropshire, Henderson v. Heyward, and Fears v. State, supra; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 378-380.

Under the ruling in Miller v. Shropshire, supra, we conclude that the Legislature, having determined that the keeping of liquors in private places should not be prohibited in the exercise of the police power inherent in the state, it determined to raise a revenue by imposing a tax on "locker clubs," and a proviso was added, making it clear that no part of the recently enacted prohibition law was intended to be repealed or modified thereby. It is idle to discuss the policy or morality of this species of legislation, because we cannot question the right or power of the lawmakers to adopt a general public policy upon any subject, even though it be "for revenue only." The trial judge erred in not sustaining the certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (specially concurring). I concur, because obedience to the spirit of the binding precedent of Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 53 S. E. 335, forbids that I should do otherwise. My personal judgment has never yielded assent to the principle of that case; for, if it means anything, it means that the state, by taxing a noxious occupation, gives such countenance to it as to amount to the state's consent for it to be conducted free from penalties which otherwise would ensue. I have always thought that the better view was expressed by Judge Cooley in Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 664. I quote this language:

"The idea that the state lends its countenance to any particular traffic by taxing it seems to us to rest upon a very transparent fallacy. It certainly overlooks or disregards some ideas that always must underlie taxation. Taxes are not favors. They are burdens. They are necessary, it is true, to the existence of the government, but they are not the less burdens, and are only submitted to because of the necessity. It is deemed advisable to make careful provision to preclude these burdens becoming needlessly oppressive; but it is conceded by all the authorities that under some circumstances they may be carried to an extent that will be ruinous to individuals. It would be a remarkable proposition, under such circumstances, that a thing is sanctioned and countenanced by the government when this burden, which may prove disastrous, is imposed upon it, while, on the other hand, it is frowned upon and condemned when the burden is withheld. It is safe to predict that, if such were the legal doctrine, any citizen would prefer to be visited with the untaxed frowns of government rather than with those testimonials of approval which are represented by the demands of the tax gatherer. It may be supposed that some idea of special protection is involved when a business is taxed; taxation and protection being reciprocal. If the tax upon any particular thing was the consideration for the protection given to the owner in respect to it, this might be so; but the maxim of reciprocity in taxation has no such meaning."

CAMPBELL v. CITY OF THOMASVILLE.

JONES v. MAYOR, ETC., OF WAY-CROSS. (Nos. 1,813, 1,820.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. COURTS (§ 217*)—JURISDICTION—COURT OF APPEALS — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ORDINANCE.

The Court of Appeals has jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 134*)—"NEAR BEER."

"Near beer" is a term of common currency, used to designate all that class of malt liquors which contain so little alcohol that they will not produce intoxication, though drunk to excess, and includes in its meaning all malt liquors which are not within the purview of the general prohibition law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 11*)—POWER TO CONTROL TRAFFIC—CONFLICTING REGULATIONS BY STATE AND MUNICIPALITY.

Since the General Assembly, by the "near beer" tax act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112), has by implication expressed the general policy of permitting the sale of "near beer" by those who pay the tax, the municipalities may not, in the absence of express charter authority, prohibit its sale entirely. They may, however, under the usual general welfare clause, enact reasonable regulations governing its sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 110*)—POWER TO CONTROL TRAFFIC SALE OF NEAR BEER.

The selling of "near beer" is a business which, from its very nature, admits of strict regulation under the police power. It stands legitimately in a different class from the business of selling drugs, soda water, and similar liquids. Regulations may be upheld as applied to this occupation which would be arbitrary and unreasonable if there were an attempt to apply them to other businesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 64*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—REASONABLENESS.

Any fair and apposite regulation designed to confine the business of selling "near beer" to persons of good character is reasonable.

(a) In order that the municipal governing body may have an opportunity to pass upon the character of the applicant, they may require the making of a written application and the granting of a permit or license thereon as a condition precedent to one's engaging in the business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 59, 130*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—TERRITORIAL LIMITS—REASONABLENESS.

The business of selling "near beer" may be confined to reasonable territorial limits within the municipality. The limits, however, should be fairly extensive, and not arbitrarily narrowed.

(a) The municipal governing body may legitimately refuse to grant a permit to sell at a place within the designated limits, where, for some special reason, it should appear that the sale in that particular place or building would be subversive of these objects which municipal government is designed to protect.

(b) The limits prescribed by the ordinance of the city of Waycross are, under all the facts appearing in the record, unreasonable.

(c) The ordinance just referred to was manifestly designed, not to regulate the sale of "near beer," but to prohibit it absolutely under the guise of regulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 138½; Dec. Dig. §§ 59, 130.*]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 83, 84*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—BOND.

It is a reasonable regulation that every one who engages in the selling of "near beer" in a municipality shall give a good and solvent bond, conditioned that he will keep an orderly house, will not violate the state liquor laws, and will obey the municipal ordinances of the city regulating the business.

(a) A provision that the only acceptable surety on the bond shall be a guaranty company is unreasonable.

(b) A provision that the only acceptable sureties on the bond shall be freeholders of the city is unreasonable.

8. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 116*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—REASONABLENESS.

Regulations forbidding the proprietors of "near beer" stands from allowing drinking on the premises, and also from permitting persons to loiter and idle there, are reasonable. Likewise a regulation forbidding the keeping of chairs, tables, gaming stands, etc., in the room is valid. It may also be required that the "near beer" business shall not be carried on in connection with any other business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

9. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 120*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—KEEPING OPEN.

A regulation that "near beer" stands shall not be kept open during night hours, or on Sundays, election days, or legal holidays, is valid.

10. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 115*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—OBSCURING VIEW OF INTERIOR OF ROOM.

A regulation prohibiting the keepers of "near beer" stands from having in their places of business, screens, shades, stained windows, and other devices for obscuring the view of the interior of the room, is valid.

11. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 11, 119*) — REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—OFFENSE AGAINST STATE—SALES TO FEMALES.

A regulation that minors shall not be permitted to enter the place where "near beer" is sold is valid. A provision in a municipal ordinance against selling "near beer" to a minor is unenforceable, as that is an offense against the general law of the state. Sales to females may be prohibited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. §§ 11, 119.*]

12. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 124*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—QUANTITY.

A regulation forbidding sales of less than a pint of "near beer" is valid; but it is unreasonable to forbid the sale of more than one quart to one person in one day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 133; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

13. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 106*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—FORFEITURE OF LICENSE.

A provision, in a municipal ordinance regulating the licensing of the business of selling "near beer," that the license shall be forfeited if the holder is convicted of violating the state liquor laws or the ordinances of the municipality, is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 113, 115-116; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

14. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 122*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—MARKING BOTTLES—SUBMITTING SAMPLES.

A municipality may lawfully ordain that all bottles, vessels, barrels, etc., containing "near beer" shall have stamped thereon a designation of their contents and the name of the manufacturer thereof. It may also require all dealers in "near beer" to submit samples to be tested.

15. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—ORDINANCES — PERSONS ENTITLED TO QUESTION.

An indigent Confederate soldier, duly certified by the ordinary of the county of his residence, being exempt by law from the payment of any municipal license fee required for the sale of "near beer," cannot raise the question that the license fee named in an ordinance regulating the sale of "near beer" is excessive. He is not legally interested in the question.

16. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 112*)—REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—INDIGENT CONFEDERATE SOLDIER.

Indigent Confederate soldiers, who have paid the state tax on the sale of "near beer," are exempt from the payment of municipal license fees imposed upon that business; but they are not exempt from the operation of such other reasonable regulations as the municipality may impose upon those engaging therein.

17. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 208, 240, 296*) — REGULATION OF SALE OF NEAR BEER—ARBITRARY CLASSIFICATION — EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The ordinance enacted by the city of Thomasville, regulating the sale of "near beer," is not unconstitutional, as against a person desiring to engage in that occupation, on the ground that it makes an arbitrary classification, or that it denies him the equal and complete protection of the laws, or that it takes his property without due process of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. §§ 208, 240, 296.*]

18. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 111, 121*)—INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 11*)—ORDINANCE VOID IN PART AND VALID IN PART—BOND—PERSONS ENTITLED TO OBJECT—POWER TO CONTROL TRAFFIC.

A municipal ordinance may be void in part and good in part. The void and the good may be so interdependent as to render the whole invalid, or may be so separable as to allow a segregation, and to permit of the enforcement of one part, while the remainder is nugatory.

(a) The unreasonable requirement of the "near beer" ordinance of the city of Thomasville, restricting the nature of the sureties to be taken on the prescribed bond, is not such a vital part of the ordinance, and is not so interwoven into the whole legislative scheme, as to render the entire ordinance void.

(b) One who has been convicted of selling "near beer" in violation of that ordinance, but who has made no application to the city council and has tendered no bond at all, is not in a position to complain of the illegality of the requirement that the sureties on the bond shall be freeholders. This provision being void, the presumption is that, if he had tendered a bond otherwise sufficient, the city council would have ignored the void provision and would have accepted the bond.

(c) In the "near beer" ordinance of the city of Waycross the void and the good are so interwoven as to indicate an invalid legislative design, and that ordinance must fall entirely.

J. L. Sweat and Malcolm D. Jones, for plaintiff in error Jones. Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, for defendant in error City of Waycross.

POWELL, J. These two cases are distinct and separate causes, but will be considered together, because of the fact that they both involve the same general questions. In No. 1,813 the plaintiff in error, Campbell, was convicted of violating what is known as the "near beer" ordinance of the city of Thomasville. He presented a petition for certiorari to the judge of the superior court, who refused to sanction it; and to this judgment he brings error. The ordinance under which he was convicted is as follows:

"Whereas, in the judgment of this council the keeping of 'near beer,' or any other imitation of beer, for sale in the city, is in the nature of a nuisance, and certain to become a nuisance unless carried on under proper regulations, and to be or become more injurious to the general welfare of the city: Therefore, be it ordained * * *:

"Section 1. That any person desiring to sell in said city any imitation of beer that is commonly called 'near beer,' or any other imitation of beer, must, before commencing said business, make application to the council, through the clerk thereof, which application must be signed by the party applying for such license and must plainly and fully describe the house in which such business is to be carried on, the location by street and number, and the applicant must agree and bind himself thereby to keep a decent and orderly house, and that there shall be no screens or partitions or other devices of any kind by which any one passing along the front of said place of business will be prevented from having a full, free, and unobstructed view of the entire interior of said place and every one therein; that there shall be no tables or seats therein for the use of customers; that no person or persons shall be allowed to loiter or loaf in said place of business; that minors shall not be allowed in said place of business; that said place of business shall not be opened at all on Sundays, nor before 6 o'clock in the morning, nor after 7 o'clock in the evening, and that between said hours of 7 p. m. and 6 a. m. no one shall be allowed to enter said place or remain therein after the time of closing; that, said application having been duly made and filed, the applicant shall file a bond with two good securities, freeholders of said city, in the penal sum of $3,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of all conditions of the application, and the payment of any fine or fines that may be imposed by the mayor, or acting mayor, for a failure to comply with all the agreements, or any of them, in said application contained. If said application and bond are approved by council and the clerk authorized to issue a license to said applicant, the clerk shall not issue any license to such person until the said party presents a receipt from the treasurer for the sum of $1,000 paid as a license for the time between the date of said receipt and the first day of the next March.

"Sec. 2. That any person who has obtained a license by complying with all the requirements of the preceding section, and who shall thereafter fail to comply with the terms of said application, by failing to keep out of said place of business any and all screens, partitions, or other things that prevent or tend to prevent a full, free, and unobstructed view of the entire room or rooms in which such business is carried on, or that has in said place of business tables or seats for the convenience of customers, or that allows minors in said place of business, or that allows persons to loiter or loaf in said place of business, or that opens before the time specified, to wit, 6 o'clock a. m., or that fails to close said place on the stroke of 7 o'clock p. m., or that conducts said place of business in such a way as to annoy or disturb the neighbors, shall be deemed guilty of violating this ordinance, and on conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in the general Penal Code, section 1, and his license shall be revoked also, and he and the securities on his bond shall be liable for any fine imposed for any such violation of this ordinance.

"Sec. 3. That the application above described must be signed by any party desiring or intending to engage in the business of selling 'near beer' or any other imitation of beer, and all the rules and requirements and punishments in the foregoing sections shall apply to every person carrying on said business in this city, regardless of any exemption by law or otherwise that may be claimed by any party from the payment of a license fee. Any person claiming an exemption from such payment, by reason of his service as a Confederate soldier, must produce his certificate from the ordinary of the county of his residence, and must show that he is personally in charge of and running said business, and owns the same in his own right; otherwise the marshal shall close said place at once. Any such exemption from payment of license shall be construed to authorize the party holding same to run only one stand or place of business in this city.

"Sec. 4. Any person engaged in running a place where 'near beer' or any imitation of beer is sold shall be required to furnish the city with a sample of every brand or kind of such imitation of 'near beer' sold by him, whenever requested to do so by the marshal, for the purpose of having the same tested by the proper authorities as to the amount of alcohol therein, and a refusal to furnish such samples on request shall be deemed prima facie proof that such person is selling or keeping for sale at his place of business intoxicating liquors, and subject him to all the penalties for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors, prescribed by the city or the state."

Under the charter of the city of Thomasville (Acts 1889, p. 854) offenders may be brought to trial before the police court upon a summons "setting out in a plain, summary way the nature of the offense charged." The summons in the present case charged Campbell with "the offense of selling an imitation beer commonly called 'near beer' in the city of Thomasville, Ga., without complying with the regulations for the sale of same, as prescribed in the 'near beer' ordinance of said city." The defendant, upon arraignment in the police court, demurred to the summons, on the ground that it was too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to put him on notice as to what was charged against him. The demurrer elaborates this ground; but we do not deem it necessary to go into the details of these objections, as we think the summons sufficiently complies with the requirement of the charter that it shall set out the nature of the offense "in a plain summary way."

The defendant, by his demurrer, also attacked the ordinance in question as follows:

"Defendant says that said ordinance as it is written is void in its entirety, for the reason that it shows upon its face that it is not an attempt by the municipal authorities, by way of police regulations, to regulate and reasonably restrict or govern dealers in 'near beer'; but that, on the contrary, the said ordinance shows on its face that it is arbitrary and unreasonable, and intended by said city to be vexatious, and for the purpose of driving persons engaged in the 'near beer' business in said city, under a license from the state of Georgia, out of said city, and destroying and depriving them of their right, given by law, to conduct said business, same being a property right.

"For further ground of demurrer defendant says that said ordinance is void, and incapable of enforcement as to any provisions thereof, because it is apparent from the general scheme of the ordinance that the same was intended to be enforced as a whole, and it was not the intention of the makers thereof that any particular portion of said ordinance should be enforced; and, further, said ordinance shows that it is incapable of enforcement, except in its entirety, for the reason that an attempt to enforce a part only of it would cause the entire legislative scheme to fail.

"For further ground of demurrer defendant says that said ordinance is void because it violates paragraph 1, section 4, of article 1 of the Constitution of Georgia, in that it is a local law and in direct conflict with section 1642 of the Political Code of 1895, and Acts Leg. 1897, p. 24, amendatory to said Code section, conferring upon Confederate soldiers the right to peddle or carry on business in any city in Georgia, in that said ordinance, by reason of its unreasonableness, is destructive and prohibitive of the right so conferred upon confederate soldiers by the general law to conduct business without giving bond; the said ordinance making no exceptions as to them.

"For further ground of demurrer, defendant says that said ordinance is void because, as it is written, it is conflicting with the general law of Georgia, approved September 5, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 1112), same being an act to provide a revenue for development and conduct of the penitentiary system of the state, etc., because, by reason of its arbitrariness and unreasonableness, it renders it impossible for any person, after having paid the state of Georgia the license tax of $200, as contemplated by said act, to conduct the business authorized by said license from the state in said city of Thomasville, by requiring a license which is prohibitory, and a $3,000 bond, which is likewise prohibitory; and for this reason it is violative of the provisions of the Constitution aforesaid, and therefore unconstitutional, and for this reason is also void, because, as it is written, it is contrary to the public policy of the state of Georgia, as outlined in said act referred to.

"For further ground of demurrer defendant says that said ordinance is unconstitutional and void because it violates paragraph 2, section 1, article 1 of the Constitution of Georgia, in that it denies to persons engaged in the 'near beer' business in said city impartial and complete protection of their persons and property, guaranteed by the Constitution, for the reason that it arbitrarily taxes one class of dealers in nonintoxicating malt liquors, and undertakes to classify them, and to impose upon them restrictions and regulations and licenses, without placing any restrictions and regulations and licenses upon any other class of dealers in nonintoxicating malt liquors in said city, such as licensed druggists; and for the further reason that the requirements of said ordinance are such as to totally destroy and impair the property right of such dealers in said business, acquired by the payment of the license tax to the state of Georgia.

"For further ground of demurrer defendant says said ordinance is null and void because in conflict with article 1, section 1, paragraph 3, of the Constitution of Georgia, and is likewise in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States (Civ. Code 1895, § 6080), because it deprives the defendant of his property without due process of law, and denies him the equal protection of the laws, because the provision in said ordinance requiring the defendant to make bond in the penal sum of $3,000, conditioned to pay any fine that might be assessed against him, which bond must be signed by two good securities, freeholders of said city, and the additional requirement that he pay a license fee of $1,000, are absolutely prohibitive and destructive of the defendant's right to carry on the business authorized by the state of Georgia, in consideration of the license tax of $200, and because, the business of dealing in 'near beer' being authorized and licensed by the state of Georgia solely on the idea that the beverage is not an intoxicant, the said ordinance, arbitrarily taxing such dealers, and segregating and classifying them and their business, and imposing upon it unreasonable restrictions and regulations and prohibitions, without putting any such regulations and restrictions upon persons carrying on any other business in said city, and especially in distinguishing 'near beer' dealers from all other dealers in nonintoxicating malt liquors, is denying to the defendant the equal protection of the laws."

Upon the trial it appeared that the defendant had paid the state tax on dealers in imitation or "near beer"; also that he was an indigent Confederate soldier and possessed the certificate of the ordinary of the county of his residence, upon which he was entitled to the benefit of the statute exempting indigent soldiers from the payment of certain occupation taxes. It was proved that he had sold "near beer" without complying with the requirements of the ordinance. No point is made upon the adequacy of the evidence. The only grounds of error are that the conviction is contrary to law, for the lack of a legal ordinance, and that the mayor presiding in the police court erred in overruling the demurrer.

In No. 1,820 the plaintiff in error, Jones, was convicted in the police court of Waycross, for the violation of what is called the "near beer" ordinance of that city. He also excepts to the fact that the judge of the superior court refused to sanction a certiorari. Upon arraignment the defendant filed pleading, which he designated as an answer, and which presents his attack upon the ordinance, as follows: "Defendant admits having violated 'an ordinance to license and regulate the sale of "near beer" and similar beverages within the corporate limits of the city of Waycross, and for other purposes,' adopted March 3, 1909, a certified copy of which is hereto attached, by engaging in the sale at retail, in store No. 17 on Albany avenue, in said city, of a nonintoxicating beverage manufactured by the Acme Brewing Company, of Macon, Ga., and of a similar nonintoxicating beverage manufactured by the Savannah Brewing Company, of Savannah, Ga., with the name of each company plainly stamped on the bottles containing same, respectively, commonly known as 'near beer,' contrary to the provisions of said ordinance; but defendant says that he should not be adjudged guilty, and punished as prescribed in said ordinance, because the same is illegal, invalid, and contrary to the law of the state.

"(2) Defendant further says that, if said ordinance shall be deemed valid and binding, he should not be adjudged guilty and punished as prescribed therein, because on February 28, 1909, he paid to the ordinary of Ware county, in which said city of Waycross is located, the sum of $200, the amount of the state license tax required for the sale of 'near beer,' obtaining his receipt or license therefor, and thereupon rented said store No. 17 on Albany avenue, in said city, fronting on the courthouse square and one of the business streets of said city, for one year at the monthly rental of $10, paying to the owner the rent for the month of March 1909, and on the 1st day of said month and prior to the adoption of said ordinance engaged in the business of selling at retail said 'near beer,' and, as defendant holds a license duly issued to him as a Confederate soldier by Warren Lott, ordinary of said county of Ware, dated October 21, 1899, he is exempt from the payment of any license tax to said city of Waycross.

"(3) Further answering, defendant says that said ordinance is illegal because its terms and conditions are unreasonable and cannot be complied with, and hence it is prohibitive of a lawful business being engaged in within said city of Waycross, in that it limits and restricts the carrying on of said business only upon that portion of one of the business streets of said city known as Plant avenue, between Gordon street and Frances street, where a store cannot be rented for that purpose, and furthermore requires the written consent of all the owners and occupants of stores, shops, residences, and other buildings within a radius of 100 yards of the place where said business is to be conducted, which cannot be obtained, and fixes the license fee therefor at the unreasonable sum of $1,000 per annum for all others than Confederate soldiers, and requires of every one engaged in said business, including Confederate soldiers, to give a bond, with a reliable guaranty company as surety, in the unreasonable sum of $5,000, which defendant cannot give, as the agents for all such companies doing business in Waycross refuse to make the same, and, moreover, it limits the quantity of said 'near beer' to be sold by any one person in any one day to not more than one quart, and prevents the carrying on of said business except between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 5 o'clock p. m., the same being an unreasonable restriction, as said business could be made most profitable between the hours of 5 o'clock p. m. and 10 o'clock p. m., and as it also prevents the drinking of said 'near beer' in the building or on the premises where such business is located, which is necessary, as the retail dealer is expected to open same and furnish glasses for the purpose, and return the empty bottles to the manufacturer, and as it also prevents any person lingering in or about such place of business or on the premises for any length of time whatever, and prohibits the sale of cigars or any other thing at such place of business.

"For all of which said reasons defendant says he should not be adjudged guilty and punished as prescribed in said ordinance. Wherefore, having fully answered, defendant prays to be hence discharged."

As an exhibit, the ordinance is set out as follows:

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the mayor and council of the city of Waycross, and it is hereby ordained by authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this ordinance it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell, or offer for sale, or to have on hand for the purpose of sale, any preparation or beverage known as 'near beer,' or 'Bud,' or 'Malt Mead,' or 'Acme Brew,' or 'Red Buck Ale,' or similar drinks or beverages or substitutes, within the corporate limits of the city of Waycross, unless such person, firm, or corporation shall comply with the following conditions, namely: (1) An application in writing shall be made to the mayor and council for a license, and such application shall state the place where said 'near beer' or similar beverages will be sold, which application must have indorsed thereon the written consent of all [italics ours] the owners and occupants of stores, shops, residences, and other buildings within a radius of one hundred yards of the place where said business is to be conducted, and same shall be granted only by a majority vote of council. The provisions of this section, as to securing the written consent of the parties named therein, shall also apply to those persons who may be exempted by law from having to secure license from municipal authorities in order to engage in such business, and such persons shall be required, before opening up or carrying on such business, to secure such written consent. (2) The amount to be paid by the applicant for such license shall be $1,000 per annum, payable in advance. (3) No person, firm, or corporation shall be allowed to sell such 'near beer,' or similar beverages, except on the following street, to wit, on Plant avenue, between Gordon street and Frances street. (4) Every applicant for such license, and any other person or persons engaging in said business who may be by law authorized to do so without a license from the municipal authorities of said city, shall be required to give a good and sufficient bond, with a reliable guaranty company as surety, to be approved by said mayor and council, and payable to said municipal corporation, in the sum of $5,000, conditioned to keep a clean and orderly house and place of business and to comply with all the rules, regulations, and requirements adopted by said mayor and council, or that may hereafter be adopted by them, touching the conduct of such business and regulating the sale of such 'near beer' or other beverages.

"Sec. 2. Be it further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell to any one person, on any one day, more than one quart of such 'near beer' or other beverage, and the quantity sold to any one person at any one time shall not be less than one pint; nor shall same be sold to minors or females.

"Sec. 3. Be it further ordained, that no 'near beer' or other similar beverages shall be drunk in the building or on the premises where such business is located, and it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, or corporation selling 'near beer' or other similar beverage to sell same or keep open their place of business, except between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 5 o'clock p. m. Said places of business shall be closed on Sundays, public holidays, and election days, and such other days as the mayor and council may direct.

"Sec. 4. Be it further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any kind of table, stand, cards, games, machines, board, billiard table, or pool table, or any other device or implement, for playing any game, to be allowed or kept in the building or on the premises where said business shall be located.

"Sec. 5. Be it further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any place of business, where said 'near beer' or similar beverage is sold, to be provided with screens or shades, or for the front doors or windows to be painted or frosted over, or otherwise darkened or obscured; but the interior of such place of business shall always be kept in open view of the street in front.

"Sec. 6. Be it further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, or corporation doing such business to allow any person or persons to linger or loiter in or about such place of business, or on the premises on which same is located; and likewise any person failing or refusing to leave said place of business or premises shall be punished as hereinafter provided.

"Sec. 7. Be it further ordained, that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell or offer for sale anything or any other article of merchandise except such 'near beer' or similar beverage at the place of business where same is sold, or to carry on or conduct any other business, vocation, or calling at such place.

"Sec. 8. Be it further ordained, that it shall not be lawful for any person, firm, or corporation as aforesaid to keep on hand, or to allow or suffer any other person, firm, or corporation to keep or store at such place of business, or on the premises connected therewith, any other kinds of beer, wines, or liquors, or to allow or suffer any person to drink any kinds of beers, wines, or malt, spirituous, or intoxicating liquors at such place of business or on the premises where same is located.

"Sec. 9. Be it further ordained, that any person, firm, or corporation selling 'near beer' or other similar beverage in kegs, bottles, or otherwise shall have the kegs or other vessels so stamped as to show the name of the manufacturer of such 'near beer' or similar beverage.

"Sec. 10. Be it further ordained, that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, their agents or employes, to take or keep intoxicating liquors on deposit in soft drink or 'near beer' stands. Persons holding such licenses or carrying on such business shall not receive or retain at such places intoxicating liquor or beer on deposit or to be kept there until called for, or allow same to be left with them for any purpose, or allow people to drink beer or whisky so left at their places or brought to their places; and it shall likewise be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, their agents or employes, to receive intoxicating liquors or beer where the same is left with them on a claim that it is deposited for the time being and will be called for afterwards.

"Sec. 11. Be it further ordained, that any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall, on conviction, for each offense be punished as provided by section 23 of the charter of this city, and on conviction of any person, firm, or corporation holding a license to sell 'near beer' or other similar beverages as above provided for, such license shall be ipso facto revoked, and it shall thereafter be unlawful to sell or furnish 'near beer' or other beverage at such place of business; and any person, firm, or corporation so offending shall likewise on conviction, be punished as provided by section 23 of the charter of this city.

"Sec. 12. Be it further ordained, that each and every provision of this ordinance, except alone the provision requiring the payment of $1,000 license fee, shall apply to all persons who may by law be not subject to the license tax imposed upon the sale of 'near beer' and similar beverages, as well as to other persons, firms, and corporations selling 'near beer' or other similar beverages within the corporate limits of this city."

Further facts necessary to an understanding of the points decided will be stated in the course of the opinion.

1. As a preliminary proposition we will dispose of the suggestion that this court should certify to the Supreme Court the questions growing out of the constitutional attacks made upon the ordinances. The constitutional amendment creating this court and separating its jurisdiction from the Supreme Court provides that "where, in a case pending in the Court of Appeals, a question is raised as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution of this state or of the United States, or as to the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly of this state, and a decision of the question is necessary to the determination of the case, the Court of Appeals shall so certify to the Supreme Court," etc. Laws Ga. 1906, p. 26; 1 Ga. App. viii. It will be seen that as to enactments, laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations, etc., other than acts of the General Assembly of this state, the Court of Appeals has the jurisdiction to determine their constitutionality, and it is not necessary to certify such questions to the Supreme Court, unless they also involve the construction of some provision of the Constitution of this state or of the United States.

2. Also, at the beginning of the opinion, we may as well introduce to bench and bar this new recruit in the ranks of that army of subjects which are wont to trouble the courts, "near beer," and give its name a place in the roll of judicial definitions. "Near beer" is a term now of general currency in this state, and perhaps elsewhere, used to designate any and all of that class of malt liquors which contain so little alcohol that they will not produce intoxication, even though drunk to excess. It includes all malt liquors which are not within the purview of the general prohibition law.

3. There would be but little difficulty in convincing any one who is familiar with the general purport of the decisions, state and federal, which have been rendered concerning that subtle and apparently undefinable essence of local sovereignty which is called the "police power," that as a general proposition, uninfluenced by any inconsistent legislative declarations, a municipal government would have the power, under the usual general welfare clause, even to prohibit the sale of "near beer" and of imitations and substitutes for beer and other intoxicating liquors. However, in this state we must approach the subject with the fact in mind that the General Assembly, at its last session, placed a license tax upon the sale of these very things. In what is known as the "Locker Club Tax Case" (Wright v. Mayor, etc., of Macon, 64 S. E. 807, decided October 28, 1908) this court (with expressions of personal reluctance on the part of the judges, it is true, yet with due alacrity of obedience to the precedent of the case of Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 59 S. E. 335), held that the placing by the state of an occupation tax or license fee upon a particular business evinced such a legislative policy as to forbid a municipality, in the absence of an express delegation of authority, from prohibiting that business or occupation. To be valid, therefore, an ordinance adopted by a municipality to which no express authority on the subject has been delegated must, as regards the business of selling "near beer" and other imitations of and substitutes for intoxicating liquors, stop short of actual or substantial prohibition.

4. That the municipalities may reasonably regulate the sale of these nonintoxicating liquors seems to us to be perfectly clear. A case closely in point is that of Monroe v. City of Lawrence, 44 Kan. 609, 24 Pac. 1113, 10 L. R. A. 520. The ordinance in that case provided that no person should sell or give away cider in less quantities than one gallon, or permit the same to be drunk on the premises. The point presented and decided will be plainly seen from the following quotation from the unanimous opinion of the court:

"The appellant contends that cider is a harmless and wholesome drink, and that the restriction upon its sale is unreasonable, and an unlawful restraint of trade, in contravention of a common right, and is therefore unconstitutional. The ordinance was manifestly not enacted in pursuance of the prohibitory law, nor for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors. The ordinance inferentially permits the sale of cider in quantities of a gallon or more, and the penalty for its violation may be $10, without imprisonment. These provisions are not consonant with the law prohibiting and punishing the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, and hence we must infer that the ordinance was passed for the purpose of controlling the sale and disposition of cider that was not intoxicating. It will be observed that the ordinance regulates, rather than prohibits, the sale of cider, and the legislative power to regulate the sale of an article or liquid, which in some stages is harmless and in others hurtful, is no longer open to question. The juice of apples quickly changes from fresh to hard cider, and hard cider is presumptively not only a fermented, but an intoxicating, liquor. State v. Schaefer, 44 Kan. 90, 24 Pac. 92. It is difficult to show when the change occurs, and when it reaches such a stage as will produce intoxication. It may have been thought that the drinking of cider might foster a taste for strong liquors, and that, if the unrestricted sale of cider by the glass was permitted, the officers might be easily deceived as to the character of the drinks sold, and that a tippling shop might be carried on under the guise of a place to sell cider. In the interest of the health of the people and the peace and good order of the communities, it was deemed wise to regulate the traffic. To sell it by the glass and allow it to be drunk upon the premises where sold was deemed to be subversive of good order, and dangerous to the health and morals of the people; and hence they imposed a regulation that it should not be sold in less quantities than one gallon and should not be drunk at the place of sale. Such a regulation violates no private right, and does not unreasonably or improperly restrain trade. Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 L. Ed. 253; Stokes v. New York, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 88; Mobile v. Yuille, 8 Ala. 137, 36 Am. Dec. 441; State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419, and note.

"The principal contention, however, is that the power to regulate the sale was not conferred on the city council. There is no provision of statute directly authorizing the enactment of such an ordinance; but the Legislature, after conferring power to pass ordinances for certain specific purposes, authorizes 'city councils to enact and make all such ordinances, by-laws, rules and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the state, as may be expedient for maintaining the peace, good government and welfare of the city, and its trade and commerce.' Gen. St. 1889, par. 824. The same section of the statute provides that the ordinances passed in pursuance of this authority shall be enforced by suitable penalties therein prescribed. The ordinance under consideration is not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the state, and, as we have seen, the regulation of the same is neither unreasonable nor unjust. Every statute of the state shows the solicitude of the law to protect the health and morals of the people, and preserve the peace and good order of the communities; and it is manifest that the Legislature intended that ample authority should be conferred, either by express grant or by virtue of the general powers, to carry out this purpose. Instead of specifically defining every regulation which might be necessary to the health, peace, and convenience of the public, the Legislature enacted the general welfare clause; and it seems to us that it furnished sufficient authority for the council to pass an ordinance so clearly in the interest of peace, good order, and health as the one in question."

Every argument why cider should be regarded as within the police power which is delegated to municipalities by the ordinary general welfare clause is emphasized in the case of "near beer" and similar liquors. The very name "near beer" is as suggestive to the guardian of the police power of a necessity for close oversight, regulation, and control as it is to the drinking classes of possibilities which they may hope to find in the beverage. Its very name, so to speak, is a transcript of its character. A liquor that is "near beer," looks like beer, smells like beer, tastes somewhat like beer, capable of cheering, though not of inebriating, well deserves the attention of those whose duty it is to protect the health, peace, and good order of the community. The argument that, since "near beer" is not an intoxicating liquor, dealers in it should stand on the same footing as dealers in soda water and other similar beverages, well comports with the zeal and partizanship which is to be expected of counsel in the case; but we would stultify ourselves if we did not recognize an essential distinction and a well-marked difference between the two classes. Both businesses are in a certain sense alike legitimate; but there are many varieties of legitimate businesses. An occupation may be lawful and yet may be neither useful nor necessary—in fact, may have a harmful tendency. Is the supposition to be indulged for an instant that a state tax of $200 on each soda water dealer, in addition to such municipal taxes as might lawfully be collected, would cause to be poured into the treasury the vast sums of money which the "near beer" tax has brought in? And yet, prior to the adoption of the prohibition law, when "near beer" and soda water were on an equality so far as taxation was concerned, who ever heard of a "near beer" dealer? Who, prior to the advent of prohibition, would have paid even $10 per annum for the privilege of selling imitations and substitutes for beer and other intoxicating liquors? What does all this suggest to the reasoning mind? Are we, as judges, to be blind to that which all our fellow citizens see and know—that this recently born desire of so many people to sell "near beer" springs from a recognition on their part of the fact that the prohibition law did not kill out old cravings, but perhaps stimulated them; that "near beer," though but a poor substitute, is nevertheless adequate somewhat to palliate the special thirst; that, though not strong enough to intoxicate, it nevertheless affords something in that direction; that "near beer" is capable of making men "near intoxicated"; and that there is a profit to be made in pandering to those desires the gratifying of which tends to suppress the judgment and sense of discretion in men and to stimulate their emotional faculties? Not only that, but what other business so facilitates the operation of a "blind tiger" and the sale of liquors that are intoxicating?

The state, and under its authority the municipalities, have the right "to enact rules for the conduct of the most necessary and common occupations, when from their nature they offer peculiar opportunities for imposition and fraud." Bazemore v. State, 121 Ga. 620, 49 S. E. 701, citing Cooley, Const. Limitations (7th Ed.) 887, and Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 41, 2 Sup. Ct. 44, 27 L. Ed. 370 et seq. In Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 684, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 L. Ed. 256, the United States Supreme Court held that the possibility that "the manufacture of oleomargarine or imitation butter of the kind described in the statute is or may be conducted in such a way or with such skill and secrecy as to baffle ordinary inspection" is a ground for even its entire prohibition, and, of course, as a consequence therefrom, the strictest regulation under the police power, and upheld the statute as applied to that case, notwithstanding the fact that Powell's particular oleomargarine was properly manufactured and was no menace to health. This ruling was followed in the case of Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, 183 U. S. 245, 22 Sup. Ct. 123, 46 L. Ed. 175, in which the court said: "The proposition is that, as by the Ohio statutes harmless coloring matter is permitted to be used in butter, the effect of prohibiting the use of such harmless ingredients in oleomargarine is to deprive the manufacturer of oleomargarine of equal protection of the laws, and to take from him his property without due process of law." The Supreme Court of Ohio, however, having before it the evidence introduced upon the issues of fact made in the pleadings, held that oleomargarine was an article which might easily be manufactured so as to be hurtful, and thus result in fraud upon and injury to the public, and that the inhibition of the use of coloring matter in oleomargarine was a reasonable police regulation tending to insure the public against fraud and injury." And the statute was held to be a valid exercise of the police power. See, also, Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223.

The very possibility which "near beer" and imitations and substitutes for beer and other intoxicating liquors afford toward the palming off of real beer and actual intoxicating liquors under that guise, as well as of selling beverages dangerous to the public health, places the business of dealing in them under the guardianship and control of the police power. Therefore, while the municipalities in this state, under their general welfare clauses and in the absence of broader and express delegation of authority, may, as to the business of dealing in the class of beverages here under discussion, regulate only, and not prohibit, and while the regulation must be reasonable, and not arbitrary, yet regulations may be sustained as being reasonable, as applied to such occupations, which would be void for unreasonableness if they were made to relate to callings of a different nature. On this general subject, see 28 Cyc. 733, 734; Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 Sup. Ct. 638, 44 L. Ed. 725; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 L. Ed. 253; Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, 183 U. S. 238, 22 Sup. Ct. 120, 46 L. Ed. 171; Ex parte Byrd, 84 Ala. 17, 4 South. 397, 5 Am. St.

Rep. 328; Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 41, 2 Sup. Ct. 44, 27 L. Ed. 370; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 393, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145; Williams v. City Council of Augusta, 4 Ga. 509; Green v. Mayor, etc., of Savannah, 6 Ga. 13; Nagle v. Augusta, 5 Ga. 546; Watson v. Mayor, etc., of Thompson, 116 Ga. 546, 42 S. E. 747, 59 L. R. A. 602, 94 Am. St. Rep. 137; Badkins v. Robinson, 53 Ga. 614; Bearden v. Madison, 73 Ga. 184; Cosgrove v. Augusta, 103 Ga. 835; 31 S. E. 445, 42 L. R. A. 711, 68 Am. St. Rep. 149; Crum v. Bray, 121 Ga. 709, 49 S. E. 686; Bazemore v. State, 121 Ga. 620, 49 S. E. 701.

We have intentionally omitted the citation of a great number of intoxicating liquor cases, to which reference might be had on the general subject, for fear that we may give the impression that we are deciding this case as if the sale of intoxicating beverages were involved. Fundamentally, however, the right to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors differs only in degree from the right to regulate imitations and substitutes for such beverages, and especially those which approach closely to the border line of being intoxicating. In general terms it may be said that municipal corporations, in dealing with the sale of "near beer" and like beverages, may, under the general welfare clause, adopt all fair and appropriate regulations which would tend to prevent the business from becoming a nuisance by attracting together idle or disorderly persons, or by otherwise tending to disturb the public peace and tranquility, or from becoming a menace to health by reason of the sale of impure or unwholesome liquors, or from becoming a means of violating the law as to the sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors. Keeping in mind these general principles, as well as the recognized doctrine that municipal ordinances are to be considered prima facie as reasonable, and that all serious doubt is to be resolved in favor of their validity, we will now proceed to take up the particular provisions of the ordinances before us for consideration.

5. One of the most apposite and effective means of securing the public against nuisance, menace to health, or violation of law as a result of the sale of "near beer" is to confine the business to persons of good character. Regulation to this extent has frequently been upheld. In Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 20 Sup. Ct. 633, 44 L. Ed. 725, it is held that it is reasonable for a municipality to require evidence of the applicant's good character as a condition precedent to the issuance to him of a license to sell cigarettes. It is further held that it is not arbitrary or unreasonable to require the applicant to submit this question to some designated official or tribunal; it being presumed, until the contrary appears, that the question will be honestly and impartially decided. Hence we hold that, so far as the ordinances in question require a written application to be made to the governing body of the respective cities and require a permit or license from them, it is valid. If the right to sell were arbitrarily refused in any case, the courts would have adequate power to correct that wrong. See Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220. But, as the Supreme Court of the United States held in the case of Gundling v. Chicago, supra, no such question arises until there has been an application for a license and a refusal to grant it.

6. It is, of course, proper to require the applicant to designate, and, if necessary, to describe, the room and building in which he proposes to locate the business. For obvious reasons it would be manifestly proper for the tribunal passing on the application to refuse it, if it appeared that the business was about to be carried on in some remote section of the city, or in a residential portion, or near a church or school, or in some upstairs back room; and this enumeration is not exhaustive. Indeed, we think it would be perfectly legitimate for the municipal legislature to confine, by general ordinance, the business to certain reasonable limits. As to this, see Ex parte Byrd, 84 Ala. 17, 4 South. 397, 5 Am. St. Rep. 328; Shelton v. Mobile, 30 Ala. 540, 68 Am. Dec. 143; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 393, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780; Sanders v. Elberton, 50 Ga. 178, and cases there cited; Badkins v. Robinson, 53 Ga. 615. When only the power to regulate and not also to prohibit is possessed by the municipality, these limits must be such in extent as to afford a reasonable opportunity that the business may be conducted within them. What is reasonable is a fact primarily for the municipal body; but the courts are under the duty of declaring the limitation void if, from allunde facts appearing in the record, its unreasonableness is established. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; Bearden v. Madison, 73 Ga. 184.

It appears from the record in the Waycross case, under consideration, that the limitation that the business shall be conducted only "on Plant avenue, between Gordon street and Frances street," especially when taken in connection with the provision requiring the consent of all owners and occupants of stores, shops, residences, and other buildings within a radius of 100 yards of the place where the business is to be conducted, is unreasonable; that it amounts to substantial prohibition, and not to regulation. It appeared on the trial that the distance along Plant avenue, from Gordon street to Frances street, is 900 yards, including the parks and intersecting street, and that there were 55 storerooms fronting on this portion of the avenue; that this was the principal business street of the city, but that several other parallel and intersecting streets in this section of the city were also devoted to business purposes, and were equally open to police patrol and protection. It further appeared that the owners of all the vacant houses on Plant avenue, within the designated limits, had been applied to and had refused to rent their property for the sale of "near beer." Indeed, it is impossible to read this provision of the ordinance in connection with the testimony in the record without reaching the conclusion that the object of the city council was not to regulate the business in question, but to prohibit the defendant and all others from engaging in it at all. The provision in the Waycross ordinance that the applicant shall present the "written consent of all the owners and occupants of stores, shops, residences, and other buildings within a radius of one hundred yards of the place where the business is to be conducted" smacks of prohibition, rather than regulation. It would be a legitimate exercise of discretion for a city council to refuse to allow a "near beer" stand to be located in a place where it would be generally objectionable to the neighbors; but to allow the arbitrary refusal of consent by one property holder, or one occupant of a building, to defeat the right to carry on the business, when all the others similarly situated have consented, is hardly reasonable. If the provision were that a majority, or perhaps even two-thirds, of the neighbors should consent, we would uphold it; but, as it is, we are constrained to declare it void.

There is nothing unreasonable in requiring one who is about to engage in selling "near beer" to give bond to keep an orderly house, or to comply with the regulations governing the business, and not to violate the state law, or even, as is provided in the Thomasville ordinance, to pay such fines as may be imposed for violations of the ordinance. Such a provision is a wholesome deterrent in several respects. The very requirement that the applicant shall bring sponsors for his conduct tends of itself to confine the business to persons of good character. If the applicant is a person of good character, and his neighbors know that he will likely obey the law and keep an orderly house, he will usually have but little difficulty in getting sureties for his bond, no matter how poor he may be. On the other hand, most persons would be chary of signing such a bond for even a rich man if he were of bad character and would likely violate the law. Besides, the very fact of being under bond for good conduct tends to make most men feel the responsibility more vividly. So far, therefore, as the ordinances require bonds they are valid.

However, we do not find them so reasonable when we come to consider some of the limitations which have been prescribed as to the nature of the bonds required. In the Waycross ordinance the requirement is "for a good and sufficient bond, with a reliable guaranty company as surety." No good reason appears for the requirement of a guaranty company as the only acceptable surety. The requirement seems to be purely arbitrary, and designed for the purpose of preventing the bond from being made; for it appears from the testimony that none of the guaranty companies doing business in Waycross will undertake such an obligation as that imposed by the ordinance. If the object of the ordinance were merely to secure, through the requiring of the bond, those legitimate purposes to which we have referred above, there is no reason why solvent personal sureties would not be equally, if not more, acceptable.

So, too, the requirement in the Thomasville ordinance that "the applicant shall file a bond with two good securities, freeholders of said city," is arbitrary and unreasonable, so far as it prescribes that the sureties shall be freeholders of the city of Thomasville. Why would not a citizen of Thomasville having lands in the county or in an adjoining county be just as acceptable? We can see why the bond should be signed by some obligor residing in the county, so as to give jurisdiction to the local courts in the event of a breach and of an ensuing action on it; but the provision in the ordinance goes far beyond this. Any solvent surety in Thomas county ought to be acceptable.

8. Both the ordinances prohibit drinking on the premises, and have regulations against loitering and idling, and, also, in consonance with this general scheme, against having tables, gaming stands, etc., in connection with the business. These are salutary regulations, and enforceable. We need to cite only the Kansas case from which we have quoted so copiously in an earlier portion of this opinion. Monroe v. City of Lawrence, 44 Kan. 609, 24 Pac. 1113, 10 L. R. A. 520. The provision against having the "near beer" stand in a place devoted to other business does not seem to be arbitrary or unreasonable. Many reasons suggest themselves as to why this is best.

9. The provisions against keeping open during the night hours, and on Sundays, election days, and legal holidays, appear to be reasonable. Justice Cobb, speaking for the Supreme Court in the case of Watson v. Thompson, 116 Ga. 546, 42 S. E. 747, 59 L. R. A. 602, 94 Am. St. Rep. 137, after holding that a municipality may not, under its general welfare clause, prohibit an ordinary shopkeeper from following his calling on Christmas day, concluded the opinion as follows: "Of course, what is said above with reference to the power of a municipal corporation under the general welfare clause of its charter to prevent the carrying on of lawful occupations on public holidays is applicable only to occupations the prosecution of which is not calculated to disturb on the particular day the peace, good order, and safety of the community, in the sense in which those terms are understood by the law. A municipal corporation would doubtless have the right even to prohibit entirely on a given day the carrying on of a business which, though lawful, was of such a character that its prohibition for the time was absolutely essential to the welfare, in a legal sense, of the community." It may be that the statement quoted above is subject to the criticism that it is obiter; but it is manifestly sound.

10. We also sustain the provisions of the ordinances which prohibit screens, shades, stained windows, and other devices for obscuring the view of the interior of the room in which the business is to be conducted. These regulations are legitimately designed to prevent violations of the law.

11. The requirement that the presence of minors shall not be allowed in the place of business is unquestionably valid, though the provision that "near beer" shall not be sold to minors is unenforceable, because that offense is already covered by the general law of the state. Pen. Code 1895, § 444; Stoner v. State, 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 602. With but little less doubt we hold the provision in the Waycross ordinance against selling to females to be valid, though it may become unreasonable in certain special cases.

12. The limitation in the Waycross ordinance that not less than one pint shall be sold seems to be sustainable upon the reasoning of the Kansas case of Monroe v. City of Lawrence, cited above; but the limiting of the maximum quantity of one quart seems to be arbitrary, when we reflect that, by its very definition, "near beer" is a beverage which, even if drunk to excess, will not produce intoxication.

13. The provision for the forfeiture of the license upon the holder being convicted of violating the provisions of the ordinance or the laws of the state is, of course, reasonable.

14. The requirement that the bottles, vessels, barrels, etc., containing the liquid shall be plainly stamped, so as to show their contents and the names of the manufacturers, is valid. So, also, is the provision of the Thomasville ordinance that the dealer shall furnish samples to be tested for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of alcohol contained in the different drinks offered for sale; and, while it is competent for the ordinance to provide that a failure to furnish the samples shall be taken as prima facie evidence that the dealer is keeping intoxicating liquors on hand for the purpose of illegal sale (the municipal offense), this provision is entirely nugatory so far as it attempts to create thereby a statutory presumption of his guilt of selling intoxicating liquor—an offense cognizable only in the state courts.

15. With the amount of license fee fixed in the ordinances these plaintiffs in error have no concern. They are indigent Confederate soldiers, and therefore exempt. Burch v. Ocilla, 5 Ga. App. 65, 62 S. E. 666. We may say, in passing, however, that the provision in the Thomasville ordinance limiting the exemption to only one place of business seems to be contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Hartfield v. City of Columbus, 109 Ga. 112, 34 S. E. 288. So, also, by way of obiter, we may call attention to the fact that under the sixteenth section of the charter of the city of Waycross (Acts 1889, p. 904) the mayor and aldermen are given the power to license the sale of malt liquors of every kind whatever; but the minimum fee is fixed at $10,000. "Near beer" is a malt liquor, and is subject to taxation as such, irrespective of its lack of intoxicating quality. Eaves v. State, 113 Ga. 757, 39 S. E. 318. There is a perfectly good reason why the courts construe the words "malt liquors," in a prohibition statute, as including only intoxicating liquor, while they add no such limitation by construction if the words appear in a taxing statute.

16. There is involved in the contentions of the plaintiffs in error an insistence that, because they are indigent Confederate soldiers, they stand on some securer footing as to their right to engage in the business than other persons do. They are exempt from the payment of the municipal license fee. Both ordinances inferentially, if not directly, recognize that fact. Otherwise than this, indigent soldiers stand in regard to the reasonable police regulations of the municipalities just as all other citizens do. Section 1642 of the Political Code of 1895, as amended in 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 24; Van Epps' Supp. § 6146a), provides that these worthy objects of legislative grace may conduct business in any town or city "without paying license for the privilege." Certain exceptions are enumerated; but the selling of "near beer" is not one of the exceptions. Burch v. Ocilla, supra. They are not exempt from the state tax. Acts 1908, p. 1112. But, by exempting them from the payment of the municipal license fee, the Legislature did not intend that they should be exempt also from those reasonable police regulations which the cities and towns have the right to enact. Whatever business is open to other citizens, with or without restriction, upon the payment of a license fee, is open to them upon the same restrictions, without the payment of that fee. The writer, and, indeed, all the judges of this court, have the highest love and veneration for those veterans who served the state so unselfishly in perilous days gone by, and we have no desire to take away from them any exemptions or to limit any privilege extended to them by the laws of the state; but, with all our love for them, we must recognize that they are nevertheless subject to the laws and regulations enacted and adopted to preserve the health, peace, good order, and safety of the state and the various communities thereof. See the concluding remarks of the opinion in Land v. State, 5 Ga. App. 98, 62 S. E. 885.

17. From what we have said above, it will appear that we are of the opinion that the constitutional objections urged against the Thomasville ordinance are not well taken. The classification of the business as being different in kind from that of selling drugs and ordinary nonintoxicating drinks, such as soda water, etc., is not arbitrary or factitious. It does not deny to the plaintiff in error, or to any one else, the impartial and complete protection contemplated by the Constitution; nor does it deprive him of his property without due process of law.

18. Coming, now, to the more specific application of these general principles to the cases made by the records before us, it will be seen that several provisions of the Waycross ordinance have been held to be unreasonable and void, and that one requirement of the Thomasville ordinance has been held to be invalid. What effect does this have upon the convictions? An ordinance may be void in part and good in part. The void and the good may be so interdependent as to render the whole void, or may be so separable as to allow a segregation and the enforcement of one part, while the remainder is nugatory. Ex parte Byrd, 84 Ala. 17, 4 South. 397, 5 Am. St. Rep. 328; City Council of Augusta v. Clark, 124 Ga. 254, 52 S. E. 881 (3, 4); Joseph v. Milledgeville, 97 Ga. 513, 25 S. E. 323; Mattox v. State, 115 Ga. 212, 41 S. E. 709 (2); Duren v. Stephens, 126 Ga. 496, 54 S. E. 1045; Papworth v. State, 103 Ga. 36, 31 S. E. 402. So, also, an ordinance apparently reasonable on its face may be shown to be unreasonable and invalid as actually applied to the existing state of circumstances. Bearden v. Madison, 78 Ga. 184; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220.

We do not think that the invalid requirement in the Thomasville ordinance is so material a part of the enactment, so interwoven into the whole legislative scheme, that its presence renders the entire ordinance void. Nor does the existence of this clause in the ordinance render the conviction of Campbell, the plaintiff in error, contrary to law. He made no attempt to comply with the ordinance. He made no application whatever to the council. He tendered no bond at all. The only unreasonable requirement is that the sureties tendered on the prescribed bond should be freeholders of the city of Thomasville. The defendant, who had ignored the ordinance entirely, stands somewhat upon the same footing as did Gundling in his case against Chicago. Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the United States Supreme Court in that case, said: "It seems somewhat doubtful whether the plaintiff in error is in a position to raise the question of the invalidity of the ordinance because of the alleged arbitrary power of the mayor to grant or refuse it. He made no application for a license, and, of course, the mayor has not refused it. Non constat that he would have refused it if application had been made by the plaintiff in error. Whether the discretion of the mayor is arbitrary or not would seem to be unimportant to the plaintiff in error, so long as he made no application for the exercise of that discretion in his favor and was not refused a license." Gundling v. Chicago, supra.

In the case of City Council of Augusta v. Clark, 124 Ga. 260, 52 S. E. 881, it was contended that the requirement, in an ordinance then under consideration, for the giving of a certain bond, was void. The court said: "It is said that this act is unconstitutional, for various reasons set forth in the petition, and, the act being unconstitutional, as the ordinance requires a compliance with the act, the ordinance is void for requiring something to be done which the city council had no right to require. It is unnecessary in this case to pass upon the constitutionality of the act. If it is constitutional, then the plaintiffs, so far as the character of the business regulated by the act is concerned, would be compelled to give the bond therein required."

* * * But suppose the act is unconstitutional; then in order to obtain a license from the city of Augusta they would not be required to give a bond, because they could not be required to give bond under an unconstitutional law. The city council had a right to impose a tax upon the class of persons to which the plaintiffs belonged, and the tax as imposed is not subject to any of the objections urged by them. They are therefore subject to the payment of the tax. They have not paid the tax required of them. When they have paid or tendered this tax, and a license is refused them on the ground that they have not given the bond required by the ordinance, they can then raise the question whether the act referred to in the ordinance is not unconstitutional. The question as to the constitutionality of the act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 870) is therefore prematurely made. It may be that the city will not require the bond to be given. If it does, then the plaintiffs may with propriety invoke a decision of the court as to the validity of that law. If that part of the ordinance requiring the bond to be given is invalid, its invalidity would not void the whole ordinance, for the reasons given in a preceding portion of this opinion; and, until they have complied with that part of the ordinance which is unquestionably valid, they will not be heard to question the constitutionality of the act of the General Assembly that is made a part of the ordinance by reference to the same." City Council of Augusta v. Clark, 124 Ga. 260, 52 S. E. 881.

So, too, if the present plaintiff in error had made an application to the city council of Thomasville, accompanying it with a bond otherwise sufficient, and they had refused it because the sureties were not freeholders of the city, he would have been in a position to insist on the point; but, as it is, he is not in a position to do so. The conviction in his case will be sustained.

In Jones' Case it appears that he did attempt to comply with the ordinance, and his efforts were met at the threshold by unreasonable requirements. Indeed, looking at the Waycross ordinance as a whole, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that its but thinly guised purpose was prohibition, and not regulation, and that it is therefore void for repugnancy to the general policy evinced by the Legislature in the passage of the "near beer" tax act of 1908. Therefore the conviction in the Jones Case will be set aside.

COLEMAN v. STATE. (No. 1,802.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1024*)—WRIT OF ERROR—RIGHT OF PROSECUTION TO REVIEW.

The Court of Appeals is without jurisdiction to consider the grounds of a motion to dismiss a bill of exceptions, predicated upon matters arising prior to the judgment granting or overruling the motion for new trial. Bryan v. State, 3 Ga. App. 26, 59 S. E. 185 (1, b).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1024.*]

2. DISORDERLY HOUSE (§ 4*)—KEEPING LEWD HOUSE.

In a prosecution for keeping a lewd house, evidence of the general reputation of the house and of the women living therein is admissible in corroboration of other facts and circumstances in the case; but it is error to instruct the jury that "it is not necessary for the state to prove that there were acts of adultery or fornication committed at such house." In order to authorize a conviction, the jury must be satisfied, either by direct evidence or by the circumstances, that the house was kept for the practice of adultery or fornication. It is the gist of the offense that the house was kept for that purpose. It was therefore error to instruct the jury that "it would be sufficient if the state proves to your reasonable satisfaction that she bears the general reputation of being a lewd woman, and that the house or place kept by her bears the general reputation of being a lewd house or place of prostitution, and that the women there at that house bear the general reputation of being lewd women, and that men were seen to frequent the place by day and by night." Reputation for lewdness may be a circumstance tending to show the character of the house; but the probative value of this circumstance is for the jury alone, and the facts and circumstances adduced in any case must reasonably satisfy the jury that the house was maintained for the purposes of prostitution, and that adultery or fornication was actually committed, and not merely that the reputation of the house or of its inmates is bad.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Crisp County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Marie Coleman was convicted for keeping a lewd house, and she brings error. Reversed.

Crum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Walter F. George, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Marie Coleman was convicted of the offense of keeping a lewd house, and excepted to the overruling of her motion for a new trial. Several witnesses testified that the defendant kept and maintained a house which had the general reputation of being a lewd house, that the defendant and the other women living there had the reputation of being lewd women, that men frequented the house at all hours of the night and day, that when the women appeared on the streets they were nicely and neatly dressed, and so far as witnesses knew they were not married and had no lawful vocations. One of them, a policeman, said that he had been to the house several times to serve processes and papers, and had seen the women walking about the house, rather loosely dressed, in company with men who did not board there, and had heard them engaged in profane and vulgar conversation. He had also seen the women drinking with the men.

1. The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions is based on alleged errors prior to the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, and is governed by Bryan v. State, 3 Ga. App. 26, 59 S. E. 185.

2. The controlling question in the case arises upon an exception to the following excerpt from the charge of the judge: "In order to make out a case of that kind, it is not incumbent or necessary for the state to prove that there were really acts of adultery or fornication committed at such place as alleged. It would be sufficient if the state proves to your reasonable satisfaction that she bears the general reputation of being a lewd woman, and that the house or place kept by her bears the general reputation of being a lewd house or place of prostitution, and that the women there at that house bear the general reputation of being lewd women, and that men were seen to frequent the place by day and by night." A person who maintains a place where fornication or adultery is practiced is guilty of the offense of keeping a lewd house. Pen. Code 1895, § 391. The practice of adultery or fornication at the house is the very gist of the offense; and the state must prove that fact beyond a reasonable doubt before the jury would be authorized to convict the defendant. The method by which the ultimate fact may be proved is a different matter; but it must be proved either by direct or circumstantial evidence. The jury may infer the existence of the fact from relevant and probative circumstances; and where the circumstances detailed in the charge of the judge appear in the evidence, and the jury find the defendant guilty, the verdict will not be set aside on the ground that it is without evidence to support it. Mimbs v. State, 2 Ga. App. 387, 58 S. E. 499; Hogan v. State, 76 Ga. 82.

But the jury were not bound to find the defendant guilty, even though they believed the circumstances in fact existed, because they might have taken the view that they could not infer therefrom beyond a reasonable doubt the ultimate fact which alone would legalize the conviction. When the judge charged the jury that "it is not incumbent or necessary for the state to prove that there were really acts of adultery or fornication committed at such place," he made an inaccurate statement of the law. The error was not cured by the subsequent statement that if the jury believed the circumstances enumerated "that would be sufficient evidence." As was said by Judge Bleckley in the case of Kinnebrew v. State, 80 Ga. 232, 237, 5 S. E. 56, 59: "The logical sufficiency of the facts to warrant the inference, and also the existence of the facts themselves, ought to be left to the jury for their determination. * * * The judge cannot pilot the jury in their passage by inference from fact to fact; but he can point out the line of transit which the law authorizes them to follow if they think the facts in evidence sustain them in taking that route. * * * To instruct them that they are legally authorized to infer one thing from another, or from certain others, but that they are to decide for themselves both whether the given premises are true and whether the inference can and ought in fact to be made, is only to say that the law permits them to reason in the manner indicated, if they determine that the evidence and the ordinary test of human experience warrant them in so doing. It is but to tell them that the law will be satisfied if they are, and that they will not have done a vain thing. No doubt there is danger of intimating an opinion, or of leading the jury to think that an opinion is intimated, though the purpose be only to discriminate between legal and logical sufficiency; and this danger is not lessened, but rather increased, by the fact that in most instances the one kind of sufficiency exists wherever the other does." The learned Chief Justice then cites and reviews a great number of cases, and illustrates how and when the judge may instruct the jury that, if they believe certain facts, they may infer another fact essential to conviction. He demonstrates that the judge is on dangerous ground, in view of the "dumb act," when he begins to instruct the jury in the rules of logic, and to tell them what conclusions they may draw from stated premises; and in no event should the jury be instructed that it is their duty to draw the inference which they would be authorized to draw.

In the case at bar the charge of the judge in all probability took from the jury their right to acquit the defendant under the evidence introduced before them. The jury had a legal right to acquit the defendant, even though they believed all the state's evidence, if that evidence failed to satisfy them beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of the ultimate fact which is the gist of the offense charged, to wit, that acts of adultery and fornication had been practiced at the house which the defendant is alleged to have maintained. The charge was apt to make them believe that under that evidence they had no discretion but to bring in a verdict of guilty. Compare Patterson v. State, 85 Ga. 131, 11 S. E. 620, 21 Am. St. Rep. 152; Hayden v. Neal, 62 Ga. 365.

MCKAIN v. MULLEN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

April 27, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 161*) — RIGHT TO APPEAL — WAIVER.

A party who accepts the benefit of a decree waives his right to appeal from that decree, unless he is so absolutely entitled to the benefit received that a reversal will not affect his right to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 979-983; Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 161*)—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

One cannot avail himself of that part of a decree which is favorable to him, accept its benefit, and then prosecute an appeal to reverse such portion of the same decree as militates against him, when the acceptance of the benefit from the one part is totally inconsistent with the appeal from the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 980; Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 162*)—RIGHT TO APPEAL—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS.

The defendant in a suit by which his tax deed is set aside cannot unreservedly accept the taxes, interest, and charges tendered by the bill and ordered by the decree to be paid him, and then appeal from the decree. His acceptance is a positively implied waiver of his right to appeal. Nor will an offer to return the money, made long after its acceptance, avail to prevent dismissal of an appeal in such case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County.

Bill by George L. McKain against E. M. Mullen. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

F. P. Moats and Geo. W. Johnson, for appellant. F. H. McGregor, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. Mullen purchased real estate at a tax sale. The sale was made for a delinquency upon an assessment, in the name of the Little Kanawha Lumber Company, of a lot on Depot street, in the city of Parkersburg. The lot was not redeemed from this sale. After the expiration of the statutory period for redemption, Mullen received a deed for the lot from the county clerk. McKain, who had purchased, through McGraw, the title of the Little Kanawha Lumber Company to the lot in question, sought by suit in chancery to set aside Mullen's tax deed for irregularities alleged. He had tendered to Mullen a proper amount for redemption before the institution of his suit. The tender was refused. In his bill he kept this tender good, brought the money into court, and it was deposited with the clerk. This suit resulted in a decree annulling the tax deed, and directing the clerk to pay Mullen the amount necessary to reimburse him in the premises. Mullen accepted that amount pursuant to the terms of the decree. He receipted to the clerk therefor. More than one year afterwards he applied for an appeal from the decree. The appeal was allowed him. The appellee, McKain, moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that, by the acceptance of the taxes, interest, and charges, pursuant to the terms of the decree, Mullen acquiesced in the decree setting aside his tax deed, recognized the validity of that decree, and thereby waived his right to appeal from it. After this motion was made, Mullen sought to return the money to the clerk from whom he had accepted it. The clerk would not take it back. He then replied to the motion to dismiss, bringing the money into this court. He insists that he has a right to make restitution of the money he accepted, and that his right of appeal is not affected in the premises.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is, of course, first in order. If that motion is well taken, we have nothing to do with the merits of the errors assigned and submitted for our consideration.

Did Mullen lose his right to appeal? Clearly so, by reason and authority. The money he accepted represented what he had paid for the title declared void. It was tendered him by the decree as essential to the action of the court in setting aside the tax deed. Its tender to him was a substantial portion of the decree made upon the equities arising between the parties. That portion of the decree was inseparably connected with the order annulling the tax title. And so inseparably was it connected therewith that it could not be recognized by Mullen without his recognizing the decree annulling his tax deed. As the decree stood, it gave him benefit. True, it gave him not what he had sought in the litigation, but it gave him the fruits of the controversy that the court in equity and law deemed to be his. He voluntarily accepted these fruits, yet he seeks by appeal to destroy the rights under the decree belonging to the other party. He cannot have the one and deny the other. The acceptance of the taxes tendered and deposited was a recognition of McKain's title, and it is inconsistent with the prosecution of this appeal which attacks the title. The money was tendered, and later decreed to be paid, for the sole purpose of clearing that title of a claim to it. Therefore the acceptance of the money so tendered and decreed plainly recognized the clearing away of the claim. Mullen had no right to the money, except as compensation for what he had paid out, as a basis of his claim of title to the land. When he accepted the money he relinquished something for it. That which he relinquished was the claim that he was a valid tax purchaser. Surely he was not entitled to both the lot and this money. He could claim only the one or the other. The claim of the one is totally inconsistent with any claim of the other. His acceptance of one can mean nothing but his release of the other. Any other view is at variance with reason and right. The clerk could pay him the money only for one purpose—to reimburse him for giving up his claim of title set aside by the decree. When he accepted the money, he must have recognized this fact. And his acceptance can be taken to mean nothing but that he meant to be so reimbursed. He could not be so reimbursed without giving up his further claim of title upon the tax purchase. He knew that the money proffered him by the decree represented his relinquishment of this claim. When he accepted the money, he also accepted that which it represented. He is bound by his act. It cannot be otherwise in conscience, reason, or law.

"It is a general rule that a party who accepts the benefit of a judgment waives a right to prosecute an appeal from it." Elliott on App. Pro. § 150. This principle has been almost universally approved. 2 Cyc. 651; 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 174; Paine v. Woolley, 80 Ky. 568; Dunham v. Randall, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 265, 32 S. W. 720; Tyler v. Shea, 4 N. D. 377, 61 N. W. 468, 50 Am. St. Rep. 660. Extensive notes of cases touching the subject are found in 13 Am. Dec. 546, and in 45 Am. St. Rep. 271. The rule does not apply "to cases where the appellant is shown to be so absolutely entitled to the sum collected upon the judgment that the reversal of it will not affect his right to it." 2 Cyc. 653; Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 8, 2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346; Reynes v. Dumont, 130 U. S. 394, 9 Sup. Ct. 486, 32 L. Ed. 934. The case before us is plainly without the scope of this exception. Mullen's act in accepting the money decreed was wholly inconsistent with his appeal. He was not so absolutely entitled to the sum that a reversal would not affect his rights to it. A reversal, such as he seeks, would declare that he had no right whatever to the money which he re-celved under the decree. "He stands thus in the attitude of holding the fruit of the judgment to which he may not be entitled if his appeal succeeds and yet persisting in his appeal. The trouble is that he cannot gain the right to recover more without incurring the hazard of recovering less." Alexander v. Alexander, 104 N. Y. 643, 10 N. E. 37. A party cannot avail himself of that part of a decree which is favorable to him, and accept its benefit, while prosecuting an appeal to reverse such portion of the same decree as militates against him, when the acceptance of the benefit from the one part is inconsistent with the appeal from the other. Moore v. Williams, 29 Ill. App. 597; Albright v. Oyster, 60 Fed. 644, 9 O. C. A. 173; Chase v. Driver, 92 Fed. 780, 34 O. C. A. 668; Webster-Glover Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. St. Croix Co., 71 Wis. 317, 36 N. W. 864. "The defendant could not proceed to enforce such portions as were in his favor, and appeal from those which were against him. The right to proceed on the judgment and enjoy its fruits and the right of appeal were not concurrent; on the contrary, were totally inconsistent. An election to take one of these courses was therefore a renunciation of the other." Bennett v. Van Syckel, 18 N. Y. 481. So connected was the money with the order sought to be reversed that Mullen could not convert it to his use without acquiescing in the decree against him. "If a party to an action acquiesces in a judgment or order against him, he thereby waives his right to have such judgment or order reviewed by an appellate court." 2 Cyc. 644. Nothing can be implied from Mullen's voluntary act in accepting, without reservation, what the decree gave him, but that he recognized the validity of the decree against him. "Any act on the part of a defendant by which he impliedly recognizes the validity of a judgment against him operates as a waiver of his right to appeal therefrom, or to bring error to reverse it." 2 Cyc. 654. "A person who does a positive act which according to its natural import is so inconsistent with the enforcement of a right in his favor as to induce a reasonable belief that such right has been dispensed with will be deemed to have waived it." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1103. It is this principle of acquiescence and waiver which gives existence to the general rule we have quoted. True, the law favors appeal. The act of waiver must be clear and decisive. And it has been authoritatively said that "no waiver or release of errors operating as a bar to the further prosecution of an appeal or writ of error can be implied except from conduct which is inconsistent with the claim of a right to reverse the judgment or decree, which it is sought to bring in review." Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 8, 2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346. This court held at this term in Shields v. Simonton, 63

S. E. 972, that appellant's act did not amount to a waiver of appeal, because it was not inconsistent, under the circumstances presented, with a claim of right to reverse the decree. In that case the act itself had in its purview the continuance of the appeal. The force of the act was expressly contingent upon the result of the appeal. In the case now before us it is not so. No other import than that of waiver of right to reverse can be implied from Mullen's act in taking that which the decree gave him. It was his privilege to accept what the decree offered in redemption of the lot from his claim thereto. His acceptance of the offer consummated this redemption. This principle of waiver of right to appeal by an act, without reservation, clearly inconsistent with the right, is distinctly acknowledged in the dictum of Judge Haymond in Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 520.

Mullen, when he was awarded his appeal, plainly had no right to it. Does his offer to make restitution avail him? We hold that it does not. Repayment cannot reinstate a right that he did not have. More than a year elapsed between his acceptance of the money decreed to him and his taking this appeal. During all that time he was enjoying what the decree had given—a return of the money he had invested in the claim of tax title. And during all that time, by his act, he was causing McKain to believe that all litigation affecting his lot by reason of the tax sale was at an end. Acting upon this belief, McKain had a right to treat the property as clear, to make improvements upon it, or to dispose of it without risk of further claim thereto by Mullen or depreciation in value of the lot. Shall we now change the situation that Mullen's own act brought forth? It would not be right to do so. Mullen, having elected to adopt a course of action, must be confined to it, so as not to prejudice McKain. He cannot in fairness revoke his acceptance of the money and his positively implied waiver of appeal. "A party waives an error when he goes by and proceeds in the case with other matters, so that it would be unjust or unfair to go back and take advantage of it." Powell on App. Pro. § 96. We assume that McKain relied upon the waiver, as he had a right to do. After the right of appeal had been lost to Mullen, then McKain had a vested right to his decree, free from review. No further right of appeal from the decree can be conferred. 7 Cur. Law, 130. "In some decisions it has been intimated that a restitution of the money collected upon a judgment restores the right to appeal, or bring error; but in those jurisdictions where the question has been directly passed upon it has been held otherwise." 2 Cyc. 654. "The appellant cannot revive his right of appeal, lost by acceptance of payment, by tendering the money received back to the appellee."

2 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 177. Many cases that have considered this point so hold. Among them are Paine v. Woolley, supra; Dunham v. Randall, supra; Portland Con. Co. v. O'Neil, 24 Or. 54, 32 Pac. 764; Morgan v. Ladd, 7 Ill. 414. "Payment produces a permanent and irrevocable discharge, after which the judgment cannot be restored by any subsequent agreement, nor kept on foot to cover new and distinct engagements." Freeman on Judgments, § 468.

The motion is sustained. The appeal will be dismissed.

TOWN OF CAMERON v. HICKS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 34*) — RULES OF CONSTRUCTION.

In their general nature, the rules of interpretation and construction applicable to pleadings are the same as those pertaining to other writings and documents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 21*)—CONSTRUCTION—REPUGNANCY.

If terms used in a declaration signify in the abstract something different from what they mean when read with the context or as a part of the whole instrument, they are to be taken in the latter sense. To vitiate a pleading on the ground of repugnancy, the conflict or inconsistency must be irreconcilable. If the intent is clear, nice exceptions are ignored.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 444*)—ACTIONS AGAINST—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Though, in charging an administrator in respect to a debt made by his decedent, it is usual to allege that he detains, or owes and detains, the money, the omission of the word "detains" and use of the word "owes" only do not vitiate a declaration, charging the defendant as administrator and setting forth facts, imposing liability in a representative capacity only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—DECLARATION—ALLEGATION OF DEMAND.

In an action by a municipal corporation on the bond of an officer thereof for the recovery of money received by him virtute officii, it is not necessary to aver presentation to him for payment of an order drawn for the amount or service upon him of a copy of an order made and entered by the council, requiring him to pay it, unless such mode of procedure is prescribed by a statute or ordinance, or stipulated in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—DECLARATION—ALLEGATION OF DEMAND.

As the custody of public funds by municipal officers partakes of the nature of a bailment for hire, a demand for payment is a condition precedent to a right of action for the money, but, in the absence of a prescribed or stipulated form of demand, it suffices to aver any facts showing authority in the defendant to pay, and a desire on the part of the plaintiff for payment, known to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—ALLEGATION OF DEMAND.

In such case, it is sufficient to aver the making and entry of an order by the town, requiring payment of the money and notice thereof on the part of the officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—ALLEGATION OF DEMAND.

As a municipal corporation can move, in respect to such matters, only through its council or governing tribunal, acting as a body, the declaration should allege the making of an order to pay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—OFFICERS—ACTIONS ON BONDS—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Though inartistic and variant from good form, an averment that the town, not its council, made an order or passed an ordinance, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

9. PLEADING (§ 21*)—DECLARATION—INCONSISTENT ALLEGATIONS.

If there be joint liability on the part of a defendant and others in respect to duty, but, for some reason disclosed by the declaration, a separate right of action against him, allegations, applicable to all, concerning the duty, and others, applicable to the defendant only, pertaining to the remedy, are neither inconsistent nor objectionable on demurrer.

10. DEPOSITARIES (§ 10*)—PUBLIC MONEY—INSURER.

For reasons of public policy the custodian of public money is held liable and must account therefor as a debtor or insurer, notwithstanding the relation, subsisting between him and the state or municipality, is substantially that of bailment for hire, and no loss of the fund otherwise than by an act of God or the public enemy, will relieve him from the obligation to pay it. Loss by fire, theft, burglary, bank failure, or the like does not relieve him, however careful and prudent he may have been.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositaries, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

11. PLEADING (§ 21*)—"REPUGNANCY."

Repugnancy only exists where a sense is annexed to words which is either absolutely inconsistent therewith, or, being apparently so, is not accompanied by anything to explain or define them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Action by the Town of Cameron against John A. Hicks, as administrator of the estate of C. Y. Benedum, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. Newman, for plaintiff in error. McCamic & Clarke, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The town of Cameron recovered a judgment against John A. Hicks, as administrator of the estate of O. Y. Benedum, for the sum of $3,484.77, in an action of debt in the circuit court of Marshall county, on a submission thereof to the court in lieu of a jury.

The overruling of the demurrer to the declaration, rejection of a certain plea, and the finding on the evidence are the subjects of complaint. The grounds of demurrer are: (1) The charge is that the defendant owes, not that he detains or owes and detains. (2) The allegation, respecting the making and service of an order, requiring the decedent to pay over the money, are insufficient.

Tested by the facts, the declaration sets forth liability in a representative capacity only. According to these, the town issued and sold its bonds for sewerage purposes, and placed the proceeds thereof in the hands of T. C. Pipes, Clell Nichols, and A. E. Fox, whom it had appointed its bond commissioners. Benedum, the decedent, became surety on the bond of Fox in the penalty of $4,000, the condition whereof was that Fox should faithfully perform the duties of bond commissioner and account for and pay over all money that should come into his hands by virtue of his office. Some of the counts say he received, as such commissioner, $3,300, and others that he, Pipes and Nichols, as such, received $10,000, and charge, as a breach of the condition, the nonpayment by Fox of $3,255.56, part thereof, after demand therefor. There is no suggestion of a devistavit, and the charge is that the defendant owes the money as administrator. It therefore imports an obligation in that capacity, and no other, to pay it. Strictly and technically speaking, he detains the money. The word "owes," standing alone, would have a broader meaning, but it must be read in connection with other parts of the declaration. Its true meaning, as used in that instrument, is determined, not by its form or significance in the abstract, but by the context. In their general nature the rules of construction applicable to pleadings are not materially different from those pertaining to other documents or writings. It is true everything must be taken most strongly against the party pleading, but this maxim is operative only when two meanings present themselves. If, on a fair and reasonable interpretation of the words used, no ambiguity appears, it has no application. 1 Chitty on Pleading (11th Ed.) 237, says: "But, in applying this maxim, the other rules must be kept in view, and particularly those relating to the degree of certainty or precision required in pleading. The maxim must be received with this qualification: That the language of the pleading is to have a reasonable intendment and construction; and, where an expression is capable of different meanings, that shall be taken which will support the declaration, etc., and not the other, which would defeat it. * * * But, if it be clearly capable of different meanings, it does not appear to clash with any rule of construction, applied even to criminal proceedings, to construe it in that sense, in which the party framing the charge must be understood to have used it, if he intended that his charge should be consistent with itself. * * * And if, where the sense may be ambiguous, it is sufficiently marked by the context or other means in what sense they were intended to be used, no objection can be made on the ground of repugnancy, which only exists where a sense is annexed to words which is either absolutely inconsistent therewith, or, being apparently so, is not accompanied by anything to explain or define them. If the case be clear, nice exceptions ought not to be regarded." We applied this principle in Ceranto v. Trimboli, 63 W. Va. 340, 60 S. E. 138. From what has been said it must be apparent that the use of the word "owes" and the omission of the word "detains" constitute nothing more than a formal defect, if, indeed, any at all. It amounts to a departure from the customary form of allegation, an immaterial matter, if the declaration is sufficient in substance and certain to a "certain intent in general."

The allegation as to the order to pay over the money is that the town of Cameron on a certain day made an order requiring the three commissioners, not Fox alone, to pay it to the town sergeant, naming him, and that the latter had notice thereof. The first and second counts say Fox alone received $3,300; while the third charges all three with $10,000. As to the first and second, an order binding all three would bind Fox; for the fund in his possession was subject to the control and disposition of the council, and in a certain sense his custody thereof and action relating thereto were the custody and action of all three. In both of these counts it appears that these three persons were named in the ordinance authorizing the issuance and sale of the bonds as commissioners to dispose of them and receive the proceeds, in pursuance of which the bond sued on was executed. This made them joint commissioners, and the acts of each were prima facie the acts of all in respect to the management and control of the fund under the direction of the council. The third count is consistent with the charge. It charges all with the receipt of $10,000 and the issuance of an order requiring all to pay it over.

In respect to the averments of notice and demand for payment, the criticism is more difficult to answer. The first count says the bond commissioners and the administrator had notice of the making of the order, and that the money had been demanded of Fox and his administrator; second, that Fox had notice of the making of the order, and that the money had been demanded of him as bond commissioner; and, the third, that he had notice of the making of the order, and the sum of $10,000 had been demanded of the bond commissioners. In none of them is it charged that the order to pay over made by the council was presented to, or served upon, any of the commissioners. Necessity of averment of presentation for payment of an order drawn on the commissioners in favor of the sergeant or service of a copy of the order entered on the minutes of the council, directing payment, is predicated on the principles declared in State v. Hayes, 30 W. Va. 107, 3 S. E. 177. An examination of that case, however, discloses the basis of the decision to be the statutory provisions, prescribing the mode of disbursement of county and district funds by county and district treasurers, and positively inhibiting payment otherwise than on orders or judgments and decrees. These provisions are not in terms applicable to the officers of municipal corporations, and the mode of disbursement of the funds of such corporations seems to be left, by the general statute (chapter 47, Code 1899 [Code 1906, §§ 1941-1910]), as a subject for determination and regulation by ordinances of the council. The declaration does not disclose any provisions of the ordinance by or under which the commissioners were appointed, defining their powers, duties, or rights as against the town, except in the general manner already indicated. It only says an ordinance passed by the council under which they were appointed and requiring them to execute bonds was ratified by the voters at a special election, and they executed the official bonds, sold the municipal bonds, received the money, and failed to pay over a part of it on demand after an order had been made and entered of record, requiring them to do so, and of which they had notice. Nor is any other ordinance set forth prescribing a particular mode of accounting or disbursement. Whether any such ordinance provisions exist we are unable to say. The prevailing rule is that courts other than those of the municipality will not take judicial notice of city ordinances. Smith, Munic. Cor. § 556, note 422; Dill, Munic. Cor. §§ 83, 413. In the absence of statutory or other provisions introducing into the contract between the decedent and the town covenants or conditions imposing upon the latter the duty to perform conditions precedent to the right of action, and specifying the manner of performance, a general demand, sufficient to terminate a bailment, if it were a mere bailment, is sufficient. It is not perceived how anything more could be required. If we should say the demand must be made in a particular way, that would render a demand made in any other form ineffectual, and there is no reason for our giving preference to one form or mode over another. If the plaintiff had assumed the necessity of making and averring the demand in a particular manner, it could only have surmised or guessed at what in the opinion of this court that manner would be, and proceeded at its peril. On the other hand, the averment of a demand in general terms, stating sufficient facts to enable the court to see that payment was requested, not a mere conclusion of law, admits evidence to prove it, and exposes the defendant to no danger whatever, since the court may be trusted to say whether the facts stated amount to a request. In other words, while no particular form of demand is necessary, and it is not sufficient merely to say the plaintiff demanded payment, it does suffice to aver facts from which the court may see that payment was requested. Such a request by a town council must necessarily differ in form from one made by an individual, since it must act officially and as a body. Its action is always evidenced or manifested by the adoption of a motion, order, resolution, or ordinance. As this is essential, it should, of course, be averred, and, as such action could be taken in the absence of the agent having the custody of the funds, notice to him of the action taken should be alleged. This seems to be all the rule declared in Board v. Parsons, 22 W. Va. 308, requires. In that case the board of education made an order requiring the sheriff to pay its school funds to his successor and caused a copy of it to be served on him, and the court said it thereupon became his duty to pay the money. Authority to pay and notice thereof and of the desire of the board that payment be made seem to have been regarded as amply sufficient to confer a right of action. Nor do we think any particular form of notice essential. No statute nor ordinance prescribes it. The case last cited does not go so far as to say that knowledge of the order to pay over the money derived otherwise than from the service of a copy thereof would not be sufficient. All it decides in this respect is that the making of the order and service of a copy thereof is sufficient. That any other form of notice would be insufficient is neither suggested nor implied.

It is equally unimportant and immaterial in our opinion that some of the counts aver notice to Fox only and his administrator, while the others aver notice to all three of the bond commissioners. Notice to one would bind them all. They acted as a body, and all stood on the same footing; no one of the three holding a superior position to, or one of authority over, the others. They were all responsible and legally bound to see that the trust was faithfully executed. One of them called upon for the performance of a trust duty that he could not perform without the aid of the others was bound to procure their assistance, or at least request it, and his request would convey notice. It is said the averment of an order directing all three of the commissioners to pay over the fund in the counts in which Fox alone is charged with having received money vitiates those counts. We are unable to concur in this view. These counts make the bond commissioners joint officials, and this character is not changed by the averment that Fox alone received or had in his hands part of the money, or was liable to be proceeded against separately by reason of his having given a separate bond. His liability was one thing and the security for the faithful performance of his duty a different thing. In charging him jointly with his associates in respect to liability, and charging him separately in respect to remedy and the security he gave, there is no inconsistency. The differences in statement are plainly referable to the difference in status as regards liability and remedy. An order directed to all requiring payment gave a right of action as to all, and the execution of separate bonds gave a right to separate actions to enforce the liability.

Another ground of criticism is found in the averment as to the form of the order; it being stated, not that the council of the town made and entered the order, but that the town of Cameron made and entered it. We think this averment is sufficient. A valid order could only be made by the council. The town, as a corporation, could not act otherwise than by its council. The council is an agency or instrumentality through which it acts. What it does by its agent it does itself in contemplation of law. If the making of the order by the council had been alleged, the legal effect would be that the town had made the order. This is the primary or ultimate fact. The means by which it was effected is mere evidence, which need not be pleaded. Yeager v. Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484, 21 S. E. 752; Lydick v. Baltimore & Ohio Ry. Co., 17 W. Va. 427; Waggener v. Point Pleasant, 42 W. Va. 798, 800, 26 S. E. 352.

The rejection of plea No. 3 and the finding on the evidence may be considered together. The plea was one of confession and avoidance, showing that the money in question had been deposited by the commissioners in a certain bank which had failed, and thereby inflicted a loss which, it is claimed, the commissioners cannot be required to make up. It proceeds upon the legal principle of bailment for hire, averring the duty of the commissioners to have been only that of keeping or preserving the fund for the use of the town. The evidence is in conformity with the rejected plea, and the contention is that the loss of the fund in that way should exonerate the commissioners; no misconduct nor lack of care on their part being disclosed. The question thus presented is purely one of law, namely, whether the bond commissioners were bailees for hire, charged with ordinary prudence, diligence, and care for the safety of the fund or sureties, bound to account for and pay over unless prevented by an act of God or the public enemy. By the great weight of authority, the custodian of public money is not a bailee, bound only to the exercise of a high degree of care, prudence, and diligence for its safety, and excusable for the loss thereof by fire, robbery, theft, or bank failure, when such loss is not in any sense due to negligence or misconduct on his part, but a debtor and insurer to the extent of the amount received, excusable for no losses except those resulting from acts of God or the public enemy. Some decisions hold the contrary, but they are comparatively few in number. In New York the declarations of the courts were for many years somewhat contradictory and inconsistent, but in Tillinghast v. Merrill, 151 N. Y. 135, 45 N. E. 375, 34 L. R. A. 678, 56 Am. St. Rep. 612, the previous decisions were reviewed and discussed, and the question settled in conformity with the weight of authority throughout the country. In Alabama, Maine, South Carolina, and Louisiana the courts adhere to the rule of common-law liability, treating the officer as a bailee for hire. But in practically all of the other states in which the question has been presented the decisions hold the officer to the rule of strict liability. State v. Clarke, 78 N. C. 255; Inhabitants v. Hazard, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 113, 59 Am. Dec. 171; Inhabitants v. McEachron, 33 N. J. Law, 339; Board, etc., v. Jewell, 44 Minn. 427, 46 N. W. 914, 20 Am. St. Rep. 586; County Com'r v. Lineberger, 3 Mont. 231, 35 Am. Rep. 462; State v. Harper, 6 Ohio St. 607, 67 Am. Dec. 363; State v. Nevin, 19 Nev. 162, 7 Pac. 650, 3 Am. St. Rep. 878; State v. Moore, 74 Mo. 418, 41 Am. Rep. 322; Taylor Township v. Morton, 87 Iowa, 550; Rock v. Stinger, 36 Ind. 346; Clay County v. Simonson, 1 Dak. 403, 46 N. W. 592; Lowery v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50, 49 N. W. 1049, 83 Am. Rep. 114; Nason v. Poor Directors, 126 Pa. 445, 17 Atl. 616; State v. Powell, 67 Mo. 395, 29 Am. Rep. 512; Perley v. Muskegon County, 32 Mich. 132, 20 Am. Rep. 637. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are uniform to the same effect. Boyd v. United States, 18 Wall. 17, 20 L. Ed. 527; United States v. Prescott, 3 How. 578, 11 L. Ed. 734; United States v. Thomas, 15 Wall. 337, 21 L. Ed. 89; Smith v. United States, 188 U. S. 156, 23 Sup. Ct. 279, 47 L. Ed. 425; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 133, 18 Sup. Ct. 552, 42 L. Ed. 977. In some instances the courts have excepted such custodians from the common-law rule on the ground of statutory duties imposed. In others, including the federal decisions, the ground of the exception is the express contract in the bond to account for and pay over the money, and in still others the rule of strict liability is based solely upon public policy, the courts declaring that the public good will be better subserved and the public interests safeguarded, and that the danger of loss through fraud and imposition by means of simulated robberies, thefts, burglaries, and fires under the operation of the common-law rule is so great as to justify and demand a stricter rule, even though it occasionally results in hardship and injustice. After a careful consideration of the matter, we are of the opinion that the reasons of public policy advanced in support of the rule of strict liability amply justify its adoption.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

EASTERN OIL CO. v. COULEHAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 27, 1909.)

1. EQUITY (§ 46*)—ADEQUACY OF DEFENSE AT LAW.

Although one have a defense at law, yet if it be doubtful, and he has also an equitable defense, and his defense at law would not be as complete, adequate, and certain as in a court of equity, he should not be required to relinquish his equitable right or defense and to depend solely on his defense at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 151, 152; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 43*) — RIGHT TO SUE — ACTION PENDING AT LAW.

A defendant at law, having a legal defense to an action and a distinct ground for equitable relief against the plaintiff's claim, may bring his suit in equity without waiting for the determination of the action at law, and may, without being compelled to waive his legal defense by confessing judgment or otherwise, have a hearing in a court of equity on the merits of his case, and a decree for the proper relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 164; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 73½*) — LEASES — CONSTRUCTION.

Where, in a lease for oil and gas, there is a habendum "to have and to hold the same unto the lessee for the term of five years from this date, and as much longer as oil or gas is produced or the rental paid thereon," and whereby, in order to extend the term of such lease as provided, oil or gas is required to be produced within such five years' limitation, the date of the lease should be excluded in the computation of time, unless it is plainly manifest therefrom that it should be included.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 200; Dec. Dig. § 73½.*]

4. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*)—DISCOVERY OF OIL OR GAS—EFFECT.

The discovery of oil or gas under a lease giving right of exploration and production, unless there is something in the lease manifesting a contrary intention, is sufficient to create vested estate in the lessee in the exclusive right to produce oil or gas provided for therein—a right, however, which may be lost by abandonment, by failure to produce oil or gas, or pursue the work of production, or development of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 205; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

5. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*)—RIGHT TO PRODUCE—ABANDONMENT OR FORFEITURE.

Such right, once vested by discovery of oil or gas in an upper sand, will not be lost if the lessee continues to drill deeper in search of oil or gas in a lower sand, although he does not succeed in finding oil in the lower sand within the limitation prescribed by the lease; but, if oil or gas be not found in the lower strata, production from the upper sand could not long be deferred without incurring the penalty of abandonment or forfeiture if forfeiture be prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 205; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

6. CONTRACTS (§ 294*) — SUBSTANTIAL PERFORMANCE.

Where, before the time has expired for the performance of a contract, there has been such a substantial compliance therewith by a party thereto that gross injustice would be done him by denying him relief, equity will grant him relief as from a forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1361; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

7. EVIDENCE (§ 7*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Judicial notice will be taken that gas, unlike oil, cannot be brought to the surface and stored to await a market for it, but must remain in the ground, and, unless allowed to waste away, taken out only as and when producer may be able to find a customer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Bill by the Eastern Oil Company against John C. Coulehan and others. Decree for defendants and complainant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

W. S. Stuart and Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellant. J. V. Blair and G. W. Farr, for appellees.

MILLER, P. August 3, 1901, defendant and wife executed and delivered to West Union Gas Company a lease, which on the same day it assigned to plaintiff, and whereby, in consideration of $250 and other valuable considerations, the said lessors granted and demised unto said lessee all the oil and gas in and under a tract of 118 acres in Doddridge county, and also said tract of land for the purpose and exclusive right of operating thereon for oil and gas, together with other rights usually appertaining to such leases, and containing this habendum: "To have and to hold the same unto the lessee for the term of five years from this date, and as much longer as oil or gas is produced, or the rental paid thereon." The lease also stipulates: That the lessor shall be paid a royalty of one-eighth part of all the oil produced and saved, and thereafter at the rate of $200 yearly for each gas well as long as gas therefrom is sold, payable within 60 days after commencing to use gas therefrom; the lessor to have gas for his dwelling from any gas well free by making connections, and, in case no well shall be completed within three months from the date thereof, the same to become absolutely void and of no further effect whatever on either party, unless the lessee shall pay for further continuances of the privileges therein mentioned the sum of $50 quarterly, payable in advance until a well shall be completed. That the lessee may at any time reconvey the premises "thereby granted" and thereupon be forever discharged from all liability to the lessors under any and every provision thereof accruing after such reconveyance and the instrument be no longer binding on either party. In Ohio a lease of this character, for a consideration, with granting clause, a habendum, a condition subsequent or defeasance clause, and a surrendering clause, is held to be a lease and not merely a license. Brown v. Fowler, 65 Ohio St. 507, 521, 63 N. E. 76, citing Woodland Oil Co. v. Crawford, 55 Ohio St. 161, 44 N. E. 1093, 34 L. R. A. 62, and Martin v. Jones, 62 Ohio St. 519, 525, 57 N. E. 238. In this state and in Pennsylvania such leases are generally treated as mere licenses vesting no estate; the title thereto, both as to the period of years and the term thereafter, remaining inchoate and contingent on the finding of oil and gas. Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W. Va. 252, 27 S. E. 220; Steelsmith v. Gartian, 45 W. Va. 27, 29 S. E. 978, 44 L. R. A. 107; Headley v. Hoopengartner, 60 W. Va. 626, 55 S. E. 744.

The plaintiff, having paid the cash consideration, entered, and regularly paid the quarter annual installments of rent in advance for the full period of five years, but did not begin the work of drilling for oil or gas until June, 1906, after the last quarter had begun. It owned other leases adjoining and in the same neighborhood, on some of which it had put down wells, the wells drilled, defining defendant's land as gas, but not oil, producing territory. We take judicial notice that gas, unlike oil, cannot be brought to the surface and stored to await a market for it, but must remain in nature's storehouse, and, unless allowed to waste away, taken out only as and when the producer may be able to find customers to take and consume it.

Plaintiff, having then invested in bonus money and rentals $1,200, in June, 1906, began a well on defendant's land, and about July 20th struck gas in the salt sand at the depth of about 1,240 feet, which, when gauged and tested, showed a capacity of about 3,000,000 cubic feet per day. After striking this gas, however, he concluded to go deeper, to the lower or Indian sand. The well was begun in ample time to have completed it in the lower sand, but shortage of water, due to the drought, caused a delay of several days. Finding the time growing short, and defendant declining to extend the term except upon terms deemed oppressive, orders were given the drillers to work on Sunday. The defendant seeing the drillers at work suggested that they were laying themselves liable to arrest and conviction for working on Sunday, and they were frightened away and refused to work. Thirty minutes, about, after midnight of August 2, 1906, defendant, with witnesses, appeared at the well, where the drillers were at work on the night tower, and, inquiring of and being informed by them that the well was not yet completed in the lower sand, notified them that the lease had expired at midnight, that the rights of lessee had ceased, and that all from that time would be treated as trespassers. The drillers, in the absence of the owners, stopped drilling, went home, and went to bed, and work was not resumed until noon of August 3d, a loss of about 12 hours in time. The drilling then begun was continued until shortly before 1 o'clock of August 4th, when gas in immense quantities was struck in the Indian sand; the only interruption being the second appearance of the defendant with witnesses shortly after the previous midnight to again notify the drillers that the lease had then expired and ordering them off the premises. The plaintiff having refused to vacate the premises, the defendant on August 4, 1906, instituted against the plaintiff in the circuit court of Doddridge county a suit in unlawful detainer to recover possession of the property.

On December 8, 1906, the plaintiff upon its original bill obtained from said circuit court of Doddridge county an injunction protecting it in the possession and occupancy of said land, and enjoining defendant from in any manner interfering with any of its rights specified in said lease of August 3, 1901, and from in any manner interfering with it in the use, occupancy, and operation of said land for oil and gas purposes under said lease, and also from prosecuting his said action of unlawful detainer until plaintiff's rights under said lease should be settled and determined in this suit, and until the further order of the court. The further prayer of the bill was on the grounds alleged that the court would decree plaintiff vested with the title to and interest in all the oil and gas according to and subject to the terms of said lease, and that the said lease be held firm and valid. At January rules, 1907, the plaintiff filed an amended bill amplifying the grounds of relief alleged in the original bill, renewing the prayer thereof, and upon hearing upon said original and amended bill and the separate answer of John C. Coulehan thereto, and upon the depositions and proofs taken and filed in the cause, the decree of September 7, 1907, appealed from, was pronounced by the circuit court, whereby the court, being of opinion that the evidence did not sustain the material grounds for relief alleged, decreed that said injunction be wholly dissolved, the plaintiff's original and amended bills dismissed, but, though expressing no opinion as to the production of gas in the salt sand, reserved to plaintiff the right to interpose the same as a defense to said action of unlawful detainer.

The grounds for relief alleged and especially relied upon by plaintiff are: (1) That having, for the consideration paid and acknowledged, purchased the lease, promptly paid all the bonus and rental money for the full term of five years, and within that period having actually discovered and produced gas in the salt sand, it thereby acquired a vested estate in and the right to produce oil and gas according to the provision of the lease. (2) That whether or not the first ground be good it could, and but for the alleged improper conduct and interference of defendant it would, have discovered and produced gas in the Indian sand before the five years expired.

The defendant relies upon the theories: (1) That even if oil and gas was discovered in the salt sand in July, it was not utilized, but abandoned, evidenced by drilling deeper, pulling the casing, whereby it was drowned out by the water, and defendant thereby deprived of the use of the gas therefrom for domestic purposes according to the terms of the lease. (2) That by the provision of the lease the term of five years expired at midnight of August 2d, and not as plaintiff claims at midnight of August 3, 1906, and that there was no such interference on his part with the completion of the well in the Indian sand within the five years, as claimed by him, as to entitle plaintiff at law or in equity to an extension of time, and that therefore the rights of plaintiff under the lease were wholly terminated at midnight of August 2d, if not then certainly at midnight of August 3d. (3) That equity has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of plaintiff's bill.

By its decree the court below was manifestly of the opinion that the bill presented no grounds of equitable relief, and that whatever rights, if any, plaintiff acquired by its alleged discovery of gas within the five years, was available at law as a defense to defendant's suit of unlawful detainer, wherefore its reservation in the said decree. If plaintiff's rights depended solely on discovery of gas in the first sand, there would be force in this view of the court, although jurisdiction in equity to settle all questions as to the validity and priority of leases, for oil and gas and other minerals and mineral rights, where the parties claim under the same title, has been established by a long line of decisions of this court, beginning perhaps with Thomas v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 385, 12 S. E. 522, and including Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 19 S. E. 436, 25 L. R. A. 222, Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 26 S. E. 271, 36 L. R. A. 566, Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W. Va. 252, 27 S. E. 220, Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 29 S. E. 978, 44 L. R. A. 107, Lowther Oil Co. v. Guffey, 52 W. Va. 83, 43 S. E. 101, Lowther Oil Co. v. Miller-Sibley Co., 53 W. Va. 501, 44 S. E. 433, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, Pyle v. Henderson, 55 W. Va. 122, 46 S. E. 791, Starn v. Huffman, 62 W. Va. 422, 59 S. E. 179, and other cases, and ending with Sult v. Hochstetter Oil Co., 63 W. Va. 317, 61 S. E. 307, and Pheasant v. Hanna, 63 W. Va. 613, 60 S. E. 618. Jurisdiction in equity was maintained in many of these cases on the well-recognized grounds of avoidance of multiplicity of suits, removal of cloud and quieting of title, accounting, avoidance of forfeiture, and specific execution of contracts. And it has been held by this court in Kilcoyne v. Oil Co., 61 W. Va. 538, 56 S. E. 888, Knotts v. McGregor, 47 W. Va. 566, 35 S. E. 899, and Headley v. Hoopengartner, 60 W. Va. 626, 55 S. E. 744, that the covenant for peaceable and quiet possession implied in every lease for oil and gas is not limited to the right of exploration, but extends also to the right, after finding oil or gas, to produce the same, and that injunction is the proper remedy for enforcement of such covenant or to protect the exclusive right of the lessee under the contract. Transportation Co. v. Pipe Line Co., 22 W. Va. 621, 46 Am. Rep. 527; Tufts v. Copen, 87 W. Va. 623, 16 S. E. 793; Brown v. Spillman, 155 U. S. 673, 15 Sup. Ct. 245, 39 L. Ed. 304. In Pennsylvania we find it has been held that a preliminary injunction will be awarded against a lessor where he has made a re-entry under a claim of forfeiture and the claim is disputed on every ground on which he puts it. Thornton on Oil & Gas, 120, citing Poterie Gas Co. v. Poterie, 153 Pa. 10, 25 Atl. 1107, and Duffield v. Rosenzweig, 144 Pa. 520, 23 Atl. 4. The doctrine of these cases on the subject of equitable jurisdiction has never, we believe, been questioned in this court, except that in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 59 L. R. A. 556, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, the first point of the syllabus of Bettman v. Harness, supra, so far as it relates to the jurisdiction to settle the title and boundary of lands as between adverse claimants, when the plaintiff has no equity against the party who claims adversely to him, was overruled.

But as we view this case the rights of the plaintiff are not wholly dependent on the discovery of gas in the salt sand. The fact of such discovery within the meaning of the lease is controverted. The question whether the gas in that sand was not abandoned and the rights of the plaintiff, if any, lost thereby, are raised here, and no doubt would be raised in the trial of the action at law, so that if the plaintiff has any other rights of an equitable nature to assert against the defendant of which a court of equity can take cognizance, or its defense at law would not be as complete, adequate, and certain as in a court of equity it should not be required to relinquish its equitable rights. Hogg's Equity Proc. § 3, and state and federal cases cited; Eaton on Equity, 31, and cases cited. As the court said in Nease v. Insurance Co., 32 W. Va. 283, 9 S. E. 233: "A doubtful or partial remedy at law does not exclude the injured party from relief in equity." And in Robinson v. Braiden, 44 W. Va. 183, 28 S. E. 798: "A defendant at law, having a legal defense to the action and a distinct ground for equitable relief against the plaintiff's claim, may bring his suit in equity without waiting for the determination of the action at law, and may, without being compelled to waive his legal defense by confessing judgment, have a hearing in the court of equity on the merits of his case and a decree for the proper relief." These cases were affirmed in Gas Co. v. Window Glass Co., 63 W. Va. 266, 61 S. E. 329. Equity retains its jurisdiction to relieve from a forfeiture notwithstanding it may be relieved at law. Hogg's Equity Proc. § 587, p. 678, citing 2 Story, Equity Jur. (4th Ed.) § 1301. Indeed, this is such a well-recognized rule that it requires no citation of authority to sustain it.

One of the questions presented, but particularly applicable to the rights of the plaintiff involved in the discovery of gas in the second sand, but somewhat apropos also to the discovery of gas in the salt sand is: When did the five-year term expire? It is urgently insisted for plaintiff that "five years from August 3, 1901, did not expire until the end of August 3, 1906," and it is with equal energy insisted for defendant that in construing a lease contract of this character which it is said must be regarded as having become effective on the day of its date, that day must not be excluded but included in reckoning time. We perceive that a rule which might be applicable to a mere deed of grant and conveyance, passing present title, and containing no words of condition, limitation, or defeasance would not be applicable to a deed of lease of this character, making the subsequent rights of the lessee depend upon things to be done and covenants to be performed on his part thereunder. The plaintiff, in addition to the rule at common law, relies upon section 288, Code 1906, providing that: "The time within which an act is to be done shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last; or, if the last be Sunday, it shall also be excluded; but this provision shall not be deemed to change any rule of law applicable to bills of exchange, or negotiable notes." It is suggested by counsel for defendants that this statute is only applicable where the act to be done is one required by some provision of the statute law, and has no application to things to be done under a contract; but the title of the chapter under which this section occurs is: "Of the promulgation, proof, commencement and construction of laws; effect of the common law and ancient statutes." This title seems to imply a broader meaning than that given it by defendants' counsel.

In 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 211, the common-law rule supported by the weight of authority is said to be that the date of the act or the happening of the event is to be excluded and the last day of the period included. The authorities, both English and American, are there collected in a note, and at page 215 of 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, referring to the distinction drawn in the early cases between the terms "day" and "day of date," holding that where the computation was from the former the day of the date was included, but when from the latter the day of the date was excluded, says: "It is obvious that this distinction is without merit and only calculated to mislead, and it is now recognized that there is no distinction between the two phrases, and the universal rule is that the day of the date is excluded and the last day of the period included, whether the computation be from the date or from the day of the date"—citing in note the English and American cases on the subject. In Atkins v. Sleeper, 89 Mass. 487, it was held that "a lease for a term of years from the 1st day of July begins on the 2d day of July." In Pugh v. Leeds, 2 Cowper, 714, where under a power to make a lease in possession but not in reversion a lease was granted for 21 years to commence from the day of the date, it was held that from the day, etc., was to be regarded as inclusive and not exclusive of the date. This construction was given to the instrument, however, for the purpose of upholding it under the power. But Lord Mansfield said: "The ground of the opinion and judgment which I now deliver is that 'from' may in vulgar use, and even in the strict propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive." And the rule seems to be that the first and last days will be included or excluded in the computation of time as it may be necessary to give effect to an instrument, save a right or prevent a forfeiture, if this can be done without violating a clear intention or a positive provision thereof. Weeks v. Hull, 19 Conn. 376, 378, 50 Am. Dec. 249; Sands v. Lyon, 18 Conn. 18; Bigelow v. Willson, 18 Mass. 485; State v. Gasconade County Ct., 33 Mo. 102; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 215, and other cases cited in notes. Our conclusion, based on our statute and these authorities, is that, where a contract of lease of the character of that involved here requires of the lessee affirmative acts to be done within a certain period stipulated from the date thereof, unless there is something in the instrument itself evincing a different intention on the part of the parties thereto, the date of the instrument will be excluded in the computation of time.

But it is claimed that the receipts taken by plaintiff for the quarterly installments of rent show a different construction by the parties, which should prevail. We do not think so. The rule invoked is applicable only when the words of the instrument are ambiguous.

Now as to the two main questions: First, was gas discovered in the salt sand, and, if so, did the plaintiff thereby become vested with an estate in the right to produce oil and gas, which has not been lost by abandonment or otherwise? It is not controverted that gas in some quantity was struck in this sand; but an effort was made, and some evidence offered, tending to show that it was not of sufficient quantity for profitable production, and it is claimed the plaintiff by going on down with same well to deeper sand, and by subsequently pulling the casing and allowing the water to come in and flood out the gas in the first sand, must be treated as having abandoned the gas in that sand, and therefore as not having acquired any vested right to produce gas from it or from the lower sand. But the positive evidence of the drillers and others, tested by the gauge, is that gas sufficient for profitable production was obtained in this first sand, and plaintiff denies any intention to abandon it, claiming that in going to the deeper rock its intention was to also test the land for oil and gas in that sand. Our cases seem to clearly hold that discovery of oil or gas is alone sufficient to vest the right—a right, it is true, which may be lost by abandonment, manifested by neglect to produce, or pursue the work of production and further development. Steel-smith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 29 S. E. 978, 44 L. R. A. 107; Lowther Oil Co. v. Guffey, 52 W. Va. 88, 43 S. E. 101; Lowther Oil Co. v. Miller-Sibley Co., 53 W. Va. 505, 44 S. E. 433, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027; Oil Co. v. Gas Co., 51 W. Va. 583, 591, 42 S. E. 655, 59 L. R. A. 566. See, also, Thornton on Oil & Gas, §§ 53, 70, and cases cited. In Oil Co. v. Gas Co., supra, at page 591 of 51 W. Va., at page 658 of 42 S. E. (59 L. R. A. 566), it is said: "After the discovery of oil in paying quantities, it is held that title does vest in the lessee; but there is no case which goes so far as to announce that, after mere discovery of oil, the lessee, upon the assumption of a vested interest or title, may cease operation, refuse to develop the property, tie up the oil by his lease, and simply hold it for speculative purposes, or to await his own pleasure as to the time of development."

But what of the fact here? After discovery of gas in the first sand, the lessee went right on down, with the same hole, it is true, succeeding thereby in finding greater quantities of gas in the lower strata, and rendering the defendants' land and its lease still more valuable. We have no case directly holding that, where, oil or gas has not been first produced from the rock in which they are first found, there is no abandonment by going deeper for the product in some lower strata; but we have a case, where a well had ceased to produce oil in the first sand, saying: "No one can claim that under such lease, if the lessee go on in further exploration, his right is lost. He may go on in a reasonable time." Ammons v. Toothman, 59 W. Va. 165, 169, 53 S. E. 13, 115 Am. St. Rep. 908. We would have to say on the weight of the evidence that gas was found by plaintiff in the first sand, in sufficient quantities to vest in it the right to produce oil or gas from said land, and that there was no intention to abandon that right by going deeper with the same well to the lower rock. Having discovered gas in the first sand, and almost immediately thereafter in larger quantities in the lower sand, what was to preclude plaintiff from returning to the first sand, and either from the same well, or from a new well drilled, again tapping that reservoir, discovered by it, and producing gas also from it? Of course, if gas had not been found in the lower rock, on the principle announced in the case last cited, production of gas from the first sand, after discovery, could not long be deferred, without incurring the penalty of forfeiture or abandonment.

But suppose we are wrong in our conclusion on the first question, what rights, if any, did the plaintiff acquire by the slightly belated discovery of gas in the Indian sand? It is conceded the Indian sand was not penetrated and the gas gotten there until about 1 o'clock of August 4th, some 12 hours after the 5 years had expired. What is the proper construction of the lease as to time? It is for five years from date and as much longer as oil or gas is produced or the rental paid thereon. If oil or gas was produced within the five years given for exploration, the full term thereof was as surely for as much longer as oil or gas should be produced, as it was for the term of five years in which to explore. Failure to produce oil or gas within that time therefore, while not strictly or technically working a forfeiture of any further right to explore or produce oil or gas, resulted in the same thing to plaintiff, and we perceive no reason why in a proper case equitable principles applicable in cases of technical forfeiture should not be applied. The same necessity therefor, in order to prevent a gross injustice, may arise in the one case as in the other. It is said, however, that in contracts of this kind time is of the essence thereof, and this proposition, for which authorities are cited by counsel, is not controverted; but the case we have in hand is one where the plaintiff was legally entitled to the full term of five years given for exploration, without let or hindrance of the lessor. Indeed, the lessee by the implied covenants of his deed was entitled to the protection of the lessor therein. The evidence satisfies us that, though defendant may not have been guilty of serious breach of the implied covenants of his deed, yet that he was anxious the lessee should fail to get to the Indian sand in time, did nothing to aid him, and actually succeeded by his suggestions in preventing work on Sunday, and caused a loss of about 12 hours' time after midnight of August 2d, when he had no right of interference, but owed a positive duty to plaintiff to protect it in its rights. The drillers Kenney and Gaffney give it as their opinion that had they not been thus interrupted the well could have been drilled into the Indian sand and gas produced from it before the time expired.

Do these facts and circumstances give rise to no equitable rights against defendant? Shall he be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong in this way? And if he had not so interfered and the well could not have been drilled in within the time, are there no principles available to a court of equity upon which the plaintiff can be relieved from the gross injustice which the defendant seeks to inflict upon it? The plaintiff was acting in good faith, had invested large sums of money. The plaintiff lost nothing, but he got the benefit of the successful search, and wherein has he been wronged? Defendant's counsel cite us to Thornton on Oil & Gas, § 141, for the proposition that, "although a well be commenced in time, if it be not completed in time the lease will terminate." For this Thornton cites Cleminger v. Baden, 159 Pa. 16, 23 Atl. 293, a case in which, though the well was commenced in time, there was no intention to complete it in time. It was not begun in good faith, and it was very properly held the beginning of the well did not prevent a forfeiture. The other cases cited are of the same character, and are not, we think, in conflict with the conclusion we have reached in this case. A lessor should not be heard to complain of a default caused by himself, or permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, 62 W. Va. 700, 59 S. E. 634; Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818; Stahl v. Van Vleck, 53 Ohio St. 136, 41 N. E. 35; Hukill v. Guffey, 37 W. Va. 426, 16 S. E. 544.

We perceive that, upon the facts shown, the plaintiff is entitled to relief by injunction upon at least two well-recognized grounds of equitable jurisdiction: First, upon the principle applicable in cases calling for relief from a forfeiture; second, upon the ground that where there has been a substantial compliance with the contract, and gross injustice would be inflicted upon the plaintiff by denying him relief, relief should be granted. As we have said, the case in hand does not, strictly speaking, involve forfeiture, but is one, we think, calling for the application of the same principles. The reasons therefor are the same in both cases. "The reason of the law is the life of the law." "Affirmative relief against penalties and forfeitures," as was said by this court in Craig v. Hukill, 37 W. Va. 520, 16 S. E. 363, "was one of the springs or fountains of equity jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction was very early exercised; and it would be going in the very opposite direction and acting contrary to its very essential principles to affirmatively enforce a forfeiture," citing Story, Pomeroy, and Bishop on this subject. Unless the delinquency has been willful, the court has discretionary power in relation thereto. Railroad Co. v. Triadelphia, 58 W. Va. 516, 52 S. E. 499, citing Noyes v. Anderson, 124 N. Y. 175, 26 N. E. 316, 21 Am. St. Rep. 657, and other cases. In Pheasant v. Hanna, supra, jurisdiction in equity was upheld to relieve a mining lessee from a mere technical forfeiture.

Now on the subject of substantial performance of the contract: There can certainly be no question as to the fact that the plaintiff substantially performed its contract. It had discovered gas in one sand, and was about to find it in a lower sand in still greater quantities, and we cannot say from the evidence that, but for the improper interference by the defendant with its operation, it would not have discovered the gas in the lower sand within the term of five years. Where there has been such substantial performance of a contract, equity may set aside or disregard a forfeiture occasioned by a failure to comply with the very letter of an agreement. 1 Pomeroy, § 451, p. 756, citing Hagar v. Buck, 44 Vt. 285, 5 Am. Rep. 368, and Bliley v. Wheeler, 5 Colo. App. 287, 38 Pac. 603. And this court, in Railroad Co. v. Triadelphia, page 517 of 58 W. Va., page 511 of 52 S. E., recognizes the doctrine announced in Henry v. Tupper, 29 Vt. 358, opinion by Chief Justice Redfield, that relief may be granted in equity even where the condition is for the performance of collateral acts.

For the reasons given we think the plaintiff has made out a case entitling it to relief in equity, and the decree which the circuit court should have entered will be entered here, making perpetual the injunction awarded upon the original and prayed for therein and in the amended bill, and that the plaintiff have its costs in this court and in the circuit court in this behalf expended.

JOHNSTON v. MACK MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 27, 1909.)

1. ANIMALS (§ 70*) — PERSONAL INJURIES — LIABILITY OF OWNER.

The owner and keeper of a boar is not liable for a personal injury inflicted by him, unless it appear that he was vicious, and that such owner and keeper had previous knowledge of his vicious propensity, or unless the injury was done while trespassing upon lands inclosed by a lawful fence.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 507*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—VICIOUS PROPENSITY OF ANIMALS.

The habits and propensities of domestic animals are matters of common knowledge to all men, and expert testimony to prove the vicious propensities of a particular kind of animals in general, after they become a certain age, is inadmissible for the purpose of proving that the owner of an animal of that class had knowledge of his vicious propensity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Hancock County.

Action by George H. Johnston against the Mack Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

E. A. Hart, J. A. McKenzie, J. R. Donehoo, and O. S. Marshall, for plaintiff in error. G. L. Hambrick and Alfred Marland, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This is an action of trespass on the case for personal injuries inflicted upon plaintiff by a large boar, the property of defendant. Plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining lands in Hancock county, and defendant was the keeper and owner of a number of hogs, among them a large boar of the Berkshire breed, about 5 or 6 years old and weighing from 300 to 500 pounds. There was no lawful fence dividing their lands, and on the 16th day of April, 1906, this boar strayed onto the lands of plaintiff, and was endeavoring to break through plaintiff's inside inclosure to get to plaintiff's hogs. Plaintiff was engaged at the time in repairing the roof of his springhouse nearby, and did not see the hog at first. His daughter, who happened to be nearby, called his attention to the hog, and plaintiff got down from the building, dropped the hatchet with which he had been working, and went to the hog to drive it away, whereupon it savagely attacked him, throwing him down, lacerating both legs badly, and causing a compound fracture of the large bone of one leg just above the ankle, and altogether injured him so badly that he was confined to his bed for a period of about six weeks. On the 19th of April, 1907, a trial was had resulting in a verdict for plaintiff for $3,660.33. Defendant moved to set the verdict aside and grant it a new trial. The court took time to consider the motion, and, after due consideration, on the 26th of August, 1907, overruled the motion and rendered judgment on the verdict. Defendant presented several bills of exceptions embodying all the evidence and the rulings of the court complained of, which were signed by the judge and made a part of the record.

The case is here for review upon writ of error granted to the defendant. A number of errors are assigned; but the case depends upon a decision of the following questions: (1) Is the owner of a boar guilty of such negligence in suffering him to run at large as will render him liable for an injury inflicted on the person of another while straying on the land of the injured person? (2) In such case is it necessary to prove that the owner had previous knowledge of the vicious propensity of the animal? (3) If so, is it proper to prove such knowledge constructively by expert testimony concerning the propensity of boar hogs in general to become vicious after a certain age?

It was the rule of the common law that the owner of animals was required to confine them on his own premises, and if he failed to do so, and they trespassed upon the lands of another and did injury either to his close, person, or animals, defendant was liable. Thus it was held in an English case where a horse bit and kicked a mare through a fence that the owner of the horse was liable. Lord Coleridge in that case says: "It seems to me sufficiently clear that some portion of the defendant's horse's body must have been over the boundary. That may be a very small trespass; but it is trespass in law." Ellis v. Loftus Iron Co., L. R. 10, C. P. 10. But the rule of the common law requiring the owners of animals to keep them confined on his own land is no part of the law of West Virginia. This court decided in Blaine v. Railroad Co., 9 W. Va. 252, and Baylor v. Railroad Co., 9 W. Va. 270, that this rule of the common law had no general application in this state, except in regard to animals that are unruly and dangerous. These decisions were later approved in the case of Layne v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 438, 14 S. E. 123. Section 2730, Code 1906, has no bearing on this case. Acts 1882, p. 412, c. 131, of which said section is a part (in section 4 of said act, or section 2733 of the Code), excepts from the operation of the act so much thereof as relates to the running at large of "bulls over one year old, buck sheep over four months old and boars over two months old," unless and until it shall have been adopted by a vote of the people of any county desiring to put such part of the act in operation in such county; and there is no evidence in the case that such provision was ever adopted as a part of the law in Hancock county. Therefore defendant was not negligent in permitting its boar to run at large. This answers the first question, unless the animal was vicious and dangerous.

But plaintiff alleges that defendant had knowledge of the vicious propensity of the boar. It was also necessary to prove it had such knowledge. Domestic animals, as a general rule, are not vicious, and are not liable to attack mankind; and, in order to make out a case entitling one to recover for injury to his person inflicted by such domestic animals, it is necessary to allege and prove a scienter. Ingham in his work on the Law of Animals, § 94, says: "Except in the case of animals feræ naturæ, it is essential to show that the owner or keeper of an animal knew of its vicious or dangerous disposition; otherwise, there can be no recovery."

ery for an injury committed by it." And in support of this he cites a long list of decisions by both the courts of England and of this country. These authorities we deem it unnecessary to review in this opinion, since this is well-established law, stated by all the text-writers, and recognized by all the courts. The rule is thus stated in 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 384: "If domestic animals are rightfully in the place where they do the injury complained of, the owner will not be liable unless he had knowledge of the vicious propensity of such animals; and, in an action for such injuries, knowledge on the part of the owner must be alleged and proved." This is no variation from the rule above quoted from Ingham, as applied in the present case, because the law in West Virginia is that a man must fence against trespassing animals, and not that the owner of such animals must confine them on his own land. There being no lawful fence inclosing plaintiff's land, the hog was not trespassing at the time it inflicted the personal injury on plaintiff. 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 845, says that the trend of most decisions is to break away from the ancient rule which made the keeper of a vicious animal, having knowledge of its vicious propensity, liable at all hazards for injury done by it, and to hold him liable only in case of some negligent act as the proximate cause of the injury. But it matters not which principle be applied in deciding this case, as either one leads to the same conclusion. In either case proof of scienter is necessary. In the one case if he does not take reasonable precaution to restrain the animal after such knowledge, actual or constructive, he is liable for negligence; and in the other he is liable in any event as an insurer against injury by such vicious animal. There was no negligence on the part of the defendant in suffering the boar to run at large because defendant did not know its boar was vicious, and because it was not obliged, by the laws of this state, to confine it on its own land. The rule is laid down by the Supreme Court of Maine in the case of Decker v. Gammon, 44 Me. 322, 69 Am. Dec. 99, as follows: "If damage be done by any domestic animal kept for use or convenience, the owner is not liable to an action on the ground of negligence without proof that he knew that the animal was accustomed to do mischief before, if such animal is rightfully in the place where it does the mischief." In the next point of the syllabus the converse of the rule is stated: "If domestic animals are wrongfully in the place where they do the mischief, the owner is liable for it, though he had no notice that they had been accustomed to do such mischief before." There are two elements of negligence involved in this Maine case, only one of which has application to the case under review, and that is the keeping of a vicious domestic animal with knowledge of its vicious propensity. The second element does not apply in West Virginia, unless the animal trespasses upon the land of another inclosed by a lawful fence. In such case the owner of the trespassing animal might be liable, under section 2735, for a personal injury inflicted by the animal, as well as for injury done to the close. This question, however, we do not decide, as it does not arise in the case. In Maine the rule of the common law of England prevails, making it the duty of the owner of animals to keep them on his own land. All of the following cases hold the owner of the animal liable either on the ground that the owner kept the animal after having knowledge, actual or constructive, of his vicious character, or that he negligently permitted the animal to trespass on the lands of another: Cockerham v. Nixon, 33 N. C. 269; Vrooman v. Lawyer, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 339; Godeau v. Blood, 52 Vt. 251, 36 Am. Rep. 751; Knowles v. Mulder, 74 Mich. 202, 41 N. W. 896, 16 Am. St. Rep. 627; Muller v. McKesson, 73 N. Y. 195, 29 Am. Rep. 123; Turner v. Craighead, 83 Hun, 112, 31 N. Y. Supp. 369; McIlvaine v. Lantz, 100 Pa. 586, 45 Am. Rep. 400; Lyons v. Merrick, 105 Mass. 71; Jenkins v. Turner, 1 Ld. Raym. 109. In the case of Hayes v. Smith (decided by the Supreme Court of Ohio in 1900) 62 Ohio St. 161, 56 N. E. 879, which was an action for damages for personal injuries inflicted by a vicious dog, the court based the right of recovery upon the "keeping of the dog in a negligent manner, after knowledge of his vicious propensities, rather than the keeping of the animal with such knowledge." The case of Springs Company v. Edgar, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and reported in 99 U. S. 645, 25 L. Ed. 487, is a case upon which defendant in error apparently places greatest reliance. That was an action brought by a lady who had been attacked and injured by a buck deer kept by the Springs Company in its park among others of its kind to enhance the attractions of the park, which apparently was a health and pleasure resort. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $6,500, and the court refused to disturb the judgment of the lower court. It does not appear that the animal had ever attacked a person on any previous occasion; but there was expert testimony in the case to show that a buck deer in the fall of the year, the season at which this complainant was injured, is liable to become vicious and attack persons. And there was further evidence that there were signs posted up at various places in the park warning persons to "Beware of the Buck." There was no other evidence that the company had any knowledge of the vicious propensity of the animal. But that was an action for an injury done by an animal feræ naturæ; and the liability in such case depends upon a different rule of law than it does in case of injury done by domestic animals. Mr. Justice Clifford, speaking apparently for the whole court, in the opinion makes the distinction clear. In the opinion he says: "Owners of wild beasts that are in their nature vicious are liable under all or most all circumstances for injuries done by them; and in actions for injuries by such beasts it is not necessary to allege that the owner knew them to be mischievous; for he is presumed to have such knowledge, from which it follows that he is guilty of negligence in permitting the same to be at large." On the same page of the opinion the judge further says: "Domestic animals, such as oxen or horses, may injure the person or property of another, but courts of justice invariably hold that, if they are rightfully in the place where the injury is inflicted, the owner of the animal is not liable for such an injury, unless he knew that the animal was accustomed to be vicious; and in suits for such injuries such knowledge must be alleged and proved, as the cause of action arises from the keeping of the animal, after the knowledge of its vicious propensity." In support of this proposition he cites a number of authorities. We find no authorities which hold that the owner or keeper of a domestic animal liable on account of injury done to another unless it is shown (1) that the owner continued to keep the animal after knowledge, either actual or constructive, of the vicious propensity of the animal, some of the court holding that after such knowledge he is liable in any event, and other courts holding that he is liable only in the event of the negligent keeping of the animal; or (2) that the injury was committed while the animal was trespassing on the lands of another, in which case it is only necessary to show negligence in the owner in failing to keep the animal on his own land, knowledge of the vicious propensity of the animal in the latter case being unnecessary.

Apart from the attack made on the defendant, the only other evidence of the hog's viciousness is the testimony of J. D. Stewart and of a son of plaintiff, George Johnston, Jr. The latter testified that he had chased it off his father's place a few times, that one time he and his brother were chasing it off, and it turned on them; and he says: "We jumped over the fence into the pig yard, and got away from it." But he thought so little of the occurrence that he is not sure whether or not he so much as told his father of it, much less complained of it to the owner. Stewart said that on one occasion he was passing along the road, the boar was standing off to one side, and as he passed by the boar "made a jump at him," and that he jumped to one side and dodged him; that the boar turned and came back; and that he "picked up a boulder, and throwed it at him, and he started off." This was not identified as the same boar that injured plaintiff. Witness said that he did not take notice whether or not it had tusks. There is no evidence whatever that defendant knew this particular hog was vicious, but, on the contrary, four or five witnesses prove that during the time, three or four months, that defendant owned it, it had free range of the fields of defendant with its other hogs; that it frequented the premises of defendant's numerous tenants; and that it had never at any time exhibited any signs of viciousness, or shown any disposition to attack any one. Two or three witnesses testify that they had kicked it out of their way; that they had seen children, not over 10 or 12 years old, drive it away from their houses with sticks. One witness says he saw his wife strike it over the head with a bucket and drive it from the trough where she had fed her own pigs; another man that he had driven it from his yard by the motion of his hands. So that the overwhelming weight of evidence shows that the particular hog in question was not as a matter of fact vicious.

The expert testimony of Howard A. Hill, a breeder of hogs, was received over the objection of defendant to prove that boar hogs become vicious, and are likely to attack other animals and even persons after a certain age, unless their tusks are broken off. But it is a matter of common knowledge that domestic animals are not vicious as a general rule; and upon this common knowledge rests the principle which requires proof of knowledge by the owner before he can be held liable for the vicious act of his animal, except, perhaps, in case of certain animals which the statute prohibits from running at large. The boar is not made an exception by the statute. The reverse of the fact testified to by the expert is a matter of common knowledge; and expert testimony cannot be received either to prove or to disprove those things which the law supposes to lie within the common experience and common education of all men. Rogers on Expert Testimony (2d Ed.) § 8; 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 436. But, if it could be said that this expert testimony was admissible, it would cut like a two-edged sword; because, while, it would prove negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to confine the boar, it would also affect plaintiff, and convict him of contributory negligence, as the proximate cause of his injury, in getting down from the building where he was at work, and approaching the hog unarmed to drive it away from the fence. This is the first time this court has been called upon to review a case involving personal injury inflicted by a vicious hog; nor have we been able to find where any other court has decided a similar case. Consequently the very novelty of the case, in view of the prevalence of the hog and man's familiarity with his natural propensities, is a contradiction of the expert testimony. Reports of the various courts of this country are replete with cases involving injuries from biting dogs, kicking horses, vicious bulls, and an occasional case may be found where an owner has been held to account for the butting of his ram, but this is the first case of which we have any knowledge where the hog has so far departed from his usual habits of gentleness as to savagely bite and injure man. There would, therefore, seem to be less reason for demanding expert testimony to prove the general propensity of the hog than there would be in the case of the horse, the ox, or the sheep. All domestic animals stand in the same category, except where the rule applicable thereto has been modified by statute; and, under the law of this state, no evidence short of proof that defendant knew or by reasonable diligence should have known that its hog was of a vicious disposition or propensity will suffice to sustain a verdict for damages for the injury. We think the expert testimony was improperly admitted, and was prejudicial to plaintiff in error. Without such testimony there is not the slightest evidence in the record to support the verdict. It was an unfortunate occurrence, and a serious injury to plaintiff, but it is not shown that defendant was guilty of any wrong or negligence, and the law does not hold it liable.

We deem it unnecessary to review the other points of error assigned. Our conclusion is that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence, and that it was error not to set it aside. We therefore reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and, according to the established practice of this court, remand the cause for a new trial; it not being made to appear clearly that the plaintiff may not be able on a second trial to strengthen his case.

CAPITO v. TOPPING. SUTHERLAND v. SAME. REESE v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 27, 1909.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 73*)—PURPOSES OF RELIEF—LEGISLATIVE OFFICERS.

Mandamus is an appropriate remedy to compel the keeper of the legislative rolls to deliver to a citizen requiring it a copy of an act passed by the Legislature, and also to compel him to promulgate the same with the other acts passed by printing and binding it with them for distribution and sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 82*)—PUBLIC OFFICER—DEFENSE.

Mere lack of possession by a public officer of a document, of which he is the legal custodian constitutes no defense to an application for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel him to certify and deliver a copy thereof when the law requires it of him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 139, 177-179; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 42*)—WHO MAY RAISE—QUESTION.

Unconstitutionality of a legislative act cannot be set up by the keeper of the rolls as a defense to a writ of mandamus to compel him to furnish a copy thereof; this defense being available only for protection of personal interests or rights invaded or encroached upon by unconstitutional legislation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 35*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION—MANDATORY.

Being organic in character, constitutional provisions stand on a higher plane than statutes, and, as a rule, are mandatory, prescribing exact or exclusive times and methods of doing acts permitted or required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 34½; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 29*)—VETO BY GOVERNOR.

The provision in section 14 of article 7 of the Constitution of this state (Code 1906, p. lxvii), requiring the Governor to file a bill, with the objections thereto, in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after the adjournment of the Legislature, in order to effect a veto thereof, is mandatory, in respect to both the time and the manner of exercising the power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

6. TIME (§ 10*)—VETO—TIME FOR—EXCLUSION OF SUNDAY.

In computing the period of five days after adjournment allowed for the exercise of the power of executive disapproval, a Sunday occurring within five days after adjournment is to be excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Time, Cent. Dig. §§ 34-52; Dec. Dig. § 10; Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 31.]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 387*)—PAROL EVIDENCE.

When the records of the Legislature show the time of adjournment and are clear and unambiguous respecting the same, they are conclusive; and extraneous evidence cannot be admitted to show a different date of adjournment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1699; Dec. Dig. § 387.*]

8. STATES (§ 37*)—LEGISLATIVE RECORDS—CERTAINTY.

The date of adjournment of the Legislature, as shown by its journals, is not contradicted or rendered uncertain by record evidence therein of the transaction of a large amount of business within a short period of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

9. STATUTES (§ 15*)—READING—AMENDMENTS.

Amendments to legislative bills read on three separate days, as required by the Constitution, made at a late stage of the proceedings, such as the third reading, do not make it necessary to repeat the constitutional readings thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Separate original applications for peremptory writs of mandamus by Charles Capito, Howard Sutherland, and Z. M. Reese were directed to C. L. Topping, Clerk of the House of Delegates. Writs awarded.

Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay and Kemble White, for petitioners. Wm. G. Conley, Wm. M. O. Dawson, and Linn & Byrne, for respondent.

POFFENBARGER, J. Chas. Capito applied to this court for a peremptory writ of mandamus, to compel O. L. Topping, clerk of the House of Delegates, to certify and deliver to him a copy of a certain document, known and designated in the legislative proceedings as Senate Bill No. 162, a bill to amend and re-enact a certain statute, constituting the charter of the city of Charleston, as an act passed by the Legislature. Howard Sutherland applied for two such writs, commanding said Topping to certify two other documents, relating to roads, as having become laws. Z. M. Reese also asked such a writ, commanding him to certify still another one, purporting to establish Grant Independent School District in Marion county, as a law passed. Another purpose of the applicants was to have these acts printed and bound with the other acts passed. Topping resisted all these applications, basing his defense on an alleged veto by the Governor in each case and unconstitutionality of some of the acts.

The facts disclosed are as follows: The legislative journals, as written up by the clerks, but not yet signed by the presiding officers, show the Legislature adjourned on the 26th day of February, 1909, but do not disclose the hour of adjournment. As shown by affidavits tendered, that body in point of fact adjourned on February 27, 1909, at 6:40 o'clock a. m. Within five days after February 26th, the Governor indorsed "Disapproved" on some of the bills, but did not return any of them to the office of the Secretary of State within that period, but did return them within five days after February 27th, excluding Sunday, to wit, on the 5th day of March, 1909, at 8:00 o'clock a. m.; that being more than five days after midnight of February 26th, excluding Sunday, February 28th. The legislative journals show a recess for 10 minutes at 11:30 o'clock p. m. on February 26th and the transaction of a large amount of business after that time.

Assuming the validity of the acts in question, the right of the applicants to have copies thereof and the propriety of the remedy invoked are clear beyond doubt. As citizens and taxpayers, they have a sufficient interest, and the statute makes the clerk of the House the keeper of the rolls, and requires him to make and deliver a copy of any act to any person requiring the same on payment of the fee allowed therefore. Code 1889, c. 12, §§ 13, 14 (Code 1906, §§ 266, 267). That mandamus is the proper remedy to enforce performance of this duty is obvious, in view of legal principles, and has been judicially declared. Wise v. Bigger, Clerk, 79 Va. 269; Wolfe v. McCaull, 76 Va. 876.

Unconstitutionality of the acts in question, treating them as having had bestowed upon them all the vital and essential requisites of passage in due form by both houses of the Legislature, and not having been vetoed, may be eliminated as a defense the respondent cannot make in his ministerial and representative capacity, if it exists. That defense is open only to persons having a personal interest or right, which the unconstitutional act invades or violates. Dillon v. County Court of Braxton County, 60 W. Va. 339, 55 S. E. 382, Id., 208 U. S. 192, 28 Sup. Ct. 275, 52 L. Ed. 450.

Another objection preliminary in character is that the document is not in the custody of the respondent. If it became a legislative act, it should be in his possession; and, if it is not, he fails to show any excuse for not having it. His return stops with the mere statement that the Secretary of State, not he, has it. It fails to go further and show his inability to get it. It is not even suggested that he cannot obtain it, or that he has made any effort to do so. As the legal custodian of such records, he is bound to exercise some degree of diligence in respect to them. An impossibility would not be required of him, of course, and, if it appeared here that time were necessary to enable him by legal proceedings or otherwise to obtain the possession of it, that might constitute a defense. Whether it would or not we are not called upon to say, for it is not even suggested in the return. Insufficiency of this part of the return is obvious.

The constitutional provision involved and conferring and limiting the gubernatorial power of veto reads as follows: "Any bill which shall not be returned by the Governor within five days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislature shall, by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall be filed with his objections, in the office of the Secretary of State, within five days after such adjournment, or become a law." Const. art. 7, § 14 (Code 1906, p. lxvii). In view of the terms, as well as the nature of this clause, it must be held to be mandatory, not merely directory. Constitutional provisions are organic. They are adopted with the highest degree of solemnity. They are intended to remain unalterable except by the great body of the people, and are incapable of alteration without great trouble and expense. They are the framework of the state as a civil institution, giving cast and color to all its legislation, jurisprudence, institutions, and social and commercial life by confining the Legislature, the executive, and judiciary within prescribed limits. All the great potential, dominating, creative, destroying, and guiding forces of the state are brought within their control so far as they apply. Thus, to the extent of their duration, they define and limit the policy of the state more rigidly and unalterably than the sails and rudder of the ship when set govern and control its course. A more apt figure is made up of the great system of highways, including railroads, fixing the mode, courses, and extent of travel and transportation. So they necessarily stand on a much higher plane than mere statutes, and the courts as a rule do not feel warranted in upholding deviations from them in respect to the manner and time of the performance of acts prescribed or required by them. Wolfe v. McCaull, 78 Va. 876; Cooley, Cons. Lim. (7th Ed.) 114, 219; Lewis' Suth. Stat. Con. § 164, p. 109. Tested by its terms, the clause under consideration may be said to be in mandatory form, though form is not always conclusive. The passage of the act makes it law, subject to a contingency, the executive veto. If the Governor desires to veto a bill after the adjournment of the Legislature, it must be filed, with his objections, "in the office of the Secretary of State within five days after such adjournment, or become a law." It is alternative and emphatic, saying, if a certain thing is not done, another shall happen. Unlike many other provisions, it does not stop with the prescription of the affirmative act, leaving the consequence of failure to inference. It declares the sequence. We are aware of no decision authorizing the view that a constitutional clause dealing with matters so high and vital in character as the executive power of veto, and the making of laws, and having form and terms so emphatic, is merely directory. In our opinion this clause requires actual filing in the office of the Secretary of State within five days after adjournment. Otherwise, something other than the record indicated in it would have to be relied upon as evidence of the nonexistence of the law. Resort might be had to uncertain memoranda, or somebody's recollection or understanding. Laws should rest upon something more certain and durable, and the evidence of their existence should be a public record, kept in a certain place, that all may know where to look for it and be able to see it. The legislative journals show the passage of an act, making it a law subject to a contingency. This is evidenced by a public record. The veto annulling it after adjournment should also be evidenced by a record, and in framing the Constitution the people saw fit to designate a certain office as the repository of that evidence. Plainly no other place will do. If any other could be substituted, what one would it be? One man might say the Governor's office, another the Auditor's office, and so on, and there would be no certain place. The locality or name of the place of record is not of primary importance, but it is vital that there be a known, certain place. We think, therefore, the veto is not effective, unless the bill is filed with objections in the prescribed office. Nor have we any doubt that it must be filed within the prescribed time. If not within five days, then within how many? Who shall say? Is not a time limit beyond which the citizen may know the fate of an act passed important?

Two questions relating to the computation of time have been argued. One of these is whether a Sunday occurring within five days from adjournment is to be excluded. In our opinion the settled rules of construction, reason, and authority all point to an affirmative answer to this question. Sundays are excluded from the five days allowed the Governor for action on bills passed prior to adjournment. This defines the five-day period, subsequently used in the same section. The Governor is required to do certain work within five days, not to be engaged in a certain way or at a certain place for five days. As no intention to require work of him on Sunday can be presumed, and work for five days is marked out for him, it is reasonable to say five working days were contemplated. To this effect the authorities are almost, if not quite, uniform. Many decisions holding it proper to exclude from the count the first day in computing time under a clause, saying the Governor shall act upon a bill within five days after it shall have been presented to him, are relied upon, but they are not applicable here. We are not considering a clause of that kind. We do exclude the day of adjournment, which corresponds to the day of presentation under the other clause, but there is no authority for the exclusion of the day after adjournment after having excluded the day of adjournment.

There being no dispute as to the date of the filing of the bills in the office of the Secretary of State, the vital question is the date of adjournment, and this reduces itself to another, namely, how that is to be proved—whether by the legislative journals or extraneous evidence. It is admitted that no date subsequent to February 26th is disclosed by the journal or any record or memorandum of either house of the Legislature, and that both records show adjournment on that day. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity whatever in these records. Under such circumstances extraneous evidence to impeach the written record is inadmissible. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269; State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N. W. 499; Webster v. Hastings, 59 Neb. 563, 81 N. W. 510; In re Granger, 56 Neb. 260, 76 N. W. 588; State v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N. E. 447, 12 N. E. 829; State v. Moffitt, 5 Ohio, 363. If the Legislature has failed to make any record of its adjournment, or its records are in such a state of confusion as to render ascertainment of the date impossible, then resort may be had to other evidence, but not otherwise. Crocker v. Junkin, 79 Neb. 532, 113 N. W. 256. The common practice of staying the hands of the clock to enable the Legislature to effect an adjournment apparently within the time fixed by the Constitution for the expiration of the term is dwelt upon in the argument as a serious trespass upon the rights of the executive in respect to the time allowed him for examination of, and action upon, bills un-disposed of by him at the time of adjournment; it being pointed out that he might thus be deprived of the entire period of five days. In point of fact no serious curtailment of this period has ever occurred in the history of the state, and the assumption that it will ever occur would be a violent and highly improbable one. If it should, the resultant evil might be slight as compared with that of altering the probative force and character of legislative records, and making the proof of legislative action depend upon uncertain oral evidence, liable to loss by death or absence, and so imperfect on account of the treachery of memory. Long, long centuries ago, these considerations of public policy led to the adoption of the rule, giving verity and unimpeachability to legislative records. If that character is to be taken away for one purpose, it must be taken away for all, and the evidence of the laws of the state must rest upon a foundation less certain and durable than that afforded by the law to many contracts between private individuals concerning comparatively trifling matters. The Constitution was adopted by the people, with full knowledge of the existence of this rule of evidence, and no provision was inserted to protect the Governor or any person else from its operation and effect. How can we say they did not think it better for the public to take the risk of slight, or even great, abuse or perversion of it, than to innovate upon the rule, or that they did not rightly and safely assume that no substantial encroachment would ever be made by the Legislature upon the time of the executive in this way? In more than 45 years it has never yet occurred. The few hours so taken is in a practical sense no encroachment at all, since the Governor and Legislature may both work at the same time. If the evil should grow and become serious, the power of remedy is in the hands of the people rather than those of the courts.

It is said the journal of the senate properly interpreted shows an adjournment could not have occurred on or before midnight of February 26th, because a large amount of business was transacted, after a recess, terminating at 11:40 o'clock p. m. of that day. Some four or five reports of committees on enrolled bills and the report of a conference committee on the appropriation bill were received and acted upon, and there were two roll calls after that time. All this is remote and merely argumentative. What business was transacted is one thing. The time of adjournment is another. The journal says the Legislature adjourned on the 26th. This covers the point in issue. A mere uncertain inference cannot prevail over it. The court does not judicially know how much legislative business can be transacted in twenty minutes.

It has been suggested in argument that the day of adjournment shown by the record extended to noon of February 27th. We are unable to concur in this view. The day indicated by the journals is a calendar day, a day of the month and year, not a day of the session. Even if we could say the 45-day constitutional period extended to noon of February 27th, it would be immaterial. The date of adjournment and the date of expiration of that period are different things. The Governor is not allowed for veto purposes five days after the expiration of the constitutional legislative period. His veto period is 5 days after adjournment, which might occur on any day in the 45-day period.

Another contention is that, owing to an alleged irregularity in the legislative proceedings shown by the journal, the bill did not pass. This is predicated on an amendment made on the third reading, although the bill is shown to have had its first, second, and third readings in both houses. We are aware of no law, constitutional or otherwise, requiring a repetition of the reading of bills in their entirety, when amendments are made at late stages of the proceedings.

Being of the opinion that none of the bills in question were vetoed, we awarded the writs.

MAY v. TOPPING.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 4, 1909.)

STATUTES (§ 32*) — APPROPRIATION BILLS — VETO—"DISAPPROVAL."

In no event has the Governor power to disapprove a bill making appropriations of the public money, embracing distinct items, or to disapprove any item therein, without communicating his disapproval thereof, with his reasons therefor, to the house in which the bill originated before the adjournment of the legislative session.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Maude May for writ of mandamus against C. L. Topping, Clerk of the House of Delegates. Writ granted.

Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for petitioner. Wm. G. Conley, Frank Lively, and Wm. M. O. Dawson, for respondent.

ROBINSON, J. Maude May has applied for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the clerk of the House of Delegates of West Virginia, keeper of the rolls of the state, to make and deliver to her, upon payment of the fees therefor, a certified copy of House Bill No. 342, entitled "An act making appropriations of public money to pay general charges upon the treasury," and to include in such certified copy of that act the following: "To pay to Mrs. Maude May, executrix and devisee, widow of the late Attorney General, Clark W. May, deceased, the salary for the balance of the year in which said Clark W. May died, $2,080.00"—as one of the acts legally passed by the Legislature of the state of West Virginia and duly enrolled pursuant to law, and also to include in the printed copy of the acts of the Legislature of 1909, to be published and issued by the keeper of the rolls according to law, House Bill No. 342, entitled as aforesaid, containing therein the item appropriating the sum of $2,080, as in the words and figures given above, as a valid subsisting act in law, duly passed by the Legislature of the state of West Virginia, according to the provisions of the Constitution. The application for such mandamus is resisted by respondent. He maintains that the item appropriating the sum of $2,080 in the words and figures recited above, was vetoed by the Governor. He therefore presents as his defense that such portion of the bill did not become a law, and that he has no power to certify and publish it as such.

The Legislature which passed the bill in question met on Wednesday, the 13th day of January, 1909. It adjourned by operation of the Constitution, wherein it limits the session to 45 days, on Friday, the 26th day of February, 1909. The journals of the Senate and House of Delegates, printed by the authority of the respective houses, show that House Bill No. 342 was constitutionally passed by each of them, presented to the Governor, and report of such presentation made to each house. The journals further show that a joint committee of the two houses waited upon the Governor; that he directed them to inform the two houses of the Legislature that he had no further communication to make to either of them; that the committee made such report; and that, thereupon, each house adjourned sine die. These printed journals bear the date of Friday, February 26, 1909. They show no extension of the session beyond the constitutional period.

Enrolled House Bill No. 342 was presented to the Governor, as attested by the printed journals of the two houses of the Legislature, on February 26, 1909. It remained in his possession and control until Friday, the 5th day of March, 1909. At the hour of 8 o'clock a. m. on that day, it was filed in the office of Secretary of State. As presented to the Governor, it contained the item of appropriation in favor of Mrs. May. As filed in the office of Secretary of State this item was stricken out by red ink, and there was indorsed on the bill, under the signature of the Governor and the date of March 3, 1909, his disapproval of all items indicated in the bill by red ink erasure, and his approval of all items not so indicated.

The right of petitioner to the remedy by mandamus, invoked to compel the certification and delivery to her of a copy of an act passed by the Legislature and to compel the keeper of the rolls to promulgate the same with the other acts passed, has been determined and upheld by this court in the Cases of Capito, Sutherland, and Reese, 64 S. E. 845, applying for similar writs, at this term. The opinion in those cases is, to further extent, controlling in this case. We need not inquire to what extent. A reference suffices. Aside from the questions therein determined this case involves but one. That question is: Can the Governor veto an item in the general appropriation bill after the adjournment of the Legislature?

The question is, we are of opinion, answered by the plain terms of the Constitution wherein it prescribes that which governs in such cases. Article 7, § 15 (Code 1906, p. lxvii). This organic constitutional provision in view of its character and purpose is necessarily mandatory. It provides: "Every bill passed by the Legislature making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, shall before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he disapprove the bill, or any item or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval with his reasons therefor to the House in which the bill originated; but all items not disapproved shall have the force and effect of law according to the original provisions of the bill. Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a majority of each House according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the preceding section in reference to other bills." How is it ordained by this supreme and mandatory law that an item in an appropriation bill embracing distinct items shall be disapproved by the Governor? Plainly is it stated therein that, if he disapproved such item, he shall communicate such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the house in which the bill originated. It is this action of the Governor in communicating such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the house in which the bill originated that consummates and effects a veto of the item. The communication of his disapproval, with his reasons therefor, is the disapproval itself. The obligation upon the Governor to communicate his disapproval of an item, with his reasons therefor, to the house in which the bill originated, is a mandatory one to bring about the qualified veto that is given him in such instances. Unless he communicate as directed by this constitutional provision, he approves, and does not disapprove. The last clause of the section clearly discloses such interpretation. It says: "Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a majority of each house." What do the words "so disapproved" mean? The use of these words makes one to inquire: How disapproved? Clearly they relate not simply to disapproval in the mind of the Governor, but to some act of disapproval, some manner of disapproval. That act or manner of disapproval provided for just above these words, and to which "so disapproved" clearly relates, is by communication with reasons to the house in which the bill originated. "Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed." The very connection between the words "so disapproved" and "unless repassed" show that the Constitution intends that the disapproval of the Governor, to be a disapproval at all, must be communicated to the house of the Legislature in which the bill originated, so that the Legislature may again act upon the item; so that it may repass it, if the Governor's reasons for disapproval do not persuade it to do otherwise, by a majority of each house according to the rules and limitations prescribed. Only by being "so disapproved" is the item declared void by the Constitution. Disapproval in any other form or manner does not affect it.

The plain terms of this constitutional provision should prevail. A Constitution is made for the people and by the people. The interpretation that should be given it is that which reasonable minds, the great mass of the people themselves, would give it; "for as the Constitution does not derive its force from the convention which framed, but from the people who ratified it, the intent to be arrived at is that of the people, and it is not to be supposed that they have looked for any dark or obtruse meaning in the words employed, but rather that they have accepted them in the sense most obvious to the common understanding, and ratified the instrument in the belief that that was the sense designed to be conveyed." Cooley's Const. Lim. 81. The great Chief Justice Marshall in the interpretation of a provision of the national Constitution said: "As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most distinctly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they said." Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 188, 6 L. Ed. 23. There is no ambiguity in section 14 of article 7 (Code 1906, p. lxvi). It is plain. It needs no construction. The terms used in common everyday interpretation can mean nothing but that the Governor disapproves a distinct item in an appropriation bill by communicating his dissent, and his reasons therefor, to the house that originated the bill, so that house may set in motion, if it desire, after hearing the Governor's reasons against the item, legislative action to repass the item by a majority of each house. The section plainly contemplates further legislative action, if the Legislature sees fit. Can there be such action after the Legislature has adjourned? The very fact that there cannot be determines that the Governor must express his disapproval before the adjournment.

The people of this state most evidently intended that the sovereign will, the Legislature, should have the ultimate power in the general expenditure of the public revenue. They have so expressed it in the fundamental compact of government. They provided, it is true, a check upon legislative action in this particular by ordaining that the Governor could disapprove the general appropriations and express such disapproval to the Legislature. It was so provided in order that the executive, versed in statecraft, should advise or reason against the general expenditure of public money or any item thereof. But the very language of the Constitution in this regard can mean nothing but that, after such reasons against an appropriation are communicated to the Legislature by the Governor, that Legislature, the sovereign body, still has the will to expend the public money notwithstanding the opinion and arguments of the executive head of the state. The people have reserved unto themselves by their many representatives, embodying the combined and versatile intelligence of the masses, the last word as to the policy and propriety of public expenditures. Such idea is most consistent with the republican form of government. But the people never intended, and it is not so expressed, that the intelligence or will of any one man in a matter so vital and varied as the expenditure of the public revenue, the very life-blood of the state, should prevail, except by argument, over the combined intelligence and will of their representatives in legislative assembly. "In the multitude of counsellors there is safety."

It has been submitted in the argument that the court will go far to uphold the veto power of the Governor. We have no power to change the Constitution; and, where that instrument is clear in its terms and of plain interpretation to any ordinary and reasonable mind, there is no room for construction, and it would be mischievous and unlawful to assume it. If the absolute veto power of the Governor was clearly expressed, we should declare its existence. Yet we have nothing to control us other than the plainly written language of the fundamental compact. In that instrument there is nothing to attach us to the idea that the veto power is so sacred that it should be made to prevail, in the face of plain words, against the supreme power of the people. The Governor is not vested with the absolute power of veto. The people have reserved unto themselves in every event the right and opportunity to accept his disapproval as sound or to overthrow it as not being for the commonweal. We iterate that nowhere in the Constitution is the Governor given the absolute power to prevent a bill that has passed the Legislature from becoming a law, providing that same Legislature, by a majority thereof, sees fit to make that bill a law. During the session every bill presented to the Governor must be returned by him to the house in which it originated, or it becomes a law. During that session he must express his disapproval to the house whence the bill came. The legislative assembly may then by a majority vote still persist in the bill's being a law. True it is that the legislative assembly may adjourn leaving bills in the hands of the Governor for his disapproval within five days after adjournment pursuant to article 7, § 14. But the Legislature has the discretion, the power, to deny to the Governor such absolute opportunity of disapproving legislation. It may so confide in him, or it may not so trust his judgment. It may remain in session for these five days or longer, presenting no bills to the Governor, solely for the purpose of receiving his disapproval of those already presented, and for the further purpose of ratifying or disaffirming any veto that he may make. If the Legislature desires to hold unto itself the power of acting upon the Governor's disapproval of bills, if it does not desire to vest him with absolute veto power as to any bill, it may five days or more before the day that it would adjourn complete the legislation for that session, present no more bills to the Governor, and remain in session solely for the purpose of receiving the Governor's disapproval, and of overruling any executive disapproval in the event that it should not meet the sanction of the legislative mind. Or, for the purpose of acting on bills that may be disapproved by the Governor, the Legislature may remain in session after the constitutional period by a concurrence of two-thirds of the members elected to each house. So most certain it is that the people have not given the absolute power of veto to the Governor. They have reserved unto themselves the ultimate question of the propriety of all legislation. They may, and they do, give such power to him as to bills other than an appropriation bill embracing distinct items, if the Legislature, representing the people, sees fit to adjourn before the time has expired for executive approval or disapproval of all such bills passed. Thus we see that the legislative, not the executive, will, has been made supreme. Then, shall we yield to the argument that the executive will is entitled to the doubt, if any exists, as to which is supreme, in relation to the bill herein involved? Is it not the legislative will in whose favor such doubt should be resolved?

It is insisted upon behalf of respondent that section 14 of article 7 should be read and applied in connection with section 15 thereof, and that, therefore, the Governor had five days after adjournment to exercise his disapproval by filing the bill with his objections in the office of the Secretary of State. If this were true, the item in the bill in question became a law; because, as we have held in the Capito, Sutherland, and Reese Cases, it was not filed for more than five days after adjournment. But we cannot read section 14 into section 15. They are distinct. If the provision as to the five days after adjournment was intended to apply to, and to be read into, section 15, then why the necessity of the latter section at all? The mere inclusion of a few words in section 14 would have made it fit an appropriation bill embracing distinct items. In reason we must assume that there was a separate purpose for section 15, and that the section expresses that purpose. The only adoption that section 15 makes from the preceding section is, not as to that portion referring to disapproval within five days after adjournment, but as to the rules and limitations prescribed for the repassing of a bill after the Governor has disapproved it. And in that reference of the latter section to the former one, we observe that the promulgators of the Constitution, in effect, refer to section 14 as pertaining to bills other than the one provided for in section 15. The latter section says that the rules and limitations prescribed in the preceding section refer to "other bills." If the rules and limitations in section 14 apply to "other bills," does not the whole of section 14 apply to "other bills"? The clause of section 14 in reference to disapproval within five days after adjournment is not a rule or limitation for the repassing of a bill. We seek in vain for any tie by which that clause can be connected with the provisions of section 15. There is no rule of construction by which it can be so applied. A distinct section and provision was made relative to executive disapproval of a bill making appropriation of money embracing distinct items. The Constitution expresses itself in a distinct way as to executive disapproval of a bill making general appropriations of public money. The specific expression of this subject in the latter section is the exclusion of it in the preceding one. In the distinct section no power of disapproval after adjournment is prescribed. Yet in this distinct section it is positively ordained that only items so disapproved as therein provided shall be void unless repassed. To incorporate the last clause of section 14 would be inconsistent with the use of the clause: "Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed."

We have been cited to the Journal of the constitutional convention of 1872 showing that section 14, as proposed to the convention, was adopted without change, and that section 15 was materially changed. It is argued that the changes which were made disclose interpretation to be given. It is needless to discuss these changes. There may be force in the argument made upon them. But, as we have hereinbefore said, the interpretation from the language of the provision is plain. The rule which permits a reference to the proceedings of the convention applies only where the meaning of the constitutional provision is doubtful. It cannot, it need not, apply here. Cooley's Const. Lim. 80.

On behalf of respondent, it is maintained, pursuant to allegations of his answer, that it has been the custom of the executive branch of the state government to approve general appropriation bills, or to disapprove some Items therein, within five days after an adjournment of the Legislature, and that such action of the executive department has never been questioned. Such custom, if it has existed as alleged, has been directly contrary to the constitutional provision. No affirmative approval of a general appropriation bill is required, and no disapproval of such bill or any item therein is effective if expressed after adjournment. The rule of contemporaneous or practical construction is sought to be invoked. We are cited to Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 472 et seq. This celebrated authority does not justify the position nor does any authority in this case. The rule applies only where there is ambiguity and doubt. As said at section 473, in the work just mentioned: "Long usage is of no avail against a plain statute; it can be binding only as the interpreter of a doubtful law, and as affording a contemporary exposition." The rule cannot be applied to overthrow an unambiguous mandate of the law. The very growth of the rule sprung from doubtful provisions. In reference to this subject, Judge Cooley says: "Where, however, no ambiguity or doubt appears in the law, we think the same rule applies here as in other cases, that the court should confine its attention to the law, and not allow extrinsic circumstances to introduce a difficulty where the language is plain. To allow force to a practical construction in such case would be to suffer manifest perversions to defeat the evident purpose of the lawmakers." Const. Llm. 84. And in a renowned work by an eminent jurist, it is said: "Contemporary construction * * * can never abrogate the text; it can never fritter away its obvious sense; it can never narrow down its true limitations; it can never enlarge its natural boundaries." Story on the Constitution, § 407.

It is further insisted that, since the general appropriation bill was passed during the last hours of the session, the Governor is denied time for consideration, unless the provision for disapproval of a bill after adjournment is made to apply. The legislative journals show that immediately before adjournment the Governor stated to a joint committee that waited upon him that he had no further communication to make to either house. This committee made such report. Must it not be presumed that the Legislature inferred from this that the general appropriation bill was approved? The Governor could have made reply to this committee that he had been given no time for consideration of the appropriation bill. It must be assumed in reason, fairness, and a recognition of statesmanship that the Legislature would then have provided for the time that the spirit of the Constitution intends that the Governor shall have. That body certainly would have corrected its fault in postponing the passage of this most vital bill to such late hour of the session. If the situation warranted it, he could have requested that the committee report to the Legislature that, if the session was not extended to give him such time, he must veto the bill as a whole. He had full power to convene the body the next day in extraordinary session, limiting that session to the consideration of appropriations only. By such action the Legislature would have learned that the Governor meant to have time for consideration, as it was intended he should have, before final adjournment. It was never contemplated that the important matter of appropriating the public money should be left to the very last moments of a legislative session. Such practice is detrimental to the state and injurious to government. The Legislature should not countenance it. The executive should stamp it out, even if it must be by the immediate disapproval of a bill passed, at such a late hour, under the pressure of hurried legislative grind. The people rightfully assumed, when the Constitution was adopted, that the provision in reference to presenting bills to the Governor for his disapproval and objection, as well as all other provisions of the compact, would be recognized and respected. It should be so. The Legislature can give the executive a long time or a short time for consideration of a general appropriation bill. He does not have to return it to the house within five days after it is presented to him, as required in relation to other bills, unless the session would sooner adjourn. But it was surely believed that the legislative and executive branches, in the interest of the masses they represent, would treat each other fairly in such case. However, the failure of the Legislature or of the executive, whichever one may be at fault, properly to use the provisions of article 7, § 15, cannot alter those provisions. The instrument cannot be amended that way. If the Legislature unfairly denied the Governor time, or the Governor erroneously assumed that he had time after adjournment, these are not substantial reasons for changing, by construction, a mandate which means what it says. We repeat, it was reasonably supposed when these provisions were adopted that they would be fairly dealt with, appropriately and usefully applied, and quite as fairly, appropriately, and usefully interpreted by those to whom direction is given thereby. That the section has not hitherto received such interpretation and use is no reason why it should not in the future. "Two wrongs cannot make a right." That the provisions of the section would be used to the detriment of the proper consideration of bills by the Governor was never contemplated. That it should be misinterpreted to allow time for disapproval after adjournment was never anticipated. Neither of these exigencies need arise. It is hoped and believed that in the future they will not.

There have been addressed to the court considerations relating to the merit of the item in question, to the propriety of the alleged veto, and to the effect of the items sought to be vetoed upon the amount of the public revenue available for expenditure. With these questions this court has nothing whatever to do. Let the bill or the item involved in this case be good or bad, we can concern ourselves with nothing but the question: Is it the legislative will? We can say it is legislation or not legislation, as the case may legally appear; but it is not for us to say that it is good or bad legislation. The policy and propriety of the law rest wholly with the legislative department, subject to the restricted power of disapproval given to the Governor, if exercised by him in proper time.

It appearing that the Governor did not disapprove the item of House Bill No. 342, making the appropriation to petitioner within the time prescribed by the Constitution and in the manner therein directed, the writ will be awarded.

PORTER v. MACK MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 4, 1909.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—RESERVATION—RIGHTS OF GRANTOR IN SURFACE.

A deed conveying land, reserving to the grantor all the clay, fire clay, and other minerals, severs them in ownership from the land, creating two estates therein. The owner of the surface cannot obstruct the mineral owner from a use of the surface for a tramway or other means of transportation fairly useful and necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 163, 164; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—RIGHTS OF MINERAL OWNERS—USE OF SURFACE—INJUNCTION.

Injunction lies for one owning minerals in land, with right to use the surface for mining and removing them, to prevent the surface owner from unlawfully resisting and obstructing the mineral owner in the legitimate use of the surface for mining and removing the minerals.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hancock County.

Bill by Fred G. Porter against the Mack Manufacturing Company. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hart & McKenzie, for appellant. J. B. Donehoo and J. B. Sommerville, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. This is a chancery suit brought in the circuit court of Hancock county by Fred G. Porter against the Mack Manufacturing Company. Porter, claiming the fire clay, coal, and other minerals in a tract of land, went upon it with his hands to construct a tram road upon the surface for the purpose of conveying fire clay and perhaps other minerals which he owned, in order to use them in the manufacture of fire brick in a plant of his upon adjoining land. The Mack Manufacturing Company denied his right to construct a tram road, and, indeed, denied the right, as its answer tells us, of Porter to use the surface for taking away the minerals. The Mack Manufacturing Company absolutely refused as owners of the surface to let Porter build the tram road. It caused a warrant to be sued out from a justice to arrest the employees of Porter for criminal trespass, and probably caused the indictment of Porter and his employees therefor. In short, the Mack Manufacturing Company admits in its answer that it opposed and resisted the right of Porter to go upon the land and construct a tram road or to use the surface. This suit by Porter was to enjoin the Mack Manufacturing Company from interfering with his use of the surface for the purpose of making a tram road and of mining the fire clay, and to declare the right of Porter to have a tramway for the conveyance of the clay, and to enjoin the Mack Manufacturing Company from interference with his right, and from obstructing Porter in its exercise. The circuit court entered a decree permitting Porter to construct and operate a single tramway over the surface of the tract by a certain route of sufficient width, strength, and capacity to remove from the mine fire clay and other minerals, and allowing Porter to open one pit or mine in the surface of the land at a certain point designated for the production of fire clay and other minerals, with the provision in the decree that Porter should so operate the mine, and so construct and operate the tramway with due regard for the rights of the Mack Manufacturing Company in the surface. The Mack Manufacturing Company has taken this appeal.

Desellem and Cooper were owners of the whole body, the corpus, of a tract of land, and by deed they conveyed the tract to Evans, the grantors "reserving to themselves all the clay, fire clay, coal, stone and minerals of whatever kind underlying the above-described tract of land, with the right to mine and remove the same." By this deed Desellem and Cooper granted the surface, granted the land, except that they did not grant, but retained, the minerals. In other words, they made two estates out of the land, two properties, one of the surface or body of the land, the other the minerals, which the deed operated to leave in them, or, rather, the minerals before vested in them remained in them. They thus severed the minerals from the balance of the land. Their deed did not pass the minerals. They had as full estate in the minerals as if the minerals had been separately granted to them by some one else. There is no difference as to title thereto between the case where minerals are granted to one by the owner of the body of the land and the case where the owner of the body of the land grants the land away, excepting the minerals. Preston v. White, 57 W. Va. 278, 50 S. E. 236. If the deed of Deselle and Cooper had not reserved the right to mine and remove the minerals, there would have been an implied right to use the surface in such manner and with such means as would be fairly necessary for the enjoyment of their estates in the minerals. Without this right, what account would be the minerals which they reserved? But their deed expressly retained the right to mine and remove the minerals. In the great case of Marvin v. Brewster Iron Mining Co., 55 N. Y. 538, 14 Am. Rep. 322, this subject is discussed at great length and with great ability. It is true that before that case this question had been elucidated in English decisions. In that case it was held that: "A reservation in a deed of land of the minerals which may be found therein implies the right to penetrate the surface for the minerals, and to use such means in mining and removing them as are necessary; but the means used must be necessary as distinguished from convenient or reasonable, and the surface owner is entitled to subjacent support for the soil in its natural state." The court said: "The whole estate was at first in Parks. He severed it by his conveyance to Downs. He transferred to Downs and his grantees only the surface land. It is said that such a transference is of the surface, and of all profit which can be got from cultivating it or building upon it or using it; that thus much is intended to be conveyed. But as in the same conveyance there is a reserve to the grantor of an important part of the general estate, and of important incidents thereto, it is manifest that, if the reserve is effectual and still operative, there is imposed upon the estate conveyed a serious servitude, though it in its turn becomes to a certain extent dominant over the estate reserved." The deed in that case read: "Reserving always all mineral ores now known or that may hereafter be known, with the privilege of going to and from all beds of ores that may be hereafter worked, on the most convenient route to and from." The court said that this reservation "is also a privilege of way upon the premises." The court also said: "A reserve of minerals and mining rights is construed as an actual grant thereof. It differs not whether the right to mine is by an exception from a deed of the surface or by a grant of the mine by the owner of the whole estate therein reserving to himself the surface." It seems hardly necessary in this mining state to state these principles of law; but it may not be without benefit to do so. They are old and settled principles. I refer to 27 Cyc. 638, and to Snyder on Mines, §§ 1007, 1009. "As against the owner of the surface each of the several purchasers would have the right, without any express words of grant for that purpose, to go upon the surface to open a way by shaft, or drift, or well, to his underlying estate, and to occupy so much of the surface beyond the limits of his shaft, drift, or well, as might be necessary to operate his estate, and remove the product thereof. This is a right to be exercised with due regard to the owner of the surface, and its exercise will be restrained within proper limits by a court of equity if this becomes necessary; but, subject to this limitation, it is a right growing out of the contract of sale, the position of the stratum sold, and the impossibility of reaching it in any other manner." Section 1009. In Charliers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon, 152 Pa. 286, 25 Atl. 597, 18 L. R. A. 702, 34 Am. St. Rep. 645, we find this holding: "The owner of the surface of land who has granted to another person the coal under his land has a right, apart from any reservation in the deed, to access through the coal to the strata underlying it." Such were the rights reserved by Deselle and Cooper. By conveyance these mineral rights became vested in Fred G. Porter, and the right to the surface conveyed by Deselle and Cooper to Evans came to be vested in Mack Manufacturing Company.

Counsel for defense would oppose the plaintiff's suit, upon many authorities, on the theory that his right stands on the law of way of necessity, and that he must prove that necessity; say that the law of way of necessity is applicable. Do we not know without proof, that a use of the surface of necessity calls for a way of inlet and outlet to one who owns the coal or other mineral to produce and market it? The question submits the answer. But how can we logically talk about a way of necessity? That is obiter, because the deed reserves minerals "with the right to mine and remove the same." What use to mine without removal? How can removal be effected without a right to have a wagon way to transport outside the tract? A tramway is just as legitimate as a wagon way, perhaps more so. We do not deny that it must appear that the tram is necessary to the use of the minerals; but it is not technically a way of necessity over the grantor's remaining land.

It is even argued that Porter had to first prove that there are minerals in the land. This is not so. He had right to search for them, if they had not been before found. And he had right to build a tramway, or other way suitable, in anticipation of finding the minerals sought for. But, in fact, prior work had found the useful fire clay, and this tram was considered by Porter as a suitable, convenient, and necessary mode of transportation. It is so proven, if we cannot say so without proof, as we can.

It is said that equity has no jurisdiction because there is adequate remedy at law. That is a ground assigned in the demurrer, but not insisted upon in the brief. It is untenable. What remedy? We are not informed by counsel. An action at law might give damages; but how measure damages? How many actions? For each day, week, or month? That would not give the easement, the ingress and egress. And that would say that Porter must give up his right of ingress and egress, his part of the body of the land. Indeed, there is no question of pecuniary damage. Porter owned part of the land, not the surface, but the minerals. He had a property therein, and a right as to surface, and this claim would deny this property right; would be akin to denial by a co-tenant of joint use. Porter has just as much right to his share or portion as has the defendant to the surface, and that property cannot be enjoyed without use of the surface. The deed to Evans reserved this property. The very nature of the case tells that equity is the only court that can give adequate relief. The equity remedy is well settled to restrain obstruction to clear right of way or easement. High on Injunction, §§ 886, 896; Flaherty v. Fleming, 58 W. Va. 669, 52 S. E. 857, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461; Tufts v. Copen, 37 W. Va. 623, 16 S. E. 793. It cannot be said that Porter must first establish his right at law. It is not controverted, but admitted, that Porter is owner of the minerals. This ownership is conclusively established. "But it is not necessary that complainant's title should have been actually established by an action at law in order to give a court of equity jurisdiction; for if he makes out a prima facie title, and the same is not controverted by the defendant, he is entitled to an injunction to prevent trespass likely to result in irreparable injury to his property. Greater latitude is allowed in the case of trespass to mining property than in restraining ordinary trespass to realty, for the mineral is the chief value of this species of property, and, if the trespass were allowed to continue for a great length of time, it would deteriorate the value of the property." Snyder on Mines, §§ 480, 481.

Counsel says that the bill alleges irreparable injury without stating facts showing it. Clearly this position cannot be sustained. The bill shows a severance of minerals from the surface, a property in Porter of the minerals, and an acknowledged resistance by the surface owner of the right of way and right to open the surface to get the minerals, and a clear obstruction of the right. We judicially know that ownership of the minerals is a property right and of great value, and there is proven and admitted open denial, open resistance and obstruction of the right vested in Porter, not merely by implication, but by express reservation in the deed to Evans. The bill alleges, the evidence shows, that the tramway is a suitable and necessary means of transporting the fire clay, and that the opening allowed was necessary.

We see no error in the decree, and therefore affirm it.

HAYMOND et al. v. MURPHY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 4, 1909.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 239*) — BONA FIDE PURCHASERS — FAILURE TO RECORD INSTRUMENT.

Neither by subrogation, marshaling of assets, nor otherwise can land, purchased for a valuable consideration and without notice, be subjected to the satisfaction of judgments rendered by justices of the peace against the vendor, not docketed at the time of the recordation of the deed or contract of purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

2. MARSHALING ASSETS AND SECURITIES (§ 4*) — NATURE OF LIENS — VENDOR'S LIEN.

If the land so purchased be bound, along with other unsold land of the vendor, by a vendor's lien, constituting the first lien on both tracts, it should be relieved from the burden thereof, in whole or in part, according to the circumstances of the case, by application of the proceeds of the sale of such other land to the satisfaction of the lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marshaling Assets and Securities, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 266*)—OBJECTIONS TO COMMISSIONER'S REPORT—REVIEW.

Advantage of an error in a commissioner's report apparent upon the face thereof, or upon the record of the cause, may be taken in the appellate court, though not noted in any exception to the report nor insisted upon in the court below.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Braxton County.

Bill by W. E. Haymond and others against McComas Murphy and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and Tetrick Bros. & Stewart appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Hall Bros., for appellants. Haymond & Fox, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. J. W. Tetrick, O. M. Tetrick, and O. E. Stewart, partners doing business as Tetrick Bros. & Stewart, claim to have been prejudiced by a decree pronounced in three consolidated creditors' suits against McComas Murphy and others in the circuit court of Braxton county. Murphy and his wife seem to have been trading extensively in real estate, town lots, and incurring heavy indebtedness, some of which was secured by vendor's liens and otherwise, and much of it unsecured. The appellants bought from them two town lots covered along with other property by a vendor's lien and a docketed justice's judgment. At the time of their purchase, there were a good many other undocketed judgments of that kind and a number of others were subsequently obtained. In the separate suits brought to enforce the liens some of the lots were sold, and while others remained unsold the suits were consolidated for convenience and the better protection of the interests of all parties.

The appellants were not interested otherwise than as purchasers of two lots as aforesaid. These were lots Nos. 1 and 2 in Hyer and Stalnaker's addition to the town of Burnsville. At the time of the purchase said lot No. 1, together with lots Nos. 5 and 6, were subject to a vendor's lien in favor of Hyer and Stalnaker for over $400. On lots Nos. 5 and 6, so linked with No. 1, there was a deed of trust in favor of the Burnsville Exchange Bank and certain sureties for the sum of $300. Hyer and Stalnaker held a vendor's lien on lots Nos. 69 and 70 and other land which Murphy, after his purchase thereof, had divided in lots, which he numbered 17 to 28, inclusive. Murphy was also indebted to W. T. Brosius, trustee, for purchase money of lot No. 3 in section A and lot No. 7 in section 3 of Offutt's addition, more than $700, which debt was a lien on said lots. The vendor's lien on lots Nos. 1, 5, and 6 was ascertained to be $410.06, the trust lien on Nos. 5 and 6 $312.26, the contract lien on Nos. 69 and 70 and 17 to 28 $212.82, and the contract lien on Nos. 3 in section A and 7 in section 3, with the costs, $897.97. On these two there was another trust deed lien for $600. Lots Nos. 5 and 6 were sold separately for $1,450, considerably more than enough to pay the vendor's and trust deed liens on them and No. 1; Nos. 69 and 70 and 18 to 28 for $888; and Nos. 3 and 7 for $1,330. At the time of the purchase of lots Nos. 1 and 2 by the appellants, and the recordation of their contract of purchase, only one judgment had been docketed, that of Dowell, Helm & Co., for the sum of $278.44. At that time the judgments recovered amounted, in the aggregate, to $1,188.60, and, after that date, others, amounting to $1,025.51, were recovered. All of them but one were rendered by justices of the peace, and the one rendered by the circuit court was subsequent to the recordation of the contract of purchase. Lot No. 1 had been conveyed to McComas Murphy and Annie L. Murphy, his wife. Lot No. 2 had been bought of Hyer and Stalnaker by McComas Murphy and H. H. Coberly. How Coberly's interest was acquired by Murphy does not appear, but the lot was conveyed by Murphy and his wife to the appellants. Only one of all the judgments was against Murphy and his wife, that of Burk and Garrett for $86.44. The others were against Murphy alone. All the lots except Nos. 1 and 2 seem to have been sold. One group, 5 and 6, bringing $1,450, another, 69, 70, and 17 to 28, $888, and another, 3 and 7, $1,330. The proceeds of the sale of the first group will almost pay all the liens on Nos. 1, 5, and 6 to and including the Dowell, Helm & Co. judgment. Those of the second group will apparently pay something on this judgment, even if none of those constituting liens on 5 and 6 prior to that of Dowell, Helm & Co. should be paid out of the proceeds of 5 and 6, and, if they should be largely satisfied out of the proceeds of 5 and 6, the proceeds of 69, 70, and 17 to 28 will apparently pay the Dowell, Helm & Co. judgment; or, if the judgments having precedence over that of Dowell, Helm & Co. should be satisfied out of the proceeds of 69, 70, and 17 to 28, the surplus of proceeds of 5 and 6 seems to be amply sufficient to satisfy the Dowell, Helm & Co. judgment to the complete relief of both lot No. 1 and lot No. 2.

Finding this state of things in the consolidated suits, the court entered a decree confirming the commissioner's report, adjusting the liens, and ordering a sale of the unsold lots. By this decree the surplus arising from the sale of lots Nos. 5 and 6 was held liable for the debts therein provided for. It was further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that lots 1 and 2 should not be sold, if the entire proceeds of lots 5, 6, 69, 70 and 17 to 28 should be sufficient to discharge the liens thereon; but that, if a balance of such liens should remain unsatisfied out of such proceeds, the sale of said two lots, or such parts thereof as may be necessary, shall be restricted to such balance, or prevented by payment thereof, but in no event shall they be liable for an amount in excess of the judgment in favor of Dowell, Helm & Co. and lot No. 1 for the vendor's lien in favor of Haymond, administrator of Hyer, and S. Wise Stalnaker. The liens binding lots 5, 6, 69, 70, and 17 to 28 by virtue of the decree are, first, the vendor's and trust deed liens above mentioned, and then all the judgments in the order of their precedence over one another. The effect of this decree is to make lot No. 1 wholly satisfy the vendor's lien for $410.06, though it constituted the first lien on it and two others, and the proceeds of sale of the other two were more than sufficient to satisfy it, and to make Nos. 1 and 2 pay the whole of the Dowell, Helm & Co. judgment, though it constitutes a lien on all of Murphy's real estate, and apparently could be satisfied out of the proceeds of lots 5, 6, 69, 70, and 17 to 28, without displacing any prior liens thereon. It also subjects Mrs. Murphy's one-half of lot No. 1 to this judgment against her husband alone. These are grounds of complaint against it.

The decree is in our opinion plainly violative of statutory provisions and also of well-settled principles of equity. The appellants are protected in their purchase from undocketed judgments rendered by justices of the peace prior to the date of the purchase. Their contract was recorded before any of the judgments other than that of Dowell, Helm & Co. were docketed, and there is no proof that the purchasers had any notice of them. Code 1899, c. 139, § 6 (Code 1906, § 4146). As purchasers of lots Nos. 1 and 2, they are entitled to protection from the sale of those lots, if the liens thereon acquired before they purchased and recorded their contract can be satisfied out of the proceeds of the other real estate of the vendor without defeating liens thereon prior to those constituting burdens on the land purchased. Code 1899, c. 139, § 8 (Code 1906, § 4148). In no event could the lots purchased by them be made liable, directly or indirectly, by marshaling of assets or otherwise for judgments not constituting a lien on the lots purchased as against the purchasers thereof. The principle of marshaling assets cannot be invoked or applied so as to defeat statutory rights. Section 6 says "the judgment of a justice of the peace shall not be a lien on real estate" as against a purchaser thereof for valuable consideration without notice "until the same is docketed as aforesaid." Section 8 of said chapter provides as follows: "Where the real estate liable to the lien of a judgment is more than sufficient to satisfy the same, and it, or any part of it, has been aliened, as between alienees for value, that which was aliened last shall, in equity, be first liable, and so on with other successive alienations until the whole judgment is satisfied. * * * But any part of such real estate retained by the debtor himself shall be first liable to the satisfaction of the judgment." These provisions make it the duty of the court to exonerate lots Nos. 1 and 2 by satisfaction of the judgment liens thereon out of other property still owned by the grantor, the judgment debtor, if that can be done without defeating liens on such other property, having preference over the liens covering such other property and the lots sold. Independently of these statutory provisions, the same result would be accomplished by the application of equity principles. The equity of the purchaser is equal to that of the judgment lienors. The statute just quoted applies to judgments only, but general equity principles apply the same rule to the vendor's lien. Besides, there is no ground upon which judgments acquired subsequent to the purchase can be fastened upon these lots to the prejudice of the purchaser. The decree complained of is broad enough to do that to the extent of the amount of the vendor's lien and the judgment in favor of Dowell, Helm & Co. These views are fully sustained by principles declared in McClaskey and Others v. O'Brien, 16 W. Va. 791; Snyder v. Martin, 17 W. Va. 276, 41 Am. Rep. 470; Whitehill v. Basnett, 24 W. Va. 142; Snyder v. Botkin, 37 W. Va. 355, 16 S. E. 591; McNeil v. Miller, 29 W. Va. 480, 2 S. E. 335; Ball v. Setzer, 33 W. Va. 446, 10 S. E. 798; Linn v. Collins, 47 W. Va. 250, 34 S. E. 916, 81 Am. St. Rep. 788.

The report of the commissioner ignored these rights of the appellants, and dealt with lots Nos. 1 and 2 as they have been dealt with in the decree complained of. The appellants, as well as Dowell, Helm & Co., excepted to this part of the report, and the court overruled their exceptions. They should have been sustained and a decree pronounced in accordance with the conclusions above stated directing a sale of lots Nos. 1 and 2 only in the event that the surplus proceeds of the property already sold should be insufficient to satisfy the judgment in favor of Dowell, Helm & Co. and the others having priority over it on the property sold, namely, the judgments in favor of the Citizens' Bank of Weston for $178.30, Burk and Garrett for $86.44, Citizens' Bank of Weston for $184.50, and the Collins Company for $52.78. This is subject to one qualification. The Dowell, Helm & Co. judgment is against McComas Murphy only, binding only his interest in lot No. 1. That lot was conveyed to McComas Murphy and Annie L. Murphy. The judgment constituted no lien, therefore, on the one-half thereof which belonged at the rendition of it to Annie L. Murphy. Hence only an undivided half thereof should be sold to satisfy it. There was no exception to the commissioner's report in so far as it found that McComas Murphy had been the owner of lot No. 1. This, however, was an error apparent upon the face of the record. That lot had been proceeded against in the suit instituted by Haymond, administrator, as the property of both husband and wife, and conditionally decreed to be sold as such. Failure to except for an error apparent upon the record or the face of the report itself does not constitute a waiver thereof. Gardner v. Gardner, 47 W. Va. 368, 34 S. E. 792; State v. King, 47 W. Va. 437, 35 S. E. 30; Gay v. Lockridge, 43 W. Va. 267, 27 S. E. 306; Kester v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 161, 20 S. E. 933.

It is said the legal title to lots Nos. 1 and 2 was outstanding, and no decree of sale should have been made for that reason. The commissioner reported that these lots had been conveyed to McComas Murphy and wife and McComas Murphy and Coberly, respectively, who were all parties, and there was no exception to that finding. The argument of outstanding title is based on the absence of deeds from the record showing the conveyance. We think failure to except on this ground constitutes a waiver of the finding or an acquiescence therein. In fact, the appellants themselves claim under Murphy and wife.

For the reasons stated the decree complained of, in so far as it makes lots Nos. 1 and 2 liable, by subrogation or otherwise, for judgments other than that of Dowell, Helm & Co., or for it, except in so far as it shall remain unsatisfied, after applying thereon the surplus proceeds of the sale of the unaliened property of the judgment debtor, after satisfaction of liens thereon prior to it, and more than an undivided half of said lot No. 1 liable for said judgment in any event, and said lot No. 1 liable, as aforesaid, for the amount due under the vendor's lien in favor of Hyer and Stalnaker, must be reversed, the exceptions of the appellants and Dowell, Helm & Co. to the commissioner's report sustained, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles and conclusions herein stated and the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

BARR et al. v. BARR.

EQUITY (§ 394*)—MASTERS—COMMISSIONS.

Civ. Code 1902, § 3113, allows masters the same commissions for moneys passing through their hands as are allowed by law to sheriffs. Section 3118 allows sheriffs 2 per cent. commissions on all moneys collected by them if under $300, and, if over that sum, 2 per cent. of the first $300 and "one-half of one per cent. on all sums paid to plaintiff" on execution lodged with the sheriff, and also allows them commissions of one-half of 1 per cent. for transferring money to a party. Held, that a master was not entitled to a commission of one-half of 1 per cent. on money passing through his hands and disbursed by him, in addition to the 2 per cent. allowed on the first $300 under the part of section 3118 quoted, that applying to money which has not passed through the sheriff's hands, but which is paid directly to the plaintiff by the judgment debtor, but was entitled to such commissions thereon under the provision relating to transferring money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Dec. Dig. § 394.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Saluda County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Partition by Lula M. Barr; individually and as administratrix of Capers G. Barr, deceased, and others, against Capers G. Barr, Jr. From a decree allowing the master certain commissions on money disbursed, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. T. Jaynes and Le Grand G. Walker, for appellants. C. J. Ramage, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The following statement of facts is set out in the record: "The matter presented by the petition and answer in the above-entitled action relates to the commissions of the master on sales of real estate sold on sale day in January, 1908, under decree in partition of the real estate of Capers G. Barr, Sr., deceased. On such sale all the real estate was purchased by Lula M. Barr for the aggregate sum of $11,570. The parties in interest contend that the commissions of the master on said sum of $11,570 is 2 per cent. for the first $300, and 1 per cent. on the excess of said sum, aggregating $118.70. Before the commencement of this proceeding the said sum of $118.70 had been paid to T. L. Edwards, master, out of the proceeds of the said real estate. T. L. Edwards, master, claimed that he was entitled to one-half of 1 per cent. on said proceeds of sale in addition to the 2 per cent. on the first $300 and 1 per cent. on the balance, except on his own costs, fees, and commissions, which said one-half of 1 per cent. was claimed for disbursing said proceeds. In order to facilitate the execution and delivery of the deeds to Lula M. Barr, purchaser of said real estate, the sum of $57.85, an amount slightly in excess of amount claimed by said master, was deposited with M. T. Pitts, clerk of court, to await the determination of the question as to the commissions in dispute." It was admitted that the funds were to be considered as passing through the master's hands. His honor, the circuit judge, ruled that the master was entitled to one-half of 1 per cent. on the entire amount disbursed by him, except his own costs, fees, and commissions, in addition to the 2 per cent. on the first $300, and 1 per cent. on the balance. The only question raised by the exceptions is whether said ruling was erroneous.

Section 3113 of the Code of Laws of 1902 provides that masters "shall be allowed the same commissions, for all moneys passing through their hands, as are now allowed by law to sheriffs." Section 3118 contains the provision that sheriffs shall be allowed "commissions on all moneys collected by them, if under three hundred dollars, two per cent., if over that sum, two per cent. for the first three hundred dollars, and one-half of one per cent. on all sums paid to plaintiff, his agent or attorney, on execution lodged with the sheriff." Our construction of this provision is that it refers in the first instance to commissions on moneys collected by the sheriff; and, secondly, to commissions on moneys which have not passed through the hands of the sheriff, but which have been paid to the plaintiff his agent or attorney by the judgment debtor. Previous statutes on this subject show that the Legislature has kept in view the distinction between commissions on moneys collected by the sheriff and commissions on moneys paid by the judgment debtor directly to the plaintiff. Commissions on moneys collected by the sheriff have always been larger than those upon moneys paid directly to the plaintiff by the judgment debtor. In the fee bill of 1791 (5 St. at Large, p. 157) we find the following under the head of "Sheriffs": "For levying an execution on the goods of the defendant, and selling the same, for all sums where the debt does not exceed one hundred pounds, two and a half per cent. commissions; and for all sums where the debt exceeds one hundred pounds, one per cent.; in all cases where the defendant, after the sheriff may have levied on the property, shall settle with the plaintiff before actual sale, the sheriff in such cases shall be entitled to one fourth per cent., besides all reasonable disbursements, and also fees for entering execution, but if the defendant shall pay the money to the sheriff, one per cent. in lieu of the one fourth." The following appears in Rev. St. 1873, p. 169, c. 20, § 61: "Commissions on all moneys collected by him (the sheriff), if under three hundred dollars two per cent.; if over that sum, two per cent. on the first three hundred dollars, and one per cent. on balance; one half of one per cent. on all moneys paid out of office, on all executions lodged." The word "out" means "outside," and the provision last mentioned is practically the same as that now appearing in section 3118 of the Code of Laws. There are other old statutes on this subject likewise tending to show that this is the proper construction of that provision; and that the words "one-half of one per cent. on all sums paid to plaintiff," etc., are not applicable to the facts of this case.

There is, however, another provision of section 3118 which allows to sheriffs commissions for "transferring money, bonds or other securities for money to party, one-half of one per cent." On funds passing through the hands of the sheriff he is not only allowed commissions for collection, but also for "transferring" money in his hands to the party entitled thereto. The parties to the action having agreed that the moneys are to be considered as having passed through the hands of the master, it necessarily follows that he is entitled to the additional commissions for which he contends.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BERRY v. VIRGINIA STATE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 1, 1909.)

1. VENUE (§ 26*)—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES—FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 146, providing that an action against a nonresident may be brought in any county which plaintiff may designate in his complaint, a common pleas court would have jurisdiction of an action against a foreign fire insurance company, though the company had no agent in that county, and the policy was issued in another county, where the insured property was located and in which plaintiff resided at the time of loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—POLICY—WAIVER OF PROVISIONS—EVIDENCE.

A statement to a policy holder by an agent of the insurer, made when the policy was issued and premium received, that a condition of the policy would not be insisted on, is evidence of waiver or estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1716; Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 154*)—COMPETENCY—STATEMENTS BY DECEDENT.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 400, providing that no party to an action shall be examined respecting a transaction or communication between him and a person at the time of examination deceased, etc., as a witness against a party prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir at law, etc., does not apply to an examination of plaintiff in an action on a fire policy as to statements made to him by a deceased agent of the insurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 661; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—ACTION ON POLICY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the amount determined in the proof of loss, inserted by an adjuster, operated as a limit of recovery on the policy by virtue of an agreement of insured, held, under the evidence, to be for the jury.

5. INSURANCE (§ 666*)—ACTION ON POLICY—INTEREST.

Where a fire policy by its terms was payable 60 days after notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of loss had been received by the company, the insurance was due and interest began to run 60 days after that date, and in an action on the policy it was error to allow interest from the date of the fire.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Saluda County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by M. W. Berry against the Virginia State Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed on condition that remittitur be made.

Blease & Dominick, for appellant. Barnard B. Evans, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant, Virginia State Insurance Company, appeals from a judgment of $779.80 recovered by the plaintiff on a fire insurance policy.

The action was brought and the judgment entered in Saluda county, where the plaintiff now resides. The policy was issued by defendant's agent in Newberry county, in which county the insured property was situated and in which the plaintiff resided at the time of the fire. There was no evidence that the defendant had an agent in Saluda county. Under these facts the defendant, relying on the case of Nixon v. Piedmont Ins. Co., 74 S. C. 438, 54 S. E. 657, submits that the court of common pleas of Saluda county was without jurisdiction of the action. The cases cited, and others like it, involved the question of the proper county for the trial of actions against domestic corporations, and they have no application to such question affecting foreign corporations. An action against a nonresident may be brought in any county which the plaintiff may designate. Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 146. It is true the pleadings do not show by direct allegation that the defendant is a foreign corporation, nor is there any direct evidence on that point; but, from the allegations of the answer, it may be inferred the defendant is a foreign corporation. The name of the defendant, Virginia State Insurance Company, gives some indication that it is a corporation of the state of Virginia, and this fact is still shown by the allegation of the answer that in the courts of Virginia certain creditors of the plaintiff had attached the debt due to him by the defendant.

There is no doubt that the plaintiff violated the iron-safe clause of the policy, for he did not use a safe nor keep the books required by the policy, nor keep such books, as he had, in a place not exposed to the fire which destroyed the insured property. This violation of the terms of the policy gave rise to the issue whether the defendant had waived these requirements. Mr. Tyree, the agent who issued the policy, died before the trial; but the plaintiff testified that when the policy was issued he told the agent that he had no iron safe, and the agent replied the iron-safe clause was not carried out by all the small stores. The plaintiff's store was a small one; the stock of goods being valued at about $2,000. This was some evidence tending to show that the agent of the defendant threw the plaintiff off his guard and took his money for the premium, leading him to believe that compliance with the iron-safe clause would not be expected. A statement to the policy holder by an agent of the insurer, made at the time of the issuance of the policy and receipt of the premium, to the effect that a condition of the policy will not be insisted on, is evidence of waiver or estoppel. Pearlstone v. Insurance Co., 74 S. C. 250, 54 S. E. 372; Fludd v. Insurance Co., 75 S. C. 315, 55 S. E. 762. There was therefore no error in refusing a nonsuit because of the failure to comply with the iron-safe clause of the policy.

The objection, under section 400 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, to the testimony of the plaintiff as to the statements made to him by Tyree, the deceased agent of defendant, is not well taken. The defendant is not defending the action as "executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor" of Tyree, and therefore section 400 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 does not apply.

The next position taken by defendant is that the recovery could not in any event be greater than $400, because the plaintiff had agreed to accept that sum, and that even from this sum should be deducted the amount of certain attachments sued out in Virginia. The evidence is clear to the effect that the plaintiff agreed that the demand inserted in the proof of loss by the adjuster should be $400 on condition that immediate payment should be made. The defendant failed to pay any amount. It is therefore clear there was evidence warranting the circuit court in submitting to the jury the issue whether the plaintiff was bound by the amount set out and demanded in the proof of loss. The evidence that the defendant's agent said the payment was not made, because of attachments in Virginia, could not affect the question for the reason that no attachment proceedings were introduced in evidence, and the plaintiff denied that the defendant had ever offered to pay the $400, less the amount of the attachments. The exceptions on this point are overruled.

The verdict, however, included interest from January 1, 1907, the date of the fire, and was excessive in this respect. By its terms the policy is "payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of loss have been received by the company." The estimate and proof of loss was dated March 28, 1907, and the insurance became due by the terms of the policy 60 days thereafter. The verdict should therefore have included interest from May 25, 1907, and not from January 1, 1907.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment be affirmed on condition that within 10 days after the filing of the remittitur the plaintiff remit from the judgment, by proper indorsement thereon, the excess of interest amounting to $19.73; and that, upon failure of the plaintiff to make such indorsement, the judgment be reversed, and that the defendant have a new trial.

OGILVIE et al. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 27, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DELAYED MESSAGE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—MENTAL SUFFERING.

In an action against a telegraph company for delay in the delivery of a message relating to an accident to plaintiff's son, plaintiff was allowed, after stating that she suffered great mental anguish, to state that her "suspense was terrible," and her husband was permitted to testify as to his wife's condition on receipt of the telegram that: "It was pretty bad. She was all to pieces. I never saw her like that before in my life." There was no attempt to show that her suspense and suffering were beyond what the average normal mother would feel in her situation, and the court carefully restricted recovery to an ordinary person under the circumstances. Held, that such testimony did not violate the rule excluding testimony as to the claimant's peculiar or abnormal fears and apprehensions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTION FOR DELAYED MESSAGE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for delay in the delivery of a telegram, a witness for defendant testified that he attended to all the business of the railroad and express companies at the station to which it was sent, and that on the day it was sent he was very busy in the warehouse most of the time and had no help. On cross-examination he testified that the work was too much for one man, and that he ought to have had help, and was further allowed to testify as to the income of the railroad and express companies at that point as bearing on the question of the amount of work he had to do. On the same line, defendant was allowed to show that the income of the telegraph business did not exceed $10 per month. Held, that the testimony as to the income of the railroad and express companies was not wholly irrelevant, as it had some relation to the question whether the agent's failure to receive and deliver the message on the day it was sent could be excused because of reasonable demands on his time and attention by his associated employments, and that it was not reasonable to suppose that the jury may have estimated the amount of damages by reference to such income, and hence there was no error in admitting the evidence in relation thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*)—ACTION FOR DELAYED MESSAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for a delayed telegram informing plaintiff of an accident to her son, defendant requested a charge that "a telegraph company, under the mental anguish act, is not liable for mental anguish merely incidental to its failure to deliver a message, and in such an action the defendant is charged with the suffering, if any, which the failure to deliver the message may reasonably be expected to produce, when its contents are considered, not with the suffering due to a peculiar temperament, but that of an ordinary human being," and in addition that "plaintiff should not recover under the act for any feeling of disappointment, annoyance, or vexation which she may have felt." The court refused to charge the additional sentence and instead charged as follows. "That means the failure to deliver must cause the suffering, and the test is what the jury think that a person of ordinary feeling, the usual ordinary feeling in this case—I charge you that feeling that you conclude a mother, the ordinary mother, that the ordinary mother should have under similar circumstances. You cannot take the way of a person of a very excitable temperament or impulsive disposition on the one hand, or one of a very callous disposition on the other. The test you go by is what, in your judgment, a person of ordinary feeling under similar circumstances, what feeling they had, or should have suffered, suffered under similar circumstances." Held, that plaintiff's regret or disappointment in being delayed in reaching and ministering to her son may have been so keen, bitter, or intense as to be properly classed as mental anguish, and the charge given sufficiently covered the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*)—ACTION FOR DELAYED MESSAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Conceding that, in an action for a delayed telegram, the reasonableness of office hours is a question of law for the court, when there is no dispute as to the facts, yet, where there was testimony that the regular office hours at a telegraph station were from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m., the court could not assume that the closing of the office at 6:30 p. m. Saturday and opening the next morning at 9:30 was reasonable office hours, and there was no error in modifying a requested charge to that effect so as to leave the question of the reasonableness of office hours to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—ACTION FOR DELAYED MESSAGE—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for a delayed telegram informing plaintiff of an accident to her son, there was no error in submitting to the jury the question of punitive damages, where there was no explanation whatever as to the long delay at a relay office from 4 p. m. Saturday to 10:06 Sunday morning, though the agent made commendable effort to deliver the message on its receipt at the latter time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Emma M. Ogilvie and another against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearons, Nelson & Nelson, and Efrd & Dreher, for appellant. Graham & Sturkie, for respondents.

JONES, C. J. The defendant, appellant, seeks to reverse a judgment for $500 in favor of plaintiff for alleged negligent and wanton failure to deliver the following message filed by Jeremiah Smith with defendant's agent at Conway, S. C., and addressed to the plaintiff at Lexington, S. C.: "Daggett badly cut with saw; flesh wound; not necessarily fatal. Both come." Daggett, referred to in the message, was plaintiff's son. The message, as alleged, was filed with the defendant for transmission about 4 o'clock p. m. on Saturday November 12, 1904, and was not delivered until about 10:30 o'clock a. m. on November 13, 1904, resulting in delaying plaintiff in reaching her son for about 26 hours, and thereby causing her to suffer great grief and mental anguish.

Appellant's first contention is that the court erred in allowing plaintiff, after stating that she suffered great mental anguish, to further state that her "suspense was terrible," and in permitting plaintiff's husband to testify as to his wife's condition, upon the receipt of the telegram: "It was pretty bad. She was all to pieces. I never saw her like that before in my life." It is objected that the testimony violated the rule stated in Willis v. Tel. Co., 69 S. C. 537, 48 S. E. 538, 104 Am. St. Rep. 828, excluding testimony as to the claimant's peculiar or abnormal fears and apprehensions, but we do not so hold. There was no attempt to show that plaintiff's suspense and suffering were beyond what the average normal mother would feel in her situation, and in instructing the jury the court was careful to apply the rule in the Willis Case and restrict recovery to the suffering of an ordinary person under the circumstances.

Error is alleged in admitting evidence as to the income of the railroad and express companies at the Lexington station. Defendant's witness Hartley had testified that he attended to all the business at Lexington of the railroad, express, and telegraph companies, and that on Saturday, November 12th, he was very busy in the warehouse most of the time and had no help. On cross-examination he testified that the work was too much for one man to do, and that he ought to have had help, and was further allowed to testify as to the income of the railroad and express companies at that point as bearing upon the question of the amount of work the agent had to do. The testimony was not wholly irrelevant, as it had some relation to the question whether the failure of defendant's agent at Lexington to receive and deliver the message on November 12th could be excused because of reasonable demands upon his time and attention by his associated employments. On this same line, defendant was allowed to show that the income of the telegraph business did not exceed $10 per month. It is not reasonable to suppose that the jury may have estimated the amount of damages against the defendant by reference to the income of strangers to the suit.

It is alleged that the court erred in not giving the jury, without modification, defendant's sixth request, as follows: "A telegraph company, under the mental anguish act, is not liable for mental anguish which was merely incidental to its failure to deliver a message, and, in an action such as this, the defendant is charged with the suffering, if any, which the failure to deliver the message may reasonably be expected to produce, when its contents are considered, not with the suffering due to a peculiar temperament, but that of an ordinary human being; and under the mental anguish act the plaintiff in this case cannot recover for any feeling of disappointment, annoyance, or vexation which she may have felt by reason of the failure to promptly deliver the message in question." The court charged the first sentence of the request, but refused to charge the last sentence, and instead charged as follows: "That means the failure to deliver must cause the suffering, and the test is what the jury think that a person of ordinary feeling, the usual ordinary feeling in this case—I charge you that feeling that you conclude a mother, the ordinary mother, that the ordinary mother should have under similar circumstances. You cannot take the way of a person of a very excitable temperament or impulsive disposition on the one hand, or one of a very callous disposition on the other. The test you go by is what, in your judgment, a person of ordinary feeling under similar circumstances, what feeling they had, or should have suffered, suffered under similar circumstances." It is contended that the modification was not in harmony with the construction of the statute given in Johnson v. Tel. Co., 81 S. O. 235, 62 S. E. 244, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1002. The court in that case was considering the application of the statute with respect to the relatives not connected with the subject of the message by close family ties, and therefore not likely to sustain the mental anguish contemplated by the statute. The present case involved the mental suffering of a mother with respect to her son. Her regret or disappointment in being delayed in reaching and ministering to him may have been so keen or bitter or intense as to be properly charged as mental anguish. The charge given sufficiently covered the issue.

The appellant requested the court to charge the jury: "That closing the telegraph office at Lexington on Saturday afternoon at 6:30 and opening next morning at 9:30 is reasonable office hours, and the company is not required by law to receive a message at Lexington between 6:30 p. m. Saturday and 9:30 a. m. Sunday." The court modified the request by charging "that it is for the jury to say whether the closing of the telegraph office at Lexington on Saturday afternoon at 6:30, if it was closed, and you are to say whether closed, and opening the next morning at 9:30, if opened at all, were unreasonable office hours or not, and, if you decide that they were reasonable office hours, then the telegraph company would not be required by law to receive a message at Lexington on Saturday afternoon between 6:30 p. m. and 9:30 a. m. Sunday. You are to be judges." Appellant contends that this was error on the ground that the reasonableness of office hours is a question of law for the court when there is no dispute as to the facts. Conceding this to be correct, the court committed no error, as there was testimony that the regular office hours at Lexington were from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m., and the court could not assume the facts to be as declared in the request.

It is finally contended that the court erred in submitting the question of punitive damages to the jury. While it appears that the message was promptly transmitted from Conway to Augusta, Ga., the relay office, there was no explanation whatever as to the long delay of the message at the Augusta office from 4 p. m. Saturday to 10:06 a. m. Sunday morning. By many decisions in this state it has been held that a long, unexplained delay in transmitting and delivering telegrams affords some evidence of a reckless or wanton disregard of duty. It is true that the agent at Lexington made commendable effort to deliver the message on its receipt by him at 10:06 Sunday morning, but this was unavailing in view of the long and unexplained delay in transmitting from the Augusta office.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(83 S. C. 68)

TALBERT v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 27, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 65*) — NONDELIVERY OF MESSAGES — ACTIONS — COMPLAINT.

The allegations in the complaint, in an action by a wife for delay in the delivery of a telegram announcing the serious illness of her husband, that the husband was suddenly taken with a relapse of typhoid fever, that plaintiff had nursed him until he became convalescent, that she had an invalid son who needed care, and to recuperate and to place the son where he could have attention she went to the home of her kinsman, that shortly thereafter the husband was taken with a relapse, etc., did not set forth any element of damages, but were merely of an explanatory nature, rendering the refusal to strike the allegations and the admission of evidence in support thereof, at most, harmless error, where the cause was tried on the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

The refusal to permit a witness to state what a third person had said was not prejudicial, where the third person was afterwards examined as a witness and testified fully as to the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4194; Dec. Dig. § 1057.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

An instruction, in an action against a telegraph company for delay in the delivery of a telegram, that where the sender of a message knows that the addressee is a visitor in a strange city, staying with a relative whose name is not the same as the addressee, and fails to give any further address than the name of the city, the sender is guilty of negligence precluding a recovery, provided such negligence is the proximate cause of the delay, is erroneous as invading the province of the jury and as a charge on the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 439, 450, 465; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 68*) — DELAY IN THE DELIVERY OF MESSAGES — DAMAGES — PRESUMPTIONS.

A delay of about 20 hours in the delivery of a message addressed to a wife requesting her to come at once, and stating that her husband was not expected to live through the night, presumptively causes the wife to suffer mental anguish.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County; John S. Wilson, Judge. Action by Mrs. Lillie C. Talbert against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint alleged: That on October 18, 1906, Joe Talbert, the husband of plaintiff, had suddenly become ill with a relapse of typhoid fever; that Joe Talbert had come to the home of his mother at Parksville from his duty as baggagemaster in the employ of the Southern Railway Company, between Columbia, S. C., and Asheville, N. C., with a spell of typhoid fever; that plaintiff had been with him and nursed him for about five weeks, when he became convalescent; that plaintiff had an invalid son, who needed her care; that she was thoroughly exhausted; that, when her husband became better, she went to the home of her kinsman, in Laurens, to recuperate, etc., and that shortly thereafter her husband was taken with a relapse.

The following are the exceptions of defendant:

"Because the presiding judge erred:

"(1) In not sustaining defendant's motion to strike out in paragraph 3 of the complaint the following words, 'with a relapse of typhoid fever,' and the words: 'Between Columbia, S. C., and Asheville, N. C., with a spell of typhoid fever. That the plaintiff, his wife, had been with him and nursed him for about five weeks, when he became convalescent and seemed to be out of danger. That the plaintiff has an invalid son who needs her constant care and attention; and that she was thoroughly exhausted in mind and body by the double strain on her on account of the illness of her husband.' Also the words, 'in order to recuperate her strength and in order to place her invalid son where he could have attention that he needed.' The said matters being irrelevant, not stating any element of damage for which the defendant was liable, were not in contemplation of the parties at the time the message was filed for transmission, and there is no allegation in the complaint that such state of facts was made known to the defendant by the party filing the message, and the message does not on its face disclose such state of facts.

"(2) In permitting F. P. McGowan, a witness for plaintiff, to testify, over objection of defendant's counsel, as follows: 'Q. Do you recall what her condition was at the time she came there? (Referring to Mrs. Talbert's condition at the time she visited his house at least two weeks prior to October 18, 1906.) A. Mrs. Talbert's condition? Q. Yes. A. She seemed to be rather worn out and tired and exhausted, physically, was not strong. Q. Whom did she have with her? A. A little boy about eight years old. Q. What condition was he in? (Objected to as irrelevant and incompetent. The company had no notice of it.) The Court: I will let it in. Mr. Nelson: We would like objections to be noted to all this testimony. Q. (By Mr. Nicholson) What is the condition of the little boy? A. Paralytic; can't walk but can talk, but cannot feed himself without aid. Q. With reference to his mother's care, was he a care and a charge on her? A. Yes, sir; it was necessary for her to give him her personal time all the while. He will not allow any other person to attend to his wants, and she has to give him her constant attention.' Said testimony being irrelevant, not stating any element of damage for which the defendant was liable, and being in reference to circumstances not in contemplation of the parties at the time the message was filed for transmission, and the defendant was not then nor at any time advised of such state of facts, and the message itself on its face does not disclose any such state of facts.

"(3) In not permitting the said F. P. McGowan, on cross-examination, to answer the following question: 'Q. Did Mr. McLeese say anything when he delivered the telegram with reference to the telegram? Did Mr. McLeese make a statement to you with reference to this telegram, the cause of its being delayed, the telegram in suit, at the time of its delivery? The error being that the declarations of McLeese, who was the agent of the company at Laurens, accompanied the act of delivery to McGowan and tended to explain it, and was a part of the res gestæ.

"(4) In refusing the motion of defendant's attorney to strike out the reasons given by the said F. P. McGowan why the plaintiff, Mrs. Talbert, did not go on the train on the night of the 18th of October. The reasons assigned by said witness were: 'I did not think that a lady with a paralytic child could safely go on that train which left at 10 o'clock at night at Laurens and getting to Greenwood in the night.' And in permitting the said witness, over objection of defendant's counsel, to testify as to Mrs. Talbert's being partially blind, near-sighted, wearing glasses, and its being difficult for her to see at night, and that with this child he did not think it advisable for her to undertake to go on a freight train at night and try to make the trip to Parksville. The error being that it was merely the opinion of the witness, and he and the plaintiff determining that she should not take the night train was a voluntary act on her part for which the defendant could not be held responsible, and her failure to take the train was not the result of any act of the defendant.

"(5) In permitting the plaintiff, Mrs. Lillie C. Talbert, over objection of defendant's counsel, to testify as follows: 'Q. Why did you leave your husband? Mr. Nelson: We object; irrelevant and incompetent. We are not charged with notice why she left for Mr. McGowan's. The Court: I will let that out to explain her conduct. Q. Why did you leave your husband and go back to Mr. McGowan's? A. I was weak and my baby was on my hands. He was nervous, could not stay in the house, and I had to keep him outdoors. Q. How old is that child? A. Eight years old. He is most like a baby. Q. He is a paralytic? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was your condition there? A. I was up, but not very strong, physically weak. Q. Why did you have to keep this child outdoors most of the time? A. Because he was nervous and made a noise. Mr. Nelson: We object. The Court: I do not think that is an allegation of the complaint. Mr. Nicholson: We don't insist on that. Q. You stated you had this child and your husband? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why did you go to Laurens? A. To rest, because my health was broken down. Q. You took the child with you? Now, after you got to Mr. McGowan's, how long was it before the second telegram came? A. It was about seven days, not quite a week.' Said testimony being irrelevant and incompetent, in that the defendant was not charged with notice of the condition of plaintiff or of her child or of the reasons why she left her husband, and said testimony failed to establish any cause of action which might exist against the defendant for its failure to deliver the telegram; and said testimony was prejudicial to the defendant, in that it tended to show extraordinary damages, resulting from special circumstances, of which the defendant had no notice, for which it was not responsible, and of which the delay in the delivery of the telegram was not the proximate cause.

"(6) In that he refused to charge the following portion in italics of defendant's fourth request to charge: '(4) In an action such as this, the defendant is charged with the suffering, if any, which the failure to deliver the message may reasonably be expected to produce when its contents are considered, not with the suffering due to a peculiar temperament, but that of an ordinary human being, and under the mental anguish act, the plaintiff in this case cannot recover for the anxiety which she may have suffered on account of the illness of her husband, nor for any feeling of annoyance, disappointment, or vexation which she may have felt by reason of the failure to promptly transmit and deliver the telegram in question.' It being respectfully submitted that the portion of the request refused contained a sound proposition of law applicable to this case, in that plaintiff had been permitted to testify as to her condition and that of her child and her husband over defendant's objection.

"(7) In refusing defendant's twelfth request to charge: '(12) In a case where the sender of a message knows that the addressee is a visitor in a strange city, staying with a relative whose name is not the same as the addressee, and fails to give any further address than the name of the city, I charge you the sender is guilty of negligence, and if this negligence should contribute as a proximate cause to delay in delivery of the message, neither the sender nor the addressee could recover damages.' The error being that said request correctly stated hypothetically a correct proposition of law applicable to this case.

"(8) In charging plaintiff's third request to charge: '(3) From the words contained in the telegram set out in the complaint, the defendant company was charged with notice of the relationship between the plaintiff and her husband, Joe Talbert, and that mental suffering would result from the failure to deliver the telegram promptly, if the said telegram did refer to her husband, Joe Talbert.' The error being that it was for the jury to say, from the wording of the message and the testimony in the case, of what facts the defendant company had notice, and whether or not it should have inferred from such facts that mental anguish would result from a delay in the delivery of the said message, and in charging said request his honor invaded the province of the jury.

"(9) In refusing defendant's motion for a new trial: (1) Because of error in refusing to strike out certain allegations of paragraph 3 of the complaint, to wit, the words: 'With a relapse of typhoid fever. * * * Between Columbia, S. C., and Asheville, N. C., with a spell of typhoid fever. That the plaintiff, his wife, had been with him and nursed him for about five weeks, when he became convalescent and seemed to be out of danger. That plaintiff has an invalid son, who needs her constant care and attention, and that she was thoroughly exhausted in mind and body by the double strain on her on account of the illness of her husband.' And the words, 'in order to recuperate her strength and in order to place her invalid son where he could have attention that he needed,' and in allowing plaintiff's witnesses, over objection of defendant's counsel, to give testimony in support of the allegations so sought to be stricken out of the complaint. (2) Because his honor failed to charge the jury that in awarding damages they should not consider the allegations and testimony set out in the preceding exception. (3) Because the verdict of the jury was against the preponderance of the evidence, in that there was a total failure on the part of the plaintiff to offer any testimony tending to show that the delay in the delivery of the telegram was the proximate cause of any damage she may have sustained. (4) Because the evidence shows that the negligence of the sender of the message, in failing to give a more definite address, contributed as a proximate cause to the damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff. (5) Because his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's twelfth request to charge, set out in exception 7."

Nelson & Nelson, for appellant. J. Wm. Thurmond, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages for mental anguish, alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff on account of the delay in the delivery of the following telegram: "Parksville, S. C. October 18, 1906. Mrs. J. L. Talbert, Laurens, S. C. Come at once; Joe not expected to live through night. J. B. Talbert." "Joe" was plaintiff's husband, who was ill at his home near Parksville, and Mrs. Talbert was at the time visiting her sister, Mrs. F. P. McGowan, at Laurens, S. C. The telegram was handed to the agent at Parksville about 7 o'clock p. m., but was not delivered to the addressee until about 3:40 o'clock p. m. on the 19th of October. The agent at Parksville knew the plaintiff, and that she was the wife of Joe Talbert. The complaint alleges negligence and willfulness, but the claim for punitive damages was withdrawn, at the close of plaintiff's testimony. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was refused. The defendant appealed upon numerous exceptions, which will be set out in the report of the case. In considering the exceptions, we will adopt the arrangement followed by the appellant's attorneys in their written argument.

64 S.E.—55

Exceptions 1, 2, 4, 5, and subdivisions 1 and 2 of exception 9: The allegations of the complaint which the defendant's attorneys made a motion to strike out were not intended to set forth an additional element of damages, but were merely of an explanatory nature. There has been a trial upon the merits; and, conceding that in strictness of pleading they were objectionable, the appellant has failed to satisfy this court that they or the testimony mentioned in the exceptions were prejudicial to its rights.

Third exception: J. M. McLeese afterwards was examined as a witness, and testified fully as to the cause of delay. It cannot be successfully contended that testimony as to what McLeese said is higher in degree than his testimony, when examined as a witness. Wallingford v. Tel. Co., 60 S. C. 201, 38 S. E. 443, 629. Therefore the refusal to allow the witness to answer the question was not prejudicial.

Sixth exception: When the words in the exception alleged to be objectionable are considered in connection with the entire charge, it will be seen that this exception cannot be sustained.

Seventh exception: This request was properly refused, as its submission would have invaded the province of the jury and would have been a charge upon the facts.

Eighth exception: As hereinbefore stated, the testimony showed that the agent at Parksville knew the plaintiff, and that she was the wife of Joe Talbert, and there was a presumption that delay in the delivery of the message would cause her mental anguish.

Subdivisions 3, 4, and 5, of exception 9: Subdivision 3 must be overruled, for the reason that it is only necessary to refer to the testimony to show that the plaintiff suffered mental anguish, for which the statute makes the defendant liable in damages. Subdivision 4 cannot be sustained in the light of the testimony. Subdivision 5 has already been disposed of.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J. (concurring). I concur in the result. There are two main grounds of appeal. The first is that the circuit judge erred in refusing to strike out allegations respecting the plaintiff's physical condition at the time she suffered mental anguish on account of the failure to deliver the telegram announcing the extreme illness of her husband. It is true that defendant was not liable for suffering due to any peculiar physical or mental condition or idiosyncrasy of the plaintiff not known to the defendant. This was decided in Willis v. Telegraph Co., 69 S. C. 531, 48 S. E. 538, 104 Am. St. Rep. 828, and subsequent cases. But an order refusing to strike out a pleading or a portion of it as irrelevant is not appealable. Harbert v. Railway Co., 74 S. C. 13, 53 S. E. 1001; Bank v. Witcover, 77 S. C. 441, 58 S. E. 146.

It is also true that evidence tending to support this allegation of the plaintiff's weak physical condition was not admissible to show increased suffering due to that cause. But there was another issue on which it was admissible. The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, after receiving the telegram, might have reached her husband earlier than she did, by taking at Laurens a freight train with a passenger coach attached. The duty of the plaintiff was to use due diligence to mitigate her suffering and thus diminish her damages; and upon the issue whether reasonable diligence required her to take the mixed train, and undergo the fatigue of travel by that means, it was her right to show her weak physical condition as an excuse for not doing so.

Only one remark need be made as to the other of the two points mainly relied on. In Johnson v. Telegraph Co., 81 S. C. 235, 62 S. E. 244, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1002, it was held that the mental anguish statute does not contemplate recovery for any slight feeling of unpleasantness, such as mere annoyance or vexation. The request here was to charge that there could be no recovery for "annoyance, disappointment, or vexation." There was no error in refusing the request for two reasons. Disappointment may be significant of mere annoyance or vexation; but, on the other hand, it may be about a matter of such nature and importance as to produce great anguish. Oglvie v. Telegraph Co., 64 S. E. 860. In the second place, a charge with respect to feelings of slight unpleasantness is irrelevant in the discussion of the law applicable to the feelings of a wife kept away from her dying husband, in the absence of evidence of lack of affection on her part.

(150 N. C. 646)

JONES et al. v. TOWN OF NORTH WILKESBORO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 70*)—FINAL JUDGMENT.

The sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint praying for an injunction, the refusal to grant the injunction, and adjudging that plaintiff pay the costs, operate as a dismissal of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 367-372; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2 APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 927*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

The court in disposing of an appeal from a judgment of dismissal, on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, must assume that the facts alleged in the complaint are true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 927.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1000*)—MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC NUISANCE.

A citizen and taxpayer of a town, who seeks to restrain the town from purchasing a water power and pond for a water supply on the ground that the same will be a public nuisance and an injury to the health of the people, need not show that he had applied to the town to rescind the contract for the purchase of the property, where he shows that the establishment of the waterwork system as proposed will create a public nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 1000.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*)—JUDICIAL INTERFERENCE WITH MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

The court will not interfere with the exercise of discretionary powers conferred on municipal corporations for the public welfare, unless their action is so clearly unreasonable as to amount to oppression and manifest abuse of their discretion, and the power of the court will be exercised with great caution and only in a clear case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 155; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1000*)—INTERFERENCE WITH MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint, in a suit by a citizen and taxpayer of a town to restrain it from purchasing property for a water supply for domestic purposes, which alleges the inability of the town to comply with Revisal 1905, §§ 3045, 3048, relating to the protection of watersheds, and which sets forth facts showing that it will be impossible to use the water, and that it will endanger the health of the inhabitants, is sufficient to require the town to answer and show that by proper precaution the proposed water supply is either not impure or can be purified, though the complaint does not allege corruption or moral turpitude.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 1000.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 736*)—CREATION OF PUBLIC NUISANCE.

A municipal corporation has no legal right to establish and maintain a condition which creates a public nuisance per se, injuring the health and lives of the people.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1552; Dec. Dig. § 736.*]

Hoke and Brown, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Justice, Judge.

Action by P. C. Jones and others against the Town of North Wilkesboro. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

The plaintiffs allege:

"(1) That they are citizens and property owners of the town of North Wilkesboro, N. C., and as such are interested in the welfare of said town and its inhabitants, and have started a suit in the superior court of Wilkes county against the above-named defendant.

"(2) That an election was held by the voters of said town on the question of issuing bonds to put in a system of waterworks in said town at an election held on the _____ day of _____, 1908, in the sum of $30,000 for said waterworks, which election was declared carried.

"(3) That a short time prior to said election the mayor and board of commissioners of North Wilkesboro, fearing that said bond issue would not carry, caused to be published and circulated among the voters the following circular: 'To the Voters of North Wilkesboro: As there seems to be quite a misunderstanding as to the position of mayor and commissioners on the waterworks question, we wish to state that each and every member of said board are in favor of the gravity system, with water brought from Brushy Mountain preferred, and are not in favor of taking water from Reddie's river. We wish to state further that there is not any proposition on foot to purchase the Hackett Bros. water power. J. E. Finley, J. R. Combs, R. W. Gwyn, H. O. Absher, J. D. Moore, Commissioners. Oscar C. Dancy, Mayor.'

"(4) That since such election, in utter violation of their pledge, three of the above-named commissioners are attempting to close a deal with Hackett Bros., or rather with the Gordon Manufacturing & Power Co., for the purchase of said mill tract of land with all its appurtenances for said town, and out of the mill pond are proposing to supply a system of waterworks by pumping water with an engine, which water is to be used for drinking purposes by the inhabitants of said town.

"(5) That Reddie's river, which flows into Hackett's millpond, passes through one of the most populous sections of Wilkes county, as well as many creeks and smaller tributaries that flow into said river, and it would be utterly impossible for the town authorities to comply with sections 3045 and 3048 of the Revisal of 1905 in protecting the watersheds.

"(6) That by reason of many families living upon the numerous watersheds for the first 15 miles, to say nothing of the many who lived beyond the 15-mile limit, but are upon the watersheds, it will be impossible to use this water for drinking purposes, and it will render the inhabitants of the town liable to the great scourge of typhoid fever, which frequently rages to considerable extent upon the watersheds of Reddie's river, as affiant believes.

"(7) That several years ago typhoid fever prevailed in the town to a very considerable extent, and your affiants have heard that the doctors attributed it to the use of ice taken from Hackett's millpond, and directed that the use of ice from said pond be stopped.

"(8) That not only are the watersheds on Reddie's river outside of the corporate limits of said town so thickly settled that it renders its water unfit for use, but the watersheds of said river within the corporate limits of said town, if there were no other objection, would render the use of said water dangerous to the life of the citizens.

"(9) That upon the watersheds within said town there are many dwelling houses, and the only drainage is into Reddie's river, and without enormous expense to said residents of the town or to the town itself can this drainage be brought into the river below the millpond.

"(10) That if permitted to buy this property and operate from said millpond a system of waterworks, irreparable damage and loss will be sustained not only by the plaintiffs, but the health and well-being of the citizens of the town will be greatly endangered."

It was further alleged that a supply of pure water could be had from the Brushy Mountains, etc.—all of which was duly verified. Plaintiffs ask that a restraining order issue, etc. Defendant demurred to the complaint and assigned as grounds for demurrer that: "(1) It does not appear that plaintiffs made application to the town or its authorities to rescind the contract for the purchase of the Hackett property. (2) That the petition, taken as a whole, does not set forth grounds sufficient to justify injunctive relief, in that: (a) It does not show that the commissioners of said town grossly abused their discretion in making a contract for the purchase of the Hackett property. (b) It does nothing more than question the ability of the town to maintain a waterworks system, using the water from Reddie's river, inspecting its watershed, and filtering said water, as to which the court cannot interfere."

His honor sustained the demurrer, refused the injunction, and adjudged that plaintiff pay the costs of the action. Plaintiffs appealed.

W. W. Barber, for appellants. Finley & Hendren, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. While the court does not in express terms dismiss the action, it is evident that such is the effect of the judgment. The only relief asked is that defendant be enjoined from installing the system of water supply for the people of the town as set out in the complaint. For the purpose of disposing of this appeal, the facts set out in the complaint must be taken as true. The defendant relies upon the principle announced in Merrimon v. Paving Co., 142 N. C. 539, 55 S. E. 366, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 574, to sustain its first ground of demurrer. That case is not in point. There, the corporate authorities had made a contract with the paving company to pave the streets, and, plaintiff thinking that the company was not performing its contract, and that the officers whose duty it was to compel it to do so in accordance with its terms were derelict in the discharge of their duty, without applying to the governing board of the municipality to do so, they brought the action. Upon a well-settled principle and uniform line of decisions, we held that they could not maintain it without making the essential averments showing that the authorities refused to perform their duty, or such other averments as showed that a demand was useless and would be of no avail. Here, the allegation is that the municipal authorities are threatening to establish and maintain a public nuisance, endangering the health and lives of the people. The demurrer admits the truth of the allegation. The first cause of demurrer cannot be sustained.

The second cause assigned involves the proposition that, unless a gross abuse of the discretion vested in the authorities is alleged, the court has no power to interfere. The rule by which the courts have been governed in the exercise of the injunctive power is well stated by Mr. Justice Hoke in Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, 149 N. C. 128, 62 S. E. 905. There the authorities, deeming it conducive to the public health, directed the removal of shade trees on the street upon which plaintiff resided. It is said in the opinion: "The court will not interfere with the exercise of discretionary powers conferred upon municipal corporations for the public welfare, unless their action should be so clearly unreasonable as to amount to an oppressive and manifest abuse of their discretion." This is sustained by a number of authorities cited in the opinion and, we think, correctly marks the limitation upon the exercise of discretionary municipal authority. It falls short of holding that the discretion is without any limitation. It is not consistent with our conceptions of a municipal government of granted powers, certainly in the method of exercising them, that there should be no limitation, or, at least, that, when called into question, in good faith, by those who are interested in the result, officers may admit such allegations as are made here and successfully maintain the position that the citizens are without remedy. Conceding that the rule is correctly stated in the decision cited, we think that plaintiffs' allegations bring their case within the power of the court to interpose. It is not necessary to allege corruption or moral turpitude. It is manifest that a municipal corporation has no legal right to establish and maintain a condition which creates a public nuisance per se; that is, a condition which seriously endangers the health and lives of the people. Harper v. Milwaukee, 30 Wis. 365. The injunctive power of the court will be exercised with great caution and only in a clear case. We decide in this appeal that the defendant was called upon to answer the allegations in the complaint. We do not think it should be permitted to dismiss charges so serious in their character. It may be that, upon the filing of an answer, the authorities can show that the conditions are not correctly stated, and that by proper precaution the proposed water supply is either not impure, or that by proper methods it can be purified. Of course, the court could not undertake to direct the method of supplying the town with water.

As the case is before us only upon demurrer, we forbear discussing the question further than is necessary to dispose of the exception to his honor's judgment. The defendant will file such answer as it may be advised, and upon notice the motion for an injunction will be heard before the judge having jurisdiction in the premises.

There is error.

HOKE, J. (dissenting). I differ from the court in the disposition made of the present case. While there are allegations in the complaint which seemingly tend to show that a public nuisance will be created if defendants are allowed to proceed, a perusal of the entire complaint will disclose that such allegations rest necessarily in surmise, and are not in reality stated as facts, but deductions made by plaintiff from certain recognized and admitted physical conditions, and that the real controversy presented is a difference between the governing authorities of the town and certain citizens therein, as to the most desirable plan or scheme for obtaining a good water supply for the municipality and the citizens thereof.

In passing upon the questions presented, we should not close our minds to recognized facts, and are allowed to take judicial notice of certain physical conditions which appear and are essential to a proper decision of the matter. We know that Reddie's river is a bold mountain stream, and at the point indicated not far from its source, and we know too, that there are methods very generally in use by which water far more unpromising than this is made available for domestic as well as general purposes, and there is no good reason to doubt that, by a simple and feasible way of treating the water of the stream in question, a copious, satisfactory, and healthful supply of water can be obtained.

One grave objection to adopting and acting on plaintiffs' statements, made apparently as facts, though it clearly appears that they amount to nothing more than apprehensions on their part from conditions and actual facts fully set out, is that, under our decisions, the same position which calls for a restraining order may, and likely will, require, if the complaint is reasonably supported by affidavits containing allegations of the same general character, that the question should be referred to a jury for ultimate decision; and thus the people, who have sanctioned the measure by their votes, will be indefinitely deprived of the water desired and necessary for their comfort, convenience, and safety. If this plan is checked, any other is liable to be arrested on just such indefinite allegations, and it will prove well-nigh impossible for the municipal authorities ever to carry into effect their lawful and beneficent purpose of securing for the inhabitants of the town a satisfactory and sufficient water supply.

It is well recognized, and chiefly for the reasons presented here, that these matters of local concern are, and should be, matters largely of local regulation, and only in rare and extreme cases are the courts allowed to interfere in any way, and should never undertake to direct and control local authorities as to how they should act on matters which rest in their judgment and discretion. While there are general allegations of serious injury threatened if the present plan of defendant is carried out, on considering the complaint as a whole, it is clear that such statements rest only in apprehension and surmise, and that, on the real and ultimate facts, this suit is but an effort to compel the municipal government of North Wilkesboro to adopt a different plan than that on which they have entered, and one which plaintiffs think will better promote the welfare of the town. This is clearly a matter which rests in the judgment and discretion of the town government, and, as heretofore stated, it is a principle fully established here and elsewhere that courts will never undertake to direct and control these municipal authorities as to how they shall act or what plan or method they should adopt on matters which the law has wisely referred to their judgment and discretion. Board of Education v. Board of Commissioners (present term) 63 S. E. 724; City of Kinston v. Wooten (present term) 63 S. E. 1061; Ward v. Commissioners, 146 N. C. 534, 60 S. E. 418; Broadnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; People v. Knickerbocker, 114 Ill. 539, 2 N. E. 507, 55 Am. Rep. 879; Clicotte v. County of Wayne, 59 Mich. 509, 26 N. W. 686.

I am of opinion that the position of the defendants should prevail, and the judgment of the court below dissolving the restraining order should be affirmed.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). I concur in the dissent of Mr. Justice HOKE. It is true that a demurrer technically admits the truth of the facts alleged in the complaint, but it also raises the question of the power of the courts to grant the relief prayed for in the case, and that relief, broadly stated, is that the court take away from the municipal officers of the town the right to determine what is best for their municipality and to substitute in their places the judgment of a jury. The real question involved on this appeal is: Does the complaint state a good cause of action? This is raised as well by the demurrer as by the motion made by defendant in this court to dismiss the action, which motion it is conceded can be made at any time in the court below or in this court. Assuming that the defendants had filed an answer and denied every allegation in the complaint, they could then make the same motion. I see nothing alleged in the complaint which, if denied by answer, can properly be submitted to a jury, or determined by a judge. The only issue which can be raised upon this complaint is as to whether the commissioners of the town of Wilkesboro have agreed upon and are about to install a water supply system which may be deleterious to the health of its inhabitants. There is no suggestion, much less allegation, that the commissioners or any of them are acting in bad faith, or have any personal or pecuniary interest in the lands comprising the watershed or in Hackett's pond, or are acting in any dishonest or fraudulent manner. Therefore I am of opinion that under our Constitution, laws, and form of government the courts are not vested with a supervision and control of the honest exercise of the powers of the commissioners of the town.

Under the law governing the town of Wilkesboro, the duty of providing a supply of wholesome water is left to the sound discretion of the town authorities, whom the electors have chosen to administer their affairs. It is hardly to be supposed that such authorities have adopted a system of water supply which will bring on an epidemic of typhoid fever, and we are bound to assume that they have given the matter a thorough investigation, with perhaps expert assistance, before deciding so important a matter. Are 12 jurors, or 5 judges, any better able to determine what is best for the welfare of the town than its chosen authorities, who reside there, drink the same water, breathe the same air, pay the same taxes, and are in all respects identified with the interests of all other citizens? The power to determine the matter is delegated under the Constitution and laws of the state to the board of commissioners of the town. What right has this court to substitute a jury of 12 men in their places? Or to enjoin the honest exercise of powers conferred exclusively upon the defendants? I know of no case to which the words of a great judge are more applicable than to this. "For the exercise of powers conferred by the Constitution," says Chief Justice Pearson, "the people must rely upon the honesty of the members of the General Assembly and of the persons elected to fill places of trust in the several counties. The court has no power, and is not capable if it had the power, of controlling the exercise of power conferred by the Constitution upon the legislative department of the government or upon the county authorities." Broadnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 250. Again, the Chief Justice says: "In short, this court is not capable of controlling the exercise of power on the part of the General Assembly, or of the county authorities, and it cannot assume to do so, without putting itself in antagonism as well to the General Assembly, as to the county authorities and erecting a despotism of five men—which is opposed to the fundamental principles of our government and the usages of all times past." We have affirmed and acted upon these heretofore, well-settled principles at this term in Hightower v. City of Raleigh, 85 S. E. 279.

In the absence of any allegations impeaching the good faith of the commissioners in adopting a water supply system, I think the motion to dismiss the action should be granted.

SNELL et al v. CHATHAM.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 257*)—TRIAL OF CAUSE—CONFORMITY TO FINDING OF REFEREE.

A complaint set out a cause of action for injury from the maintenance of a pond and sought only to enjoin the rebuilding of a dam which created such pond. The parties, by a consent order, submitted to arbitrators "to settle and decide upon the matters in controversy in this action, * * * including such plan or scheme as they shall deem and find proper to safeguard the public health in the premises," by which findings all parties agreed to be bound; such findings to be made the judgment of the court. The arbitrators found that the pond formed a breeding place for mosquitoes and recommended that it be drained. Held, that the court properly enjoined the erection of the dam.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 257.*]

2. REFERENCE (§ 86*)—SCOPE OF AWARD.

The arbitrators were within the scope of their powers in recommending the drainage of the pond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

3. REFERENCE (§ 33*)—RELIEF OF PLAINTIFF.

The relief of the plaintiff was not confined to that set up in the complaint, but was enlarged by the consent order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 257*)—CONFORMITY TO FINDING OF ARBITRATORS.

Judgment requiring defendant to drain the area of land theretofore covered by the dam or pond was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 257.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Justice, Judge.

Action by J. E. Snell and others against Paul Chatham. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This was an action brought upon the grounds: That the defendant, owner of a tract of land near Charlotte, had in 1907 erected a dam across a small branch on the said land and thereby created a pond or lake; that in August, 1908, by reason of heavy rainfall, the dam having been broken, the defendant was rebuilding the dam; that the effect of rebuilding the dam would be to create a pond of stagnant water which would produce mosquitoes and communicate malaria to the plaintiffs and other residents of their neighborhood, thereby injuring the public health and creating a nuisance; and the plaintiffs prayed that the defendant be enjoined and restrained from the reconstruction of the dam. A temporary restraining order was issued, and an order to show cause why the temporary restraining order should not be made permanent was served upon the defendant. A hearing was had before Judge Justice upon affidavits filed by the plaintiffs and the defendant. At the hearing it was agreed between the parties that the matter in controversy should be submitted to Drs. Gibbon, Montgomery, and Misenheimer as arbitrators; the language of the agreement being as follows: "In the above-entitled action it is by consent of parties ordered and decreed that the temporary restraining order heretofore made in the cause be continued and in full force until the next civil term of this court. That the following experts, to wit, R. L. Gibbon, J. C. Montgomery, and C. A. Misenheimer, be and they are hereby appointed as arbitrators, and empowered to hear, at such times and places in this county as they may fix, the evidence that may be submitted to them by the parties, and they are hereby made arbitrators to settle and decide upon the matters in controversy in this action, and to submit to this court at the next civil term thereof their findings and awards, or that of any two of them, including such plan or scheme as they shall deem and find proper to safeguard the public health in the premises; and all parties to this action hereby agree to be bound by the findings and award of said arbitrators or of any two of them—their findings and award to be made the judgment of this court in this action." And this cause is retained for further direction.

The majority of the arbitrators filed their award as follows at December term, 1908, of Mecklenburg: "The undersigned arbitrators appointed by this honorable court at October term, 1908, to settle and decide upon the matters in controversy in this action, and to submit to this court their findings and awards, including such plan or scheme as they would deem and find proper to safeguard the public health in the premises, beg leave to report as follows: That after due notice to the parties litigant they met at the office of Dr. J. C. Montgomery, in the city of Charlotte, on December 2, 1908, having first by consent and at the instance of the parties inspected and carefully examined the premises whereon was formerly maintained the dam and pond, all of which are more particularly described in the complaint, and in the affidavits of the parties and their witnesses, which affidavits were by consent used as evidence before us at the hearing, the parties expressly waiving their rights to offer other evidence. From our inspection and examination of the said marshy tract upon the land of the defendant Chatham and from the evidence produced before us, we find as follows: First. That stagnant water, in the light of present day medical opinion, is obnoxious to health in this country, chiefly as it serves for a breeding place for a certain species of malaria-carrying mosquito; the only means at present known by which that disease is disseminated. The life and habitat of the mosquito has received the most careful investigation at the hands of the United States health authorities, and, as bearing upon the question before us, we beg to briefly quote a description of the natural breeding places of these insects, which appears in volume 23, July 17, 1908, of the Public Health Report of the United States Marine Hospital Service: "The domestic species may be found breeding in any collection of water in or about the houses in which they lodge. They have been found in discarded tin, bottles, and broken crockery on the garbage heap; in buckets, tubs, barrels, cisterns, and wells; in baptismal and other fonts; in flowerpots and sagging roof gutters; in street and roadside puddles, gutters, and ditches; and in cesspools and sewers. The semidomestic (which is the malaria-carrying mosquito) species may occasionally be found breeding in tins, barrels, hoof prints, post-holes and holes in trees or tree stumps, but they usually prefer grass-bordered pools, slowly flowing ditches, the margins of lakes and streams, even such as are stocked with fish, provided the margins are shallow or are more or less choked with reeds and water plants so that the fish cannot reach them." Accepting the above as authoritative, and applying the knowledge to the matter in hand, after a visit and examination of the locality in question, we reach the conclusion that the said marsh and bed of pond, now drained, furnishes an abundant breeding ground for the mosquito, but that it is not, in our opinion, worse in this respect than are numerous other low and badly drained areas in and about the suburbs of the city of Charlotte, and some of them are contiguous to the neighborhood in which it is alleged that sickness has developed as a result of the pond, formerly on the Chatham place. The sanitary method of handling the areas in dispute may be decided upon the general principles governing such matters, the dominant idea of which is the elimination of stagnant water. There can, of course, be no question that this can most thoroughly be done by simple drainage and filling in. The latter particularly is not always practical; the former so far as our knowledge goes, is much more available. The drainage must, however, be thorough, and the ditches large enough and sufficiently well laid out to avoid the dangers of stagnation, as 'slow flowing' ditches, as previously shown, do not accomplish the object aimed at. In the specific case before us, we would recommend thorough ditching, properly drained to suit existing conditions, as the ideal method of treating said area, and we find and award accordingly. Second. We further adjudge and award that the drainage, ditching, and filling aforesaid shall be done by the defendant during the winter months and prior to spring and so as to completely prevent the accumulation of stagnant water upon said premises. R. L. Gibbon, C. A. Misenheimer, Arbitrators. December 3, 1908." The other arbitrator, Dr. J. C. Montgomery, filed a dissent, recommending, instead of drainage, a "free flowing sanitary lake," i. e., that the defendant be allowed to put back the dam.

There were no exceptions filed to the award by either party, and his honor entered the following judgment: "This cause came to be heard before me at chambers in the city of Charlotte, on the 20th day of October, 1908, upon an order to show cause why the restraining order heretofore granted in this cause should not be continued to the hearing. At said hearing both plaintiffs and defendant were represented by counsel and argument was heard by me. During the argument a certain proposition was made by the defendant's counsel, and certain other propositions were made by the plaintiffs' counsel, looking towards an amicable settlement of the matter in dispute. These propositions were rejected by the parties, and thereupon the court announced its conclusion that the restraining order should be continued till the hearing. Thereupon the defendant's counsel stated to the court that, rather than submit to such an order, the defendant would agree to accept one of the propositions made during the argument by the plaintiffs' counsel to the defendant's counsel in the presence of the court, and of the parties to the action. The plaintiffs' counsel thereupon signified their willingness, on the part of their clients, to still make with the defendant the agreement referred to, and thereupon the hearing was adjourned in order that the counsel of the respective parties might put in writing the agreement entered into orally by them in the presence of the court at the said hearing. Thereafter there was submitted to me by the counsel of the respective parties a consent order, which I signed, which order is on file in the papers in this action. The arbitrators appointed by that consent order having made their report, as will appear by reference thereto, now, to carry out the agreement of the parties to this action as expressed in the aforesaid consent order, it is now ordered and adjudged as follows: It is ordered and adjudged that the said report of the said arbitrators be in all respects approved and confirmed, and the findings of said arbitrators and their award as set out in their said report is made the judgment of this court in this action. It is therefore further considered and adjudged by the court that the restraining order heretofore granted in this cause be, and the same is hereby, made permanent, and the defendant is therefore perpetually restrained and enjoined from reconstructing and maintaining the pond or lake described in the complaint. And it is further considered and adjudged by the court that the defendant within four months from this date be required to drain the area of land heretofore covered by said dam or pond as in the report of said arbitrators prescribed for the safeguarding of the public health in its vicinity. And the cause is held for further direction." The defendant excepted and appealed.

Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant. Burwell & Canaler and Clarkson & Duls, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). There was no exception to the award of the arbitrators. After his honor had entered judgment in conformity therewith, the defendant excepted, assigning four grounds: (1) That upon the award the court should not have signed judgment enjoining the erection of the dam. (2) That the arbitrators went beyond the scope of their powers in recommending the drainage of the pond. (3) That the plaintiffs have no right to any relief not set up in the complaint. (4) That the court had no power to require the defendant to drain an area of land which was in its natural condition.

The first three exceptions are based upon the proposition that the complaint sets out a cause of action for injury from the maintenance of the pond and sought only to enjoin the rebuilding of the dam; but the parties by their consent order voluntarily enlarged the scope of the controversy and unequivocally submitted to the arbitrators not only "to settle and decide upon the matters in controversy in this action" (which means the controversy upon the pleadings), but added, "including such plan or scheme as they shall deem and find proper to safeguard the public health in the premises; and all parties to this action agree to be bound by the findings and award of said arbitrators, or any two of them, their findings or award to be made the judgment of the court in this action." This was not an inadvertent or hasty agreement. His honor sets out in his judgment the care and deliberation with which the consent order was made, and the adjournment taken that the parties might have a full understanding and that the able and experienced counsel might have the assent of their clients and put their agreement in writing, which was done. That the consent order embraced an agreement to settle not merely the question of the re-erection of the dam, but was to include also "such plan or scheme as they shall deem and find proper to safeguard the public health in the premises," appears by the explicit language of the agreement. The arbitrators, all three, so understood and acted, for, while two recommended drainage, the other recommended a "free-flowing lake or pond" as the better scheme or plan. There is nothing to impeach the award, and by the previous consent of the parties it was properly entered as the judgment of the court.

Nor do we find any ground for the fourth exception, nor any difficulty in enforcing the order of the court as to drainage. If the defendant had made an agreement with the plaintiffs that upon certain consideration paid, or upon the ascertainment of certain facts, he would drain his pond, this would be enforceable by a decree for specific performance. Here the defendant agreed to execute such plan or scheme as the majority of the arbitrators should award as "proper to safeguard the public health in the premises." One arbitrator thought a "free-flowing lake or pond" the plan. This would have suited the defendant, as this would have enabled him to put back and keep up his dam, without fear of damages, and, if the majority had so awarded, the plaintiffs must have acquiesced in the infliction of mosquitoes and malaria (if the lake did not remove them) and the loss of all claim for damages. The majority of the arbitrators, however, said "drainage" was the remedy, and the defendant should know how to be "a good loser," for, after all, the majority of an impartial board of arbitrators are more likely to be right than either party to the litigation. It is an old saying that "fragments of all the sciences are taken up in ashes of the law." It is not long since that our progressive brethren of the medical profession have discovered that one kind of mosquito (anopheles) causes malaria, that another (stegomyia) carries yellow fever, that another still spreads asiatic cholera, that house flies spread typhoid fever, that fleas on rats communicate the dreaded Bubonic plague, and lesser germs as bacteria and bacilli are the agents of other diseases, for thus do "the weak things of the world confound the things which are mighty." 1 Cor. 27. Acting on these discoveries, under authority of law, the stegomyia and yellow fever have been extirpated in Cuba and the cholera stayed in San Francisco, because mosquitoes and rats were systematically destroyed by the officers of the law. There is no reason that the plaintiff's home shall not be freed of malaria, by authority of a judgment based upon medical advice—especially as the parties agreed that such remedy (whatever the majority of the medical arbitrators should find it to be) should be entered as the judgment of the court.

MURPHY HARDWARE CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May. 21, 1909.)

CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATIONS—STATUTORY PENALTY—FAILURE TO RECEIVE FREIGHT—DEFENSES.

Revisal 1905, § 2631, requires every railroad to receive all articles for transportation whenever tendered, and imposes a penalty of $50 for each day it refuses to receive freight. Section 2632 imposes a penalty for refusing to transport freight within a reasonable time and requires shipments to start from the initial point within two days after the freight is received. Held, that a carrier could plead any legal excuse to avoid the penalty for failure to receive freight, and, if a carrier was unable to transport cattle because its motive power was tied up by a strike, it would not be liable for the statutory penalty for its refusal to receive the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cherokee County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by the Murphy Hardware Company against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Moore & Rollins, W. B. Rodman, and Dillard & Bell, for appellant. E. B. Norvell, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The facts as set out in the record present this case: On February 4, 1907, the plaintiff instituted eight separate actions against the defendant to recover the sum of $2,000 penalties in each action (total $16,000) under section 2631, Revisal N. C. 1905, for failure of defendant to receive a drove of 80 head of cattle, tendered to the defendant at Murphy, N. C., for shipment to Richmond, Va. The eight actions came on for hearing at the spring term, 1908, of the superior court of Cherokee county, and for convenience and by consent were consolidated by his honor, O. H. Gulon, Judge. Upon the admissions contained in the record, his honor signed judgment in the consolidated case in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $200; it being one penalty of $50 for each day for the four days the defendant refused to receive the entire lot of cattle for shipment. The defendant demanded a trial by jury upon the issues raised by the pleadings and excepted to the refusal of the court to submit said issues and also to the action of the court in signing judgment for $200, and further moved to dismiss said action for the reason that upon the face of said complaint it appeared that the court was without jurisdiction to try and determine said cause, for that the same was an interference with interstate commerce, and for that the statute providing such penalty upon interstate shipments was contrary to the Constitution of the United States. The court rendered the judgment in the record from which the defendant appealed.

The statute which imposes the penalty sued for is section 2631 of the Revisal of 1905, and reads as follows: "Agents or other officers of railroads and other transportation companies whose duty it is to receive freights shall receive all articles of the nature and kind received by such company for transportation whenever tendered at a regular depot, station, wharf or boat landing, and every loaded car tendered at a side track, or any warehouse connected with the railroad by a siding, and shall forward the same by the route selected by the person tendering the freight under existing laws; and the transportation company represented by any person refusing to receive such freight shall forfeit and pay to the party aggrieved the sum of fifty dollars for each day said company refuses to receive said shipment of freight, and all damages actually sustained by reason of the refusal to receive freight. If such loaded car be tendered at any siding or warehouse at which there is no agent, notice shall be given to an agent at nearest regular station at which there is an agent that such car is loaded and ready for shipment." In its answer the defendant avers that it was prevented from furnishing cattle cars to the plaintiff on account of a strike of the machinists on its road, numbering some 2,000 or 3,000, which strike it could not control, in consequence of which a large per cent. of defendant's motive power got out of order and could not be used. The decision of the court is put upon the ground that the action is brought to recover a penalty for not receiving the cattle, and not for a failure to transport, and that therefore the defense pleaded cannot avail the defendant, even if true.

We are advertent to the general rule that the carrier must at all times be in proper condition both to receive from the shipper and to deliver to the consignee. Covington Stock Yard v. Keith, 139 U. S. 133, 11 Sup. Ct. 469, 35 L. Ed. 73. But we think that general rules must sometimes give way to particular cases, and that, if the defense set up be true, the defendant could not be compelled to receive cattle and feed them indefinitely when it was impossible to foresee when they could be shipped. Otherwise, at a cattle shipping point like Murphy, the carrier might, in cases of a breakdown or burning of its bridges, or a long-continued strike of its employes, find itself in a short while with hundreds of cattle on hand which it must feed and care for. No reasonable foresight and judgment can provide against such contingencies. But that is not the only reason why this defense should be allowed. The penalty statutes must be taken together so as to ascertain the entire burden imposed on the carrier. In case the defendant had received these cattle in its then unavoidably crippled condition, it would have incurred very shortly thereafter another penalty for delay in shipping, for section 2632, immediately following, imposes a penalty for failure to transport within a reasonable time, and fixes the limit of time within which to start the shipment from the initial point at two days. So it follows that, if defendant had received the cattle and penned them, its inability to ship them within two days would have brought upon it another and continuing penalty for 30 days. Bagg v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co., 109 N. C. 279, 14 S. E. 79, 14 L. R. A. 596, 26 Am. St. Rep. 569. As between these two statutes, and in the crippled condition it could not provide against, the defendant would be placed in a helpless condition. It seems unreasonable to require a carrier to continue to receive such a commodity as live stock, especially when conditions it cannot control or avoid will prevent their shipment within the time required by law. To hold that these penalty statutes admit of no defense whatever would render them amenable to the forcible criticism of the Supreme Court of the United States in Railroad v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 329, 26 Sup. Ct. 493, 50 L. Ed. 772: "While there is much to be said in favor of laws compelling railroads to furnish adequate facilities for the transportation of both freight and passengers, and to regulate the general subject of speed, length and frequency of stops, for the heating, lighting, and ventilation of passenger cars, the furnishing of food and water to cattle and other live stock, we think an absolute requirement that a railroad shall furnish a certain number of cars at a specified day, regardless of every other consideration except strikes and other calamities, transcends the police power of the state and amounts to a burden upon interstate commerce. It makes no exception in cases of a sudden congestion of traffic, an actual inability to furnish cars by reason of their temporary and unavoidable detention in other states, or in other places within the same state. It makes no allowance for interference of traffic occasioned by wrecks or other accidents upon the same or other roads involving a detention of traffic, the breaking of bridges, accidental fires, washouts, or other unavoidable consequences of heavy weather."

For these reasons we think that a statute which imposed such penalties, and which permitted no defense and no excuse however just, practically takes the property of the carrier without due process of law, because, while the carrier may be brought into court, it is denied the right to make defense or excuse, however reasonable; but we do not so construe the law. We have considered this question at length in the case of Garrison v. Railway, 64 S. E. 578, at this term, in a well-considered opinion by Mr. Justice Connor, and have held that these penalty statutes are enacted in aid of the common law and to compel a discharge of those duties which the common law itself imposes upon the carrier, and that, where the carrier has a legal defense or excuse for failure to discharge such duty, it may be pleaded in an action to recover the penalty. Upon the principles laid down in that opinion, we think his honor erred in holding that the statute admitted of no defense.

In this view of the case, we deem it unnecessary now to consider the other question of interstate commerce presented on the record.

New trial.

(150 N. C. 753)

REID & BEAM v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 25, 1906.)

1. COMMERCE (§ 10*)—PENALTIES FOR REFUSAL TO RECEIVE FREIGHT—VALIDITY OF REGULATION.

Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty upon any carrier of $50 for each day it refuses to receive freight for shipment, is not invalid as a burden on interstate commerce; the statute permitting excuses in proper cases for failure to comply therewith, and the federal government not having acted directly on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. COURTS (§ 97*)—RULE OF DECISION—FEDERAL SUPREME COURT.

The federal Supreme Court is the final authority upon the validity of regulations affecting interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 331; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. COMMERCE (§ 10*) — POWERS OF STATES — NONEXERCISE BY CONGRESS.

The act of Congress, requiring the publication by carriers of freight rates for interstate shipments, and the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission thereunder, do not constitute such action by the federal government as to prevent proper and reasonable state regulations imposing penalties upon interstate carriers for failure to receive shipments or promptly transport them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REFUSAL TO RECEIVE FREIGHT—PENALTIES.

That a shipper presented goods for shipment to Scottsville, Tenn., when the real name of the town on defendant's line was Scottville, Tenn., would not relieve the carrier from the statutory penalties for refusal to receive goods for shipment thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REFUSAL TO RECEIVE FREIGHT — PENALTIES — CARRIER'S IGNORANCE OF DESTINATION.

Goods were delivered for shipment to a station on a railroad, which, though it maintained a separate organization for local purposes, was operated by defendant company and its receipts paid over to defendant's treasurer and its operating reports made to defendant's auditor, and the salaries of its employees were paid by defendant. Defendant's agent, who refused to receive goods for shipment on the ground that he did not know the location of the station, was replaced by another agent shortly thereafter, who received and shipped the goods to the point of consignment. Held, that defendant's agent in charge when the goods were first presented for shipment should have known the location of the shipping point on its line, or should have ascertained it by the exercise of reasonable care, and his ignorance of its location would not relieve defendant from the penalty imposed by Revisal 1905, § 2631, for failure to receive goods for shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 46; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REFUSAL TO RECEIVE FREIGHT—PENALTIES—DEFENSES.

That a shipper suffered no pecuniary injury by reason of delay in shipment caused by a carrier's refusal to receive goods for shipment was not a defense to an action under Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty for the carrier's failure to receive goods for shipment.

Brown and Walker, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Reid & Beam against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 63 S. E. 112.

There was evidence, on the part of plaintiffs, tending to show: That on or about June 25, 1906, the plaintiff firm, having received an order for a car load of shingles, from one James Haddox at Scottsville, Tenn., applied to P. B. Gunnels, who was then agent of defendant company at Rutherfordton, N. C., for a car. The same was furnished and loaded with the shingles by plaintiffs on July 2d, shipping instructions given, prepayment of freight tendered, and bill of lading demanded. That the agent of defendant refused to give bill of lading, or ship the goods, assigning for reason that he did not know where Scottsville, Tenn., was, nor the rate thereto. Plaintiffs demanded that the goods be shipped, and told the agent they would prepay any additional amount found to be due, and requested that when the agent got ready to ship to phone to plaintiffs and they would come over and pay the freight due. That defendant's agent failed and refused to ship the shingles till July 17th, when one Castle came to take over the agency, and being told, on inquiry of plaintiffs, about the car load of shingles and what the trouble was, he asked for shipping instructions, which were given, to James Haddox, Scottsville, Tennessee, and on July 19th the freight was paid, the bill of lading given, and shingles shipped as directed, arriving at their destination without further let or hindrance. Plaintiffs further testified that they had received no pecuniary injury by reason of the delay, that Gunnels still had charge of the depot when the shingles were shipped, and that he left about that time, and Castle took charge.

There was evidence, on the part of defendant: That Scottsville, Tenn., was an industrial siding on the Knoxville & Augusta Road, 8 or 10 miles out of Knoxville, Tenn., established for the convenience of persons shipping brick from that point; that there was no depot or regular agent there, but goods were rebilled to that point at Rockford, a regular station on the same road, some two miles distant. One W. P. Hood, testifying for defendant, stated: That he was superintendent of the Knoxville & Augusta Road, and that this road was operated as an independent line; that there was no such place on that road as Scottsville, but an industrial siding called "Scottsville," at the point indicated, a flag station 8 or 10 miles out from Knoxville; and that bills of lading for goods to and from that point were made out at Rockford, a regular station some two miles distant. On cross-examination the witness stated that his remittances from the operation of the road were made to the treasurer of the defendant company, that his reports were made to the auditor of such company, and that, since the consolidation of the East Tennessee & Virginia Railroad with the Old Richmond & Danville, the defendant company had paid all the employes of the Knoxville and Augusta Road their salaries.

The court below charged the jury, in part, as follows: "The burden is on the plaintiffs to show, by the greater weight of the evidence, that the defendant is indebted to plaintiffs. This suit is brought to recover penalty for refusal on the part of the defendant, Southern Railway Company, to receive a car load of shingles for shipment to James Haddox, Scottsville, Tenn. In order to entitle plaintiffs to recover, it is necessary for the jury to find from the evidence, by the greater weight thereof: First, that the defendant is a common carrier—that is admitted. Second, that the plaintiffs tendered the car load of shingles for shipment. And, third, that defendant refused to receive the same for shipment. If the jury finds from the evidence, by the greater weight thereof, first, that the plaintiffs, Reid & Beam, tendered the car load of shingles to Gunnels, the defendant's agent at Rutherfordton, and furnished him with shipping directions and offered to prepay the freight and demanded a bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs demanded that the car be shipped, then the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, unless you find from the evidence that the defendant failed and refused to ship by reason of facts intervening which defendant, by the exercise of reasonable care, could not have prevented or overcome. The defendant contends that the agent did not know where Scottsville was, and did not know the freight rate, and that therefore defendant is excused. If you find from the evidence, by the greater weight thereof, that Scottsville or Scottville was a flag station on a branch road under control of defendant company, then it was the business of the agent of defendant company to know where it was, and to know the freight rate to that point, or if you so find that the plaintiffs told the agent that Scottsville was on a branch road running out from Knoxville, and on the Knoxville & Augusta Railroad and some seven or eight miles from Knoxville, and that statement was true, and further so find that by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence on the part of the agent he could have ascertained where the place was, and the rates, it was his duty to do so, and failure on his part to exercise such reasonable care would not excuse the defendant company. If you find from the evidence, by the greater weight thereof, that defendant refused on July 2d to receive the car simply on the ground that the agent did not know and could not, by the exercise of reasonable care, have ascertained the locality and rates, and you further find from the evidence, by the greater weight thereof, that the failure to ship up to the 19th was on the same ground and no other, then the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover $50 a day as a penalty for such failure from 14 days, this would exclude the day of shipment and also exclude the Sundays included between the dates, which would be $700."

The jury rendered a verdict as follows: "Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiffs for the unlawful failure to receive a car load of shingles to be transported to Scottsville, Tenn., as alleged, if so in what sum? Answer: $350." There was judgment on the verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant excepted and appealed; and, having made 18 exceptions duly noted in the record, under different forms of statement, assigns for error: "(1) That the statute in question (Revisal 1905, § 2631) is unreasonable and oppressive, and in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution. (2) That, as applied to interstate commerce, the same is in conflict with article 1, § 8, cl. 3, of said Constitution: (a) As an unlawful attempt to regulate commerce. (b) And on the facts presented here as amounting to distinct burden upon it."

W. B. Rodman and Jas. M. Carson, for appellant.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The validity of these penalty statutes has been before the court for consideration in many recent cases, and in Eftand v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 138, 59 S. E. 355, this being a decision on a statute of kindred nature, the court, in speaking to the power of a government to enact regulations of this character, said: "The right of the state to establish regulations for these public service corporations, and over business enterprises in which the owners, corporate or individual, have devoted their property to a public use, and to enforce these regulations by appropriate penalties, is now and has long been too firmly established to require or permit discussion"—citing: Harrill's Case, 144 N. C. 532, 57 S. E. 383; Stone's Case, 144 N. C. 220, 56 S. E. 932; Walker's Case, 137 N. C. 168, 49 S. E. 84; McGowan's Case, 95 N. C. 417; Branch's Case, 77 N. C. 347; Railway v. State of Florida, 203 U. S. 261, 27 Sup. Ct. 109, 51 L. Ed. 175; Railway v. Hums, 115 U. S. 513, 6 Sup. Ct. 110, 29 L. Ed. 463; Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77. The opinion then quotes from that of Associate Justice Fields, in Hums' Case, 115 U. S. 513, 6 Sup. Ct. 110, 29 L. Ed. 463, both on the right to enact such statutes and the necessity for their proper enforcement, as follows: "The power of the state to impose fines and penalties for a violation of its statutory requirements is coeval with government; and the mode in which they shall be enforced, whether at the suit of a private party or at the suit of the public, and what disposition shall be made of the amounts collected, are merely matters of legislative discretion. The statutes of nearly every state of the Union provide for the increase of damages where the injury complained of results from the neglect of duties imposed for the better security of life, and property, and make that increase in many cases double, and in some cases treble, and even quadruple, the actual damages." And proceeds further: "And the right to establish such regulations for certain classes of pursuits and occupations, imposing these requirements equally on all members of a given class, has been made to rest largely in the discretion of the Legislature. Tullis v. Railway, 175 U. S. 348, 20 Sup. Ct. 136, 44 L. Ed. 192; Insurance Co. v. Dagg, 172 U. S. 562, 19 Sup. Ct. 281, 43 L. Ed. 552; Magoun v. Savings Bank, 170 U. S. 286, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1037."

And the very statute in question here (Revisal 1905, § 2631) has been approved and upheld in several of these cases as a just and reasonable exercise of the power indicated, and both as to interstate and intrastate commerce. Garrison v. Railroad (present term) 64 S. E. 578; Twitty v. Railway, 141 N. C. 355, 53 S. E. 957; Currie v. Railroad, 135 N. C. 536, 47 S. E. 654; Baggs v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 279, 14 S. E. 79, 14 L. R. A. 596, 26 Am. St. Rep. 569. In Twitty's Case, supra, we have held that a refusal to receive goods for "transportation," and to issue a bill of lading therefor, amounts to a violation of this section, though the goods were received for storage. In Garrison's Case, supra, it was held that the placing of goods for shipment in the car of the company, permitted by the agent, with a demand for shipment, and accompanied by a continuous offer of prepayment of freight, were facts from which a tender day by day should be inferred until the shipment was made. The case of Cotton Mills v. Railway (at the present term) 64 S. E. 586, in no way conflicts with this position. That case only holds that where goods were on a platform, under circumstances leaving it doubtful whether they had been taken charge of by the company, with other facts which left the matter of a tender day by day in doubt, the question was properly referred to a jury to decide as to whether such tender had been made. And the opinion of the court on a former appeal in this cause (149 N. C. 423, 63 S. E. 112) is a direct decision on the validity of the statute to be enforced by orderly and proper procedure; the court holding, on facts substantially similar to those presented here, as follows: "(1) A refusal by the carrier's agent to receive, at its depot, freight, and transportation charges therefor, destined for a point on the carrier's road which was only a siding, and was not a regular station, is wrongful, and subjects the carrier to the penalty prescribed by Revisal 1905, § 2631, when the refusal is on the ground that the agent did not know where the given destination was, and it appears that he could have ascertained that freight was ordinarily shipped there on waybills made out to a regular station on the carrier's road some two miles distant therefrom. (2) When a shipment of freight and transportation charges are refused by carrier's agent because he did not know where its given destination was, and it appears that the name given was very slightly changed from that appearing on the 'Official Railway Guide and Shipping Guide' used by the carrier, the fact that another agent, who afterwards took the place of the first, promptly learned the location of the destination and the rate, and gave bill of lading and made shipment, is evidence that the rate and destination could have been ascertained by the first from the information given him, in an action for the penalty prescribed by Revisal 1905, § 2631. (3) The penalty arising under Revisal 1905, § 2631, from the wrongful refusal of carrier's agent to accept an interstate shipment of freight, bears no relation to the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, for the penalty accrues before the freight is accepted for transportation. (4) The shipper of the goods is the 'party aggrieved,' and is the one entitled to sue for the penalty prescribed in Revisal 1905, § 2631, which arises from the wrongful refusal of the carrier's agent to accept them for transportation."

It was chiefly urged for error, on the part of the defendant company, that the statute in question was invalid, because an unlawful interference with interstate commerce, and we were referred by counsel to several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as tending to support their position, notably the case of McNeill v. Southern Ry., 202 U. S. 543, 26 Sup. Ct. 722, 50 L. Ed. 1142; Houston & Texas Central Ry. Co. v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 321, 26 Sup. Ct. 491, 50 L. Ed. 772; Railroad v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 194, 25 Sup. Ct. 218, 49 L. Ed. 444. It may be, as indicated in the former opinion in this cause, that the commerce clause of the federal Constitution is not involved in the case, on the ground therein stated, that the penalty accrues before the "freight is accepted for transportation," and on the principle applied in the case of Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. 475, 29 L. Ed. 715; but conceding that the goods, when tendered for transportation to another state, as to matters involved in such transportation, and in reference to these penalty statutes, should be considered and dealt with as interstate commerce, we are of opinion that the position of the counsel cannot be sustained, and that they do not correctly interpret the cases cited and relied on by them.

In the case of Morris-Scarboro-Moffitt Co. v. Express Co., 146 N. C. 167, 59 S. E. 667, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, the plaintiffs sued for penalty imposed by section 2634 of the Revisal, for unlawful failure on part of defendant company to adjust and pay a valid claim for loss or damages to goods shipped from another state, and it was held: "(2) Revisal 1905, § 2634, is not repugnant to or in contravention of article 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States, conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce between the states. The penalty is in direct enforcement of the duties incumbent on the carriers by law to adjust and pay for damages due to their negligence; is imposed for a local default arising after the transportation has terminated; is not a burden on interstate commerce, but in aid thereof, and, in the absence of inhibitive congressional legislation, the matter is the rightful subject of state legislation." And in the opinion (page 171 of 146 N. C., page 668 of 59 S. E. [15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983]) the court said: "The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have uniformly held that under this clause of the Constitution commerce between the states shall be free and untrammelled by any regulations which place a burden upon it, and these decisions also hold that, in the absence of inhibitive congressional legislation, a state may enact and establish laws and regulations on matters local in their nature which tend to enforce the proper performance of duties arising within the state, and which do not impede, but aid and facilitate, intercourse and traffic, though such action may incidentally affect interstate commerce. Calvert on Regulation of Commerce, pp. 76, 152, 159"—citing in support of this position Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238, Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 476, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 508, Telegraph Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105, Railway v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133-137, 18 Sup. Ct. 289, 42 L. Ed. 688, and other authorities, and quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Matthews, in Smith v. Alabama, supra, as follows: "It is among these laws of the states therefore that we find provisions concerning the rights and duties of the common carriers of persons and merchandise, whether by land or by water, and the means authorized by which injuries resulting from the failure properly to perform their obligations may be either prevented or redressed. A carrier, exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable according to the laws of the state for acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fail to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time or place, he is liable in an action for damages under the laws of the state in its courts; or, if by negligence in transportation he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, a right of action for the consequent damage is given by the local law. In neither case would it be a defense that the law giving the right to redress was void as being an unconstitutional regulation of commerce by the state. This, indeed, was the very point decided in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 819), above cited." The court, then referred to the cases cited and relied upon by defendant, as follows: "We were referred by counsel to cases of Railway v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 195, 25 Sup. Ct. 218, 49 L. Ed. 444, Railway v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 321, 26 Sup. Ct. 491, 50 L. Ed. 772, and McNeill v. Railway, 202 U. S. 543, 26 Sup. Ct. 722, 50 L. Ed. 1142; but we do not think that these decisions are in conflict with the views we have held to be controlling in the case before us. As we understand them, they all proceed upon the idea, not that the regulations in question were void because they affected in some way interstate commerce, but because they interfered directly with intercourse and traffic between states and were of a character that imposed and undoubted and distinct burden upon them."

As showing that this is a correct deduction from these authorities, in McNeill's Case, supra, Mr. Justice White, for the court, said: "Without at all questioning the right of the state of North Carolina in the exercise of its police authority to confer upon an administrative agency power to make reasonable regulations concerning the place, manner, and time of delivery of merchandise moving in the channels of interstate commerce, it is certain that any regulation of such subjects made by the state or under its authority, which directly burdens interstate commerce, is a regulation of such commerce and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." In Mayes' Case, supra, Associate Justice Brown, among other things, said: "While there is much to be said in favor of laws compelling railroads to furnish adequate facilities for the transportation of both freight and passengers, and to regulate the general subject of speed, length and frequency of stops, for the heating, lighting, and ventilation of passenger cars, the furnishing of food and water to cattle and other live stock, we think an absolute requirement that a railroad shall furnish a certain number of cars at a specified day, regardless of every other consideration except strikes and other public calamities, transcends the police power of the state and amounts to a burden upon interstate commerce. It makes no exception in cases of sudden congestion of traffic, an actual inability to furnish cars by reason of their temporary and unavoidable detention in other states, or in other places within the same state. It makes no allowance for interference of traffic occasioned by wrecks or other accidents upon the same or other roads, involving a detention of traffic, the breaking of bridges, accidental fires, washouts, or other unavoidable consequences of heavy weather." And in Railway v. Murphey, supra, Mr. Justice Peckham, delivering the opinion, said: "The effect of such a statute is direct and immediate upon interstate commerce. It directly affects the liability of the carrier of freight destined to points outside the state, with regard to the transportation of articles of commerce. It prevents a valid contract of exemption from taking effect, except upon a very onerous condition, and it is not of that class of state legislation which has been held to be rather an aid to than a burden upon such commerce. The statute in question prevents the carrier from availing itself of a valid contract, unless such carrier comply with the provisions of the statute by obtaining information which it has no means of compelling another carrier to give, and yet, if the information is not obtained, the carrier is to be held liable for the negligence of another carrier over whose conduct it has no control. This is not a reasonable regulation in aid of interstate commerce, but a direct and immediate burden upon it." In Garrison v. Railway (at the present term) 64 S. E. 578, the court has held, Associate Justice Connor delivering the opinion, that the statute in question here is not an arbitrary requirement permitting no defense, but that, "when the carrier shows the existence of conditions for which it is not responsible, preventing and rendering impossible the discharge of the duty, it will not be liable for the penalty," and quotes with approval from an opinion by Ashe, J., as follows: "When the facts show that by force and circumstances for which it is in no way responsible the carrier was disabled from performing the duty imposed by the statute, it would be unjust to punish it for failure to comply with its requirements." To like effect is Whitehead v. Railroad, 87 N. C. 255; Keeter v. Railway, 86 N. C. 346; Branch's Case, 77 N. C. 347.

The statute therefore does not come under the condemnation expressed in these decisions of the United States Supreme Court; but it is always open to defendant to offer satisfactory excuse and explanation for an apparent default, and this opportunity was given the defendant on the trial of the present case. Since the decision of Morris-Scarboro-Moffitt Co. v. Express Co. was rendered, the Supreme Court of the United States, the final authority of these matters, has held on a question relevant to this inquiry: "That, notwithstanding the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the delegation to it by Congress of the control of certain matters, a state may, in the absence of express action by Congress or by such commission, regulate for the benefit of its citizens local matters indirectly affecting interstate commerce." This principle was announced and sustained in Railway v. Flour Mills, 211 U. S. 612, 29 Sup. Ct. 214, 53 L. Ed. —, a case which involved the right of the court to compel a railroad, or a common carrier, to place cars on a siding which had been prepared for the purpose and for the benefit and convenience of a flouring mill, engaged in making shipments of interstate commerce. So far as we have been enabled to discover, there has been no act of Congress or regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which undertakes to deal directly with this question to the reception of freight for shipment—certainly none in reference to its safety and prompt dispatch—and, until this is done, we are of opinion that the matter comes within the principle of the numerous authorities referred to, and continues to be a subject for proper and reasonable state regulation.

It does not appear from the testimony that the defendant has not filed its schedule of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission to Scottville, Tenn., for it can hardly be seriously contended that the difference between Scottville, Tenn., and Scottsville, Tenn., is of the substance. The presumption is that the company has complied with the law, and, if it were otherwise, we are of opinion that the act of Congress, and the orders of the commission made thereunder, requiring the publication of rates, was made for an entirely different purpose from that involved in this inquiry, and does not constitute such interfering action. See Harrell v. Railway, 144 N. C. 540, 541, 57 S. E. 383.

Nor do we think that the statute imposes any burden upon interstate commerce as applied to the facts of this particular case. While one of defendant's witnesses stated in his examination in chief that the Knoxville & Augusta Road was operated as an independent line, the witness evidently could have meant only that a separate organization was maintained for purposes of local management and control. This is no doubt required by its charter, or the general statutes of the state of Tennessee; but it is also conclusively established from the statement of the witness on his cross-examination that the Knoxville & Augusta Road is operated by defendant company, all the money being sent to its treasurer, the reports being made to its auditor, and all salaries of all employees being paid by the defendant. This being true, the agent of the defendant should have known of the placing of this siding and the rate thereto, or should have ascertained the same in the exercise of reasonable care, and this was the only burden which was placed upon the defendant, and any fact or circumstance which might have tended to indicate hardship or oppression would seem to be effaced by the fact admitted that in two days after the coming of a new man, and while the former agent was still in charge, the goods were received and shipped, and reached their destination in due course without further annoyance or delay. Nor is there any merit in the suggestion that the plaintiffs suffered no pecuniary injury by reason of the delay. Speaking to this question, in Summers v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 298, 50 S. E. 715, this court said: "These penalties are not given solely on the idea of making pecuniary compensation to the person injured, but usually for the more important purpose of enforcing the performance of a duty required by public policy or positive statutory enactment."

We are of opinion: That, in the absence of inhibitive congressional legislation, or of interfering action on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the statute in question is a valid regulation in direct and reasonable enforcement of the duties incumbent on defendant as a common carrier; that on the trial the defendant was afforded full opportunity to make defenses, and the facts presented disclose no substantial excuse or explanation for its default; that no error appears in the record which gives the defendant any just ground of complaint. And the judgment against it is therefore affirmed.

No error.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). This is a civil action to recover a penalty under section 2631 of the Revisal of 1905 for failure to receive a car load of shingles to be shipped from Rutherfordton, N. C., to Scottsville, Tenn. The following issue was submitted: "Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff for the unlawful failure to receive a car load of shingles to be transported to Scottsville, Tenn., as alleged? If so, in what sum?" Answer: "$350."

1. I am of opinion that upon the entire evidence there was but one tender, and that in no event can a penalty for more than one day be recovered. When the agent of defendant refused to issue the bill of lading, and gave his reasons for it, then and there plaintiff told the agent that, when he found what the freight rate was, to let him know, and he would prepay it; agent replying that when he got instructions how to ship he would issue bill of lading and ship shingles. Plaintiff never had a further conversation with the defendant's agent from the 2d day of July, 1906, to the 17th of July, 1906, when one Castle came to plaintiff's place of business to inquire about the car. Plaintiff further testified that he never lost a cent by the shipment being delayed. On July 17th Castle came to relieve defendant's agent, Gunnels, and went in to see Reid about the car of shingles. Reld showed him correspondence that he had received from James Haddock relative to the delay of the shipment of shingles, stating that Scottsville was on the Knoxville & Augusta Railroad. In the meantime the freight office at Columbia, S. C., was also trying to locate Scottsville, and received a wire from defendant's agent at Knoxville that Scottsville was a siding on the Knoxville & Augusta Railroad a few miles out from Knoxville. The information was forwarded to Gunnels on the 19th of July, and the bill of lading was issued and the car was moved that day. The standard railroad guides and directories do not show a Scottsville or a Scottville anywhere in Tennessee. These undisputed facts show that there was only one tender, and that the plaintiff made no further tender, but acquiesced in the delay incident to locating Scottsville, the place of destination, admitted to be not on defendant's lines of railway. This puts the case, in my opinion, squarely on "all fours" with the opinion of this court at this term in Cotton Mills v. Railway.

2. I think this transaction from its inception related solely to interstate commerce, and that the state statute cannot apply. The car was ordered for the purpose of shipping shingles to a point in Tennessee. The act of furnishing cars for such shipments was held to be interstate commerce by the Supreme Court of the United States in Houston & Texas Pacific Railroad v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 321, 26 Sup. Ct. 491, 50 L. Ed. 772, because it was one of the steps necessary to the culmination of the transaction. The car in this case had been duly furnished and was loaded with the shingles or articles to be shipped. The next step to complete the transfer of the title and the exchange of commodities was for the shipper to give shipping instructions and receive from the railroad company a bill of lading. The shipper claims that he gave instructions to ship to James Haddock at Scottsville, Tenn. Thus making it an interstate transaction. The statute in question, and under which this action is brought, undertakes to regulate the terms and conditions upon which the bill of lading shall be issued by the carrier. The bill of lading demanded was not to a point in this state, but to a point in Tennessee. The contract which the defendant was required to enter into was a contract of carriage of freight from one state to another. Such contracts not only partake entirely of the character of interstate commerce, but they are actually regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the authority of federal law. Congress has legislated on the subject and made regulations in reference to the publication of rates for interstate commerce and otherwise taken control through the commission of all matters relating to the shipment of freight from one state to another. Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 2, 34 Stat. 586 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 897). This section of the interstate commerce act provides: "No carrier, unless otherwise provided by this act, shall engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless the rates, fares and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier, have been filed and published in accordance with this act; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive, a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs, than the rates, fares and charges which are specified in the tariff, filed and in effect at the time." It is undisputed that the defendant company had never filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and had never published a tariff to Scottsville or Scottville, Tenn., for the reason that its officials had never heard of any such place. This appears in the plaintiff's own testimony. It turns out upon investigation that Scottsville is not and never has been a shipping point upon any railway, but that it is only a flag station and siding on the Knoxville & Augusta Railroad and that all freight destined to it is billed to Rockford, Tenn. Thus it appears that, if defendant's agent had issued the bill of lading to Scottsville and fixed the freight rates thereto and received the money, he would have violated the act of Congress which I have referred to, and would have subjected the defendant to prosecution by the federal government. Surely the defendant cannot be penalized by a state for not issuing a bill of lading in violation of the act of Congress in a matter over which the latter has exclusive control.

3. It is admitted that the plaintiff, when he tendered the car, demanded a bill of lading to a point in Tennessee not on defendant's system. The evidence is undisputed that defendant's agent consulted Standard railway guides and endeavored to locate Scottsville and were delayed in finding it for the reason that all freight destined to Scottsville was waybilled or consigned to Rockford; all freight originating at Scottsville was waybilled or consigned from Rockford. There is a siding at Scottsville, put there for the accommodation of a brick plant, and up to the time of this shipment the Knoxville & Augusta Railroad, upon whose line Scottsville is situated, had never received any shipments for that siding. Upon these facts it is contended that defendant's agent was required to receive the car eo instanti, issue bill of lading to Scottsville (the first and only shipment from any point), enter into a contract for the carriage of the shingles to this point, and state the freight rate, when none had been established. The mere statement of the contention I think demonstrates its unreasonableness.

A common carrier may contract to deliver freight to a point beyond its own lines, but it cannot be compelled to do so. Hutchinson on Carriers, § 145, and cases cited in notes. The liability of the carrier beyond the terminus of its own line must be based on contract, and no authority has been shown, and none exists so far as my researches have discovered, to the effect that a state can compel an interstate carrier to enter into such a contract and give a through bill of lading to points in another state beyond its own lines and penalize the carrier for its refusal.

The condition of the tender of the car was that the defendant should contract to deliver it to a point in another state beyond its own line. It necessarily follows that, if defendant cannot be compelled by the state to enter into such a contract against its will, it cannot be penalized for refusing to receive the car. A defense that may be interposed against the shipper for damages may be interposed in a suit for the penalty. Garrison v. Railway (at this term) 64 S. E. 578; Hardware Co. v. Railway (at this term) 64 S. E. 873; Railroad v. Mayes, supra; McNeill v. Railroad, 202 U. S. 543, 26 Sup. Ct. 722, 50 L. Ed. 1142.

For the reasons given, I think the defendant's motion to nonsuit should have been allowed.

WALKER, J., concurs in dissenting opinion.

METZ v. CITY OF ASHEVILLE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 25, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 745½*) — TORTS — EXERCISE OF CORPORATE POWERS — UNDERTAKINGS FOR PECUNIARY BENEFIT.

Cities are liable for damage caused by the torts of their officers while exercising their corporate powers for their own advantage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1568, 1569; Dec. Dig. § 745½.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 745½*) — TORTS — EXERCISE OF GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

Cities are not liable for damage caused by the torts of their officers while exercising judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by their charters, in the absence of statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1568; Dec. Dig. § 745½.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 745½*) — TORTS — DUTIES IMPOSED FOR PUBLIC BENEFIT.

Cities are not liable for damage caused by the torts of their officers while discharging duties imposed upon them solely for the public benefit, in the absence of a statute imposing such liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1568, 1569; Dec. Dig. § 745½.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 745½*) — TORTS — DAMAGE TO PROPERTY — LIABILITY OF CITY.

While a municipality is not liable for personal injuries resulting from the exercise of its governmental powers, it is liable for damage to property caused by the torts of its officers in discharging its governmental functions, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, as not even government can interfere with vested rights except for a public purpose and upon making compensation.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*) — TORTS — SEWERS — PERSONAL INJURIES.

The maintenance of a free public sewer system by a city is an exercise of its police power for the public benefit, so that a city would not be liable for the death of a citizen from illness caused by the pollution of a stream by the sewer which emptied into it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by J. H. Metz, administrator, against the City of Asheville. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the court intimated an opinion that upon the entire evidence the defendant, as matter of law, was not liable, and that he would so instruct the jury. In deference to this intimation of opinion, the plaintiff submitted to nonsuit and appealed.

Chas. E. Jones, for appellant. H. B. Carter and Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellee.

BROWN, J. Plaintiff sues to recover damages for the death of his intestate, caused by typhoid fever communicated by the condition of Reed branch, a small stream emptying into the French Broad river, and which ran near the house where said intestate resided. The defendant under its charter maintained a free public sewerage system, the mouth of which emptied into Reed branch a short distance beyond the city limits above the house where intestate resided. It is admitted that, with full knowledge of the conditions necessarily caused by the constant discharge of the sewerage of the city into the branch, the intestate rented the house and moved into it in February, 1905, and died in August following, of typhoid fever, although his wife and children did not take it. There is evidence tending to show that the fever was caused by the sewerage in the branch. It is contended that the sewer system should have emptied into the French Broad river, and that emptying it into Reed branch created a nuisance for which defendant is liable.

Whatever may have been held by some other courts, it is plain that, under the previous decisions of this court, the opinion of his honor is well founded. The principle upon which our decisions have been based is clearly stated by the present Chief Justice, speaking for a unanimous court in McIlhenny v. Wilmington, 127 N. C. 146, 37 S. E. 187, 50 L. R. A. 470: "The law may, on a review of the authorities which are uniform, be thus stated: When cities are acting in their corporate capacity or in the exercise of powers for their own advantage, they are liable for damages caused by the negligence or torts of their officers or agents; but where they are exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by their charters, or are discharging the duty imposed solely for the public benefit, they are not liable for the torts or negligence of their officers, unless there is some statute which subjects them to liability therefor." Moffitt v. Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 9 S. E. 695, 14 Am. St. Rep. 810; Pritchard v. Commissioners, 126 N. C. 908, 36 S. E. 353, 78 Am. St. Rep. 679; Hill v. Commissioners, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451; Coley v. Statesville, 121 N. C. 316, 28 S. E. 482. The same principles are recognized and set forth in an elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Walker in Hull v. Roxboro, 142 N. C. 453, 55 S. E. 351, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 638. See, also, Peterson v. Wilmington, 130 N. C. 77, 40 S. E. 853, 56 L. R. A. 959. The theory upon which municipalities are exempted from liability in cases like this is that, in establishing a free sewerage system for the public benefit, it is exercising its police powers for the public good and is discharging a governmental function, and, as expressed by the Supreme Court of Illinois: "It is a familiar rule of law, supported by a long line of well-considered cases, that a city in the performance of its police regulations cannot commit a wrong through its officers in such a way as to render it liable for a tort." Craig v. Charleston, 180 Ill. 154, 54 N. E. 184; Dillon, Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 975. The distinction between cases in which a power is conferred upon a municipality for private purposes and those where such power has relation to public purposes only, and of the liability or nonliability of the municipality therein, is thus aptly and clearly stated in 1 Smith's Modern Law of Municipal Corp. § 780: "When power conferred has relation to public purposes and for the public good, it is to be classified as governmental in its nature and appertains to the corporation in its political capacity. But when it relates to the accomplishment of private purposes in which the public is only indirectly concerned, it is private in its nature, and the municipality in respect to its exercise is regarded as a legal individual. In the former case the corporation is exempt from all liability, whether for nonuser or misuser; while in the latter case it may be held to that degree of responsibility which would attach to an ordinary corporation."

Recognizing this well-defined distinction in the liability of municipal corporations, it is held that, where by statute it is made the duty of the city to remove garbage, it is a governmental function, and the city is not liable for the manner of its discharge. Davidson v. Mayor, etc., 24 Misc. Rep. 560, 54 N. Y. Supp. 51. So a city is held not to be liable for permitting its hydrants to become clogged, since the neglect is in the discharge of a public governmental function. Miller v. Minneapolis, 75 Minn. 181, 77 N. W. 788. Therefore a city is not liable for damages of any sort arising from the negligence of its fire department. Irvine v. Chattanooga, 101 Tenn. 291, 47 S. W. 419. Nor in the performance of governmental duties generally. Bartlett v. Clarksburg, 45 W. Va. 393, 31 S. E. 918, 43 L. R. A. 295, 72 Am. St. Rep. 817; Snyder v. Lexington (Ky.) 49 S. W. 765; Love v. Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, 51 Am. St. Rep. 64. Applying this same principle, the town of Greenville was exempted from liability for damages for illness caused by a foul condition of its public sewer; this court holding that: "Where a drain constructed by a municipal corporation through its negligence becomes choked with refuse and overflows the premises of a landowner, the corporation is liable only for damages to the property, not for bills of physicians, increase in expenses of his family, loss of time or mental anguish, the result of illness caused by the condition of the drain." Williams v. Greenville, 130 N. C. 93, 40 S. E. 977, 57 L. R. A. 207, 89 Am. St. Rep. 860. The reason of this distinction in regard to property seems to lie in the fact of ownership, vested rights, which no one can invade, not even the government, unless for public purposes, and then only by paying the owner for it. Where, in the discharge of its governmental functions and police powers, the officers of a municipality invade property rights, the doctrine of respondeat superior applies, and the corporation is liable for their acts.

The identical question presented on this appeal was decided by the Court of Appeals of New York in Hughes v. City of Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 55 N. E. 389, 46 L. R. A. 636, where it is held: "(1) A city is not liable in damages for disease suffered by an individual in consequence of the neglect of the city authorities to observe proper sanitary precautions in the construction and maintenance of a sewer system. * * * (3) The statutory right of action for damages by reason of death caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default does not extend to an action against a city by the representatives of one who dies from disease superinduced by the neglect of sanitary precautions on the part of the public authorities in the construction or maintenance of a sewer system." So it was held by the Massachusetts court that, where a private party sued a city for personal damages arising from the creation of a nuisance by the city upon his premises in constructing a sewer system with so narrow an outlet that the sewage was set back into plaintiff's cellar through a drain which he had constructed by permission of the city to connect with the public sewer, the action could not be maintained. Buckley v. New Bedford, 155 Mass. 64, 29 N. E. 201. See, also, Markey v. Queens County, 154 N. Y. 675, 49 N. E. 71, 39 L. R. A. 46;

Hughes v. Monroe, 147 N. Y. 49, 41 N. E. 407, 89 L. R. A. 33; Kavanagh v. Barber, 181 N. Y. 211, 30 N. E. 235, 15 L. R. A. 689. The village of Keeseville, as authorized by statute, maintained, by a public charge in the nature of taxation, a waterworks system which it used for the purpose of extinguishing fires. The Court of Appeals of New York held that the corporation was not liable for damages arising from the negligence of its agents in operating the waterworks at a fire. The court holds that it was an exercise of the police power of the village for the public benefit for the purpose of extinguishing fires, and remarks "that cases have arisen, and may still arise, where an extensive conflagration might bankrupt the municipality, if it could be rendered liable for the damages or losses sustained." Insurance Co. v. Keeseville, 148 N. Y. 46, 42 N. E. 405, 80 L. R. A. 680, 51 Am. St. Rep. 667. The distinction between the exercise of municipal corporate functions for the public benefit and those undertaken by such corporations for pecuniary profit is clearly recognized by Mr. Justice Connors in Fisher v. New Bern, 140 N. C. 508, 53 S. E. 342, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 542, 111 Am. St. Rep. 857, a case relied upon by plaintiffs. In that case it appeared that the city of New Bern, through a commissioner created by law, operated an electric light plant for profit and furnished lights only to those who paid for them. From negligence in permitting a live wire to remain on the ground a person was killed. The court held that operating an electric light plant for profit for the benefit of those who paid for the service was not an exercise of police power, nor a governmental function, and that the city was liable for the negligence of its agents.

It must be admitted that the city of Asheville was exercising its police power when it established a free public sewer system for the use of which no charge is made, for the benefit of its citizens. Certainly nothing is more necessary to the health of a city than that its filth should be removed and its area well drained. That the establishment of a public sewer system is an exercise of a governmental function is recognized by all the authorities I have quoted. The serious consequences of holding a municipality liable for disease arising from nuisances of this kind is portrayed by the Court of Appeals of New York in an opinion of marked ability in the case of Hughes v. Auburn, supra: "The right of the plaintiff to maintain this action depends upon the right of the deceased herself to maintain it had she survived the sickness resulting in her death, and this suggests the inquiry whether an individual, who has suffered from disease, superinduced by the neglect of the authorities of a city or village, to observe sanitary laws in the construction or maintenance of a system of sewerage, can recover damages for the injury from the municipality. If one member of a family can, so can every member; and, if one family may, so may every family, and every person who can give proof enough to carry the case to the jury. It matters not what the disease may be or the cause, so long as it may be traced by proof to some act or neglect on the part of the municipal authorities. There are few communities where places or conditions may not be found that generate disease, and, if the municipality may be charged with the results traceable to these conditions, it is indeed subject to a liability more serious and far-reaching than has heretofore been recognized."

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

MURCHISON NAT. BANK v. DUNN OIL MILLS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 88*)—COMPETENCY—INTEREST.

That a juror is a stockholder in plaintiff corporation, though not enumerated in the statute as ground for challenge, makes him incompetent because of interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 409, 410; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 877*)—REVIEW—JOINT OR SEPARATE ASSIGNMENTS.

Error in overruling the joint challenge of defendants to a jury may be availed of by the only defendant appealing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3560-3572; Dec. Dig. § 877.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1103*)—REVERSAL—NEW TRIAL.

Where, in an action on a note against a corporation and an officer thereof, the liability of one depended largely on the liability of the other, and vice versa, and plaintiff recovered against the corporation, but not against the officer, and plaintiff and the corporation appealed, the reversal of the judgment against defendant corporation requires a new trial against both defendants, without passing upon the errors assigned on plaintiff's appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1103.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by the Murchison National Bank against the Dunn Oil Mills Company and another. From the judgment defendant company and plaintiff appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

E. K. Bryan and Rountree & Carr, for plaintiff. J. D. Bellamy & Son, J. C. Clifford, Woodus Keelum, and Godwin & Townsend, for defendants.

WALKER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a promissory note executed by the Dunn Cotton Oil Mills Company to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn, N. C., and by the latter bank deposited as collateral security for its note to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff sued the Dunn Oil Mills Company and J. D. Barnes jointly, Barnes having signed the note of the oil mills company in its name as its president; whereas, the by-laws of the oil mills company required that the note should also be signed by its secretary and treasurer, which was not done, and Barnes notified E. F. Young, president of the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn, N. C., of such requirement, and that the note would not be valid without the signature of the secretary and treasurer. The plaintiff alleged that it acquired the note in good faith before maturity and without any notice of the provision of the by-law of the oil mills company. It therefore sues the oil mills company upon the ground that it is liable upon the note, as Barnes had apparent authority to execute it and joins Barnes as a defendant upon the ground that, if the oil mills company is not liable, he has falsely represented that he had authority to execute the note and is therefore liable to the plaintiff by reason of the fraud or as himself the maker of the note. This briefly states the facts, so far as is necessary for an understanding of the question presented for our decision. The court rendered judgment for the plaintiff against the oil mills company for $5,000 and ordered a nonsuit as to the defendant J. D. Barnes. The oil mills company excepted and appealed, and the plaintiff excepted to the judgment of nonsuit in favor of J. D. Barnes and appealed.

The defendants, having exhausted their peremptory challenges, objected to a juror, Samuel Bear, who admitted that he is a stockholder in the plaintiff bank. The court, upon evidence, found that, notwithstanding the fact of his being a stockholder, he was "a fair and unbiased juror," and overruled the challenge. In this ruling we think there was error. It is very true the cause of challenge is not one of those specified in the statute, but they are merely cumulative, and it was not the intention of the Legislature to repeal the fundamental principle of the common law forbidding a person to sit in judgment when his own interests are involved. Whether there are any circumstances which will justify a departure from this elementary rule by reason of the necessity of the case we need not consider, as no such necessity arose in the trial of the present action. The only question presented is: Was the juror competent to sit in the case? He was a stockholder of the plaintiff bank and therefore had a direct pecuniary interest in the result of the trial. This cannot well be questioned. He was therefore made a judge in his own cause without any sufficient reason in law to sustain the ruling of the court. Whether he was actually biased or not is immaterial. Suppose a plaintiff in a case is called as a juror, could we hesitate to declare his incompetency? The difference between such a case and the one before us, where the juror is the holder of stock in the plaintiff bank, is one that relates, not to the fact, but to the degree of interest. We cannot do better than quote the language of Judge Cooley, when discussing this question, but it must not be understood that we concur, for it is not necessary that we should do so, in all that he says. The strong language used by him but shows how closely the courts have adhered to the common-law rule and how far they have gone in its application. In Cooley on Const. Limitations (6th Ed.) pp. 506, 507, it is said: "There is also a maxim of law regarding judicial action which may have an important bearing upon the constitutional validity of judgments in some cases. No one ought to be a judge in his own cause; and so inflexible and so manifestly just is this rule that Lord Coke has laid it down that 'even an act of Parliament made against natural equity, as to make a man a judge in his own case, is void in itself, for jura naturæ sunt immutabilia, and they are leges legum.' This maxim applies in all cases where judicial functions are to be exercised, and excludes all who are interested, however remotely, from taking part in their exercises. It is not left to the discretion of a judge to decide whether he shall act or not. All his powers are subject to this absolute limitation; and when his own rights are in question, he has no authority to determine the cause. Nor is it essential that the judge be a party named in the record. If the suit is brought or defended in his interest, or if he is a corporator in a corporation which is a party, or which will be benefited or damaged by the judgment, he is equally excluded as if he were the party named. Accordingly, where the Lord Chancellor, who was a shareholder in a company in whose favor the Vice Chancellor had rendered a decree, the House of Lords reversed the decree on this ground; Lord Campbell observing: 'It is of the last importance that the maxim that "no man is to be a judge in his own cause" should be held sacred. And that is not to be confined to a cause in which he is a party, but applies to a cause in which he has an interest.' 'We have again and again set aside proceedings in inferior tribunals, because an individual who had an interest in a cause took a part in the decision. And it will have a most salutary effect on these tribunals, when it is known that this high court of last resort, in a case in which the Lord Chancellor of England had an interest, considered that his decree was on that account a decree not according to law, and was set aside. This will be a lesson to all inferior tribunals to take care, not only that in their decrees they are not influenced by their personal interest, but to avoid the appearance of laboring under such an influence.'"

The cases cited by him, and others also in point, show that a corporator or stockholder is not a competent juror in a suit to which the corporation is a party. The principle as applicable to a stockholder is clearly and strongly stated in Page v. Railroad, 21 N. H. 438, as follows: "The juror, who owned stock in the Concord & Claremont Road, was therefore, by virtue of this contract, directly interested in the result of the cause, which he assisted to try. His interest was probably very trifling in amount, and may not have influenced his judgment at all on the question of damages; but the principle is extremely well settled that any, even the smallest, degree of interest in the question pending, is a decisive objection to a juror"—citing Hesketh v. Braiddock, 3 Burrows, 1856; Hawkes v. Kennebeck, 7 Mass. 464; Wood v. Stoddard, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 194. The authorities are quite uniform to the effect that a stockholder is not a competent juror, if the corporation, in which he is a stockholder, is a party to the action. Railroad v. Howard, 20 Mich. 18; Fleeson v. Savage, 3 Nev. 157; Silvis v. Ely, 8 Watts & S. (Pa.) 420; Essex v. McPherson, 64 Ill. 349; Railroad v. Hart, 60 Ga. 550. See, also, Zimmerman v. State, 115 Ind. 129, 17 N. E. 258; Railway v. Barnes, 40 Mich. 383; Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal, 3 H. L. Cases, 759. It was held that, by the common law, a stockholder, on account of his interest in the corporation, could not be a competent witness for it. Porter v. Bank, 19 Vt. 410; McAuley v. York Co., 6 Cal. 80. In Silvis v. Ely, supra, Rogers, J., said: "The first error (assigned) is in rejecting a person because he was a stockholder and director in the Farmers' Bank of Reading. Interest is a principal cause of challenge, and for that reason the juror was incompetent in a cause in which the bank had an interest." In this case the defendants joined in the challenge, as they had the right to do, and the oil company can avail itself, on this appeal, of the error of the court in overruling the challenge. It has been compelled to try the case with a juror in the box to whom it had objected and who was incompetent to serve. The erroneous ruling of the judge as to the competency of the juror compels us to order a new trial in the appeal of the oil company.

New trial.

BROWN, J., did not sit.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

PER CURIAM. While a nonsuit was ordered as to the defendant J. D. Barnes, we award a new trial in this appeal, without passing upon the errors assigned, because the liability of the oil company depends to a great extent upon the liability of Barnes, and vice versa. For this reason the case must be tried again as to both defendants, upon proper issues, and with correct instructions as to the liability of the defendants, or either of them, according as the facts may appear.

New trial.

BROWN, J., did not sit.

MURCHISON NAT. BANK v. DUNN OIL MILLS CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§§ 156, 159*)—DRAFTS—COLLECTIONS—STOPPING PAYMENT.

As against the payee of a draft, a bank which is merely the drawer's agent for collection, as shown by its uniform custom, while giving him credit for the amount of such drafts, and allowing him to draw against the same, to charge them back to him if they are not paid, he has the right to arrest payment of the draft.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Dec. Dig. §§ 156, 159.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 363*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

Though the payee of a draft, a bank, is merely the drawer's agent for collection, yet, this not appearing on the face of the draft, the drawer may not arrest payment thereof as against one who in due course becomes purchaser thereof for value and without notice, and having done so is liable to such purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 363.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 353*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—VALUE.

By express provision of Revisal 1905, § 2173, in regard to negotiable instruments, an existing indebtedness constitutes value, so that such a consideration makes a purchaser a holder for value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 898-903½, 906, 907; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by the Murchison National Bank against the Dunn Oil Mills Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

There was evidence tending to show: That on February 4, 1904, defendant company drew a draft in words and figures as follows: "$286.00. Dunn, N. C., February 4, 1904. Dunn Oil Mills Company. Three days sight pay to the order of Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, Dunn, N. C., two hundred and eighty-six and 00-100 dollars. Invoice No. 1072. January 13, 1904. Value received and charge the same to account of Dunn Oil Mills Company. McD. Holliday, Treasurer. To C. R. Adams & Co., Four Oaks, N. C. No. 576." Said draft contained the following added words and indorsement across the end of face: "No protest. Tear this off before presenting." Also on the face stamped thereon the following words: "Cash item. Do not hold. If not paid on presentation return at once." On the back thereof: "Pay to the order of any bank or banker. Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, Dunn, N. C. V. L. Stephens, Cashier." The added entries on the face of the paper were made by plaintiff bank after receipt of same from the Dunn Bank. That this paper was drawn pursuant to a custom and understanding between defendant company and the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn that amount was to be entered subject to check, and charged back in case same was not paid or collected. That this draft, indorsed as stated, was forwarded to plaintiff bank on February 4th, and entered as cash item to credit of Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, subject to check.

There was evidence, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that, under this indorsement, the plaintiff bank became the owner outright of the draft, and the holder of same in due course. There was also evidence, on the part of defendant, tending to show that the draft was forwarded to plaintiff bank for collection, and under an arrangement that same was to be charged back against the Merchants' Bank in case same was paid or collected. The evidence further tends to show: That the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, the original payee of the draft, failed on or about February 9, 1904, owing the defendant company a large balance, over $6,000, and that at the time this indorsement to plaintiff bank was made, and during the entire period covered by this transaction, the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank was largely indebted to plaintiff bank, to the amount of some thousand dollars, and was so indebted at the time of the failure; that C. R. Adams & Co., the drawee, was indebted to the defendant to the amount of the draft, and payment of same was stopped by defendant after failure of Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, and amount was recharged to Adams on May 29, 1904.

On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict: "(1) Is plaintiff the owner of the draft sued upon? Answer: Yes. (2) What amount, if any, is the defendant indebted to plaintiff on account of draft sued on? Answer: $286." There was judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

J. C. Clifford, J. D. Bellamy & Son, Woodus Kellum, and Godwin & Townsend, for appellant. Rountree & Carr and E. K. Bryan, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Where a draft or bill is transferred to a bank by restrictive indorsement as "for deposit" or "for collection," the instrument is taken and held by the bank as agent for the indorser and for the purpose indicated and subject to the right of the indorser to arrest payment or divert the proceeds in the hands of any intermediate or subagent who has taken the paper for like purpose and affected by the restriction. Boykin v. Bank, 118 N. C. 586, 24 S. E. 357; Bank v. Hubble, 117 N. Y. 384, 22 N. E. 1081, 7 L. R. A. 852, 15 Am. St. Rep. 515; Balback v. Frelinghuysen (C. C.) 15 Fed. 875; Tyson & Rawles v. Bank, 77 Md. 412, 28 Atl. 520, 23 L. R. A. 161. And the drawer of a draft, who ordinarily stands towards subsequent parties as a general indorser, may by appropriate words appearing upon the paper, or by agreement dehors the instrument, and as to persons affected with notice, likewise restrict his obligation, and retain the right to arrest payment. Eaton & Gilbert on Commercial Paper, p. 405, and note 7. And this right of the indorser, or drawer, is not affected by the fact that the amount of such drafts are usually entered subject to check, where it is shown to be the custom or agreement to charge back such amount against the depositor in case the paper is not paid on presentation, or deduct the same from the next deposit. This doctrine is illustrated and well sustained in the opinion of this court in Packing Co. v. Davis, 118 N. C. 548, 24 S. E. 365, in which it was held as follows: "(1) A negotiable instrument deposited in a bank, indorsed 'for collection,' remains the property of the depositor, and the same rule holds when the written indorsement appears unrestricted; but, as a matter of fact (evidenced by express collateral agreement or a tacit understanding to be reasonably inferred from the course of dealing between the bank and its depositor), the instrument is taken by the bank, not as a purchase, but for collection simply. (2) The fact that a bank has given a depositor credit for the amount of a negotiable instrument, regularly indorsed, is not conclusive evidence that the bank had purchased the paper and was not a mere bailee thereof. (3) When a bank habitually credits a depositor's account with negotiable instruments indorsed to it by depositor, giving permission to the depositor to draw against such credits, but charges up to the depositor all such papers as are not paid on presentation, or deducts such items from the next deposit, such a course of dealing stamps the transaction, with reference to the title to instruments so indorsed, as being unmistakably a bailment for collection simply, and no greater title is vested in the bank."

Where the restrictive nature of the indorsement appears by proper entry upon the paper, this right of the drawer or indorser, so clearly stated in this opinion, can be made effective in the hands of any holder, and through any number of subsequent indorsements for, as said by Knowlton, J., in Freemans Bank v. Natural Tube Works, 151 Mass. 417, 24 N. E. 779, 8 L. R. A. 42, 21 Am. St. Rep. 461; "An unbroken succession of such indorsements would indicate that each indorser was acting by direction of the next preceding indorser, who was himself an agent of the owner for whom the collection was to be made." And where it arises by reason of facts dehors the instrument, it can be made available as between the original parties and subsequent indorsees who take for collection only, or who take with notice of the original restrictive agreement, unless and until the instrument is acquired by a holder in due course. Where, however, the rights of a restrictive indorsee or drawee of a draft must rest in facts dehors the instrument, and the draft has been drawn in the usual form for circulation as a negotiable instrument, and has been acquired by a "holder in due course," such drawee or indorsee may be held responsible to such holder, for though his agent for collection or deposit, as the case may be, has exceeded his power, he has acted within the apparent scope of his authority, and this on the recognized principle "that, when one of two persons must suffer by the fraud or misconduct of another, he first who reposes the confidence or by his negligent conduct makes it possible for the loss to occur must bear the loss." Rollins v. Ebbs, 138 N. C. 140, 50 S. E. 577; Railroad v. Kitchin, 91 N. C. 39; Vass v. Riddick, 89 N. C. 6. And see Ditch v. Bank of Baltimore, 79 Md. 192, 29 Atl. 72, 138, 23 L. R. A. 164, 47 Am. St. Rep. 375.

In the case before us, and under the principles stated, the right of defendant to arrest the payment of this draft as against the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank of Dunn is clear. There is also abundant testimony on the part of defendant tending to establish such right against the plaintiff bank, the Murchison National Bank of Wilmington. There was evidence, however, on the part of plaintiff, tending to show that plaintiff bank acquired and holds this draft as purchaser for value and without notice; the existing indebtedness constituting value by express provision of statute. Revisal 1905, § 2173; Manufacturing Co. v. Summers, 143 N. C. 103, 55 S. E. 522. See evidence of J. V. Grainger, Record, p. 18. The case then was properly made to depend on the question thus presented—whether plaintiff was the holder of the draft in due course—and this question the jury have resolved in plaintiff's favor. Under a full and comprehensive charge, every position available to defendant on the testimony, and under these authorities, was submitted for consideration, and we find no reversible error in the record.

No error.

ASHEVILLE SUPPLY & FOUNDRY CO. v.
MACHIN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 25, 1900.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 263*)—EXCEPTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS — SUFFICIENCY OF EXCEPTIONS.

While it is the better practice to except to an instruction, the propriety of the charge is sufficiently presented by exceptions to the admission of evidence touching the matter to which the instruction relates and by motion for a judgment upon the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1516, 1517; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 75*) — ESTOPPEL IN PAIS — OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

The true owner of personal property may be estopped by his acts and declarations from asserting his title as against a purchaser from one having no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 192-195; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

3. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 86*)—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY — IMPLIED AUTHORITY — AD-MISSIONS.

Plaintiff's attorney, in an action to recover possession of property, was not authorized to disclaim plaintiff's title to the property at a bankruptcy sale of the property as belonging to one to whom defendant turned it over after plaintiff's judgment for possession was rendered, and hence his declarations were not admissible to affect plaintiff's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 399*) — OFFICERS — AUTHORITY—GENERAL MANAGER.

The authority of the general manager of a corporation depends largely upon the particular facts of each case, considered in view of the general principle that his implied authority is limited to those things which are incidental to the usual corporate business, or to that branch of it intrusted to his management.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1602, 1603; Dec. Dig. § 399.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 422*) — AUTHORITY OF CORPORATE OFFICERS—GENERAL MANAGER.

The general manager of a corporation was not authorized, by virtue of his position, in the absence of any showing of special authority, to disclaim the corporation's right and title to property at a bankruptcy sale of the property as belonging to one to whom defendant turned it over after judgment for possession was rendered for the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1690; Dec. Dig. § 422.*]

6. BANKRUPTCY (§ 268*) — SALES — DUTY OF PURCHASER — OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY—KNOWLEDGE.

The purchaser at a bankrupt sale must take notice that nothing is sold except the bankrupt's interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 377; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

7. EXECUTION (§ 272*)—NOTICE OF OWNERSHIP—KNOWLEDGE BY PURCHASER.

The purchaser at an execution sale must take notice that nothing is sold except the interest of defendant in execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. § 272.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 181*)—ON MOTION — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to recover property, there was no evidence that plaintiff had estopped itself from claiming title if improper evidence offered for that purpose was excluded, a motion for a judgment for plaintiff should have been allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 343; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

9. COSTS (§ 264*) — ON APPEAL — COST OF PLEADING.

Where the settlement of a case was necessarily delayed for two years after trial, and the trial judge stated in settling the case that, while he believed the record contained unnecessary evidence, it was impossible to eliminate such evidence in the time allowed to send up the record, and it was impossible for the Supreme Court to separate the unnecessary evidence, a motion to tax the cost of sending up and printing the testimony against appellant on reversal will be denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 1004, 1007; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

10. COSTS (§ 256*) — ON APPEAL — UNNECESSARY MATTER IN RECORD.

Where evidence irrelevant to the exceptions is included in the record on appeal, costs may be awarded against appellant on reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 968-971; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company against John Machin and others. From a judgment in part for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The record discloses the following facts, in regard to which there is no controversy: One D. S. Russell was, on and prior to September 21, 1900, the owner of one Junior Westinghouse Engine No. 629, two band wheels, and one 60 H. P. boiler, with the fixtures attached thereto. On or about said date he entered into a contract with the defendants Machin and others, trading under the firm name and style of the "Ottalay Novelty Company," to sell said company said engine, boiler, and machinery at the price of $450 cash, which amount was to be paid to the plaintiff the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company for the benefit and an account of said Russell. Pursuant to the terms of the contract, the engine and boiler were turned over to the purchasing company to enable it to make certain tests of the boiler. The defendant company failed to comply with its contract or to return the property. The Asheville Supply & Foundry Company and Russell at the November term, 1900, brought this action for the purpose of recovering possession of the property. At the institution of the action, plaintiffs obtained an order for the immediate delivery of the property, and defendant company executed an undertaking with O. D. Revell as surety for its forthcoming, if the final judgment so directed. At the September term, 1901, the defendants having failed to file an answer, judgment was rendered by default against defendants and for plaintiffs adjudging them to be the owners of the property and entitled to the immediate possession thereof. The cause was retained for the purpose of assessing damages for the detention and deterioration. It was further adjudged that, if possession could not, for any reason, be had, the plaintiffs recover of the surety on the undertaking the sum of $900 to be discharged by the payment of such amount as should be assessed by the jury as the value of the property and damages. The plaintiffs did not immediately take out execution for the delivery of the property. The defendants Machin and Atkins delivered it to the Asheville Woodworking Company, a corporation in which they and said O. D. Revell were stockholders. This corporation was adjudged bankrupt, and the property went into the possession of Mr. Whitson, trustee.

On September 1, 1902, the said trustee sold all of the property of the Asheville Woodworking Company, including the engine and boiler in controversy, at public auction, when it was purchased by W. H. Westall, who took immediate possession. On January 20, 1903, an execution was issued, at the suggestion of Revell, upon the judgment of the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company to the sheriff of Buncombe county, directing him to take possession of the property and deliver it to the plaintiffs. The sheriff, J. H. Reed, took the property into his possession, whereupon W. H. Westall brought an action against the said sheriff, claiming that he was the owner, and demanding possession, and took possession thereof. Defendant Reed filed an answer denying that the plaintiff Westall was the owner of the property. On September 28, 1904, the defendants in the original action, together with O. D. Revell, the surety on the undertaking, filed a supplemental answer, in which they alleged the facts herein set forth, and further alleged: "That the defendants are informed and believe that at said sale of the property of the Asheville Woodworking Company by said trustee in bankruptcy the plaintiffs in said action in person and by attorney appeared at said sale, and a question being raised as to whether or not the said sale by the said trustee in bankruptcy would pass a good title to the property described in the complaint herein, the said plaintiffs and their said attorney publicly, and in the hearing of those persons then and there assembled, announced and declared, in substance, that the plaintiffs in this case had no claim to the property described in the complaint herein, and did not own the same, and did not expect to contest the title thereto, and the purchaser at said bankrupt sale would acquire a good title to said property freed and discharged from all other claims of the plaintiffs in this action. And the defendants further say that they are advised and believe that the said Westall, relying upon the said statements of the plaintiffs and their attorney, bid off the said property of said bankrupt sale in good faith, believing that he would get a good title thereto, and that the said W. H. Westall now claims the title to said property by virtue of said conduct of the plaintiffs at said sale. And these defendants further say that they are advised, informed, and believe that the said plaintiffs, by the reason of their conduct hereinbefore set forth, are estopped to recover the possession of said property or the value thereof from these defendants, since they have, by their conduct, put it beyond the power of the defendants, or O. D. Revell, their surety, to deliver the possession of said property to said plaintiffs. And the defendants further say that they are advised, informed, and believe that said W. H. Westall is a necessary party to this action. The defendants further aver that by reason of the acts, conduct, and disclaim of title by the plaintiffs as recited in paragraph 8 above, and their refusal to take possession of said property, O. D. Revell, the surety on the defendants' replevin bond, is forever released and discharged from all liability on said bond."

An order was made making Westall a party to the original action. The two cases were consolidated and brought to trial. The jury found, upon issues submitted to them: "(1) That at the time of the sale of the property in controversy by Whitson, trustee in bankruptcy, it belonged to the plaintiffs Asheville Supply & Foundry Company and D. S. Russell. (2) That Whitson, trustee, at the time of the sale, had no title to the property. (3) That D. S. Russell had been paid for his interest in the property by the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company." The following additional issues in regard to which there was controversy were submitted to the jury: "(5) Were the acts and conduct of the plaintiffs in said original claim and delivery action, or either of them, on the day of the sale by Whitson, trustee, such as to estop him or it from claiming any further title or interest in the boiler and engine sold by Whitson, trustee, at said sale? (6) Did plaintiffs in said original claim and delivery action, or either of them, by his or its conduct or acts on the day of the sale by Whitson, trustee in bankruptcy, by his or its conduct or acts, release the surety, O. D. Revell, from further liability on the replevin bond, executed by said Revell on the 23d day of September, 1900? (7) Did W. H. Westall acquire good title to the said property by his purchase at the sale by Whitson, trustee in bankruptcy, by reason of the waiver or estoppel of said plaintiffs in said original claim and delivery action, or either of them, to thereafter claim said property, to wit, boiler and engine?" At the close of all of the evidence, "Mr. Bourne moves the court for judgment in behalf of the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company and D. S. Russell against Machin and Atkins, and the surety on their bond in claim and delivery, for the sum of $450, with interest thereon from the date of the seizure of the property." Motion overruled, and exception allowed. This motion was based upon all of the evidence introduced in the case and the record of the consolidated cases. The court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the fifth issue, "Yes." The court answered the sixth and the seventh issues, "Yes," upon the coming in of the verdict—to all of which no exception was taken. The court rendered judgment upon the verdict against the plaintiffs, except as to a small amount for damage not material to this appeal. Plaintiff the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company excepted and appealed.

Davidson, Bourne & Parker, for appellant. J. D. Murphey, for appellee Revell. Moore & Rollins, for appellee Westall.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). The trial of this case took quite a wide range, and the record comes to this court in a somewhat confused condition. Much of the testimony and a number of the exceptions are rendered immaterial by the elimination of Russell, one of the original plaintiffs, by the verdict of the jury in finding that his interest in the property passed to his coplaintiff, the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company. The jury having found that the title to the property was, prior to the sale by Whitson, trustee, in the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company, the sole question is whether this corporation has lost or been deprived of its title by what occurred at the time of the sale by Whitson, trustee. There is no suggestion that it has sold the property or, by any contract, parted with its title. It is, however, alleged in the supplemental answer and testimony introduced to sustain the contention, that it has lost its title by way of estoppel in pais. His honor, being of the opinion that, if the evidence bearing upon this issue was believed by the jury, they should answer it in the affirmative, so instructed them. The contention of the plaintiff corporation to the contrary, while not presented by an exception to the charge, is presented by exceptions to the admission of the evidence and by motion for judgment upon the whole of the evidence. It would have been better practice to have excepted to the instruction on the fifth issue, but we think its other exceptions fairly present its contentions. The answers to the sixth and seventh issues are, as his honor held, dependent upon the correctness of the instruction upon the fifth. Hence the question upon which the decision of the appeal must rest is whether his honor correctly admitted and interpreted the evidence relevant to the alleged estoppel. It is unquestionably true, and quite elementary, that title to property may pass or at least the true owner may be precluded from asserting his title, as against a purchaser from one having no title, by conduct which comes within the definition of an estoppel in pais. In Mason v. Williams, 53 N. C. 478, it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of an engine, and that, at a sale made by Pescud, trustee, he was present, and, upon the statement being made in his hearing that Pescud's title was good, made no objection and bid on the property. It was purchased by defendant. Mason thereafter sued him for the property. The court, upon an agreed state of facts, held that plaintiff was estopped. Battle, J., thus states the contention of the defendant: "The argument is that it must be taken either that the plaintiff had waived his title and thereby authorized Pescud to sell the engine, or that he cannot now be allowed to assert it, because it would be a fraud upon the defendant to permit him to do so." The judgment was reversed because the court did not submit the questions, upon which the estoppel depended, to the jury. The principle upon which the rights of the parties depended is thus stated by the learned justice: "When one purchases a chattel from one who is not the owner of it, and it is admitted by the parties, or found by the jury, as a fact, that the purchaser was induced to make the purchase by the declarations and acts of the true owner, the latter will be estopped from impeaching the transaction." This principle lies at the base of the doctrine of estoppel which, as said by Pearson, J., in Armfield v. Moore, 44 N. C. 159, "lies at the foundation of all fair dealing between man and man." The case of Mason v. Williams came before this court, upon a second appeal, and is reported in 66 N. C. 564. The court below (Barnes, Judge) charged the jury: "That if the evidence satisfied them that the defendant was induced to make the purchase by the declarations or acts of the plaintiff, the latter would be estopped from impeaching the transaction." The majority of the court sustained the charge and affirmed the judgment for the defendant. Pearson, C. J., and Dick, J., dissented, not from the language of the instruction, but from its application to the facts, and Justice Boyden "concurred in the principles set out in the dissent, but felt bound by the verdict of the jury."

Conceding, for the purpose of this discussion, that the language used by Mr. Bourne, the attorney for plaintiff, and of Mr. Woody, comes within the principle of Mason v. Williams and other cases, and that, if they or either of them had been the owners of the property, the jury would have been justified in finding that they were estopped, the question arises whether they bore such relation to the corporation as entitled them or either of them to authorize Whitson, trustee, to sell its property or to make it a fraud upon Westall to assert its title against him. Mr. Bourne was counsel at the time of the sale for plaintiff corporation and for Whitson, trustee. He says: "At the trustee's sale I attended as counsel for the trustee. My firm was general counsel for the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company." An inspection of the testimony does not disclose that Mr. Bourne had any other or further power to bind his clients in respect to the property than pertained to his employment as an attorney at law. We do not find that he was attorney in fact. Giving therefore the full legal import to his language at the time of the sale contended for by defendant, and conceding that it was sufficient, as a matter of law, to estop him, we do not think it could have such effect upon the rights of his client. He certainly had no authority to sell the property or to authorize Whitson, trustee, to do so. "The powers of an attorney are to be determined, in a large measure, from the purpose of his employment. He has an implied authority to do anything necessarily incidental to the discharge of the purpose for which he was retained, but beyond this his power ceases." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. 345. In Moye v. Cogdell, 69 N. C. 93, it was said: "An attorney cannot compromise his client's case without special authority to do so, nor can he receive in payment of a debt due his client anything except the legal currency of the country." It was held in that case that an attorney, employed to collect a debt by judgment, could not release the judgment by taking a draft at 60 days. We are of the opinion that the evidence of Mr. Bourne's declarations, at the time of the sale, were not admissible for the purpose of affecting plaintiff's title, nor, after being admitted, could they be given such effect. In regard to Mr. Woody's authority to bind the corporation, there is more doubt. Mr. Westall says: "He is the manager of the Asheville Supply & Foundry Company, and I think president, but I am not sure. * * * I know he claimed to be general manager, managing the business." Mr. Woody was dead at the time of the trial. It seems that Mr. Speed was president of the plaintiff corporation. In the affidavit to the complaint, Mr. Woody describes himself as the "general manager." It does not appear what his duties or powers are, or to what extent he was empowered to represent and act for the corporation in respect to the sale of this property, or compromise its rights in the litigation. The extent of the power of the general manager of a corporation to dispose of its property, out of the usual course of its business, depends largely upon the character of the business, the charter, by-law, etc. We could not say, as a matter of law, in the absence of any evidence upon these points, that he had such power. Judge Thompson says that "the general manager has power to bind the corporation by acts done in the ordinary course of its business." 10 Cyc. 924. In Trent v. Sherlock, 24 Mont. 255, 61 Pac. 650, it is held that a bill of sale of a portion of the mining company's property by the superintendent, which he has no authority to make, was not prima facie binding on the corporation and did not tend to show that he had an implied power to make it. "His implied power and authority are limited to do only those things which are incident to the usual business of the corporation, or to that branch of it intrusted to his management. Such general manager's authority is as broad as, and no broader than, the scope of his employment and agency and the nature of the corporate business." 2 Purdy's Beach, Private Corp. 1200. It is impossible to do more than lay down and apply this general principle. Each case involves so many elements peculiar to itself that it must be decided in the light of the facts disclosed, guided by this general principle. Thus considered, we do not find any evidence of authority in Woody to attend the sale by Whitson, trustee, and, by his acts and declarations, estop the plaintiff corporation from asserting title to its property or release the surety from his liability on the judgment.

The plaintiff had successfully prosecuted its claim to the property, established its title in an action in which defendants made no defense. It filed no answer to the complaint. For reasons apparent on the face of the record, the cause was retained for final judgment against the bondsman. The amount of his liability could not be fixed otherwise than by a verdict of the jury. By the wrongful conduct of defendants Machin and Atkins, the property was put in the possession of a corporation of which they and Revell, the surety, were the principal stockholders, and in this way passed into the possession of Whitson, trustee in bankruptcy. He undertook to sell it, together with the other property of the bankrupt corporation. It seems that, some question having arisen between the attorneys present at the sale, Mr. Bourne stated that his clients did not claim the property but looked to the bond for its value. This was not a statement of any fact which bound the client, but rather an opinion of Mr. Bourne as its attorney. The fact that the property belonged to the plaintiff corporation was known and constituted the basis of the conversation. No fact was concealed or misrepresented. Every person buying at a bankrupt sale, as at one made by the sheriff, must take notice that nothing is proposed to be sold except the interest of the bankrupt or the defendant in the execution. We do not think that the plaintiff corporation has, by any officer empowered to act for it, either authorized Whitson, trustee, to sell its property, or done anything which makes it fraudulent to assert its title against Westall. This is the test of defendant's claim as laid down in Mason v. Williams, supra.

In the view of the record most favorable to defendants, the jury should have been permitted to pass not only upon the testimony, but make such reasonable inferences as should be drawn therefrom. In Mason v. Williams, supra, although there was an agreed state of facts, this court held that the ultimate decision of the existence of the constituent elements of an estoppel should have been submitted to the jury. This view of the case would work a new trial. It is evident, however, that with the testimony in regard to Mr. Bourne's and Mr. Woody's declarations excluded, as we think they should be, there would be nothing to go to the jury upon the fifth issue. The motion for judgment, made by plaintiff should have been allowed. The cause will be remanded to the superior court of Buncombe, with direction to set aside the verdict on the fifth, sixth and seventh issues and render judgment upon the verdict on the other issues, fixing the value and damages in such way as the parties may agree or may be in accordance with the course and practice of the court.

Defendants moved in this court that appellant be not allowed to tax defendants with the cost of sending up and printing the testimony. It appears from the record that the case on appeal was not sent to his honor until April 28, 1909; the cause having been tried at the March term, 1907. His honor made the following statement at the end of the case settled by him: "This is the case on appeal settled by me at Greenville, N. C., on April 28, 1909. I am now inclined to the opinion that more of the evidence than is necessary is in the case, but the case was tried more than two years ago. The appellants have sent down the cases on appeal and the record to me to-day. While I am engaged in Pitt court, it is not possible for me now, in the time allowed on the appeal, to go up for the approaching term of the Supreme Court to eliminate what may be the unnecessary parts of the evidence which appears to be the only objection to this statement. It is better to send it up as it is, or to avail myself of the right to refuse to settle the case, because of laches in the appellant, and I elect to pursue the former course." It is manifest that his honor could not, after two years' delay, undertake to do more. It was unfortunate that the settlement of the case was delayed so long—there were valid reasons for the delay. It would be impossible for us to separate such part of the evidence as was unnecessary from that which was so. It may not be improper to suggest that, while the stenographer properly took notes of all that occurred upon the trial, such parts as have no relevancy to the exceptions should be eliminated from the record on appeal.

It will be certified to the superior court of Buncombe county that there is error.

A married woman is incapable of making a contract of any sort, and her attempted contracts, unless authorized by the statute, are void.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 164*)—CONTRACTS OF MARRIED WOMEN—NECESSITY FOR EXPRESSION OF INTENT IN WRITTEN INSTRUMENT.

A married woman owned and conducted a store. Through her husband she purchased goods, and in payment thereof executed notes signed by her alone, but with the written consent of the husband, as shown by letters. The notes did not expressly or impliedly charge her personal estate. Held, that the notes were not enforceable against her, though she owned a separate personal estate at the time of the execution of the notes and at the time of the trial.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Murphy, Judge.

Action by the Mercantile National Bank against Mrs. L. J. Benbow and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Civil action tried at October term, 1908, of Wilkes superior court; his honor, Judge Murphy, presiding. These issues were submitted.

(1) Is the feme defendant indebted to the plaintiff? And, if so, in what sum? A. "Yes; indebted $163.20, with interest from maturity."

(2) Were the acceptances sued on signed by the feme defendant by the written consent of her husband? A. "Yes."

(3) Did the feme defendant own a separate personal estate at the time the acceptances were signed and suit brought? And, if so, how much? A. "Yes; from $600 to $800."

(4) Did the feme defendant own a separate personal estate at the time of the trial? And, if so, how much? A. "Yes; $13,000."

His honor rendered judgment against the feme defendant, Mrs. Benbow, upon the issues as found, directing that it be collected out of her personal estate only. The said defendant duly excepted and appealed.

C. G. Gilreath and H. C. Caviness, for appellants. L. M. Lyon and Manly & Hendren, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The feme defendant was the owner of, and conducting, a store in the town of Wilkesboro. Through her husband she purchased certain jewelry from Bixler & Co., and, in payment therefor, executed six promissory notes, signed by herself alone, but with the written consent of her husband, which was found by the jury to have been given in certain letters appearing in the record. These notes or acceptances were assigned to the plaintiff for value, and before maturity. The complaint declares upon the notes, and asks for a judgment against the feme defendant only. The male defendant is a nominal party; no relief being asked against him. The form of all the notes is the same, to wit: "Cleveland, Ohio, June 19, 1903. Two months after date pay to the order of M. F. Bixler & Company, Limited, the sum of thirty-two dollars, without interest, at their office in Cleveland, Ohio. Mrs. L. J. Benbow." Appropriate prayers for instruction and exceptions present for our consideration the liability of the feme defendant upon the contract as herein set out.

There is no specific charge upon her personal estate contained in the evidence of debt or any other paper writing executed in connection therewith, and there is nothing in the writing from which an intent to charge her separate estate may be implied. That being so, we think the ruling of the court below contravenes the principles of law governing the executory contracts of married women as enunciated in numerous decisions of the court since 1875, when the subject was first considered in Harris v. Jenkins, 72 N. C. 183, and Pippen v. Wesson, 74 N. C. 437. From the adjudged cases covering a period of 30 years this rule of law may be deduced. In order that a married woman may make an executory contract enforceable against her personal estate, it must be done with the written assent of her husband, and the contract must expressly or by clear intendment and implication create a specific charge against her personal estate. In order that she may bind her real property, the feme covert must execute either a formal conveyance or some paper writing which in equity may be charged upon her separate estate, accompanied by the written assent of her husband and her privy examination. An example of the latter is to be found in Ball v. Pequin, 140 N. C. 85, 52 S. E. 410, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 307. In the Pippen Case this court held that neither the Constitution nor statute law of the state conferred upon a married woman any power to enter into an executory contract, except in the specific instances mentioned in the statute, now section 2094, Revision 1905. Since that case, in a long, unbroken line of decisions, this court has held that a married woman is incapable of making a contract of any sort, and that her attempted contracts, unless such as are authorized by the statute, are void. These decisions have been repeated and reaffirmed so often by this court that in Ball v. Pequin, supra, they are regarded by Mr. Justice Connor as "controlling decisions," who refers to them in these words: "In the absence of controlling decisions to the contrary, we should unanimously hold that she could make all manner of contracts with the written assent of her husband, and that for a breach of them her property was liable as if she were a feme sole."

This subject has been so much discussed in decisions of this court that to review them again is unnecessary and unprofitable. Both sides of the controversy are presented fully in the opinion of the court by Mr. Justice Walker and in the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice in the case of Harvey v. Johnson, 133 N. C. 353, 45 S. E. 644. There is no pretense of any express or implied charge in the contract sued on upon the personal estate of the feme defendant, which can be enforced by a court of equity. Because the jury have found that the feme defendant owns a separate personal estate affords no ground for charging it with the performance of such contract. Our laws provide in what manner married women may become free traders, so that their contracts may be enforced as readily as if they were unmarried. Their status is easily ascertained by reference to the register of deeds by those who deal with them in business. If they neglect to obtain such information, it is the loser's fault.

His honor erred in declining to give the defendants' prayer for instruction.

As there was no motion to nonsuit, there must be a new trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The most diligent research shows no statute that forbids a married woman to make a contract "with the assent" of her husband. The statute which has been relied on is Code, § 1826, now Revisal 1905, § 2094, which forbids her to make any contract "without the assent" of her husband, except in three cases named (i. e., for necessities, for support of the family, and to pay antenuptial debts), for which she can contract without his assent. The prohibition to contract without the husband's assent in the other cases than the three cases named is certainly not a prohibition of the power to contract with his assent, but a recognition that she can contract with the husband's assent. The right to act as free trader (Revisal 1905, § 2112) is a dispensation with the prohibition to contract without the husband's assent in all cases. As this is conferred by the husband's assent once for all, certainly he can give his assent to each contract as it arises. The Constitution allows a woman to convey her land with the written assent of her husband, and the court has often held that, as the assent is only required as to land, she can draw checks and dispose of personal property without his assent. It was so held in Vann v. Edwards, 135 N. C. 661, 47 S. E. 784, 67 L. R. A. 461. A fortiori she can contract with his assent. A married woman can draw checks and drafts without her husband's assent, and, of course, is liable on them if not paid. Revisal 1905, § 2095. She is liable upon her real estate for buildings or repairs put thereon by her verbal assent, or acquiescence without the assent of her husband. Revisal 1905, § 2016; Finger v. Hunter, 130 N. C. 529, 41 S. E. 890. Of course, she must be liable when the contract is made with his assent.

Ever since the statute of frauds (St. 29 Chas. II), it has been held that land can be conveyed only in writing, but it has never been held that in consequence one cannot make a contract verbally which could be enforced by a sale of land, but, if such were the law, as a married woman can convey her land with the assent of her husband, certainly she can contract with his assent. The courts have no right to enact a statute forbidding married women to contract with the assent of their husbands. The Legislature has not done so. The Constitution has emancipated married women by giving them full control of their property and earnings, with the right to dispose of it by will or otherwise, save that as to conveyances of real estate there must be the written assent of the husband—in analogy to the joinder of the wife in the conveyance of the husband's realty. That there is no prohibition of the wife to contract freely with the husband's assent is held in Brinkley v. Ballance, 126 N. C. 396, 35 S. E. 631, and Bates v. Sultan, 117 N. C. 100, 23 S. E. 261. There is no statute requiring "charging," and the court has no power to enact it. It is against the spirit of the Constitution and in violation of the enfranchised status of married women created by it. Every student of the history of the law knows that the doctrine of "charging" was created in England in an effort to confer upon married women of wealth the power to contract on the faith of their property, at a time when the law there did not, as now, give them unrestricted control of their property and freedom to contract even without the assent of their husbands. See Century of Law Reform; Dacey, Law and Opinion in England. Certainly the doctrine is obsolete and an anachronism here, when the wife has contracted with the assent of her husband, and she can convey her realty with his assent and all her other property without it. If there are any decisions of this or preceding courts which forbid a married woman to contract with the assent of her husband, they should be modified or overruled. A court should overrule its own errors (as this court has shown it is strong enough to do), as well as the errors of a court below. Indeed, errors of the higher court more imperiously demand correction, for they are more injurious. Ten times zero is only zero, and an error ten times repeated acquires thereby no approximation to being correct. It is an error still, only more harmful by repetition. As we have as precedent Brinkley v. Ballance, supra, we can follow that if a precedent is essential.

The feme defendant bought the plaintiff's goods at the price of $163.20, with the written assent of her husband, and indeed through his agency. She has kept the goods, and now refuses to pay for them, though the jury find that she is worth $13,000 in personal property, besides realty. It is but common honesty that she be adjudged to pay the $163.20. There is no sign or shred of a statute that provides that she is not liable for such contract when made with the assent of her husband. The decisions that a wife cannot contract with the assent of her husband (though she can convey realty with his assent, and can make many contracts and dispose of personalty without his assent) have not become a rule of property and to correct the error cannot affect any title. As the husband's assent is not required for her protection in disposing of her personalty, and such assent is sufficient protection in conveying her realty, there can be no reason why the husband's assent was not enough protection in purchasing these goods when there is no statute that requires more. In Bank v. Howell, 118 N. C. 273, 23 S. E. 1005, this court in effect recommended a statute permitting a wife to contract, as a feme sole, without the assent of her husband in all cases, as is the law in England, New York, and our adjoining states; but that would require amending Revisal 1905, § 2094, which forbids her to contract without her husband's consent except in certain cases. Here she contracted with the assent of her husband, and there is no statute making her incompetent to buy these articles. Her estate has benefited to the extent of the jewelry bought.

SHEPPARD v. ROCKINGHAM POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 25, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 121*)—VOTING TRUST AGREEMENTS—VALIDITY.

An agreement, which takes from the stockholders of a corporation all right to vote for three years after the happening of an event, and provides that the decision of the voting trustees as to any fact or condition of the stock deposit agreement shall be conclusive on the parties, not made to protect bondholders, but to enable the stockholders to pool all stock and to control the corporation by a voting trust, is contrary to public policy and void, and cannot be justified as a proxy authorized and regulated by Revisal 1905, § 1184, for a proxy is good only for three years and is always revocable, though by its terms it is made irrevocable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 504; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 121*)—CORPORATIONS—OWNERSHIP OF STOCK—AGREEMENTS—VALIDITY.

Any agreement, which separates the beneficial ownership of corporate stock from the legal title, is contrary to public policy and void, and restrictions on the right to vote stock are not favored by the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 118*) — OWNERSHIP OF STOCK—AGREEMENTS—VALIDITY.

The fact that the voting trustees, under an agreement depriving the stockholders of a corporation of the right to vote, and giving such right to voting trustees, deny that they have any intention of voting the stock or causing the same to be voted, and that they believe that they have no power to vote the stock to bring about the reorganization of the corporation without the assent of all the stockholders, does not justify their refusal to transfer and assign stock to a purchaser of pooled stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 133*) — TRANSFER OF SHARES—REMEDIES FOR REFUSAL.

Mandamus or mandatory injunction lies to compel a corporation to transfer stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 284*)—COMPELLING ELECTION OF OFFICERS—REMEDIES.

Mandamus or mandatory injunction lies to compel an election of officers of a corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 201*)—VOTING TRUSTS—ILLEGALITY.

Where the court properly determined that a voting trust was illegal, it properly enjoined the trustees from using or exercising any control over the common stock of the corporation and from voting same in any meeting, and adjudged that all bona fide owners of the stock should be entitled to vote at all meetings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by R. M. Sheppard against the Rockingham Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. Davis & Davis, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is a suit to declare illegal and void a stock deposit or voting trust agreement and restrain the voting trustees from using or exercising any power or control over the common stock of the defendant, Rockingham Power Company, and from voting the same in any meeting, and to declare the holders of the stock deposit certificates issued by the trustees to be the bona fide owners of the common stock of the Rockingham Power Company, and for the election of officers, and for the transfer and assignment of 10 shares of common stock to the plaintiff in lieu of a stock deposit receipt issued by the voting trustees calling for 10 shares of stock. The stock agreement takes away from the stockholders all right to vote for a period of three years after the first installation of the power plant of the Rockingham Power Company, and provides that the decision of the voting committee as to any of the facts or conditions of the said stock deposit agreement shall be conclusive and bind all the parties in interest. The agreement is not made for the protection of bondholders but to enable the stockholders to pool the stock and to control the corporation by a voting trust. The plaintiff was not a party to said agreement, but is a purchaser of 10 shares of the stock thus pooled.

The agreement deprives the stockholders of the right to vote, and is therefore contrary to public policy and void. Harvey v. Improvement Co., 118 N. C. 693, 24 S. E. 489, 32 L. R. A. 265, 54 Am. St. Rep. 749; Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 209, 21 Atl. 847; Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 579, 24 Atl. 32; Clarke v. Railroad (C. C.) 50 Fed. 338, 15 L. R. A. 683; Cook, Stockholders (4th Ed.) § 622. Harvey v. Imp. Co., supra, is "on all fours," except that the agreement here is, if anything, more objectionable. In Harvey's Case we said: "Every stockholder must be free to cast his vote for what he deems for the best interest of the corporation; the other stockholders being entitled to the benefit of such free exercise of his judgment by each. And hence any combination or device by which any number of stockholders shall combine to place the voting of their shares in the irrevocable power of another is held contrary to public policy." In that case, as in this, the action was brought by the holders of a certificate issued by the voting committee. The voting trust agreement in Harvey's Case provided that, if a vacancy occurred among the trustees, it should be filled by the votes of the holders of the majority of the stock represented in the agreement, and that the holders of a majority of such stock should have the right, whenever they saw proper to do so, to instruct the trustees how to vote upon matters arising in the meetings, and also to remove the trustees and fill their places at any time. No such agreements or stipulations appear in this case. The power is absolute in the trustees to do as they see fit, and any instructions from the majority of the stockholders would be useless.

Chief Justice Baldwin of Connecticut, in a recent article (Yale Law Journal 1891), says: "It is obvious that a trust of this character virtually severs the ownership of the stock from the power to vote on it. The legal owner casts the vote, but at the dictation of a third party who is not the equitable owner; and not only is the third party not the equitable owner, but he may, in the progress of time, be directly opposed to his interests. He represents the interests of the original constituents of the trust, as they existed years before. Their interest in the stock meantime may have been sold to others, of different views, but these can take no share in the management of the corporation, during the life of the trust. The legal theory of the relation between the state and those who receive from it a corporate franchise is that it is one resting on a personal confidence. The state issues, so to speak, its commission to the corporators, as its trusty and well-beloved servants, fit to do this special work, which it commits to them. They can therefore no more alienate the right to vote on their stock at corporate meetings, than the citizen can alienate his right to vote at public elections. Delegation is a temporary alienation, and therefore proxy voting is not recognized at common law, at meetings of corporations. As was said in Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. Law, 222, 27 Am. Dec. 33: "The obligation and duty of corporators to attend in person and execute the trust or franchise reposed in or granted to them is implied in and forms a part of the fundamental constitution of every charter in which the contrary is not expressed."

Any agreement which separates the beneficial ownership of the stock from the legal title is contrary to public policy and void. Harvey v. Improvement Co., 118 N. C. 693, 24 S. E. 489, 32 L. R. A. 265, 54 Am. St. Rep. 749; White v. Tire Co., 52 N. J. Eq. 178, 28 Atl. 75; Shepaug Voting Cases, 60 Conn. 576, 24 Atl. 32; Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 208, 21 Atl. 847; Beach on Corporations, § 306; Clarke v. Railroad (C. C.) 50 Fed. 338, 15 L. R. A. 683; Kreissl v. Distilling Co., 61 N. J. Eq. 5, 47 Atl. 471. "A sale by a stockholder of the power to vote upon his shares is illegal for very much the same reason that a sale of his vote by a citizen at the polls, or by a director of a corporation at a meeting of the board, is illegal. Each is a violation of duty, in effect, if not in purpose a betrayal of the trust." Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501; Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309; Fremont v. Stone, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 169; Noel v. Drake, 28 Kan. 265, 42 Am. Rep. 162. This agreement cannot be justified as a proxy, for a proxy is good only for three years. Revisal 1905, § 1184. A proxy is always revocable, and, even when by its terms it is made irrevocable, the law allows the stockholder to revoke it. Frequently an attempt is made to permanently unite the voting power of several stockholders and thus control the corporation by giving irrevocable proxies to specified persons, but the law allows the stockholder to revoke this proxy at any time. Cook on Corporations (4th Ed.) § 611; Woodruff v. Railroad (C. C.) 30 Fed. 91; Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 208, 21 Atl. 847; Bridgers v. Staton, 150 N. C. —, 63 S. E. 892.

It is true that the voting trustees deny that they have any intention of voting the said stock, or causing the same to be voted, to bring about a reorganization of the company, and are advised by counsel and believe that they have absolutely no power whatever to vote said stock, or cause said stock to be voted, to bring about a reorganization of the company, without the assent of all the holders of all said deposit receipts. This is not a sufficient answer for their refusal to transfer and assign the stock and deliver it to the plaintiff upon his demand. Plaintiff demanded the stock of the voting trustees prior to the institution of this action. In Griffith v. Jewett, 15 Wkly. Law Bul. (Ohio) 419, the court said: "We are dealing with the rights of property, and it is no answer to one's demand for the possession and control of his own property to say that he withholds it and does not intend to use it for an illegal purpose. The law gives to every one, not under disability, the control of his own property, and imposes upon him the duty of making lawful use of it." Restrictions on the right to vote stock, like restrictions on the right to sell stock, are not favored by the courts, and the courts have held that any holder of trustee's certificates issued under similar contracts and agreements as this one might at any time demand back his part of the stock. 2 Cook, Corporations (4th Ed.) § 622; Fisher

v. Bush, 35 Hun (N. Y.) 641; Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501. A mandamus or mandatory injunction lies to compel a corporation to transfer stock and to compel election of officers. Cook-on Corporations, § 309; Trust Co. v. Moran, 56 Minn. 188, 57 N. W. 471, 29 L. R. A. 212; R. R. v. Pa. Co. (C. C.) 54 Fed. 741, 745, 750-752, 19 L. R. A. 387; High, Inj. § 2; R. R. v. Felton (C. C.) 69 Fed. 273.

The illegality of voting trusts having been held by this court in Harvey v. Imp. Co., 118 N. C. 693, 24 S. E. 489, 32 L. R. A. 265, 54 Am. St. Rep. 749, and Bridgers v. Staton, 150 N. C. —, 63 S. E. 892, his honor properly enjoined the voting trust in this case from using or exercising any control over the common stock of the Rockingham Power Company, and from voting the same in any meeting whatsoever, and in adjudging that all bona fide owners of such stock and holders of receipts issued therefor by said voting committee shall be entitled to vote the number of shares to which they are entitled in all meetings of the stockholders of said company and enjoined the voting trust from carrying out any plan of reorganization.

Affirmed.

GEORGIA COAST & P. R. CO. v. McFARLAND.McFARLAND v. GEORGIA COAST & P. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 39*)—ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—PLEA.

In a suit by an employé to recover damages for an alleged wrongful discharge, where the employer pleaded justification because of the refusal of the employé to obey a specified order, given first in writing and afterwards repeated in parol, whether or not the plea was sustained would depend upon the duty of the employé to obey the order which was given, and upon whether or not a refusal to do so authorized his discharge. Other possible reasons not expressed in the plea, which might have authorized a discharge, cannot be invoked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

2. REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS PROPERLY REFUSED.

Some of the requests to charge were not adjusted to the pleadings and evidence, and some were argumentative in form. In so far as any of them embodied principles proper to be given in charge, they were covered by the general charge of the court.

3. INSTRUCTIONS, CONSTRUED AS A WHOLE, NOT ERRONEOUS.

The portions of the charge to which exceptions were taken, when read in connection with the pleadings, the evidence, and the entire charge, are not subject to the criticisms made upon them.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and no reason appears on any ground of the motion for a new trial why a reversal should be granted.

5. DAMAGES FOR DELAY DENIED.

Under the special facts of the case, the motion to award 10 per cent. damages on the ground that the case is brought to this court for delay is denied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, McIntosh County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by F. H. McFarland against the Darien & Western Railroad Company, now the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Plaintiff assigns cross-error. Affirmed.

See, also, 127 Ga. 97, 56 S. E. 74.

Hitch & Denmark, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Clay, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. McFarland brought suit against the Darien & Western Railroad Company (now the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company) to recover damages, alleging that he had been wrongfully discharged from the position of auditor and superintendent during the term for which he was elected. The defendant denied the substantial allegations. On the trial the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the case was brought to this court. The judgment was reversed. 127 Ga. 97, 56 S. E. 74. The defendant then amended its answer by admitting the discharge and pleading justification therefor, by reason of an alleged refusal on the part of the plaintiff to obey an order which had first been given to him in writing by the vice president and general manager, and afterwards repeated orally. The jury found for the plaintiff $1,125, with interest, being the full amount for which he sued. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and it excepted.

On the question of whether the order given to the plaintiff by the vice president and general manager of the defendant was a legitimate direction as to the conduct of the business, or whether it was only a subterfuge, and given as a step in carrying out the purpose to oust the plaintiff from his office, the evidence was conflicting. The defendant having in its plea set up certain specified conduct of the plaintiff as justifying his discharge, it was restricted to the ground of justification thus set up. In some of the grounds of the motion for a new trial error was alleged in the refusal of certain requests to charge. Some of these sought to have the jury instructed as to the right of an employer to discharge an employé, which went beyond the ground set up in the plea, and were too broadly worded. Some of them stated the principles announced in an argumentative manner. In so far as any of the requests embodied proper charges, they were covered by the general charge, which instructed the jury as to the substantial issues made by the pleadings and evidence in the case. Complaint was also made of two excerpts from the charge of the court; but, when they are read in connection with the pleadings and the entire charge, they are not subject to the criticisms made upon them. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

As the judgment will be affirmed, it is unnecessary to pass upon the cross-bill of exceptions.

Counsel for the defendant in error moved this court to award 10 per cent. damages on the ground that the case was brought up for delay. While we have ruled that the judgment should be affirmed, we cannot say that it is so clearly a case brought here for delay as to authorize us to award damages, and we decline to do so.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

during their joint lives is not subject to the lien of a docketed judgment against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Jones County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Controversy between J. T. Hood and Sherman Mercer and others, submitted. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. D. Warren, for appellant. Simmons, Ward & Allen, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a judgment duly docketed on October 25, 1907, in the superior court of Jones county against the defendant Sherman Mercer. On February 14, 1908, certain tracts of land in said county were conveyed by deed executed to said Sherman Mercer and his wife as grantees in the premises as well as the habendum. The said Sherman Mercer and wife have subsequently conveyed certain of the lands by deed to the codefendants Jones and Bryant.

The question presented on this appeal is as to whether the judgment constitutes a lien upon the lands to the discharge of which they can be subjected by execution. We agree with his honor that the judgment is no lien on the lands, and that they therefore cannot be sold under execution. The estate of Sherman Mercer and wife is an anomalous one, but it still exists in this state. It would be well for the General Assembly to abolish it as to all future conveyance and let the grantees hold as tenants in common. While to some extent former decisions of this court in respect to this estate have been modified, we have held in recent years that under a conveyance of land in fee to husband and wife they take by entirety, with right of survivorship, and that the interest of neither during their joint lives becomes subject to the lien of a docketed judgment. During the wife's life the husband has no such interest as is subject to levy and sale to satisfy a judgment against him. Bruce v. Nicholson, 109 N. C. 202, 13 S. E. 790, 26 Am. St. Rep. 562; West v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477. It is true that, where the husband had conveyed the land by deed with warranty without the joinder of the wife, and survived her, his grantee acquired title, but this was by way of estoppel.

The judgment is affirmed.

EDWARDS v. SORRELL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 21, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 231*)—CONSTRUCTION—REVISION AS ONE STATUTE.

The originally different statutes enacted into the Revisal become thereby one statute, and must be construed as one act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 312; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

2. ARREST (§ 47*)—CIVIL ACTION—DISCHARGE FROM CUSTODY—REMEDIES.

A defendant who is arrested and in custody pursuant to Revisal 1905, § 727, subsec. 2, authorizing the arrest of defendant in enumerated actions, may obtain his discharge before judgment by pursuing the remedy given by sections 735 and 737, or by complying with the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors (section 1920 et seq.)

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 263*)—EXISTENCE OF LIABILITY AGAINST GRANTOR—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegation that during March, 1909, and many months preceding, defendant was guilty of the wrongs constituting plaintiff's cause of action, does not show that defendant had incurred any liability in June, 1907, and a conveyance then made to defendant and wife was not necessarily fraudulent as against plaintiff because the consideration was paid by defendant himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

4. ARREST (§ 48*)—CIVIL ACTION—DISCHARGE—GROUNDS.

The right of a defendant to a discharge from custody before judgment on complying with the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors (Revisal 1905, § 1920 et seq.), by presenting a petition containing the requisite averments, accompanied by a schedule setting forth his property, including real estate conveyed to himself and wife, and alleged to be exempt and by offering to surrender his nonexempt property, cannot be defeated under section 1934, authorizing a creditor opposing the discharge to suggest fraud setting forth the particulars by plaintiff alleging that the real estate is subject to execution, since the right of plaintiff, if existing as claimed by him, may be enforced by an action by the trustee appointed pursuant to the statute in which the wife will be a necessary party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Long, Judge.

Action by H. F. Edwards against A. V. Sorrell. From an order refusing to discharge defendant from custody, he appeals. Reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of his honor, Judge Long, refusing to discharge defendant from custody. The plaintiff sued for damages, charging that defendant had alienated the affection of his wife, and caused her to separate herself from him. At the time of instituting the action, he procured upon proper affidavit an order for the arrest of defendant holding him to bail. Defendant was arrested and placed in jail pursuant to the order of the clerk. On March 24, 1909, defendant filed his petition before the clerk pursuant to section 1920 et seq. of Revisal of 1905 for discharge. The petition contained the averments required by section 1922, and was accompanied by a schedule of his property. Among other properties set forth in the schedule were certain pieces of real estate, described by reference to the deeds under which they were held, conveyed to defendant and his wife, especially "one lot corner of Dowd and Cleveland streets, which lot was conveyed by H. A. Foushee, commissioner, June 28, 1907, to Albert v. Sorrell and wife, Quinnette Sorrell, registered June 29, 1907, consideration $1,111," giving book and page of registry. In reference to his real estate, defendant set forth in his petition "that your petitioner is advised by counsel learned in the law that, since the conveyance of the real estate described in Exhibit B are to your petitioner and his wife, they hold the same as tenants by entireties, and that he has no interest therein which he can convey or incumber without the assent of his wife, and that no interest of his can be sold under execution so as to pass any title during their joint lives or as against the survivors after the death of either one of them, and that all of the real estate described in Exhibit B is exempt from sale under execution; that his said wife, Quinnette Sorrell, refuses and declines to convey and incumber said estate in any manner whatsoever; that your petitioner herewith surrenders all property whatsoever in excess of $50, which exemption of $50 he desires to be allotted to him in his wearing apparel, and in the personal property described in Exhibit B."

Plaintiff, replying to the petition, denied that the real estate described in the schedule was exempt from execution by reason of the condition of the title as set out. He further says "that he denies that the petitioner has surrendered all property whatsoever in excess of $50, and he is advised and believes that the petitioner is not entitled to any discharge from the order of arrest herein, or released from custody without making an actual surrender of all his property and all interest in the property." For a further answer plaintiff says as to each piece of real estate described in the schedule "that the deeds referred to in Exhibit B do convey to A. V. Sorrell an estate which he has not surrendered, and which he must surrender before he is entitled to any discharge herein, and plaintiff suggests a fraud on the part of defendant in withholding, or attempting to withhold, the same." He further says "that the plaintiff is informed and believes that the consideration for the real estate described in said deed was paid by the defendant himself, and that the improvements erected on some or all of said lots represent the property and accumulations of the defendant himself, and the defendant is guilty of fraud in withholding, or attempting to withhold, said property from the trustee, and to protect it from liability for his indebtedness and in attempting to secure his discharge without a full surrender of the same." Plaintiff moves the court to make up an issue of fraud and set it down for trial as provided by statute. Upon the hearing of the petition and answer before the clerk, he denied the prayer of defendant, and directed that an issue of fraud be made up and transferred to the civil issue docket of the superior court for trial. Upon appeal to his honor, Judge Long, holding the courts of the Ninth judicial district, judgment of the court was affirmed. The bond required of defendant was reduced from $5,000 to $2,500. The defendant excepted and appealed.

Manning & Foushee and D. W. Sorrell, for appellant. Bryant & Brogden and R. O. Everett, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The petition for discharge complies in terms with the provisions of section 1930 of the Revisal 1905, subsection 2 of which provides that the petitioner must file with his petition "a full and true inventory of his estate, real and personal, with incumbrances existing thereon, and all books, vouchers and securities relating thereto." section 1934 provides that "every creditor opposing the discharge of the insolvent may suggest fraud and set forth the particulars thereof in writing verified by his oath," etc. The statutes applicable to cases of this kind are not so clear as they should be. Defendant was arrested, and is in custody pursuant to the ancillary proceeding prescribed by subsection 2, § 727, Revisal 1905. The method by which he may be discharged before judgment is prescribed by sections 735 and 737, neither of which contemplate the procedure provided by section 1920 et seq. The language of section 1920 is sufficiently comprehensive to include defendant's case: "The following persons are entitled to the benefits of this chapter. (1) Every person taken or charged on any order of arrest or a surrender of bail." Subsection 2 provides that any person taken "on execution of arrest for any debt or damages rendered in any action whatever"; thus making a distinction between a person in custody on any order of arrest, which includes such order made before judgment and a person in custody under final process. Whatever contradiction may appear to exist between the several sections of the Revisal, originally different statutes, is met by construing them as one statute, as by their enactment as a part of the Revisal they become. The right to be discharged by complying with the last-named sections is in addition to the remedies given in sections 735 and 737. The Constitution prohibits imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud. Without undertaking to discuss the question whether the cause of action set out in complaint comes within the exception, we are of the opinion that the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the statute for the relief of insolvent debtors.

The sole question presented by the appeal therefore is whether the answer of plaintiff to the petition for discharge raises an issue of fact. Defendant having filed the schedule of his property, it was not only proper, but necessary, that he should set out the facts showing what right, title, estate, and interest he held in the real estate. This he has done by making specific reference to the deeds showing the title conveyed by them. He simply says to the plaintiff: "Here is a schedule of my property. I surrender such right, title, and estate as the court may decide I have therein." The fact that he further says that he is advised by counsel that, by reason of the condition of the title, it is not subject to execution while not improper, is surplusage. What the law is in that respect will be for the ultimate decision of the court. It cannot be decided at this time nor in the present state of the record. The plaintiff, recognizing the fact that he must do something more than merely "suggest fraud"—that is, set out the particulars, etc.—has, in compliance with the statute, done so. The suggestion and particulars set out simply raise a question of law; that is, he differs from the opinion of defendant's counsel as to the legal effect of the deeds under which defendant holds title to the land. If he is correct in his opinion, the land will be subject to execution upon such judgment as he may recover in his action. The defendant has surrendered such title as he has. How can he do more?

We have discussed the question as to the liability of lands conveyed to husband and wife for the debts of either at this term—Hood v. Mercer, 64 S. E. 897, where the authorities are collected. It is suggested, however, that defendant paid the purchase money for the lot conveyed by Mr. Foushee, commissioner, and that, in having the title made to his wife and himself, he was guilty of fraud. If plaintiff's view of the law be correct, the land is liable to his debts. If the fact be that defendant furnished the purchase money for the land, the legal effect of it would depend upon the date when plaintiff's cause of action accrued. The allegation in the complaint is that "during the month of March, 1909, and during many months preceding," the defendant was guilty of the wrongs which constitute plaintiff's cause of action. The deed from Mr. Foushee, commissioner, was executed June 28, 1907. It does not appear with sufficient certainty that defendant then owed any debts or had incurred any liability to plaintiff to render his payment of the purchase money for the land fraudulent. If the fact be as suggested, the right of the plaintiff would be enforced by an action brought by the trustee, to be appointed pursuant to the statute, in which the wife would be a necessary party. We do not perceive how these questions can be passed upon in this proceeding. The case of Adams v. Alexander, 23 N. C. 501, is relied upon. There the debtor had executed a deed of assignment of his property for the payment of debts. In his schedule he surrendered only his interest after the payment of the debts named in the assignment. The creditor in opposing his discharge alleged that the assignment was made with intent to defraud his creditors. This court held that, as the debtor had scheduled "only the resulting trusts, which affirms the other trusts, to be bona fide and good and is an assignment of the surplus only after all the other purposes of the deed have been answered, he had not complied with the statute." Hutton v. Self, 28 N. C. 285. Here the petitioner schedules the property or the muniments of his title. Whatever he has passes to and vests in the trustee to be applied to his debts. It would be a hardship on a debtor if because, with no fault on his part, the title to his property is involved in doubtful questions of law, he must remain in prison until, after litigation, they are settled by the courts. The purpose of the law is to compel him to make an honest surrender of his property to his creditors. If he does that, he is entitled to be discharged. He is not imprisoned as a punishment for his inability to pay his debts. That was the conception of a discarded past. This case is a striking illustration of the hardship which could be perpetrated if the law was different. The plaintiff sues in forma pauperis, claiming $10,000 damages. He gives a bond in the ancillary proceeding in the sum of $100 and holds defendant to bail in the sum of $2,500. If he may, after defendant has surrendered his property to meet such judgment as may be rendered against him, hold him in custody until, after long litigation, the end is reached, the defendant, if he should successfully defend the action, would have suffered great wrong without any redress. If the plaintiff shall succeed in obtaining a judgment, he has all of defendant's property bound for it and a right to sue out execution against his person. We are of the opinion that the answer did not raise any issue to be submitted to the jury, and that petitioner is entitled to his discharge as prayed for. The court will proceed to secure the property to meet the final result of the action. This opinion and judgment will be certified to the clerk of the superior court of Durham county, to the end that further proceedings may be had in accordance herewith.

STATE v. SPROUSE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 19, 1909.)

1. ARSON (§ 25*)—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

In an indictment charging accused with burning a building belonging to S., ownership is alleged only to identify the property, and the charge is sustained by showing that the building belonged to another, who had rented it to S., who was using it as a granary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. § 52; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 203*)—AIDER BY VERDICT—GOOD AND BAD COUNTS.

Where the indictment contains two counts, and one is valid, a general verdict will be supported by such valid count, although the other count may be defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 651; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Madison County; Ferguson, Judge.

Lawrence Sprouse was convicted of arson, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Ramsey and Moore & Rollins, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant is indicted in two counts. In the first count it is alleged that the defendant "did unlawfully, wantonly, willfully, and feloniously set fire to a stable and granary then and there the property and in possession of William Sexton," and in the second count it is alleged that the defendant "did unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously attempt to burn the barn and stable of William Sexton by setting fire to a certain lot of flammable matter in said barn and stable, contrary to the statute," etc.

The defendant requested his honor to charge the jury as follows: "That if the jury believe the evidence the stable and granary was the property of E. L. Sprouse, and the jury could not find the defendant guilty under this bill of indictment, which charges that the defendant burned the stable and granary, the property of William Sexton." The court refused to give said instruction, and the defendant excepted. The evidence was that the title to the stable was in E. L. Sprouse, but that he had rented the building to William Sexton, who had stored 300 bushels of corn in the granary end of the building. This is not a civil action for possession. Ownership is alleged only to identify the property and is sufficiently proven by showing occupancy. State v. Daniel, 121 N. C. 576, 23 S. E. 255; State v. Thompson, 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921; State v. Jaynes, 78 N. C. 507; State v. Tallor, 88 N. C. 694.

The court charged the jury that if they "should be satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that William Sexton, the prosecutor, had rented the premises from E. L. Sprouse, and in pursuance of the contract of lease he went into possession of the barn or a part of it by storing his corn therein, then the bill properly charges the property burnt as the property of William Sexton, and if they shall further be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant willfully set fire to and burned said house with the corn of the prosecutor in it, it is their duty to return a verdict of guilty"—to which the defendant excepted, but without good ground.

The only other ground relied on in defendant's brief is that the judgment should be arrested because the first count in the bill is defective. If this were true, there being a general verdict, it would be supported by the valid second count. State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168. But the first count follows the words of Revisal 1905, § 3338, and the second count is based on Revisal 1905, § 3338.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; Justice, Judge.

Action by S. A. Mitchem against A. D. K. Wallace and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and motion for nonsuit allowed.

The defendants moved to nonsuit. Motion overruled, defendants except. His honor submitted these issues.

"(1) Did defendant contract and agree with plaintiff to sell her his interest in the land mentioned in the complaint as therein alleged? Answer. Yes.

"(2) Did defendant fail and refuse to convey to the plaintiff his interest in said land in violation of his contract as alleged? Answer. Yes.

"(3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer. $50."

From the judgment rendered defendants appealed.

McBrayer, McBrayer & McRorie, for appellants. D. F. Morrow and R. S. Eaves, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The evidence taken in its most favorable light for plaintiff tends to prove that the land, the subject-matter of the contract, belonged to the defendant A. D. K. Wallace and to the other codefendants. A contract for the sale of the land was drawn up and signed by said Wallace and the plaintiff, and deposited with C. W. Goode, to be held by him until released by mutual agreement of plaintiff and A. D. K. Wallace. It was evidently deposited to await the consent of the other owners who refused to sell as claimed by Wallace, but we will assume, as contended by plaintiff, that it was held by Goode to await the payment of the purchase money, and was then to be delivered to plaintiff. This contract was never delivered to plaintiff, but according to Goode, her own witness, it was taken from his granddaughter by William Mitchem, plaintiff's brother-in-law, without either Goode's or defendant's knowledge or consent. It is manifest from plaintiff's own evidence that Wallace informed her fully and particularly as to the ownership of the land, and did not undertake to bind the other "sixteen heirs." We are not furnished with the charge of the judge, but we infer from the issues that the action was finally tried as one against A. D. K. Wallace alone for damages for refusal to convey his individual fourth interest, although the complaint charged the breach against all the owners. Certainly no cause of action is made out upon plaintiff's own evidence against the other defendants, and we think upon consideration that none is made out against A. D. K. Wallace himself. There is an entire failure of evidence upon the second issue, and it was incumbent upon plaintiff to establish the affirmative of that issue by a preponderance of the evidence.

The only evidence bearing thereon is that of plaintiff herself and defendant Wallace. Upon direct examination plaintiff stated that, after the others refused to sell, she asked Wallace to give her a chance at his part, and that he refused to consent. On cross-examination, however, the plaintiff seems to have retracted that statement, for she expressly admits that Wallace agreed "that he would let me have his part, which was one-fourth interest." The defendant Wallace testifies: "Mrs. Mitchem came to see me in October, 1905, and I told her that the other heirs had repudiated the contract. I told her that I would let her have my part, and she said that she did not want my part or interest unless she could get it all. J. C. Hampton and H. B. Morgan were present." These two witnesses corroborate the statement of Wallace. Although plaintiff admitted that Wallace offered her his share of the land, and although Wallace testified to same fact, yet plaintiff admits that she never offered to pay Wallace a penny of the purchase money, and never tendered a penny to Goode the depository of the contract. It seems quite plain to us that there is nothing in the evidence to sustain the finding upon the second issue, and that upon her own showing the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages for breach of a contract which she made no attempt to perform on her part. If Wallace had refused to sell his part of the land, after contracting to do so, plaintiff might have been relieved of the necessity of tendering to him or to Goode Wallace's portion of the purchase money, which was one-fourth. But Wallace did not refuse according to plaintiff's own admission as well as his own testimony, and it therefore was incumbent on her to tender his part of the purchase money before she could call for specific performance or sustain an action for damages for a breach of the contract.

The motion for nonsuit is allowed.

Connor and Hoke, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; Biggs, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Williamston against the Germania Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hinsdale and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellant. H. W. Stubbs, Wheeler Martin, H. A. Gilliam, and W. W. Clark, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover $1,250, the amount of a check alleged to have been drawn by Lula Parham, cashier of the defendant, on the Mercantile Bank of Memphis, Tenn., to the order of R. B. Hall, manager of the defendant, and indorsed by him for value to the plaintiff, and also the protest fee, $2.50, making in all $1,252.50. The check was presented to the bank on which it had been drawn and payment refused, whereupon it was protested for nonpayment. The defendant denied its liability upon the ground that Lula Parham had no authority to draw the check, and that it had received no benefit therefrom. It further alleged that R. B. Hall, as manager, in August, 1905, opened an account with the plaintiff, in the defendant's name, but really for his own benefit, and for many months did a "kiting" business with the plaintiff, depositing with it checks and drafts on other parties, who owed him nothing, and making the same good by checks upon the plaintiff and others; the principal transactions in the way of "kiting" checks having been carried on between the said R. B. Hall, as manager, and the said Lula Parham, as cashier, of the defendant. The court submitted to the jury two issues, which, with the answers thereto, were as follows: (1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? If so, in what amount? Ans. $276.48, with interest from January 17, 1907. (2) Upon what item of debit appearing in the account of the defendant company with the plaintiff bank was the credit balance of $978.02, dated January 16, 1907, applied? Ans. The $1,250 check in controversy. The answer to the first issue was arrived at by deducting the "credit balance" of $978.02 from the amount of the check, with the protest fee added; the plaintiff having charged the amount of the check to the defendant when payment of it was refused.

There was much evidence introduced tending to show that R. B. Hall, as manager, and Miss Parham, as cashier, of the defendant, were "kiting" checks in their dealings with the plaintiff bank, and, while this evidence may be very strong and convincing, we do not think it was of such a conclusive nature as to require the court to instruct the jury, as requested to do by the defendant, that, as matter of law, it charged the defendant with notice of the fact, so as to defeat the plaintiff's recovery. Frank F. Fagan, cashier of the plaintiff bank, testified that he did not know Hall was "kiting" checks, nor did he know that there was anything wrong in his transactions with the bank. On December 18, 1906, he wrote the following letter to the defendant: "Mr. R. B. Hall, manager of your company at Raleigh, N. C., carries an account at this bank as R. B. Hall, manager Germania Life Insurance Company of New York. We desire to know if his signature to checks meets with your approval, and if the same is authorized by you. We also would like to know if the signature of Lula Parham, cashier Germania Life Insurance Company, to checks drawn on the Mercantile Bank of Memphis, Tenn., is authorized by you. As Mr. Hall is manager of your company for North Carolina and Tennessee, we presume that he has authority to sign your checks, but we desire this information for the files and records of our bank, and will very much appreciate a prompt reply. Yours truly, Frank F. Fagan, Cashier." To this letter he received, December 22, 1906, the following answer: "Gentlemen: We reply to yours of the 18th inst. in the affirmative. Mr. Hall and Miss Parham being authorized to draw checks, as indicated by you. Respectfully yours, N. S. Wesendonck, Second Vice President."

The judge charged the jury fully as to the extent of the authority of R. B. Hall and Lula Parham to draw checks in the name of the defendant, and that they had no authority, as agents, to do a "kiting business," and that the plaintiff is presumed to have had notice of such lack of authority. He then charged the jury as follows: "Checks are always supposed to be drawn upon a previous deposit of funds. If you find from the evidence that the check in controversy was one of a series of kiting checks, and that the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, this fact in the exercise of reasonable care as prudent bankers, you will answer the first issue, 'No.' Knowledge of any facts and circumstances reasonably calculated to put a man on inquiry makes it his duty to make inquiry, and he will be charged with notice of all facts, which such inquiry would have elicited. If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff did not have actual notice of such kiting, or constructive notice—that is, knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would put it upon notice by proper inquiry and investigation—in other words, if you find that the plaintiff neither knew, nor had reasonable ground to believe, that Hall was engaged in kiting checks, but, on the contrary, plaintiff reasonably believed that the account with plaintiff was being used by Hall as the company's account and not his own private account for his own benefit, then you will proceed to consider whether the defendant authorized the check in controversy. If the plaintiff has not satisfied you that it neither knew nor had reasonable ground to believe that Hall was engaged in kiting checks, and using the deposit for his own personal benefit, you will answer the first issue, 'No.' Now, as to the authority to draw the check in controversy: The burden is upon the plaintiff to satisfy you by the greater weight of evidence that Lula Parham had authority to draw the check in controversy. Unless the plaintiff has so satisfied you, you will answer the first issue, 'No.' The court then directed the attention of the jury to the facts and circumstances tending to show whether Lula Parham had authority to draw the check in controversy and whether the defendant had notice that R. B. Hall and Lula Parham were "kiting" checks, and that the check for $1,250 was drawn without the authority of the defendant. The court further instructed the jury as follows: "The defendant is bound by such acts of its agents as it expressly authorized, or such acts as are committed by its agents within the apparent scope of their authority; that is, such acts as it reasonably led the plaintiff to believe the agent possessed." The charge was exceedingly favorable to the defendant and presented its contentions with reference to the issues and evidence in the case as strongly as the law permitted with a due regard to the rights of the plaintiff.

The law in regard to the duty and authority of an agent in the transaction of the business of his principal and the liability of the principal for the acts of his agent was fully explained to the jury with reference to the special facts and circumstances of this case, and the charge in this respect was in accordance with the authorities upon the subject. Bank v. Hay, 143 N. C. 326, 55 S. E. 811, and cases cited therein. The real and vital questions in the case were whether R. B. Hall and Lula Parham had been engaged in a "kiting business," and, if so, whether the fact was known to the plaintiff, or could have been known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence. It was conceded that if they had been "kiting" checks, and the check in controversy was one of the series of such checks, and further that the plaintiff knew, or should have known, such to be the case, then there was no liability on the part of the defendant. Upon the evidence, as we view it, these were facts for the jury to find, and the court properly left the matter to the jury as one of fact, instead of instructing them, as matter of law, to answer the first issue in favor of the defendant, upon the assumption that the dealings of R. B. Hall with the plaintiff were not within the scope of his authority as manager of the defendant company, and that, in law, the plaintiff had notice thereof. The court properly placed the burden upon the plaintiff of showing the authority of Lula Parham to draw the check, and correctly instructed the jury to ascertain whether such authority existed under the facts and circumstances of the case as they might find them to be; in other words, whether she had the actual or apparent authority to draw the check, under the evidence and the principles of law concerning the liability of a principal for the act of his agent, as already explained to them.

As we have stated, there was very strong evidence to show that R. B. Hall and Lula Parham were engaged in kiting transactions—that is, they were interchanging commercial paper for the purpose of temporarily raising money or sustaining credit—but, on the contrary, the defendant had informed the plaintiff about 10 days before the check for $1,250 was deposited with the plaintiff bank that R. B. Hall and Lula Parham had authority to draw checks in the name of the defendant as its agents, and Frank F. Fagan, cashier of the plaintiff bank, testified that he did not know that the checks drawn by them, respectively, were not authorized, nor did he know that there was anything wrong in their transactions with his bank or the bank in Memphis. There was testimony sustaining the contention of each of the parties, and, under the circumstances, it was proper to submit the case to the jury with proper instructions as to the law bearing upon it. The court instructed the jury fully and correctly as to what would constitute notice that R. B. Hall and Lula Parham were not acting within the scope of their authority as agents of the defendant. While the preponderance of the evidence may have been on the defendant's side, we do not think, if this be so, it authorized peremptory directions to the jury to find in favor of the defendant in answering the issues. If the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, the judge could have set it aside, and, if he failed to do so upon proper application, we cannot review his decision here and correct the error. There are few, if any, controverted questions of law in the case, and we have not deemed it necessary therefore to cite the authorities which sustain the charge of the court, and have confined our discussion to the pivotal question, whether the case should have been submitted to the jury to find the facts under proper instructions as to the law, as was done by the court, or whether the court should have charged, substantially as requested by the defendant's counsel, that, upon the evidence, they should answer the first issue in the negative. The issues were sufficient to present all the controverted matters in the case, and there was no error in rejecting those tendered by the defendant. Deaver v. Deaver, 137 N. C. 240, 49 S. E. 113.

Upon a review of the whole case, we find no error in the rulings and judgment of the court.

No error.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). An examination of the record in this case, containing all of the evidence, forces me to the conclusion that, taking the whole evidence as true, the plaintiff bank was put upon notice that Hall and Miss Parham were "kiting" checks, that there was no fund upon which these checks were drawn, and this must have been known to the officers of the bank. If the check sued upon in this action was the only one drawn by Hall, I should concur in the opinion of the court; but it is only one of a series of checks, all of which, when considered together with other admitted circumstances, show to my mind conclusively that the account is made up of a number of checks, all of which were drawn in accordance with the system of "kiting" carried on by the parties. The authorities cited in defendant's brief establish its contention that the checks were not drawn against any fund in bank, but upon other checks crossing each other in the mail for the purpose of maintaining an apparent balance. I am therefore compelled to dissent from the conclusion reached by the majority of the court.

In consequence of the late day of the term, upon which the opinion is filed, I am unable to set out in full and discuss the evidence. I can therefore only express, with all possible deference, my dissent.

CRISS v. CRISS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 172*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—IMAGINARY LIABILITY.

A conveyance of land to be held in trust for a third person, the grantee and beneficiary intending by putting it in the hands of the grantee to shield it from imaginary liability which the beneficiary feared might be attempted to be asserted, based on forged papers which the parties feared were in existence, when in fact there were no such papers, and no such liability, and the beneficiary owed no debts, will not be held void under the statute avoiding deeds made with intent to defraud creditors, and the trust will be enforced in equity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Bill by Anna Criss against Michael Criss. Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Reversed.

John Bassel and Haze Morgan, for appellant. L. C. Crile and Dabney C. Lee, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. Anna Criss filed her bill in equity in the circuit court of Harrison county against Michael Criss, and her bill was dismissed on demurrer, and she appeals.

The bill states that Anna Criss was owner of a lot on Main street, in the city of Clarksburg, and that she conveyed it to Hezekiah F. Criss, and that later, in consideration of some of the purchase money which he had not paid her and of further indebtedness of him to her, Hezekiah F. Criss conveyed to Howard P. Criss, a son of Anna Criss, a certain lot on Monticello avenue and Maude street, in Clarksburg, on which was a dwelling house, which was occupied by the said Anna Criss and her family; that the conveyance by Hezekiah F. Criss of said lot to Howard P. Criss was in trust for the use and benefit of his mother, Anna Criss, and that Howard P. Criss accepted the said conveyance in trust for his mother, she having paid the whole consideration therefor; that later, as Howard P. Criss was about to leave home and settle in another state, by agreement of the parties said lot was conveyed by Howard P. Criss to another son of Anna Criss, Michael Criss, then a single man living on the said lot with his mother and other members of the family; that Michael Criss paid nothing whatever for the conveyance to him of said lot, and that it was a distinct agreement between Anna Criss and Howard Criss and Michael Criss that Michael Criss should hold the said lot in trust for the sole use and benefit of his mother, Anna Criss, and that the family should continue to reside in the house on said lot. The bill further states that Anna Criss in 1905, through the instrumentality of Michael Criss, was incarcerated in the West Virginia Hospital for the Insane at Weston, but remained therein a short time only until she was taken out of the hospital upon a bond given by one of her sons, the said Michael Criss refusing to bail her out and using every means at his command to keep her in the said hospital, even employing counsel to appear before the board of directors of said hospital to advocate her return to it, but that the plaintiff was soon discharged from said institution as cured, having, in fact, never been unsound in mind, although the action of the defendant was such shortly preceding her commitment to the hospital, when she demanded of him a deed for the lot, as almost to drive her to distraction. The bill further states that Michael Criss never set up any claim to the Monticello avenue property, and does not yet, except by way of a baseless, trumped-up, and untrue alleged set-off of $4,000 for keeping the family, until the plaintiff was committed to the insane asylum, when, assuming that the plaintiff had become civilly dead for the remainder of her life, and that defendant's brothers and sisters would not litigate with him the right to the property, he, Michael Criss, then married, gave up the property which he had rented in another part of the county and took possession, with his family, of the residence in controversy, and of the plaintiff's personal property, and broke up the plaintiff's home, driving her sons, one then 15 years of age, another 20 years of age, and a daughter then 17 years of age, out of their lifelong home, and compelling them to go upon the streets among strangers, after giving the daughter written notice to vacate the property, and that since then the defendant has occupied the property for a period of about one year before the bringing of this suit. The bill further states that defendant, Michael Criss, has refused to convey the said property to the plaintiff, though often requested to do so, and that she has been forced to live upon the charity of other children, when her own property, if she could have it, would afford her a home and support. The bill further states that the husband of Anna Criss had been engaged in the saloon business and broke up, and that she had engaged in business herself and prospered therein, and did not owe a dollar at the time she purchased the Monticello avenue property from Hezekiah F. Criss, but that she was informed and believed until a little while before the institution of this suit that her name had been forged to securities, orders, and other paper, the payment of which might be attempted to be enforced against any property she might acquire in her own name, and to avoid the expense and annoyance of being obliged to defend her property from supposed liabilities which she had never incurred, and for that reason alone, she had taken the conveyance of said property in the name of her son, Howard P. Criss, and afterwards for the same reason, and for that reason alone, had the property conveyed to her son Michael Criss, the defendant, her purpose being only to let the legal title remain outstanding until any judgments against her or any securities with her name forged might expire by limitation when it was her purpose to take the legal title to herself, of which purpose the defendant well knew. The bill further states that at the time of the conveyance by Hezekiah F. Criss to Howard P. Criss, and at the time of the conveyance by Howard P. Criss to Michael Criss, the plaintiff, Anna Criss, had no creditor or outstanding obligation owing by her, and that she was innocent of any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; and that, about the time of the institution of this suit, she for the first time caused investigation to be made of said supposed forgeries, with the result that she was informed that none such ever existed that would have been enforceable against said property, even had she taken the conveyance directly in her own name instead of that of her son. The bill prayed that the defendant be compelled to convey the said Monticello avenue property to the plaintiff, and that the defendant be required to account to her for rents, issues, and profits from the time when he moved into the property in July, 1906.

The defense claims that the statute of limitation bars relief to the plaintiff, and that the statute began to run from the date of the deed from Hezekiah Criss December 11, 1893. This trust is an express trust, and the statute of limitations does not commence to run against such a trust until it is disavowed and repudiated by the trustee with notice of such repudiation by the beneficiary. Woods v. Stevenson, 43 W. Va. 149, 27 S. E. 309. The bill does not mention any repudiation of the trust by Howard P. Criss, or any disavowal of it by Michael Criss until very lately, in 1905, when his mother was taken to the hospital for the insane, and this suit was brought as early as August, 1903. Moreover, the plaintiff was in possession of the property, living in it with her family, until 1905, when she was taken to the hospital, and, of course, neither the statute nor laches would have run against her while she occupied the property for a residence for herself and family. Mullins v. Shrewsbury, 60 W. Va. 694, 55 S. E. 736. It is strange doctrine that the statute or laches runs against a person in possession. Moreover, I thought that one to plead the statute must be in possession for the period prescribed by it, and in exclusive possession, shutting out the other claimant. The bill says that this defendant has been in exclusive possession only one year. The plaintiff had possession until 1905. So neither statute nor laches bars the plaintiff.

The main question in this case, that on which the defense really rests, is on the theory based on the statement of the bill that the conveyance from Hezekiah F. Criss to Howard P. Criss, as also that from Howard P. Criss to Michael Criss, were made to hinder and defraud creditors, and that equity will not enforce a trust created for such illegal purpose; that a grantor in a deed made with intent to defraud by covering up the property in another name will not be allowed to regain the property in a court of equity; that the deed is good and binding at law between its grantor and grantee, passing legal title; and that equity, though the grantee paid nothing, and agreed to hold for the use of the grantor, will not compel the grantee to reconvey to the grantor, and thus countenance fraudulent conveyances. This court has discussed this subject in many cases. Poling v. Williams, 55 W. Va. 69, 48 S. E. 704; Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349, 40 S. E. 402. I refer to that excellent late work, American & English Annotated Cases. In volume 3, p. 942, is an elaborate collection of cases. But does this case fall under that principle of equity law? To say so would carry the principle very far. Anna Criss owed no debts. The property was not, in fact, liable for any debts in her hands, if it had been in her hands. I have carefully examined the law upon this subject, and I conclude that this case does not fall under the rule just stated. Let us see if the law will sustain this position. "A conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors is not fraudulent if there were no creditors." Moore on Fraud. Convey. § 9, p. 85. "There must be creditors who may be delayed, hindered, or defrauded, and the necessary consequences of the act must be to produce such delay, hindrance, or fraud." 2 Bump, Fraud. Con- vey. § 25. In Kervick v. Mitchell, 68 Iowa, 273, 24 N. W. 151, 28 N. W. 434, we find it held that "where there is no creditor in fact, but only an imaginary one, through fear of whom the grantor, encouraged by the grantee, makes the conveyance, the fraudulent intent will not be imputed to the grantor, and, where the conveyance of the property has been without consideration, he may recover the same or its value." In Day v. Lown, 51 Iowa, 364, 1 N. W. 783, the court said: "The sole object of the statute (the statute against fraudulent conveyances) is to prevent conveyances of property with intent to defraud creditors, purchasers, or other persons. If there were no creditors or purchasers, the conveyance could not be fraudulent as to them. * * * His intention in so doing was wholly immaterial, provided no one but himself was injured or had cause to complain. It was not the intent the statute should be regarded in the light of a moral code and operate on the conscience of the party making the conveyance. Its purpose is to protect the legal or equitable rights of others." In 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 251, it is laid down as law that: "To constitute a disposition of property fraudulent within the terms of the statute, there must be a debtor intending to defraud, a creditor to be defrauded, and a conveyance of property which would have been appropriated by law to the payment of a debt due, and out of which the creditor could have realized all or a portion of his claim. * * * The second essential of a fraudulent conveyance which follows necessarily from the first is that there should be a creditor to be defrauded." In Dearman v. Dearman, 4 Ala. 521, was a conveyance of slaves made from apprehension that creditors of the father, who once owned the property, would seize it for his debts, and it was held that, as the slaves were not liable for the debts, the agreement would not render the transfer fraudulent, and the property could be reclaimed. In Pope v. Wilson, 7 Ala. 690, the court said: "It is self-evident that, where there are no creditors, there can be no intention to defraud them." Vandever v. Freeman, 20 Tex. 333, 338, 70 Am. Dec. 391, is to the same effect. In Baker v. Gilman, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 36, a man conveyed property to prevent its being subjected to a recovery in a slander suit; the grantee agreeing to reconvey. There were no other debts. The slander suit was defeated. It was held that there was no lawful debt binding the property, and a recovery was decreed.

It is argued that, this trust being by oral agreement, it is void under the statute of frauds for want of a writing declaring it. It is well established in this state that such a trust need not be declared or created in writing. Hogg's Eq. Princ. p. 740. It is useless to multiply authorities for a proposition so well established in this state. Counsel for the defense cite us to Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594, and Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567, to show that a writing is required. In those cases the conveyance was to hold in trust for the grantor himself, not the case where one conveys to hold in trust for a third person. To say that where one conveys to another to hold for the benefit of the grantor would be flat contradiction of the deed; and hence would not be good as a trust. Troll v. Carter expressly says, however, that, if the conveyance be made without consideration upon trust that the grantee will hold for a third person, such trust will be enforced. In this case the deeds were not from Anna Criss as grantor in trust for herself, but the conveyance was made between other parties to hold in trust for her.

If the facts stated in the bill are true, law and justice combine to sustain the plaintiff's cause. Therefore we hold that the bill presents the case of an enforceable trust, and we reverse the decree of the circuit court, and overrule the demurrer and remand the cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Bill by J. F. McCaskey, trustee in bankruptcy of W. T. Potts, against M. L. Potts and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Hall & Hall, for appellant. E. B. Snodgrass and E. L. Robinson, for appellees.

MILLER, P. In a suit in equity and upon attachment begun in the circuit court in April, 1903, by Foster Leap against W. T. Potts, and John F. Loehr and Mary Louise Potts, partners as John F. Loehr & Co., and others, Leap sought among other property attached to subject to the payment of the indebtedness of said W. T. Potts to him on certain notes indorsed and paid by said Leap, aggregating about $3,200, the undivided interest of Mary Louise Potts, as partner, in a stock of goods and merchandise of said John F. Loehr & Co. at New Martinsville. This suit was shortly afterwards superseded by the bankruptcy proceedings of said W. T. Potts, adjudging him a bankrupt, and in which he was subsequently discharged, and in which the complainant in the present suit was appointed trustee of the bankrupt's estate, and who by an order entered therein was authorized to intervene in the Leap suit or bring a new suit against defendants for the protection of the estate of said bankrupt. The present suit was begun in June, 1903. The bill filed swallows as a whole, and attempts to digest and assimilate to its own purposes, the entire bill in the Leap suit. It adopts the charges therein as its own, and what material averments are added thereto relate, as did the averments in the Leap bill, to alleged transactions of the defendants respecting said property as affecting the rights and interests of the said Leap. The answers of defendants put in issue all the material averments of the bill, and upon final hearing thereon, and on the depositions and proofs taken and filed, the circuit court on April 15, 1907, pronounced the final decree appealed from, adjudging, among other things, the interest of said Mary Louise Potts in said partnership property to be her property, and not liable for the indebtedness of her husband to said Leap, or to his other creditors. The decree also disposed of the issues made with respect to the other property, but the only questions presented for our decision relate to the decree respecting the said stock of goods.

The substantial averments of the bill are, that in March, 1900, John F. Loehr and W. T. Potts, in the name of his wife, Mary Louise Potts, formed a copartnership at which time the said Leap had become the accommodation indorser for said Potts to the extent of at least $2,000 of said $3,200, and that, although the partnership agreement purported to be between said Loehr and said M. L. Potts, it was, in fact, between the said W. T. Potts and said Loehr, and that the terms of the agreement were that Potts was to furnish the capital, and that Loehr, who was experienced in the business to be undertaken, was to give his time and attention to the business, and have a half interest therein; that, pursuant to this agreement, W. T. Potts did furnish the capital, aggregating $1,500, and no part of which was furnished by said Loehr or by said M. L. Potts; that the business had been prosperous; and that at the time of the suit the firm had accumulated a stock of goods valued at from $6,000 to $7,000. And it is specifically averred that this action of W. T. Potts in thus furnishing the capital for said partnership and so engaging in the business in the name of his wife was a fraud, and done to wrong, cheat, and defraud his creditors, and especially said Leap. These averments of the bill, in effect, charge, not only a voluntary gift or transfer by W. T. Potts of his money and property to his wife, and void as against existing creditors because voluntary, but also that such gift or transfer was without consideration, and was made with fraudulent intent to cheat and defraud the said Leap, not only as an existing creditor, but as a subsequent creditor of said Potts, and void as against him upon either ground. But we do not find that it is alleged that defendant M. L. Potts had any notice of such alleged fraudulent intent.

One of the averments of the present bill charged not as a basis for any relief, but as evidential matter bearing on the question of fraud, is that at the time said W. T. Potts first solicited said Leap to become his indorser, he represented to him that he owned a house and lot in Titusville, Pa., the title to which Leap afterwards learned, but not until he had become such indorser, was in the name of said M. L. Potts, and that the said Potts had designedly had title thereto so placed in the name of his wife about the time or just before he had sought credit from said Leap, with the object in view, in the event he became involved, of having said property beyond the reach of his creditors. The facts respecting the said house and lot in Titusville disclosed by the evidence are that the same was purchased and paid for in part by the said W. T. Potts in 1894, some three years before said Leap had even become acquainted with him, and, so far as the record shows, before any of his present existing indebtedness had been contracted. So that the allegations respecting this transaction, not being made the basis of any relief, have very little, if any, evidential force or effect on the issue involved here with respect to said partnership property. In the final decree appealed from the court below, upon the papers and evidence in the cause, found as a fact that the said stock of goods of John F. Loehr & Co. was not as charged in the bill the property of said W. T. Potts, and that he had no interest therein subject to the payment of his debts.

The first question presented is: Did Potts invest his own money and capital in the business of said copartnership in the name of his wife, as a voluntary gift or transfer thereof to her, and void as against Leap or his other existing creditors? And the second is whether, if not voluntary and void on that ground, was such investment of capital furnished by Potts fraudulent in fact and void for that reason as against said Leap and his other existing or subsequent creditors, and of which Mrs. Potts had notice? In answer to the first question, this court construing sections 3099, 3100, Code 1906, has held in numerous cases that a voluntary gift or transfer of property which means a gift, sale, or transfer upon consideration not deemed valuable in law is void as against existing creditors because voluntary, and not because it is fraudulent, regardless of the "amount of the debts, the extent of the property so conveyed, the motives which prompted the settlement, or the conditions or circumstances of the party at the time"; and, as to the second question, that fraud and fraudulent intent charged as against either existing or subsequent creditors must be alleged, and proven substantially as alleged. Lockhard & Ireland v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. 74; Enslow v. Sliger, 51 W. Va. 405, 41 S. E. 173; Laidley v. Reynolds, 58 W. Va. 418, 52 S. E. 405. And, where actual fraud is charged, it is said in Greer v. O'Brien, supra, respecting the question of proof, that "the rule is that he who alleges fraud must prove it, and the supposed exceptions to this rule are more apparent than real. There may be prima facie fraud, or fraud may be proved by a number of concurrent circumstances. Nevertheless, so long as the scales are evenly balanced, the defendant against whom fraud is alleged must prevail."

The law respecting transactions of this character has been so frequently declared and applied in the decisions of this court as to render it unnecessary to enter into any new discussion thereof in the case in hand. The facts with respect to the formation of the copartnership of John F. Loehr & Co., practically uncontradicted, are that the partnership agreement was made between John F. Loehr and Mrs. M. L. Potts, and not between said Loehr and W. T. Potts. Loehr and Mrs. Potts are brother and sister. Of the $1,500 cash capital provided by Mrs. Potts at the time $1,000 was obtained by her upon a draft of J. A. Bandl, cashier of the New Martinsville Bank on the Hanover National Bank of New York City, dated March 17, 1900, payable to the order of W. T. Potts, and indorsed by him and John F. Loehr & Co., and $500, the residue thereof, was provided by Mrs. Potts out of $100 paid her by W. T. Potts in cash, and $400 of other cash money furnished by her out of other private funds belonging to her. The evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Potts shows that at the time Potts paid Mrs. Potts this money she held his two notes for money actually loaned him long prior to the incurrence of any of the indebtedness now claimed by said Leap, and, so far as the record shows prior to the incurrence of any of his present indebtedness, the first dated December 15, 1896, the second dated May 7, 1897, the first calling for $600 and the second for $500. These notes were offered in evidence, and both testify in substantial agreement as to the time, places, and sources from which Mrs. Potts got this money, and where she had the money on deposit, some of it in the banks at Titusville, Pittsburg, and New Martinsville, and some of it she had kept in her possession. The evidence shows her to have been a careful, close, saving, thrifty, and industrious German woman, and a woman of considerable business ability, jealous of her personal interests, and always keeping her own property separate and distinct from that of her husband. She distinctly testifies that some $400 or $500 of her own money had been derived from the sale of horses and a buggy at Titusville, derived by her from her mother and cash money given her by her mother. Both Mr. and Mrs. Potts testify that at the time he paid for her the $1,100 she surrendered to him his notes, and he produced and filed the notes with his testimony. Moreover, it is abundantly proven not only by W. T. Potts, but by other witnesses, including cashiers of the banks, that in March, 1900, after Potts paid this money to said firm and to his wife, and took up his notes, he had a balance of some $2,000 left to his credit in the banks at New Martinsville, where he drew the money and purchased the draft, and that for months thereafter, with occasional exceptions, he continued to have large daily balances to his credit in said bank, and, besides, was the owner of three strings of oil well tools, horses and wagons, and other property, aggregating in value from $8,000 to $10,000. He was actively engaged in the work of contracting and drilling oil wells, and was apparently very prosperous, and the evidence shows that his financial misfortunes came afterwards in the purchases of oil production, and in losses upon contracts for drilling wells, due to accidents pertaining thereto, and with which Mrs. Potts, his wife, had nothing whatever to do, and was in no way responsible. This with other evidence, we think wholly fails to show a voluntary gift or transfer by Potts of his property to his wife. He simply paid her his indebtedness to her, and at a time when he was justified in doing so out of his estate, and that her interest in said copartnership property cannot be made assets of said bankrupt to be administered in a court of bankruptcy.

On the second question—Was actual fraud proven?—It is admitted by Leap, though otherwise charged in his bill, and as proven by Mr. and Mrs. Potts, that Leap had notice on the very day the copartnership was formed that Mrs. Potts, and not W. T. Potts, was the partner, or at least that she claimed to be, and the testimony of Loehr, the other partner, shows that his contract of copartnership was with his sister, Mrs. Potts, and not with

Mr. Potts; so that no fraud was practiced upon Leap or on any other creditor so far as the record shows. Nothing was concealed from Leap by Potts or either of the copartners. Leap assisted in procuring the room in which this firm began business, and with this knowledge, openly communicated to him, he continued to indorse for Potts for large amounts with his eyes wide open to the rights and claims of Mrs. Potts with respect to the partnership property. By his own admissions he knew from Potts that Potts had paid the money into this firm, and he knew from Potts from the beginning, as he admits, that the money Potts proposed to pay into the firm was to be as much in the interest of Loehr the other partner, as in that of Mrs. Potts; yet there was no attempt either in the bill of Leap or in the bill in this cause to charge the interest of Loehr in the partnership property with the payment of the bankrupt's debts. If the partnership property was liable at all for the debts of the bankrupt for anything alleged in the bill, the interest of Loehr was as much liable therefor as the interest of Mrs. Potts and more so, for Mrs. Potts had not only contributed the money paid for her by her husband on his notes, but other money, and had given practically all her time to the business, and, in addition to the $1,500 original capital, had actually paid in afterwards some $370 additional money. This evidence, with other evidence in the cause, we think sufficient to repel all charges of fraud or fraudulent intent as against Leap or any other creditor of said Potts.

Besides all this, the rule of practice announced by this court in former decisions is "that, although the conclusion reached by the circuit court may be subject to grave doubts, this court will not reverse its action unless plainly erroneous," and that "a decree of the circuit court determining questions of fact, unless plainly wrong, will not be disturbed." Shaffer v. Shaffer, 51 W. Va. 126, 41 S. E. 166; Wolfe v. Bank, 54 W. Va. 689, 47 S. E. 243. See, also, the many other cases cited in 1 Ency. Dig. of Va. and W. Va. Rep. pp. 619-621-623.

Moreover, we think that, with knowledge of all the facts communicated to Leap by both Mr. and Mrs. Potts in regard to the beginning and continuance of the copartnership, Leap upon whose rights as creditor this suit is practically made to depend is upon the principles announced in Williams v. Maxwell, 45 W. Va. 297, 307, 31 S. E. 909, and other cases there cited, estopped from asserting that said W. T. Potts has any interest in said partnership property liable for his debts.

In our judgment the decree below was clearly right, and should be affirmed.

SQUIRES v. SQUIRES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 4, 1909. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1909.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 70*) — RELEASE OF CLAIM.

If a child, in consideration of money or property advanced to him by the parent, execute a writing releasing his right as prospective heir and distributee of the estate of such parent, he is thereby estopped from asserting any claim to the estate against the other heirs and distributees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 213; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. RELEASE OF INTEREST.

Query: Suppose such child, at the date of such writing, was one of a number of children, all of whom should die without issue before the death of the parent except himself, thus leaving him sole heir, where would the estate go?

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Braxton County. Bill by Addison Squires against Asa Squires and others. Decree for plaintiff Addison Squires, and Asa Squires appeals. Affirmed.

Haymond & Fox and Morrison & Rider, for appellant. C. C. Higginbotham and Hall Bros., for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. D. S. Squires died intestate on the 11th day of November, 1905, seised of about 1,200 acres of land, leaving a widow and six children and one grandchild as his only heirs at law. In April, 1906, this suit was brought in the circuit court of Braxton county for the assignment of dower, and the partition of the land among all of the heirs. Byrd C. Dunn and Otis Squires, two of the defendants, answered the original bill, and set up, by way of cross relief, the fact that Asa Squires, one of the sons, had before his father's death released all claim, as heir and distributee, to his father's estate in consideration of money advanced to him by his father, and was therefore not entitled to participate in the benefits of said estate. At July rules, 1906, plaintiff filed his amended bill, alleging practically the same matter contained in said answer and cross-bill. Asa Squires answered, admitting the execution of the release set up against him, but denying that it had the effect to deprive him of the right to share with the other heirs in his father's estate, claiming that such release should be treated only as proof of an advancement to him by his father, and that he should be allowed to bring this advancement into hotchpot and share with the other heirs. Exceptions to this answer were sustained. The depositions of Elizabeth Squires, the widow, and of others, were taken; and on the 4th day of March, 1907, the cause, being regularly matured, was heard. A decree was made appointing commissioners to assign dower and partition the land among all the heirs except Asa Squires, and holding that he was not entitled to participate in either the real or personal property of which his father died seised and possessed. Assignment of dower and partition was made pursuant to said decree, and on the 17th day of July, 1907, the cause was further heard upon the commissioner's report, and it was decreed that each of the six heirs should take and hold in severalty and in fee simple the several parts assigned to them. This excluded the son Asa. From these two decrees he obtained this appeal.

Whether or not there is error in the decree appealed from depends upon the legal effect of the release given by Asa Squires to his father at the time the advancement was made to him. It reads as follows: "Salt Lick Bridge, W. Va., Decb. 1st, 1890. At my own request, know all persons by these presents, that I, Asa Squires, have this day accepted and received at the hand of D. S. Squires (my Father) Twelve Hundred and Thirty-five dollars ($1235.00) as a legacy or a sum in full for any and all claims of money or property, that may be vested in me, by reason of heirship or otherwise, in the estate of D. S. Squires now & forever, as witness my hand & affix my seal this the day & date above written. Asa Squires [Seal]." It is shown by the testimony of the widow that some time after the execution of this release D. S. Squires had expressed to her the wish that his three sons should have his lands, and that he intended the home place for her and his son Asa; but this is rendered ambiguous by the fact that he had four sons, one son by a previous marriage, a half brother to the others, who lived in the far West. Another witness, G. T. Herndon, says that D. S. Squires two or three years before his death stated to him that "he had offered the three boys to go out and divide up the place to suit themselves, and that he would make the writing to correspond to their division." It is further shown by witness John M. Squires, a nephew of deceased, that deceased kept a memoranda of advancements made to his children, one item thereof reading as follows: "J. H. Dunn, September 10, 1903, 600—given to Mrs. Byrd C. Dunn as a balance due to her from my estate as a bequest." But it is not shown that he made any memorandum of the amount paid to his son Asa Squires. This omission, together with the fact that the release was still in the possession of the father at the time of his death, would go to negative the idea that he had intended the money paid to Asa to be treated simply as an advancement, as he evidently did in the case of his daughter, Mrs. Dunn. This witness also says that he heard D. S. Squires say in March, 1901,

"that he intended the land for the three boys." But, if this was the father's intention, there is no evidence that he ever made any effort by deed or will to execute it. That both father and son intended that the release should operate to bar the son from any right to participate as heir or distributee in the distribution of the father's estate is too clearly expressed in the writing to admit of any doubt, and that the son regarded it as having this effect is clearly shown by a letter written by him to his brother Olen more than a month after his father's death. This letter reads as follows: "Salt Lick Bridge, W. Va. 12/20/05. Dear Bro. Oly: I will try and write you a few lines hope this may find you all enjoying good health. Well Oly we have not found any will, don't suppose pa made any. He often talked of making one, but put it off too late. Now it is left to be divided amonth the children equal except me. I am cut out by a receipt I gave him in 1889. That's when I went in the store, he gave me $1235 00/100 in all & wrote the Recpt for my full amt. from his estate, but as it is I am satisfied. Now Oley the trouble is the amount of real estate he has been paying taxes on is 800: there is from 1000 ac to 1200 ac now if this land can't be divided up by the children & it has to go to law to be divided, you won't know when they will get done paying back tax. I think you will see the point when you study it over. I think it a good plan for you to write each of the heirs a letter & give them your views on the matter. Ma will be the admrx for the personal property. I will assist her. Want to fix it up as soon after Jan. as we can & will send you a statement the appraisement bill. Oly write to me at once & give us your views on the matter. We are all well. As ever, Asa." This letter is conclusive to show that there was never any understanding or agreement between the father and son that this release should be canceled, or that the money paid by the father to the son at the time the release was executed was to be treated simply as an advancement, and the son restored to his rights as an heir. The release was found among the papers of D. S. Squires which came to the hands of his wife as administratrix. That an heir by the execution of such a writing in consideration of money or property received by him from his father in his father's lifetime does release all his rights as heir or distributee of the father's estate has been expressly decided by this court in the case of Roberts v. Coleman, 37 W. Va. 143, 16 S. E. 482. That decision was later approved in the case of Coffman v. Coffman, 41 W. Va. 8, 23 S. E. 523. We think those decisions settled the law in this state on the point, and determine the present case.

The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, however, has taken a different view of the law in the case of Headrick v. McDowell, 102 Va. 124, 45 S. E. 804, 85 L. R. A. 578, 102 Am. St. Rep. 843, in which the point seems to have arisen for the first time in that court; and the reasons expressed in the opinion of the court in that case, delivered by Keith, P., are certainly cogent in support of the other view. The decisions are not uniform on the subject, and there are other high authorities in support of the view that such a writing shall only be taken as evidence of an advancement, and does not estop the heir from afterwards claiming as such. But our court in the case of Roberts v. Coleman, supra, when the question first arose in this state, found plenty of authority of equal respectability for the opposite view following the courts of Illinois and Massachusetts; and we regard the question as settled in this state, at least where there is more than one heir. But, suppose a case where there was but one heir, and he should execute such a release, and the ancestor should die intestate, seised and possessed of property, where would it go? Would not such a writing be as binding upon a sole heir as it would be upon one of many heirs? We do not now undertake to answer this question.

It is insisted that the fact that appellant, after executing the release, became a cripple for life by the loss of a leg, is a potent circumstance to show that the father did not intend to disinherit him. But we cannot see that this fact could have any weight in determining the effect to be given the writing. It was a voluntary act on the part of the son, and he has no right to complain of the apparent hardship. The execution of the writing had its possible advantages as well as disadvantages. If the father's estate had been worth much less than it really was, so that the money received by him would have amounted to more than the share of any one of the other children as heir or distributee, he could not have been compelled by them to refund any portion of it. He assumed the risk of losing for the present use of the money.

We find no error in the decrees, and affirm them.

VLASSERVITCH v. AUGUSTA & A.
RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 10, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 832*)—REHEARING.

Where only three members of the Supreme Court who heard an appeal were on the bench at the time it was to be decided, and they were not agreed, a reargument would be ordered at the next term under the rule requiring the concurrence of three justices to reverse a judgment.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Nicholas Vlasservitch against the Augusta & Aiken Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reargument ordered.

Boykin Wright, Geo. T. Jackson, and J. B. Salley, for appellant. Davis, Gunter & Gyles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Only three of the members of this court, who heard the appeal herein, are now on the bench, one of whom is of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, but the other two entertain a contrary view. As it requires a concurrence of three justices to reverse a judgment, it is necessary for a reargument of the case before the entire court.

It is therefore ordered that the case be set for a rehearing at the next term of this court, during the time assigned for the hearing of appeals from the second circuit. It is further ordered that the opinion herein be delivered to the reporter of this court for inspection solely by the respective counsel in the case.

STRAUSS v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 8, 1909.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 69*)—DELAY IN MESSAGE—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

The mere fact that the words "726 Pine St." were omitted from the address of the sendee in a telegram for some unaccountable reason, which resulted in delay in delivery, did not show intentional wrong or reckless disregard of the sender's rights warranting punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; C. G. Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Isaac Strauss against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

R. O. Purdy, for appellant. Lee & Moise, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence and intentional wrong on the part of the defendant in failing to deliver a telegram. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions under consideration, are as follows: "That on the 31st day of March, 1907, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant in the city of Sumter, in the county and state aforesaid, the following message: 'To Mr. Leon Clark, 726 Pine St., Wilmington, Del., Elma dangerously ill, not expected to live. Suggest come at once.' And the defendant received said message, and agreed to transport and deliver the same for its usual charges, to wit, 53 cents, which was paid by the plaintiff. That the said Leon Clark would have come to Sumter at once had said message been delivered to him, but although the said Leon Clark lived at 726 Pine St., in the city of Wilmington, Del., no effort was made to deliver said message, as plaintiff was informed and believes. That the defendant had notice, of the importance of said message by its terms, but the said defendant so negligently performed its duty in regard to the delivery of said telegram that it failed entirely to deliver the same. That Elma referred to was the son of the said Leon Clark, and was paying the plaintiff a visit, and died in his residence in the city of Sumter a few hours after the said message was sent." At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for $200.53, and the defendant appealed.

The practical question presented by the exceptions is whether there is any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages. There was testimony to the effect that the message was sent promptly to Wilmington, Del., and it was properly transmitted to Augusta, Ga., a relay station, but that when it reached Wilmington, it did not contain the words "726 Pine St."; that when the message was received in this shape, the office at Wilmington made diligent efforts to deliver it; that the directory at Wilmington was not published for the year 1907 at that time; that the operator at that office consulted the directory then in print, and found that a Leon Clark lived at 902 Orange street, and at 8:30 o'clock that night tried to deliver the message at that place, and found that it was not for any one there, and then at 9:45 o'clock, after again consulting the directory, attempted to deliver it at 838 Kirkwood street; that Leon Clark had removed from that place to 726 Pine street, about the 20th of February, 1907; that, being unable to locate Leon Clark that Sunday night, the Wilmington operator telegraphed to Sumter for a better address; that the Sumter office closed at 8 o'clock, and this message was not received until the next morning, and then the office at Wilmington was advised that the message had been transmitted from Sumter in proper form; that about 3 o'clock that night Elma died, and next morning the plaintiff telegraphed Leon Clark at 726 Pine St., Wilmington, Del., as follows: "Elma died three a. m. Should we hold body for your arrival or bring it to-night?" that this telegram was not received by plaintiff until 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 1st of April; and that the first telegram had not been delivered to Leon Clark when the plaintiff arrived in Wilmington with the body next day; that the defendant, not being able to find Leon Clark at 726 Pine street, and having been informed that he was working for the railroad company, it undertook to deliver the messages, and did finally do so, and practically at the same time. In response to the last-mentioned telegram the plaintiff received the following message from Leon Clark: "Come on to-night. Bring body with you." When the motion was made for a nonsuit, his honor, the presiding judge, stated that he would have granted it but for the fact that the words "726 Pine St." being absent from the telegram, were sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question of punitive damages. The foregoing statement of the testimony explains satisfactorily the delay on the part of the operator at Wilmington. In the absence of other circumstances the fact that the words were omitted, for some unaccountable reason, is not sufficient to show intentional wrong or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights.

In the case of Lathan v. Tel. Co., 75 S. C. 129, 55 S. E. 134, the entire name of the addressee was changed, and the message was delivered to his competitor in business. This court held that this afforded at least some evidence, of a reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights. Not only was there a change in the entire name of the addressee, but, coupled with the delivery to his competitor in business, tended to show an intention to injure. And, in the case of Walker v. Tel. Co., 75 S. C. 512, 56 S. E. 38, there was not only an entire change in the meaning of the message, but when the telegraph company was requested to repeat the telegram, it was not properly corrected. In that case the plaintiff was in New Orleans, La., and his wife was in Edgefield, S. C. She first sent him this message: "Wire your address after to-day. Baby had convulsions this morning. Resting now." To which he replied: "Be here to-morrow and Monday. Wire again to-night child's condition. Will come if needed." The following telegram was afterwards sent: "Toots desperately ill, convulsions. Better come." The message when received read: "Ties displayed, all convulsions better now." The repeated message was as follows: "Toots desperately, all convulsions better now." It will thus be seen that the facts of those cases are quite different from the facts of the case under consideration. The mere absence from the message of the words "726 Pine St." is not a sufficient basis for punitive damages, and his honor the circuit judge erred in not so ruling.

It is the judgment of this court, that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

ALEXANDER v. CAROLINA MILLS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 8, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*) — ASSUMPTION OF RISK—INFANT EMPLOYEES.

In an action for injuries to a mill employé 13 years of age, it was error to charge that the doctrine of assumption of risk did not apply.

2. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUING CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

No error can be predicated on parts of a charge which, considered in connection with the entire charge, are free from error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by Harley Alexander by S. M. Alexander, his guardian ad litem, against the Carolina Mills. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Haynsworth, Patterson & Blythe, for appellant. J. R. Martin, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by Harley Alexander, an infant, for injuries while in the employment of the defendant by reason of its negligence. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff, an infant then 13 years of age, was employed by defendant as a sweeper in its spinning room; that on the day of November, 1902, he was ordered by defendant to adjust a cap on the head gear of a spinning frame, which cap was defective, in that it had no handle; and that in the attempt to adjust it his hand was caught in the spinning gear and injured. The negligence alleged was (1) failing to furnish plaintiff with a safe place in which to work; (2) ordering him to place cap on the head gear of spinning frame; (3) in not requiring plaintiff to stay away from uncased and unprotected spinning frame; (4) in not warning plaintiff of the danger; (5) in failing to provide a safe and suitable cap. The defendant by its answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and interposed the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $350. There was a motion for a new trial, which was refused, and the plaintiff has appealed.

His honor, the presiding judge, charged the jury that the doctrine of assumption of risk had no application to the case. The appellant assigns error in this ruling. The cases of Goodwin v. Columbia Mills Co., 80 S. C. 349, 61 S. E. 390, and Shirley v. Furniture Co., 76 S. C. 452, 57 S. E. 178, 121 Am. St. Rep. 952, show that the ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, was erroneous.

The other exceptions assigning error in the portions of the charge therein set out cannot be sustained for the reason that, when said extracts from the charge are considered in connection with the entire charge, it will be seen that they are free from error.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

C. L. PACE & CO. v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 9, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 84*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

An order of the circuit court, made on appeal from a judgment of a magistrate, that the judgment of the magistrate be reversed and a new trial granted, is not appealable, as it does not determine any of the rights of the parties.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by C. L. Pace & Co. against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs on trial before a magistrate, and defendant appealed to the circuit court, where the judgment of the magistrate was reversed, and a new trial granted, and plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Jas. W. Johnson, for appellants. Montgomery & Lide, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages to a china closet and for $50 penalty. The case was tried before a magistrate, who (a jury trial being waived) rendered judgment for the amount claimed and costs, to wit, $66. The defendant appealed to the circuit court. On hearing the appeal, his honor, the circuit judge, ordered that the judgment of the magistrate be reversed, and that a new trial be granted, on the ground that there was no testimony that the goods alleged to have been damaged were injured while in the possession of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed from said order.

The case of Lamplsey v. Railway Co., 77 S. C. 319, 57 S. E. 1104, shows that said order is not appealable. The order does not determine any of the rights of the parties.

It is the judgment of this court that the appeal herein be dismissed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Lidia Owens, by her guardian ad litem, G. W. Owens, against the Laurens Cotton Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dial & Todd, for appellant. Cannon & Blackwell, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendant. The complaint contains the following allegations: "That Lidia Owens is a child of tender years, being about 11 years of age, and was employed by the defendant, the Laurens Cotton Mills, to work in said mill, and while employed as aforesaid, on or about the 18th day of February, 1907, being inexperienced in millwork and not aware of the danger of the machinery, and not being warned of the same, she was ordered by the defendant to oil the gearing cogs or wheel of one of the defendant's spinning frames, and while thus employed, and under the defendant's direction and supervision, and without any fault of her own, but on account of the willfulness and wantonness of this defendant, and by reason of its carelessness and negligence in not furnishing the said Lidia Owens a safe place to work and suitable appliances, her hand was caught in and between the cogs or cogwheels of one of defendant's spinning frames, or those connected thereto, and the index finger on the right hand was so badly crushed and lacerated that it was necessary to have the same amputated." There was testimony to the effect that the plaintiff was at the time of the injury about 10 years of age; that she was inexperienced in millwork, having worked only about three weeks; that she was not warned of the danger incident to her work; that it was her duty to oil the rollers, and that she was not furnished with a brush or other appliance for getting the oil; that the defendant, not only knew that she got oil from the gear cap of the spinning frame, but the section boss under whom she worked had ordered her to get oil from a gear cap about 10 minutes before the injury occurred, and told her in what position to place her finger in order to get it. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant made a motion for nonsuit on two grounds: First, because the testimony showed assumption of risk on the part of the plaintiff; and, second, because the testimony showed that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant.

In refusing the motion his honor, the presiding judge, said: "Mr. Featherstone, if this was a grown girl or a grown man, I would have no hesitation about granting your nonsuit under the case of Wofford. But she was of tender years, nine years old, and had been in the mill but three weeks. She was not entitled under the law to be there at all. I have no hesitation about my duty to refuse the motion."

The question as to punitive damages was eliminated from the consideration of the jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500.

The defendant appealed upon exceptions, assigning error in the refusal to grant the nonsuit, and in allowing a witness to testify that some of the boss men allowed other children to get oil out of the cups. The only grounds which can be considered in determining whether there was error in refusing the nonsuit are those that were relied upon when the motion was heard.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error in refusing the motion for nonsuit made on the ground that the testimony showed assumption of risk on the part of the plaintiff. Not only was the testimony conflicting, but the presumption is that an infant under 14 years of age is incapable of assuming risks of danger. Therefore his honor, the presiding judge, could not have granted the nonsuit without invading the province of the jury. The exception raising this question is overruled.

The next question for consideration is whether the testimony showed that the plaintiff was injured as the result of negligence on the part of a fellow servant. As the plaintiff was under 14 years of age, the presumption is that she could not assume the risk arising from the negligence of a fellow servant. Furthermore, there was testimony to the effect that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. It would therefore have been error for the presiding judge to have refused to submit the testimony to the jury.

The other exception was not argued, and therefore will not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 4, 1909.)

1. EQUITY (§ 450*)—BILL OF REVIEW.

A person interested in the subject-matter of a bill in equity and a decree thereon, but not made a party thereto, may, after final decree therein, file an original bill in the nature of a bill of review for correction of any adjudication therein to his prejudice and vindication of his rights in the premises, and have it treated as a cross-bill in the original cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 1095; Dec. Dig. § 450.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 465*)—BILL OF REVIEW.

Under its power of restitution, the court may make in such case any decree or order between the parties to the first bill, if made parties to the second, that may be necessary to the effectuation of equity and justice between them, whether there be specific prayers for such relief or not; it being based upon errors appearing in the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 1142; Dec. Dig. § 465.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 227*)—SALE BY PARTNER—INTEREST TRANSFERRED.

An assignment, sale, or transfer of the right, title, and interest of a partner in and to partnership property passes only the title of the individual partner, not that of the firm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 473½, 474; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 161*) — RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PERSONS.

If a copartnership extend only to certain property, and one of the members of the firm, having property of his own of the same kind, receive advances of money on account of his own property and his interest in the social property, the person making such advances is a creditor of the individual, but not of the firm.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County.

The Kanawha Hardwood Company tendered its petition in a suit by Noah Evans against J. H. Perrine praying to be made a defendant and to have its petition taken as a cross-bill against Evans, Perrine, and others. Decree for the Kanawha Hardwood Company, and Evans and another appeal. Reversed and remanded as to Evans.

H. B. Davenport and McWhorter & Loewenstein, for appellants. Linn & Byrne, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. J. H. Perrine, engaged in the manufacture of lumber and owning a sawmill and tramway, in Clay county, entered into a contract of copartnership with Noah Evans, the owner of timber on two tracts of land, containing in the aggregate about 100 acres, on the 23d day of January, 1900. Evans' timber and Perrine's mill and tramway were to be used without charge in the common enterprise, and they were to bestow their care and labor upon it and contribute equally to expenses, and share equally in profits and losses. Prior to the date of this contract, Perrine had been financed in his timber operations by the Kanawha Hardwood Company, a copartnership to whom he had furnished on account of the advancements considerable quantities of lumber. Their relations had been established by a contract dated August 11, 1899, purporting a sale by Perrine to said company of the lumber he then expected to cut, estimated at 100,000 feet, at certain prices therefor, delivered on board cars. At the date of execution of the contract $500 was advanced on the lumber. On February 21, 1900, the company had advanced and paid Perrine $3,391.23, and credited him with $2,064.07, leaving a balance due of $1,329.16, according to the testimony of J. Q. Barker, manager of the company. On that date, which was about a month after the formation of the partnership between Perrine and Evans, Barker went to Perrine's place of business to look after the company's interests, and, finding Perrine embarrassed by lack of funds, made a new contract, dated February 22, 1900, by which his company agreed to make further advancements, and purchased the mill, tramway, and all of Perrine's "right, title, and interest in and to the lumber" then on sticks, his "interest in and to" the timber already purchased, his rights of way, and his "right and title" to mill and lumber yards wherever located on Queen Shoals creek, but there was a provision for reconveyance in case Perrine should pay back the money advanced to him. Future advances were provided for not to exceed $9 per 1,000 feet for purchasing timber, cutting, hauling, sawing, and loading on cars. Of course, shipments were to continue, and the lumber, as received, was to be credited on the indebtedness. Evans was not expressly made a party to this contract, though interested as aforesaid. Barker says the company advanced $1,200 to Perrine on the next day, paid a freight bill of $32.17 on the 24th, and his note at a certain bank for $258.20 on the 26th. While matters were in this situation, C. C. Young, a creditor of Perrine, sued him in assumpsit for the sum of $354.15, and had an attachment levied on the lumber and timber about the mill and on the yards by D. H. Stephenson, a deputy sheriff, and it was subsequently sold under an order of the court pending the suit for the sum of $529.01, the Kanawha Hardwood Company becoming the purchaser, retaining the money and giving the sheriff its obligation, with the intention of resisting Young's claim to the fund on the ground of title to the property in the purchaser. Part of the property sold under the attachment belonged to Perrine and the residue to Perrine and Evans; the former bringing $150.67 and the latter $378.34. Later the attachment was quashed. In July, 1900, Evans brought his suit in equity, setting up the copartnership between himself and Perrine, and the proceeding in the action at law, resulting in the conversion of the social property into a fund in the hands of the sheriff, and praying a settlement and dissolution and a decree for the fund, less an amount sufficient to pay the firm debts. Such proceedings were had as resulted in a decree in his favor for $378.71 out of said fund, less the sheriff's commission thereon, $19.93. This decree was pronounced at the September term of the court, 1901. Before the expiration of that term, but after the entry of the decree, the Kanawha Hardwood Company, not having been made a party to the cause, came into court and tendered its petition, praying to be made a defendant and to have its petition taken and treated as a cross-bill against Evans, Perrine, Stephenson, and Young. The court took time to consider it, but adjourned without having acted upon it, and, at the ensuing December term, permitted it to be filed, over objections of Evans, remanding the cause to rules for process. At the May term, 1902, all the parties except Perrine appeared, waiving the issuance and service of process, and answers were filed by Evans and Stephenson, that of the latter showing he had paid Evans the fund in his hands arising from the sale of the partnership property, under the decree formerly made, and praying a decree against the Kanawha Hardwood Company for $529.01, the purchase money of the property sold. On these pleadings and the evidence taken, the decree complained of, allowing the Kanawha Hardwood Company to retain said sum of $529.01, and requiring Evans to repay to Stephenson the money received from him, was pronounced, and Evans and Stephenson have appealed from it.

The so-called cross-bill was really an original bill, having for its object correction of a decree in a cause to which the Kanawha Hardwood Company had not been a party, but to which it should have been made a defendant, as the object of Evans' bill had been to acquire the fund in the hands of said company. That decree was not binding on it, but it related to, and affected, the fund in its hands. Hence the new bill was germane to the old one, and may be termed an original bill in the nature of a bill of review. The decree made on the first bill, between Evans and Stephenson, became final as to them on the adjournment of the term, and could not be set aside, but subsequent proceedings on the new bill disclosed a miscarriage of justice due to Evans' failure to make necessary parties to his bill. Assuming that he was not entitled to that fund, the decree in his favor so wrongfully procured by him passed into his hands a fund under the control of the court and constructively in its possession. We think the court, seeing the erroneous and wrongful disposition of the fund, and having all the parties before it, could, under its power of restitution, decree repayment of it by Evans, though Stephenson did not ask it in his answer to the cross-bill. The decree was a mere order of restoration, based upon error, disclosed by the record, as the circuit court thought, rather than a pleading inter partes and prayer for relief. August v. Glimmer, 53 W. Va. 65, 44 S. E. 143; Brown v. Cunningham, 23 W. Va. 109; Eubank v. Ralls, 4 Leigh (Va.) 308. We think this principle answers fully the objection of want of pleadings between Stephenson and Evans as a basis for the decree between them.

The form of the contract of sale, purporting to pass only Perrine's right, title, and interest in and to the lumber, constitutes the basis of further complaint. Of course, it carried nothing beyond the extent of its terms. Jones v. Neale et al., 2 Pat. & H. (Va.) 339. However, if the cross-bill plaintiff can be regarded as a creditor of the firm in respect to the indebtedness due it, the decree is right, since the fund, constituting the social assets, is confessedly a partnership fund, as to which creditors have preference over members of the firm. The crucial question, therefore, is whether the advancements are to be regarded as having been made to Perrine or to the firm. Evans says he knows nothing of them, nor of the use of any of them in the manufacture of the partnership lumber. According to his testimony and the finding of the commissioner, on a reference under the first bill, he paid out for labor $561.98. His deposition was taken on the issues, made under the cross-bill, to the same general effect and no effort was made to show he had received this money from the advancements made to Perrine, or that he was not financially able to have made the payments from his own funds. He received from Perrine and sales of lumber $183.22, which may have been used in paying for labor, leaving, if it was, $378.76 paid out of his other funds. There was unpaid indebtedness, amounting to about $125. Besides the work of his teams, $555.20, and the money he paid Evans, Perrine paid out $131.27. Evans furnished the timber and Perrine the use of his mill and tramway, and each his services without charge. No doubt the principal part of the money received by Evans from Perrine and paid by Perrine for labor and timber came out of the advancements made to Perrine by the cross-bill plaintiff; but the extent to which it came from that source is impossible of ascertainment. Perrine seems to have been hopelessly embarrassed when these advancements were made, and most of the money must have gone to pay his individual debts. Barker says $258.20 went to pay Perrine's individual note, and it is not likely that $1,200 was needed for, or used in, the partnership business within a month after that business commenced. Assuming that the cost of manufacture and loading would be as much as $9 per 1,000 feet, these advancements were far in excess of the entire cost of manufacturing 100,000 feet of lumber, and must necessarily have been made to cover some of Perrine's individual indebtedness. If we could say the cross-bill plaintiff is a creditor of the firm, the extent to which the debt is a firm debt has not been ascertained, and this precludes recovery on that theory. Adding to this the circumstances of a contract on the faith of which the advancements were made, looking only to Perrine's interest in the property, and, in terms, binding only that interest, and Barker's knowledge that Evans claimed an interest in portions of the lumber, it seems clear that the advancements were made to Perrine individually, and not to the firm. The circuit court seems to have been of this opinion, for, in its decree, it says Evans has estopped himself by his conduct.

We find no evidence justifying the application of the principle of estoppel. Barker says he knew or was informed that Evans had an interest in some of the lumber. That was sufficient to put him on inquiry, and there seems to have been no difficulty in ascertaining the lumber in which he had an interest, nor the extent of the interest. Evans made no false or misleading representation, nor, indeed, any at all, beyond that, arising from his having put his timber into the mill under his agreement with Perrine, and of that Barker had sufficient notice to put him upon inquiry, and seems clearly to have respected that interest in framing the contract and making the advancements.

Under the contract between Perrine and Evans, each was entitled to one-half of the net proceeds or profits of the business. That is all either could dispose of on his individual account or for his individual benefit. That profit, as shown by the commissioner's report, as well as by the evidence, was $105.25, one-half of which sum the cross-bill plaintiff is entitled to, in addition to the sum of $150.67, proceeds of individual property of Perrine's sold by the sheriff, and constituting part of said sum of $529.01. Having had all the parties before it, the court should have ascertained the costs in the attachment suit in which the sale was made, and required Young, at whose instance they were incurred, to pay the same. This should now be done and provision for restitution made, allowing interest, but the preparation of such a decree will involve investigations, ascertainment of facts, and calculations that can be more easily and expeditiously made in the court below.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, with costs to the appellant Evans, and the cause remanded.

KIRBY et ux. v. STEELE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 27*)—PARTIES.

A person who conveys property to the wife of a debtor, by deed fraudulent as to creditors of the husband, is not a necessary party to a suit by a creditor to subject the land in the wife's hands to the husband's debt. Such grantor is a mere medium of transfer, not a party in interest.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Bill of review by T. R. Kirby and wife against L. L. Steele. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Blackwood & Sanders and Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for appellant. Switzer & Wyatt, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. L. L. Steele brought a chancery suit against T. R. Kirby and Mary J. Kirby, his wife, to make liable to a debt of Steele against T. R. Kirby a tract of land conveyed to Kirby's wife by L. B. Bowles. The facts are that Kirby owed Steele, and Steele obtained a judgment against Kirby. Kirby owned the tract of land, and made a deed of trust to Morris, trustee, to secure a debt to Bowles. Morris sold the land under the deed of trust, and Bowles purchased it, and the trustee conveyed to Bowles. Then Bowles conveyed the land to Mary J. Kirby. Steele's debt antedated these transactions. Steele's bill charged that Kirby and wife and Bowles formed a combination by which Kirby was to make the deed of trust to secure Bowles and default in payment, and that Bowles was to cause sale to be made under the trust, buy the land, and convey it to Kirby's wife, for the purpose of defrauding Steele out of his debt. It charged that the husband paid Bowles for the land. A decree was made subjecting the land to the debt of Steele, holding the right of Mrs. Kirby void as to the debt. Later Kirby and wife filed a bill of review to reverse the decree for error of law, and the court did reverse the decree and enjoin the sale directed by the decree and Steele appeals.

The court in its decree assigned as ground for reversal the fact that the trustee, Morris, "and the administrator and heirs of L. B. Bowles" were necessary parties. They were not. What interest had the trustee? The legal title had passed from him. Bowles was not a necessary party. The legal title had passed from him to Mrs. Kirby. His deed was valid as between him and her, and passed title to her, and is void only as to creditors, and Bowles is not a necessary party. Herzog v. Weller, 24 W. Va. 199. Hogg's Eq. Procedure, § 65, says that a person through whom the fraudulent conveyance passes, acting only as a medium to transfer title, is not a necessary party. Bowles had no title, and the decree does not touch his debt or interest. But where it is a question between fraudulent debtor, the grantor, and the grantee and creditor, the grantor being not a stranger acting as a mere medium, it is different. The grantor is in that case a necessary party. Herzog v. Weller, just cited, and many others in this court, say that a deed to a married woman is presumed fraudulent as to the husband's creditors, and she must prove that she paid for the conveyance out of her means. Not a particle of evidence meets this requirement.

We reverse the decree made upon the bill of review on the 10th day of November, 1906, and dismiss the bill of review.

THOMPSON & LIVELY v. MANN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 4, 1909.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 96*)—CONTRACTS OF ADMINISTRATOR—VALIDITY.

The general rule, subject to few exceptions, is that a personal representative cannot charge the estate by contracts originating with himself, although for the benefit and in the interest and on behalf of the estate; such contracts binding him only in his private capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 410; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 535*)—LIABILITIES ON BONDS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF ADJUDICATION AGAINST PRINCIPAL.

A judgment at law against an administrator de bonis testatoris on such contracts will not estop the surety on his fiduciary bond in a subsequent suit in equity to charge him with the payment of such judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 529*)—BOND OF ADMINISTRATOR—LIABILITY OF SURETY.

A surety on the fiduciary bond of a personal representative is not liable thereon for obligations of the fiduciary contracted after the death of the decedent, although in the interest and for the benefit of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 529.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 51*)—ASSETS—JUDGMENT IN ACTION FOR WRONGFUL DEATH.

Money recovered in an action by an administrator pursuant to sections 3488, 3489, Code 1906, for causing the death of his decedent by wrongful act, neglect, or default, does not constitute general assets of the estate of such decedent in the hands of the administrator to be administered, and liable for his debts, and a judgment at law against the administrator de bonis testatoris constitutes no lien or charge on such fund. Such money belongs to the particular persons who by law are entitled thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 530*)—SETTLEMENT BY ADMINISTRATOR—SURCHARGING SETTLEMENT.

Where an administrator has recovered and collected money in an action for causing the death of his decedent, and before an order has been made making allowance to the attorney employed in such action for fees, and appropriating and charging thereon a sufficient portion of such fund to pay the same, such administrator has settled his accounts, and been allowed and credited therein with a sufficient sum retained for attorney's fees to cover the fees of such attorney, but not paid to him, a court of equity in a suit by such attorney against the administrator and the surety on his fiduciary bond brought for that purpose will not surcharge and falsify such settlement, respecting the item credited therein for attorney's fees, so as to create a devastavit and render the surety in such fiduciary bond liable for and give decree against him for the amount of such fees. Thompson v. Nowlin, 51 W. Va. 346, 41 S. E. 178, and Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 480, 33 S. E. 310, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826, distinguished.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 21*)—TRIAL OF ISSUES—FORMAL REQUISITES—EFFECT OF AMBIGUITY.

A decree so ambiguous in its terms as to be incapable of being rendered certain within the requirements of the law will be set aside for that reason.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Summers County.

Bill by Thompson & Lively against T. G. Mann and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

T. N. Read and T. G. Mann, for appellants. Thompson & Lively, for appellees.

MILLER, P. This cause was here before upon an appeal by the same appellants from a final decree against them in favor of the plaintiffs. 53 W. Va. 432, 44 S. E. 246. The original bill was held bad principally for the reason that the judgment relied on appeared from the abstract thereof and the execution thereon exhibited with the bill to be a judgment against Mann, not as administrator, but against him individually, although describing him as administrator of the estate of Clarkson; such judgment not being enforceable against Flanagan, the surety, since he had not engaged for Mann's individual debt. Judge Brannon in the opinion pronounced on the former appeal says: "If the final judgment were before us, we might see that it was to be levied of the goods of the deceased in the hands of his administrator, but it is not before us." Numerous cases cited hold that notes, bonds, and contracts signed by and judgments given against persons in the descriptio personæ are individual contracts and obligations, not binding on the estate or person represented. The case is now before us upon the amended bill, and the final decree thereon in favor of the appellees. The amendment consisted solely in reciting the facts alleged in the original bill, and in filing as an exhibit therewith a certified copy of the judgment referred to, and a renewal of the prayer of the original bill. That judgment was de bonis testatoris for $250, the sum assessed by the jury, less $250 paid and the interest released, and costs, "to be levied of the estate, goods, and chattels of said Sherman Clark, alias H. C. Clarkson, deceased, in the hands of said T. G. Mann to be administered." The bill is framed as a general creditors' bill, to surcharge and falsify the administration accounts, and to show a devistavit, and to recover against the administrator and the surety on his bond the amount of the judgment at law against the principal. This calls upon us to determine the status of the plaintiffs. Are they general creditors of the estate of Clarkson, and entitled to maintain such a suit, or is their claim the individual debt of the administrator? It is a general rule of law, subject to few exceptions, that a personal representative cannot charge the estate by contracts originating with himself, although for the benefit and in the interest and on behalf of the estate, and that for such contracts and claims the remedy is against the executor or administrator in his private capacity; whilst, on the other hand, for the contracts of the decedent, the representative is bound not personally, but in his representative capacity. 2 Woerner, Amer. Law of Admin. § 356, *pp. 756, 757; Croswell on Ex. & Adms. §§ 656-660; Schouler on Ex. & Adms. 334, 335, and cases cited; Fitzhugh's Ex'r v. Fitzhugh, 11 Grat. (Va.) 302, 62 Am. Dec. 653; Dangerfield v. Smith, 83 Va. 81, 1 S. E. 599; 18 Cyc. 881; 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 932, and many cases cited in note 5. In Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 366, cited in this note the court says: "The rule must be regarded as well settled." In Fitzhugh's Ex'r v. Fitzhugh, supra, this rule was applied in a suit for funeral expenses, the court holding that a personal representative cannot be sued as such for services rendered or goods furnished to his testator's or intestate's estate since his death. It is also there decided upon the authority of 2 Saun. R. 117e, note, and Epes' Adm'r v. Dudley, 5 Rand. (Va.) 437, that promises which charge a man as executor cannot be joined with those which charge him personally because the judgment in the one case would be de bonis propriis and in the other de bonis testatoris. Mr. Schouler says: "This doctrine applies to a debt incurred by the representative in employing counsel to advise and assist him in the discharge of his duty"—and so says this court in Hall v. McGregor (decided at the present term) 64 S. E. 736. And Woerner says (page 756), citing many cases, that the estate is not liable to an attorney for his services at the instance of an executor or administrator, but that the latter is himself liable in a suit by the attorney. "Indeed," says Schouler, "the rule is that executors and administrators cannot, by virtue of their general powers as such, make any contract which at law will bind the estate and authorize a judgment de bonis decedentis; but for contracts made by them for necessary matters relating to the estate they are personally liable, and must see to it that they are reimbursed out of the assets." At page 473 he says: "In causes of action wholly accruing after his decedent's death, the personal representative is in general liable individually [citing De Valengin v. Duffy, 14 Pet. 282, 10 L. Ed. 457; Kerchner v. McRae, 80 N. C. 219]. And, wherever an action is brought against an executor or administrator, on promises said to have been made by him after the decedent's death, he is chargeable in his own right and not as representative [citing Wms. Ex. 1771; Cro. Eliz. 91; Cowp. 289; Jennings v. Newman, 4 T. R. 348; Clarke v. Alexander, 71 Ga. 500]." On the question whether funeral expenses constitute a claim against the estate of a decedent there is conflict of authority. 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1024, says: "By the great weight of authority the reasonable costs and charges of the funeral constitute a claim against the estate, or more properly a charge upon the estate for which the executor or administrator is liable as such to the extent of the assets in his hands. In such cases the law implies a promise to pay therefor." But this is opposed to the Virginia case cited. And we think it will be found that many of the cases depend on local statutes, or do not support the rule as stated. However, this question is not before us, and is not decided.

This rule upon due consideration seems a wise one. It furnishes proper protection to an estate against waste and extravagance of a personal representative, while working no injustice to him. Section 3280, Code 1906, provides for reimbursing a personal representative for debts contracted by him as such in the distribution of the estate. If he makes improper contracts binding on him personally, the estate is protected, because his disbursements out of the funds of the estate are subject to the scrutiny of the probate authorities, and his accounts may be surcharged and falsified by distributees, even after they have been approved on ex parte settlements thereof by probate officers. Edwards v. Love, 94 N. C. 365, 369; Seabright v. Seabright, 28 W. Va. 412. If, then, Mann is not liable to the plaintiffs in his representative capacity, and was not properly sued as such, the question comes: Is his surety on his fiduciary bond concluded by the judgment of the plaintiffs against Mann de bonis testatoris? The authorities seem to hold that, although the principal is estopped, the surety is not. Munford v. Overseers, 2 Rand. (Va.) 313, and note; Montague's Ex. v. Turpin's Adm'rs, 8 Grat. (Va.) 453; 2 Woerner, 757, 758, citing (note 8) Curtis v. National Bank, 39 Ohio St. 579; McLean v. McLean, 88 N. C. 394. In the Ohio case the question is pointedly decided. The surety was no party to the suit at law. The bill shows on its face that the contract was with Mann, though in the interest of the estate, was made after the death of his decedent, and binding, not the estate, but him personally. In State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 385, 389, 30 S. E. 67, 69, this court said that "judgments bind parties and privies in estate, but a surety is not a privy in estate with the principal; that it is not on the ground of privity that a surety is bound." In this state, says the court, "a judgment against a principal does not bind the surety as a general rule. It depends on the character of the bond." Instances are given where judgments against principals do bind the surety, but none of them include cases of sureties on administration bonds. They cover cases where bonds are given in legal proceedings conditioned to abide the result of the suit and the like. State v. Abbott, 63 W. Va. 189, 61 S. E. 369. "A judgment against the principal alone is as a general rule evidence against the surety of the fact of its recovery only, and not of any fact which it was necessary to find in order to recover such judgment." 2 Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, § 802, and note 32.

The record shows that the money which came to the hands of the administrator was money recovered for the death of the decedent by wrongful act, neglect, or default, an action which did not survive at common law to the estate of decedent, but one created by sections 3488, 3489, Code 1906. Wherefore this money did not constitute estate of the decedent in the hands of the administrator to be administered, and by the very terms of said statute it was not subject to any debts or liabilities of the deceased. Plaintiffs in their action at law and in this suit proceeded upon the theory that this fund was estate of the decedent, and they took their judgment de bonis testatoris, and they rely upon that judgment as binding the estate of the decedent. But the decedent does not appear to have had any estate to be bound. The judgment, therefore, can have no binding force or effect at law upon the fund in question, though it be conclusive as against the administrator, and that it is a debt of the decedent. In Richards v. Iron Works, 56 W. Va. 510, 513, 49 S. E. 438, quoting from Railroad Co. v. Swayne's Adm'r, 26 Ind. 484, it is said: "The action given by the statute is for causing the death by a wrongful act or omission in a case where the deceased might have maintained an action had he lived for an injury by the act or omission. The right of compensation for the bodily injury of the deceased which died with him remains extinct. The right of action created by the statute is founded on a new grievance, namely, causing the death, and is for the injury sustained thereby by the widow and children or next of kin of the deceased, for the damages must inure to their exclusive benefit. They are recovered in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, but do not become assets of the estate. The relation of the administrator to the fund when recovered is not that of the representative of the deceased, but of a trustee for the benefit of the widow and next of kin." And this case, in connection with the authorities cited, makes it clear that because the statute authorizes action by the administrator and collection of the fund the appointment of an administrator is for the sole purpose of collecting and receiving assets which will not be general assets of the estate of his intestate or liable for the debts, but which will belong to particular persons who by law or by contract with the deceased will be entitled thereto. We do not think, therefore, that the judgment gives the plaintiffs any better standing in a court of equity than if they had no judgment. That judgment does not bind this fund. It creates no lien upon it. It is not binding upon a court of equity or upon any court of probate as to the amount or justness of the claim, and whatever rights the plaintiffs may have of an equitable nature as against said fund must be determined independently of the judgment.

We are of opinion, however, that an administrator in a case like this, as in other cases of administration, has the right to be reimbursed and credited in his accounts as such, with commissions, and with all other reasonable costs and expenses of administration. These would, of course, include reasonable attorney's fees incurred in the prosecution of the suit. Otherwise no one could be found willing to act in such fiduciary capacity. Right and justice demand this. But as in other cases of administration the contract of the administrator is personal. He cannot bind the estate by his contracts in the one class of cases any more than in the other. But it is said this position is in conflict with previous decisions of this court in Thompson v. Nowlin, 51 W. Va. 346, 41 S. E. 178, and Crim v. England, 46 W. Va. 490, 33 S. E. 310, 76 Am. St. Rep. 826. We do not think so. Those cases do no more than hold that in equity and before an estate has been fully administered attorneys may by an original suit or in a pending proceeding intervene, and have an order made making application of a sufficient sum, and the administrator decreed to pay the same out of the assets in his hands; such order, if disobeyed, giving cause of action, at least in equity, against the administrator and the sureties on his fiduciary bond as for a devistavit. In Thompson v. Nowlin there had been no settlement of the administration accounts. There had been no allowance to the administrator for counsel fees, and the court went far, perhaps too far, in giving relief to counsel in that case.

In Crim v. England the attorneys had intervened and obtained an order of court making them an allowance, and charging it specifically upon the funds in the hands of the administrator yet to be administered. No other allowance had been made the administrator in his administration accounts by way of disbursement for counsel fees. But the case we have here is different. The bill and exhibits show that in his settlement before a commissioner of accounts he was allowed $950, retained for attorney's fees nearly half the entire amount recovered, and out of which plaintiffs admit they were paid $250, and they now seek by their bill to surcharge and falsify that item in the administrator's settlement to the extent at least of the amount of the judgment and costs recovered by them, so as to show a devistavit, and thereby render liable the surety upon the administration bond. Can they reasonably ask this action by a court of equity? We think not. We think it would be inequitable to go that far. Mann himself, the administrator, was an attorney, and plaintiffs were co-counsel with him. They trusted him personally. He is personally liable to them. They suffered him to settle his accounts as administrator and obtain credit against the estate for a large sum for counsel fees without having asserted any lien upon the fund, and without having obtained any order of the court making application of a sufficient portion thereof to pay them their fees, and we think it is now too late for them in this suit to be heard upon a bill to surcharge and falsify the settled account of the administrator for the sole purpose of fixing a liability upon the surety in the bond, but that they should be required to look solely to Mann, who is primarily liable to them for their fees.

The conclusions to which we are forced as to the status of the plaintiffs as creditors of the estate of Clarkson, and as to the liability of the surety upon the fiduciary bond of the administrator, and the disposition which will have to be made of the case upon this appeal, would seem to render it unnecessary to consider another serious question in relation to the decree appealed from. That decree adjudges that the plaintiffs Thompson & Lively recover of the defendant Mann, the administrator, to be levied of the goods and chattels of said decedent in his hands to be administered, and of the defendant Wm. G. Flanagan, the surety, on his official bond as such, "the sum of $317.50 and the further sum of $67.50, the amount of costs recovered against said administrator in the judgment of plaintiffs set up in this cause, together with all their costs in this behalf expended, including an attorney's fee of $20." The decree then says: "Said recoveries shall be credited by the amount of costs yet remaining unpaid recovered by the defendants against the plaintiffs in the Supreme Court of Appeals of this state, to wit, the sum of $14 due the circuit court for transcript, the further sum of $1.50 due H. Ewart, sheriff, for serving process, and the further sum of $30 for attorney's fees recovered aforesaid in the Supreme Court, and any other costs expended not herein specified, and execution is awarded said plaintiffs." Appellants claim that this decree is so ambiguous in its terms that it cannot be rendered certain within the requirements of the law, and is erroneous for uncertainty. In this position we think they are correct, and that the decree for this reason, if for none other, would have to be reversed. Humphrey's Adm'r v. West's Adm'rs, 3 Rand. (Va.) 516; Williams' Ex'r v. Strickler, 3 Call (Va.) 281; Stratton v. Assur. Soc., 6 Rand. (Va.) 22; Early v. Moore, 4 Munf. (Va.) 262.

What disposition then can properly be made of the case? If jurisdiction in equity could be maintained on any other ground, we might remand the cause to the circuit court to ascertain the correct amount due plaintiffs from defendant Mann, and for a decree against him therefor; but, the bill not being good as a bill to surcharge and falsify the accounts of the administrator, we do not see upon what equitable ground it can be retained for any purpose. There was demurrer to the bill overruled in the court below.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, we think the demurrer should have been sustained and the bill dismissed, and that will be the order here.

TAYLOR v. RUSSELL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 4, 1909. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1909.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 9*)—TITLE TO SUPPORT.

Except under special circumstances, a plaintiff in ejectment must for recovery have legal title and right to possession. An equitable title will not do.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 9*)—EVIDENCE.

A plaintiff in ejectment must recover upon the strength of his own title, not the weakness of the defendant's title.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 54*)—EXECUTORY CONTRACT—TITLE ACQUIRED.

Character of right conferred by an executory contract for sale of land discussed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Tyler County.
Action by W. T. Taylor against Frances Russell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Dave D. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. S. Bruce Hall, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. W. T. Taylor brought an action of ejectment in Tyler county against Frances Russell to recover a lot of land in the town of Sistersville. The case was tried by the court on agreed facts, and the court gave judgment for the defendant, and Taylor sued out a writ of error.

Taylor showed no right but a right under an agreement selling him the lot, and stipulating for a future conveyance of the legal title on payment of deferred purchase money, which agreement was made with Josephine B. Stone and others. He showed no legal, but only an equitable, title. That fact alone bars Taylor from recovery, because it is a settled rule in this state, and in Virginia, that a plaintiff in ejectment must have legal title. No matter whether he claims for years or life or in fee, it is a hard and fast general rule, except under special circumstances, that he must have legal title. A mere equity will not do. Chapman v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 54 W. Va. 193, 46 S. E. 262. There we find it stated in quotation from Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 770, that: "To enable the plaintiff to sustain this action, it is essential that he be clothed with the legal title and right of possession at the time the action is instituted. The plaintiff must always in the first instance make out a legal and possessory title to the premises in controversy." Suttle v. Railroad Co., 76 Va. 284; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 10, 482. There we find also the rule: "A plaintiff in ejectment must at the time of instituting his action, and at the time of its trial, have legal title to the land he sues for." 17 Cent. Dig. 1960; Warvelle, Ejectment, 244. The Supreme Court of the United States said in Fenn v. Holme, 21 How. 481, 483, 16 L. Ed. 198: "That the plaintiff in ejectment must in all cases prove a legal title to the premises in himself at the time of the demise made in the declaration, and that evidence of an equitable estate will not be sufficient for recovery, are principles so elementary and so familiar to the profession as to render unnecessary the citation of authority in support of them." Repeated in Langdon v. Sherwood, 124 U. S. 83, 8 Sup. Ct. 429, 31 L. Ed. 344. See many authorities cited in Cyclopedic Digest, Va. & W. Va. Reports, 878. Do we have to state this fundamental rule over again? A person who has a mere executory agreement for the purchase of land, not a deed conveying legal title, has a mere equitable title. A court of law does not know such a title. It is only the creature of a court of equity. A court of law regards only the legal title as to land. Prior to the statute found in Code 1906, c. 90, § 20 (section 3355), the vendor by executory contract selling land could turn out the vendee in possession even though he had paid the purchase money or performed other obligations resting on him under the contract. Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. (Va.) 475; Twyman v. Hawley, 24 Grat. (Va.) 512, 18 Am. Rep. 661. Why so?

Because a court of law knows nothing of an equitable title to land. The vendor holds the only title it knows. It will not enforce it, except by way of an action for damages for failure to convey, treating it as a contract calling for damages for its breach, but not as passing any land rights. We find in 6 Pomeroy, Eq. Remedy, § 838, this: "The effect of a contract to purchase is very different at law and in equity. At law the estate remains that of the vendor; and the money that of the vendee. It is not so here (in equity). The estate from the sealing of the contract is the real property of the vendee. It descends to his heirs. It is devisable by his will." See Warvelle on Ejectment, § 174. All the books tell us that in equity the vendor holds the legal title in trust for the vendee. Story's Eq. § 789. In fact, some of the authorities go so far as to say that such a contract gives no equitable title to the land even in equity until payment of the purchase money. "The oft-asserted proposition that from time of the contract for the sale of land the vendor as to the land becomes a trustee for the purchaser, and the latter as to the purchase money becomes a trustee for the vendor, who has a lien upon the land, while fully expressing the rule of equity in general application, it is nevertheless subject to some qualification. * * * The essential feature of an equitable title is that it is one which appeals to equity for confirmation and enforcement. Hence a mere contract or covenant to convey at a future time on the purchaser performing certain acts does not create an equitable title. It is only when the purchaser performs or tenders performance of all the acts necessary to entitle him to a deed that he has an equitable title and may compel a conveyance. Prior thereto he has, at best, only a contract for the land when he shall have performed his part of the agreement." Warvelle on Vendors, § 176. This is held in Chappell v. McKnight, 108 Ill. 570, upon reputable authority. Strictly speaking, it is not far wrong. At any rate, until a deed is made executing a contract, the vendee has no title in a law forum. This is so true that a vendee, unless the contract otherwise provides, cannot enter into possession. "There is no implied authority for the vendee to enter. The facts are opposed to the idea that he is to come into possession of the consideration before he has complied with the contract. When the contract is silent as to the possession of the land, it remains with the vendor. The vendee if in possession, unless the contract authorize it, is a mere licensee until he has performed the contract and is entitled to a conveyance." So states Newell on Ejectment, 157, upon many authorities. Warvelle on Ejectment says the same in section 145. This, though not so material here, goes to sustain the proposition that an equitable title will not sustain ejectment. Our own case of Supervisors v. Ellison, 8 W. Va. 308, holds that a vendee in an executory contract of purchase cannot maintain an action of unlawful detainer against the vendor for possession of the premises. So clear is it that an equitable title will not do in ejectment that it has been generally held that it is not even color of title for adverse possession, as will appear in McNeely v. South Penn., 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562, and Lewis v. Yates, 62 W. Va. 581, 59 S. E. 1073. Under our statute it is good for defense against an ejectment by the vendor against his vendee; but not good for an action by the vendee against his vendor. Between them it is a weapon of defense, but not of offense. As to strangers, much less is it a basis for ejectment by its owner. Warvelle on Ejectment, § 151, says that a vendee differs essentially from a tenant, and that the relation between the parties is not that of landlord and tenant.

This lot was sold under decree and purchased by Thorn, and by him taken possession of, and he conveyed to Frances Russell, and she went into actual possession. The decrees of sale and confirmation were reversed. Counsel say that makes void the title under the judicial sale. Suppose for argument that that title no longer exists. That is immaterial here, because the plaintiff has not shown title to recover in ejectment, and, no matter what the title of the defendant, she is in actual possession, and it is a fixed rule that the right of plaintiff to recover rests upon the sufficiency of his own title, and not upon the weakness of the defendant's title. Witten v. St. Clair, 27 W. Va. 762. It will not do for the defendant's counsel to sustain this action upon such cases as that just cited and Tapscott v. Cobb, 11 Grat. (Va.) 172. They say that when one in possession actual is entered upon and ousted by a mere intruder or trespasser, who has no color of title or authority to enter, the party ousted may recover in ejectment on mere possession. That doctrine does not apply. There is no evidence that Taylor was ousted by an intruder. When Thorn entered, he entered under a deed made under judicial sale, not yet affected by reversal. Entered peaceably. There is no evidence that he physically ousted or intruded upon the possession of Taylor. Taylor was not then in actual possession. The principle just stated applies only where there is one in actual possession intruded upon wrongfully by one having no shadow of title. It does not apply to parties having competitive rights or title, where the question is which is the better title. The Witten Case and the Supervisors Case, supra, repel this claim to recover.

So for want of legal title the plaintiff cannot recover. The defendant's right is not in question; and we therefore affirm the judgment.

SOUTH PENN COAL CO. v. MALE et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 589*)—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The supreme importance of a transaction to one of the persons engaged therein will, as a general rule, make his testimony of greater weight, because his memory is more trustworthy, than that of an adverse party, to whom the transaction is of less importance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 589.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—REVIEW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where a cause turns on the effect and weight of evidence, and credit of witnesses, and that evidence is such that reasonable men may differ as to its effect, an appellate court will not reverse the decree below based thereon.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill by the South Penn Coal Company against Reese Male and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hop Woods, for appellant. W. B. Kittle, for appellees.

MILLER, P. The South Penn Coal Company, a copartnership, by bill filed in December, 1905, seek specific execution of a contract made January 23, 1902, by defendants Reese Male and wife, whereby, in consideration of $25, paid, they agreed to sell and convey to plaintiffs by deed of general warranty, free from all incumbrances and defects of title, a tract of 25 acres of coal land in Barbour county, at the rate of $24 per acre, one-third cash on delivery of the deed, the balance in two equal annual payments, with interest, the plaintiff to have until May 1, 1902, to accept said option, and, if notice of acceptance should not be given the optioners before that date, the contract was to become null and void and of no further effect, but, should such notice be given, the contract was to become absolute and binding between the parties. Another object of the bill is to cancel and set aside as clouds on plaintiffs' right and title to said land a subsequent contract of sale of said land, made November 9, 1905, and a deed therefor made November 20, 1905, by said Male and wife to defendant William T. George. On final hearing on bill, answers, and depositions, the circuit court by its final decree appealed from dismissed plaintiff's bill, thereby denying them the relief prayed for.

A number of questions are raised and argued here, but the one on which all the others depend is whether plaintiffs, as charged in their bill and positively denied in the answer of the defendant Male, gave to said Male and wife notice of their acceptance of said contract within the time prescribed thereby. If this question be determined adversely to plaintiffs, it will be unnecessary to consider the other questions, for in that event they cannot be said to fairly arise on the record. To establish the fact of such notice before May 1, 1902, plaintiffs rely mainly on the testimony of W. W. Rainey, a member of said firm, who swears that on April 24, 1902, he served notice in writing on Male of the acceptance of said contract, the time, but place and circumstance not given, and he exhibits what he claims is a copy of the notice. The only return of service indorsed thereon, and identified by him as being in his handwriting, are the words, "Copy served by W. W. Rainey." This alleged return bears no date, was not sworn to at the time, and no other witness testifies to the fact of such service. The copy of the notice exhibited is addressed to "Reese and Martha Male," but there is no claim that any notice was served on Mrs. Male. J. N. Wilkinson, another member of the firm, swears that he prepared the notice, and that a copy thereof was served by Rainey; but he was not present, and his testimony is entitled to little weight on the fact of service. Plaintiffs also rely to some extent on a copy of a letter exhibited with the bill, alleged to have been written to defendant Male October 23, 1902, purporting to refer to a former letter, but not by reference to its date, calling Male's attention to certain specific liens on the land and other defects in his title, and requesting him to remove the same. Under each item in this letter is a memorandum showing releases or defects cured, except a deed of trust to W. B. Kittle of May 22, 1900, not released. The defendant Male in his answer does not deny having received such a letter. He simply says that all the liens and defects referred to had long since been released or corrected except the deed of trust to Kittle, which he says plaintiffs at the time of the contract of January 23d agreed to pay off and discharge for him out of the purchase money. So far as we can find, no reference is made to this letter in the testimony of the witnesses. Plaintiffs claim that Male's procurement of such releases after the date of that letter goes to show that he regarded his contract of January 23, 1902, binding, and supports their claim of notice to him of its acceptance. It is a circumstance we think to be considered in connection with the other evidence on this important question; but it is by no means conclusive, and we do not think it entitled to very great weight, for, admitting the letter to have been received by Male, it was long after plaintiff's rights would have expired without notice of acceptance given, and neither receipt of the letter, nor procurement by him of releases of liens or other defects in his title, could have in any way operated as a waiver of his rights under the contract, or estop him from denying any rights of plaintiffs not actually acquired by acceptance of the contract according to the provisions thereof. We may even assume that Male concluded on receipt of that letter to act on the suggestion to clear his title of defects, and that, if plaintiffs should come forward with their money and notes, he would let them have the land upon the terms of the contract, but no one would say that in law or equity he would have been bound to do so. More than two years elapsed after the date of this letter before the plaintiffs undertook to have said contract recorded. They first presented it for record October 23, 1905, after the business of buying and selling coal lands had revived, and they had learned that defendant George was buying lands in that vicinity. They did not actually get the contract on record until December 1, 1905, after George had purchased the land at an advanced price, and had actually had his contract and deed recorded.

Opposed to this testimony of the plaintiffs is the positive evidence of Male that notice of acceptance was never given him. Supporting him is the fact of long delay of plaintiffs in asserting their rights under the contract. Male swears positively that, besides want of notice of acceptance, no request or demand was ever made upon him for the abstract of title called for in the contract. Plaintiffs claim that by subsequent agreement with Male they agreed to abstract the title; but when was such an agreement made? They fail to prove it. And this suggests another very suspicious fact in connection with the alleged notice of acceptance. There is appended to the alleged copy of the notice exhibited with the bill a form of receipt, as follows: "Received of the South Penn Coal Company the sum of one dollar in addition to the sum of twenty-five dollars heretofore paid, as per receipt, on the purchase price of the said coal described in the above option, and we agree to execute proper deed for the same as soon as said company has the same properly surveyed, abstract of title made and all liens are removed, and deed prepared for proper signature; for which work we agree to allow the sum of _____ dollars, to be credited on said purchase money. This the 24th day of April, 1902." But this receipt was never signed by the optionors, or either of them. Why not? True, it is dated April 24, 1902, within the time for acceptance; but what the necessity for such receipt? Male was illiterate. He could neither read nor write. A most significant fact about this form of receipt is its recital of a new consideration of $1, and that it contains a new agreement to convey as soon as the plaintiffs should have the land properly surveyed, a deed prepared, abstract of title made, and all liens should be removed, "for which work we agree to allow the sum of _____ dollars, to be credited on said purchase money." "We" meant Male and wife, and that the receipt was to be signed by both, making a new contract at a time when the one now sought to be enforced was still operative. Rainey, though admitting that the memorandum of service on the notice is in his handwriting, does not distinctly say that that memorandum was made by him at the time. May it not have been made subsequently from his mistaken recollection of the fact of service. He had been engaged with his copartners in the business of buying and selling coal lands, and in serving notices, no doubt. Is it not reasonable to suppose that the notice was prepared by Wilkinson as he testifies, but not actually served, and laid away, and that afterwards when the question became important, and the notice was found among the papers, the indorsement of service was made by Rainey from faulty recollection? The doubt and uncertainty might have been cleared by evidence of the place and circumstances of service, or an explanation given as to why full return was not made and verified at the time, but Rainey says not a word about this. Another circumstance relied on by defendants is that Male was anxious to sell his land. Indeed, it appears there was necessity therefor, in order that he might pay off the deed of trust to Kittle in favor of Crim. Male admits that he inquired of Rainey several times whether they had his money for his land, but says Rainey made him no answer whether they would ever take it or not. Plaintiffs claim these inquiries amounted to an admission by Male that their contract was still in force. But defendants answer, and with force, that, if Male knew he had a binding contract with plaintiffs, he would have been advised to do what the record shows others did do, sue plaintiffs for specific execution. Before contracting or selling his land to George, Male says he gave a 10 days' option to W. F. McGee, and that he neither told McGee nor George at the time of making the contracts with them that he had previously optioned the land to plaintiffs, for the reason that their option had been out so long that he did not think it worth while.

On this state of the evidence counsel for plaintiffs inquire whether the evidence of an ignorant and illiterate witness like Male, who can neither read nor write, will be allowed to outweigh the testimony of intelligent witnesses like Rainey and Wilkinson as to the fact of notice? So far as the evidence of Wilkinson is concerned, it has little evidential force on the fact of service. He was not present, did not see the notice served, and, of course, his testimony as to the fact of service is necessarily hearsay and incompetent. This leaves Rainey and Male in direct conflict as to the fact of service. While Male admits his illiteracy, his evidence shows him far from ignorant. He appears to have more than ordinary intelligence for a man of his years and opportunities. With Male this was his most important business transaction. It involved all, or practically all, the property he owned. He had a pressing obligation existing against the land, requiring a sale thereof, while Rainey was engaged in many other and various transactions requiring his thought and attention. A rule of evidence applicable in such cases is that the supreme importance of a transaction to one of the persons engaged therein will make his testimony of greater weight, because his memory is more trustworthy than that of an adverse party to whom the transaction was of far less importance. 17 Cyc. 782, citing in note 13, among other cases, Platt v. Stewart, 19 Fed. Cases, No. 11,220, 13 Blatchf. 481. There is no documentary evidence controlling this material question of fact. The copy of the alleged notice is a document with which Male denies all connection, and the letter of October 23, 1902, has little bearing on the question, nothing, indeed, inconsistent with defendants' denial of notice. The fact of notice practically stands on conflicting oral evidence. In such cases the rule so often announced here, and lastly perhaps in Bank v. Thompson, 63 W. Va. 196, 59 S. E. 974, is applicable, namely, that "where a chancery cause turns on the effect and weight of evidence and credit of witnesses, and that evidence is such that reasonable men may differ as to its effect, the appellate court cannot reverse the circuit court's decree." While the decree below does not in terms find the fact of notice against plaintiffs, yet, as plaintiff's case practically depends on this important question of fact, we must dispose of the case on the assumption that the court below did so find.

Our conclusions, therefore, are that the decree below was right and to affirm it.

COOPER v. COOPER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 24*)—CONTRACT OF SUPPORT—LIABILITY OF DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

Equity will entertain a suit against the estate of a decedent by one whom deceased had bound himself by contract to maintain and support, and upon proper proof will grant relief by decreeing against his estate the reasonable cost of such support.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—CONTRACT—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

In order to establish such contract against the estate of a decedent, if it be by parol, the proof must be so clear, cogent, and convincing as to leave no doubt in the mind of the chancellor that the particular contract as averred was made, and its terms and conditions must be clearly shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 387-395; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 117*)—PLEADING AND PROOF.

The proof must conform to the averments of the bill. Plaintiff cannot allege an agreement made with a certain person and obtain relief by proving another agreement made with a different person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 377-381; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 139*)—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

The prochein ami, being liable for costs in the event the suit should terminate adversely to plaintiff, is not a competent witness, under section 3945, Code 1906, to prove a parol agreement made between himself and a deceased person, against the heirs at law of such deceased person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 593; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by Bertha Cooper, by her next friend, against John A. Cooper and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and petition dismissed.

Harding & Harding and W. W. Brannon, for appellants. W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Bertha Cooper, an infant, who sues by next friend, her mother, Gettie Purkey, files her bill against the administrator and heirs of John A. Cooper, deceased, to specifically enforce a contract, alleged to have been made for her benefit between said Cooper and her mother, against said estate, for her support until she arrives at "full age." The facts are these: John A. Cooper died intestate and unmarried about the last of December, 1903, leaving brothers, sisters, nieces, and nephews as his heirs at law and distributees. His personal property being insufficient for the payment of his debts, his administrator brought a suit in the circuit court of Randolph county for the sale of his land to pay them. After the payment of debts, there remained in the hands of the special commissioner a fund, derived from the sale of the land, amounting to $1,408.96.

Cooper was the father of a bastard child, who is the petitioner and appellee, Bertha Cooper, begotten of Gettie L. Vance. On the 8th day of May, 1897, in a bastardy proceeding in the circuit court of Randolph county by the county court of Randolph county, he was adjudged to pay to the county court, for the maintenance of the child, the sum of $60 and the costs of the suit, and the sum of $60 per annum for six successive years, payable on the 10th of May of each year, unless the child should sooner die; the first of the six payments falling due on the 10th day of May, 1898. He was required to give bond in the penalty of $800 with security for the faithful performance of the court's judgment, and did so on May 13, 1897. On the 22d of November, 1897, he appeared before the county court, by counsel, and moved to be released from the original bond, and to be allowed to substitute another bond in the penalty of $400 for the performance of other conditions, and this was allowed to be done. This order permitting it contains the following recital: "And it appearing to this court that said John A. Cooper has taken charge of said child, with the consent of said Gettie L. Vance to keep and maintain it, at his own expense, and has this day tendered a bond in the penalty of $400 executed by himself with Christian Cooper, Asa Cooper, and George W. Cooper, as sureties, conditioned that he will maintain said child. It is ordered that said bond be accepted in lieu of the bond executed by him before the circuit court, and that he and his sureties in said original bond be released from all liability under the same." Cooper then took the child and placed it in the home of his brother, who kept it, and took care of it, until April next after the death of said Cooper. The child's mother, whose maiden name was Vance, having in the meantime married one George F. Purkey, then took it to her own home. Pending the suit by the administrator for the settlement of Cooper's estate, plaintiff filed her petition therein, against the heirs of John A. Cooper, deceased, claiming the balance of the estate after payment of debts, on the ground that the alleged agreement made her his adopted daughter, and, if it did not amount to adoption, it at least entitled her to support and maintenance out of said fund until she should arrive at the age of 21 years. The petition does not aver whether, or not, the agreement was in writing and signed by Cooper, but contains the following averment in relation thereto, viz.: "That after the said judgment had been rendered against said John A. Cooper as aforesaid, and when petitioner was about 16 months old, the said John A. Cooper entered into a contract and agreement with petitioner's said mother, whereby petitioner was given into his custody and control with the express agreement and understanding that he was to take petitioner, provide her with a home and with a support suitable to her age and condition until she arrived of full age and able to take care of herself, and not only did he agree to do this, but he also gave her his name, and agreed and promised to adopt her as his child, and did take her under his control, did, as long as he lived, provide her with a home and support suitable to her age and condition, did give her his name, but failed to formally adopt petitioner as his child in the way and manner provided by the statute regulating the adoption of children."

Defendants demurred to and answered the petition. In the answer they admit that

Cooper had taken care of, and provided for, petitioner at the home of a relative of his for about six years; but they deny the alleged agreement that he was to take care of her for any longer time than the six years during which he was obligated by the judgment of the circuit court to pay $60 a year to the county court for her maintenance. They also deny that he gave her his name, or that he ever promised to adopt her as his child. The demurrer does not appear to have been directly passed upon. On the 10th of September, 1906, the two causes were heard together, the petitioner's cause being heard upon the bill, answer, and replication, and the depositions of witnesses taken on behalf of both parties; and the court decreed petitioner her reasonable support out of said Cooper's estate, and directed the special commissioner to pay the funds in his hands belonging to the estate over to the general receiver of the court, and the general receiver was directed to lend it, subject to the future order of the court. The cause was referred to a commissioner to ascertain what would be a reasonable sum to be paid annually for the support of the child, and he ascertained and reported that $75 a year would be a reasonable amount, and on the 23d of January, 1907, a final decree was made confirming the report and directing the general receiver to pay to G. F. Purkey, guardian for petitioner, the sum of $75 a year, until she should arrive at the age of 21 years. The decree further found that four annual payments were then due, making $300, which sum the receiver was directed to pay to the guardian at that time. From these two decrees the heirs of John A. Cooper obtained an appeal and supersedeas.

The decree passing up the merits, in effect, overrules the demurrer. Bantz v. Basnett, 12 W. Va. 772; Craig v. Craig, 54 W. Va. 183, 46 S. E. 371. It is insisted that it should have been sustained. We do not think so. The bill avers sufficient matter to entitle plaintiff to some relief, even if not the full relief prayed for, and, under the prayer for general relief, she might obtain some other relief. The averments of the bill, if sufficiently established by evidence, would entitle plaintiff to a decree for her yearly support until she arrives at the age of 21 years, provided she live so long. Equity has jurisdiction, and the bill is good on demurrer. Ralphsnyder v. Ralphsnyder, 17 W. Va. 28; Rex v. Creel, 22 W. Va. 373; Billingsley v. Clelland, 41 W. Va. 234, 23 S. E. 812; Jangraw v. Perkins, 77 Vt. 375, 60 Atl. 385. The bill alleges that, after said Cooper promised to support the child, he was released from paying the $60 a year to the county court. This is sufficient consideration to support the promise. Defendants admit that John A. Cooper made a contract to support plaintiff, but allege that it bound him for a period of six years only. They deny that he made the contract alleged in the petition. This brings us to a consideration of the evidence.

The material allegations of the bill are denied, and the burden of proof rests upon plaintiff. The child's mother, who is also her next friend, and Leslie Harding, deputy clerk of the county court, are the only witnesses who testify in behalf of plaintiff. The latter was introduced only to prove the loss of the second bond executed by Cooper before the county court, and inability to find it. The testimony of plaintiff's mother was objected to on account of the relationship existing between witness and deceased. We do not think this a valid objection. Neither the relationship between Cooper and the witness, nor the fact that the promise was made for the benefit of witness' child, would exclude her from testifying. She could not, for these reasons, be said to have such an interest in the result of the suit as would render her incompetent under section 3945, Code 1906. Godine v. Kidd, 64 Hun, 585, 19 N. Y. Supp. 335, was a case very similar to the present, and the court there permitted the mother to give testimony to prove a personal contract made between herself and deceased for the benefit of her child, and under a statute similar to our own, prohibiting "a person from, through, or under whom a party derives his interest or title, by assignment or otherwise, to be examined as a witness in behalf of the party succeeding to his title or interest, against a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person, concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person." But having objected to the testimony for one reason, appellants are not precluded from now assigning a different one. Neither would they be precluded from raising the objection for the first time in this court, when the admissibility of the testimony depends on competency of a witness. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. 611; and Woodville v. Woodville, 63 W. Va. 286, 60 S. E. 140. But the witness, being next friend to the plaintiff, is liable for costs. Fisher v. Bell (decided at the present term) 63 S. E. 620. This shows her to have such an interest in the result of the suit as disqualifies her as a witness to prove the contract between herself and John A. Cooper, deceased. The common-law rule excluding parties in interest from testifying in any case embraced all persons having any interest at stake in the suit whatsoever, even though it extended only to a liability for costs, and included a prochein ami, guardian, executor, etc. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 347; 3 Jones on Evidence, § 745; 30 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 911; Clutterback v. Huntingbower, 1 Strange, 506; James v. Hatfield, 1 Strange, 548; Hopkins v. Neal, 2 Strange, 1026; Cogbill v. Cogbill, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 467. Section 3945, Code 1906, removing the common-law disability, excepts testimony of a witness "in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, insane or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee or survivor of such person or the assignee or committee of such insane person or lunatic." As to such testimony the rule of the common law still obtains. She was therefore incompetent to prove the contract, and her evidence should have been excluded.

But appellee relies upon the recitals, as evidence, made in the order of the county court of Randolph county, made on November 22, 1897, whereby Cooper was discharged from the original bond and was allowed to file instead a bond in the sum of $400. The order does not recite the agreement that is averred in the bill. It simply recites that it was made with the mother's consent, and that Cooper had tendered a bond in the penalty of $400 with security "conditioned that he will maintain said child." It does not say he was to maintain the child until it arrived at the age of 21 years, or "full age," which means the same thing. 1 A. & E. E. L. (2d Ed.) 927, note 1; Hamlin v. Stevenson, 4 Dana (Ky.) 597; Est. of Kohne, dec'd (Pa.) 1 Parson's Select Cases, 399. Nor does it say he was to maintain the child only for the length of time during which he was bound to pay to the county court the sum of $60 a year for the maintenance of the child, which by the judgment of the circuit court was for six years. This time only lacked a month of expiration when the mother of the child says she took it from Lige Cooper's, where it had been kept and cared for; but the recital in the order shows that the new bond was given in lieu of the old one which was given for the benefit of the county court. It therefore tends to prove a different contract from the one averred in the petition. Plaintiff cannot aver one cause of action, or suit, and be allowed to prove a different one. The rule that the allegata and probata must correspond applies to suits in equity as well as to actions at law. Floyd v. Jones, 19 W. Va. 359; Baugher v. Eichelberger, 11 W. Va. 217; Pligg v. Corder, 12 Leigh (Va.) 69. Before a court of equity will specifically enforce a parol agreement of this nature against the estate of a decedent, it must be established by evidence that is clear, cogent, and convincing. Godine v. Kidd, 64 Hun, 585, 19 N. Y. Supp. 335; Wallace v. Rappleye, 103 Ill. 229. In Grantham v. Gossett, 182 Mo. 651, 81 S. W. 895, it is held: "An oral contract by a foster parent to take a child into his family, treat her as his own child, and let her share in his estate equally with his own children, must be proven by proof so clear, cogent, and convincing as to leave no doubt in the mind of the chancellor, not only that a contract of the general nature alleged was made, but that the particular contract as alleged was made, and its terms and conditions must be clearly shown."

Plaintiff has failed to establish a prima facie case, and it is therefore unnecessary to discuss the objections made by plaintiff to defendants' evidence. If we could see that petitioner's evidence was sufficient to entitle her to relief if her pleadings were made to conform thereto, we might, according to the practice of this court, remand the cause with leave to plaintiff to amend her petition; but it clearly appears that she cannot aid her cause even by an amendment.

We reverse the decrees appealed from in so far as they give petitioner any recovery against the estate of John A. Cooper, deceased, and will enter a decree here dismissing appellee's petition.

BERNS v. SHAW.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

1. EQUITY (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—MONEY LOST IN GAMING CONTRACTS—RECOVERY.

Courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in suits to recover back money lost in gaming contracts, regardless of the question of necessity for discovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. GAMING (§ 17*)—PARTNERSHIP—GAMBLING BUSINESS.

As a general rule there can be no partnership in an illegal business. This includes the business of gambling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. GAMING (§ 26*)—PERSONS ENGAGED IN BUSINESS—JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

Where two or more persons engaged in the business of gambling, by whatever arrangement the business is conducted, if all are to share in the profits, and money is lost to them, they are all joint tort-feasors, and liable jointly or severally, and may be sued jointly or severally by the loser to recover the money lost to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

4. GAMING (§ 41*)—RECOVERING BACK MONEY LOST IN GAMING—CROSS-BILL.

In a suit in equity by one to recover back money lost by him to another in a gambling contract, the defendant may, by a cross-bill or a cross-answer, also recover back money lost by him to plaintiff in such gambling contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.
Bill by Charles Berns against A. E. Shaw.
Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

Cornwell & Abbatichio, for appellant. C. Powell and Harry Shaw, for appellee.

MILLER, P. This is a suit in equity under sections 3435 and 3437, Code 1906, to recover $335 alleged to have been lost by plaintiff to defendant in March, 1904, in playing the game called "roulette." The suit was commenced in the intermediate court of Marion county, where on bill, answer, and proof the plaintiff's bill was dismissed on the ground, as recited in the decree appealed from, that the suit could not be maintained against defendant alone, the evidence showing that D. E. Thomas was a partner with Shaw in the transaction and a necessary party to the suit, and upon his petition presented to the circuit court the plaintiff was denied an appeal and supersedeas to said decree, and he has brought the case here.

The appellee claims that, regardless of the reason given by the intermediate court therefore, the decree dismissing the bill was clearly right for want of equity and should have been dismissed on demurrer. This presents the question argued here on both sides whether the remedy in equity given by section 3437 is cumulative of the remedy at law given by the preceding section 3436, or is available only where some discovery is necessary and the remedy at law inadequate. Said section 3437 provides: "Such loser may file a bill in equity against such winner, who shall answer the same, and upon discovery and repayment of the money or property so won, or its value, such winner shall be discharged from any forfeiture or punishment which he may have incurred for winning the same." The appellee insists that, as the bill shows no necessity for discovery, but, on the contrary, that plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, given by section 3436, a court of equity is without jurisdiction. The allegations of the bill in effect simply charge that plaintiff lost to defendant the said sum of money, and prays for a discovery by defendant of the money so won by him from plaintiff and for a decree for the money.

These statutes have come down to us through Virginia, practically unchanged, from St. 9 Anne, c. 14, 2 Kelly's Rev. St. Ann. W. Va. p. 646; White v. Washington's Ex'r, 5 Grat. (Va.) 645. Story says (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 303, p. 307), referring to jurisdiction in equity to suppress gaming contracts: "No one has doubted that under such circumstances a bill in equity might be maintained to have any gaming security delivered up and canceled; but it was at one time held that, if the money were actually paid in a case of gaming, courts of equity ought not to assist the loser to recover it back upon the ground that he is particeps criminis." And in section 304 he says: "But it is difficult to perceive why upon principle the money should not be recoverable back in furtherance of a great public policy, independently of any statutable provision. It has been decided that, if money is paid upon a gaming security, it may be recovered back, for the security is utterly void. Why is not the original gaming contract equally void? And, if it be, why is it not equally within the rule, and the policy on which the rule is founded?" To the same effect is 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 941. It would thus seem that independently of statute such cases were within the domain of original equity jurisdiction, and that the statute was unnecessary to confer jurisdiction; but, in states like ours, which have adopted the provision of the Statute of Anne, the question of equity jurisdiction, it seems, is no longer a subject of doubt or controversy. White v. Washington, supra; Bonner v. Montgomery, 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 123; 20 Cyc. 955, and other cases cited in notes. As before the statute jurisdiction to recover back money paid in execution of a gaming contract was in equity alone, it is by virtue of the statute that courts of law now have concurrent jurisdiction. In the well-considered case of McKinney v. Pope's Adm'r, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 98, the policy and purposes of these statutes is considered, and the previous case of Downs v. Quarles, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 489, 12 Am. Dec. 337, is referred to, in which latter case the bill alleged the necessity of a discovery which the courts say possibly might have been deemed a ground for taking jurisdiction if there had been a legal remedy under the statute. "But," says the court, at page 98 of 3 B. Mon., "the question formally stated by the court, after showing that there was no remedy under the statutes, seems to relate to the general power and jurisdiction of a court of equity to decree the restitution of money paid on a gaming contract, which question is unaffected by the mere fact that a discovery might or might not be necessary in the particular case. The solution of the question is made to turn, not upon the want of jurisdiction in the court to decree the money to the loser, if he had been equitably entitled to it, but upon the absence of a right to recover, arising from the equality of his guilt, and upon the doubtful propriety, with a view to the policy of suppressing the vice of gaming, of restoring to the loser the money which he has paid." The case of Downs v. Quarles was decided before the statute of Kentucky of 1833. In considering the effect of the statute, the Kentucky court in this case further says: "Then the question whether the objects of the statute will be promoted by restoring to the loser his losses is closed, and the courts, both of law and equity, are bound to advance the object by using their appropriate powers in advancement of the means adopted by the Legislature." And the court in that case, in deciding the exact question we have here in favor of the concurrent jurisdiction in equity to recover back money lost in gaming, says: "The court then has jurisdiction to grant this relief in the case of gaming, by analogy, and because it has jurisdiction in like cases. And it is not too liberal a construction of the statute, which gives the right to sue 'in any court having jurisdiction in like cases,' without intimating any preference for the remedy at law, to say that, as the court of equity had jurisdiction in like cases, the right of suing in that forum, as well as in the court of law, is expressly given by the statute. It may be added that it has been maintained by eminent jurists that, independently of any statutory provision for the recovery of money lost at gaming, it should be recoverable back, because it is in furtherance of a great public policy (1 Story's Equity, 303), and consequently that the court of equity should have granted such relief."

We think this case states the law correctly. But has the plaintiff made out a case entitling him to relief? The intermediate court evidently thought Thomas a partner, and therefore a necessary party to the suit, and denied relief on that ground. As a general rule there can be no partnership in an illegal business. This includes gambling. Parsons on Partnership, § 8, and note; George on Partnership, 25. Illegality of a partnership, however, affords no reason why it should not be sued on a transaction with it that is legal in itself. 1 Lindley on Partnership (4th Ed.) star page 200. There was no plea in abatement, however, nor is there any defense in the answer on account of the nonjoinder of Thomas. The answer of defendant is not that the claim sued for is a partnership obligation, and that the action should abate because of nonjoinder of Thomas, but that the money alleged to have been lost by plaintiff was lost to Thomas and not to him. Shaw denies the partnership and claims that Thomas and not himself was engaged in the gambling business. So we need not consider the question of partnership or partnership liability. The question does not fairly arise.

The statute gives right of action against the person to whom the money is lost. The question then is: To whom did plaintiff lose his money? It is admitted that he lost it, and that, when he lost it, Thomas was in charge of the roulette wheel on which the game was played, and the evidence shows that the money plaintiff lost was paid to Thomas and put in a drawer belonging to defendant. It is admitted the place where the gambling was done was the place of business of defendant, and that the wheel on which the game was played and all the furniture and other paraphernalia belonged to him. And Thomas, when asked on cross-examination in whose name the business was being run, said that he did not know whether there was any name attached to it, that there hardly ever is, that nobody is anxious to assume it, that the contract between defendant and himself was that Shaw was to furnish the room, lights, and the money to back the games with, and that he should take the place, manage it, and divide the proceeds. He says he was supposed to handle the money, and that Shaw was incompetent to run the gambling room. But the evidence shows that, a night or two after plaintiff lost his money, Shaw was himself in charge of the wheel, when defendant lost to plaintiff between $250 and $300, and gave to plaintiff his check on a bank for $246.75 part thereof, but on which he stopped payment before the check could be presented for payment. True it is defendant undertakes to explain his management of the wheel on this particular night by saying that, in the absence of Thomas, plaintiff persuaded him to open the wheel; but plaintiff denies this. Both defendant and Thomas admit that they were to share in the profits. This being so, plaintiff lost his money as much to defendant as he did to Thomas. By the terms of their agreement they both must have shared in the money which plaintiff lost, and, whether we treat them as copartners or as standing in the relation of principal and agent, the law makes them joint tort-feasors and liable either jointly or severally to plaintiff. Preston v. Hutchinson, 29 Vt. 144; Johnson v. Chapman, 43 W. Va. 639, 28 S. E. 744; 20 Cyc. 959. In 1 Page on Contracts, 839, it is said: "If the wager is illegal as well as void, the agent cannot recover for services or advances, since, properly speaking, there is no agency in illegal acts, but all are joint wrong-doers." While these authorities make Shaw and Thomas joint conspirators or joint tort-feasors and liable jointly, they also make them liable severally, and each is liable, we think, under the statute.

But in the answer of the defendant he seeks a cross-recovery against plaintiff for $40 alleged to have been lost by him to plaintiff on the night he operated the wheel. Plaintiff in his reply thereto denies this, and his counsel contends that no such right is available in this suit. Why not? If he has made out a case against plaintiff by proof, the Kentucky case of McKinney v. Pope's Adm'r, supra, is direct authority that a defendant may recover on a cross-bill for money lost to plaintiff. Section 3855, Code 1906, we think gives him the same right by a cross-answer.

But has the defendant made out by proof a case for cross-relief? He testifies that he paid this money to plaintiff through Thomas the night he gave plaintiff his check for $246.75. Plaintiff admits that the defendant paid him $40 at that time, but says positively that this was money he had paid defendant for checks. Shaw claims the $40 lost by him to plaintiff was covered by $100 paid by him at the time through Thomas to plaintiff's brother, and Thomas says that the way he came to pay the brother was that he had checks to cash in calling for $100. He says, moreover, that the plaintiff and his brother were betting together; but whether these checks represent winnings, or part winnings and part money paid in for checks, is not clear. If plaintiff and his brother were playing together, and the $40 represented winnings, we think both would be liable to defendant upon the principles already announced. Both would then be joint tort-feasors. But plaintiff positively swears that the $40 he got personally was the amount he had paid for checks. He admits that he furnished some checks to his brother, but he thinks his brother lost some money before he went into the game. Inasmuch as Thomas gave the $100 to plaintiff's brother, and inasmuch as he declared the game off as having been played unfairly, and defendant stopped payment on his check, the evidence as a whole supports the claim of the plaintiff, rather than that of defendant, that the plaintiff got back only the money he had actually paid for checks, and that the money paid him and his brother did not represent losses of defendant to them. As the burden was on defendant to make out his case by a clear preponderance of the evidence, we find the fact against him on this issue.

We are therefore of opinion, upon the whole case, to reverse the judgment below and to pronounce the decree here which we think the intermediate court should have pronounced, that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $388.80, being the principal sum lost, with interest to the date of the judgment appealed from, with interest thereon from the 28th day of November, 1906, the date of said decree, together with his costs by him in this court and in the intermediate court in this behalf expended.

An affidavit for order of publication, based upon the third instance mentioned in section 11, c. 124, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 3813), is sufficient if its phraseology reasonably imports that process against the defendants as to whom publication is sought was twice directed and delivered, more than 10 days before the return day, to the officer of the county in which such defendants resided at the time, and has been returned without being executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. PROCESS (§ 63*)—PERSONAL SERVICE—AFTER PUBLICATION.

If an action, embracing an attachment, has been properly matured against a defendant upon constructive service of process by publication, a personal summons may afterwards be issued and served on that defendant at any time, pending the action, such direct service can be had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. APPEARANCE (§ 19*)—EFFECT.

An appearance in an action, solely for the purpose of attacking the sufficiency of process, does not, if unsuccessful, submit the party so appearing to the court generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

4. APPEARANCE (§ 9*)—SPECIAL APPEARANCE—EFFECT.

A defendant, who appears specially and moves to quash an attachment of his property in the action, for insufficiency of the proceedings, does not thereby, if the motion should fail, make a general appearance in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 253*)—EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW OF RULING AS TO PLEADING.

The rejection of a plea will be waived if no exception is taken thereto. In such case, the rejected plea is no part of the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1488; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Wood County.

Action by the United States Oil & Gas Well Supply Company against J. A. Gartlan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Dave D. Johnson, Chas. A. Smith, and Edward McSweeney, for plaintiff in error. Van Winkle & Ambler and A. G. Patton, for defendants in error.

ROBINSON, J. The attachment in this case was sustained by a decision of this court reported in 58 W. Va. 267, 52 S. E. 524. But the sufficiency of the affidavit for the order of publication against defendants was not then in question. That question of the sufficiency of constructive service of process by publication now arises. After the case was remanded, defendants appeared specially, and moved to quash the affidavit upon which the publication against defendants was had. The motion was sustained.

We are of opinion that the affidavit is sufficient. Constructive service of process, maturing the action so far as its reaching the attached effects is concerned, was properly had. To quash the affidavit was error. The affidavit is justified by section 7, c. 106, and section 11, c. 124, of the Code of 1899 (Code 1906, §§ 3542, 3813). It recites the issuance of the attachment, and the return thereof as executed. It also sets forth that process, directed to the officer of the county in which defendants resided, was twice delivered to such officer more than 10 days before the return day, and had been returned without being executed. The objection advanced is that the affidavit says that process was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county in which the two defendants "resided," whereas the statute uses the present tense, "resides." The plain purport of that statute is that, to support an order of publication, the process shall have been directed and twice delivered, more than 10 days before the return day, to the officer of the county in which the defendants resided at the time the process is so delivered, and shall have been returned without being executed. The affidavit substantially sets forth this fact. It says that the process in each instance was directed to the sheriff of Wood county and by that sheriff returned "not found," that the defendants resided in Wood county, and that "process was properly placed in the hands of the sheriff of said county in which said defendants resided twice more than 10 days before the return day of said process, and have been returned without being executed." It is insisted that this language does not show when defendants resided in Wood county; that such residence may have been long before the direction or delivery of the process to the sheriff. This contention seems extreme. The context of the phraseology used reasonably imports that the defendants resided in Wood county at the time the process was directed to the officer, delivered to him, and returned "not found" by him. If the present tense had been used it would have related to the date of the affidavit, not to the time mentioned in the statute. It was necessary to use the past tense to refer to the time spoken of in the affidavit. It most necessarily speaks of facts that existed before the affidavit was made, and must use the past tense.

The order quashing the affidavit also directed that the action should abate, unless it was matured by order of publication, or other process, within 60 days. No new affidavit was filed. Thereafter writs of summons were again sued out. One was served on defendant Gartlan, as a nonresident, in Pennsylvania. Another, directed to the sheriff of Lewis county, was served on defendant Ahner in that county. Some months later another writ, directed to the sheriff of Wood county, was issued and served on defendant Ahner in the last-mentioned county. The last writ was executed after the 60 days which had been given to mature the case had expired. The defendants again appeared specially, and moved the court to quash these three writs and the returns thereon, and to, abate the action. The motion was sustained, the writs were quashed, and the cause was stricken from the docket.

It is useless to discuss the sufficiency of the return of service on the summons which was served on Gartlan in Pennsylvania, as a nonresident. We have already held there was proper and sufficient order of publication against him. No such service outside of the state was necessary, and, if good, would have no more force than that order of publication. Nor shall we divert to the objections raised as to the validity of the service of summons on defendant Ahner in Lewis county. That process seems to have been abandoned by the act of plaintiff in securing service on him in Wood county, where the action was pending.

It was error to quash the summons served in Wood county and the return thereon, and to dismiss the action. There is nothing in the record justifying denial of jurisdiction of the action in that county. The return of "not found," made by the officer on the original writs, imports that defendants resided in Wood county. 18 Enc. of Pl. &

Pr. 945. They were not returned "no inhabitants." Residence by them in the county unquestionably gives jurisdiction there. The affidavit for the order of publication says defendants resided there. If there was no jurisdiction, defendants have not made that fact to appear. A plea in abatement by defendant Ahner to the Lewis county writ says that he is a resident of Ohio. That plea does not, by the record, appear to have been filed. At any rate, it is not a good plea. It does not aver that he was not a resident of Wood county at the time the suit was begun. The question of jurisdiction is determined upon facts existing at the commencement of an action. If jurisdiction is properly based upon residence, and that residence is changed after the action is commenced, the jurisdiction is not affected.

The error in the order quashing the writ served in Wood county is indeed interwoven with that of having quashed the affidavit for the order of publication, which affidavit, and the publication thereon, we have held sufficient. By that order of publication the action was regularly matured. The action was still pending. Plaintiff, having obtained the best service of process that it could, was entitled, pending its action, to personal service when that could be had. How far failure regularly to renew process may operate as a discontinuance of a suit or action we need not here set forth. 2 Blackstone's Com. 296; Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, 416; Moss v. Moss' Adm'r, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 293; Exchange Bank v. Hall, 6 W. Va. 447; Opinion of English, J., in Blowpipe Co. v. Spencer, 46 W. Va. 590, 33 S. D. 342; 14 Cyc. 455; 20 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 1179. There was no gap or chasm in the plaintiff's procedure to mature its cause justifying a discontinuance. The plaintiff had matured its case by the best process obtainable under the circumstances shown by the record. Writs to the county of the residence of defendants having twice proved unavailing, plaintiff chose the substituted method of service provided by law in that event. Plaintiff thereby as completely matured its cause as it was possible to do in such case. That maturing of the cause kept it a live, pending action. True, the force of a judgment upon such procedure would not be the same as upon personal service, but the action was kept alive nevertheless. It was a matured case. There was constructive notice to defendants. Service of process was completed, the force of which, so far as the law gave it force, extended to the end of all proceedings in the action. So when the time came that circumstances made it possible to get better service of process, that which would strengthen plaintiff's action and make it one for a better judgment, surely could plaintiff issue personal summons, and have the same served on defendant without the charge that he had not regularly kept up a chain of process. There is a wide difference between no process at all and that which is the best process that one can, under the law and the circumstances, use to mature a case. The duly executed order of publication kept plaintiff's suit in shape for better process whenever the time should come that it would be effective. Axtell v. Gibbs, 52 Mich. 639, 18 N. W. 395.

The appearances by defendants which we have mentioned did not have the effect of general appearances to the action. The insistence of plaintiff in this behalf is not well taken. Defendants appeared specially only. They appeared for the purpose of having process quashed. They had the right so to deny that they had been summoned. To hold that they thereby appeared to the action generally would deny them the very test they sought to make. Fisher, Sons & Co. v. Crowley, 57 W. Va. 312, 50 S. E. 422. Nor did the special appearance made by defendants, prior to the former writ of error herein, whereby they moved to quash the attachment, submit defendants generally to the court. Dulin v. McCaw, 39 W. Va. 721, 20 S. E. 681; Chapman v. Maitland, 22 W. Va. 329; Wynn v. Wyatt's Adm'r, 11 Leigh (Va.) 584.

Defendants cross-assign as error the action of the court in rejecting the plea or counter affidavit tendered by them. This sworn plea expressly denied the fact of the residence of the defendants in Wood county as set forth in the affidavit for the order of publication. It was asserted that, at the time mentioned in the affidavit for the order of publication, and continuously to the date of that affidavit, one of the defendants resided in Harrison county, and the other one in Wetzel county. If it was error to deprive defendants of the issue sought to be raised by this plea, they have waived it by failure to except to the rejection of the plea. There must be an exception noted, else the rejection of a plea will be waived, and the plea become no part of the record. See the cases in point cited in 5 Enc. Digest, Va. & W. Va. Reports, 364, 365. Admission of such plea, and determination of the issue thereby raised, might have materially changed the phase of the case from that which comes to us by the record. Yet we express no opinion as to the propriety of the plea, since such question is clearly not before us. It may be that such plea would be a proper one upon which to overthrow a falsely acquired maturity of the action. Lawson v. Moorman, 85 Va. 888, 9 S. E. 150; Kitchen v. Crawford, 13 Tex. 516. However, if plaintiff's action was matured by process resting upon a false affidavit, as defendants insist, that fact has not yet been presented.

The order quashing the affidavit for the order of publication, the order quashing the writ served on defendant Ahner in Wood county, and the order abating the action, are reversed, and the action is remanded for further proceedings to be had in the circuit court.

STATE v. EHRLICK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909.)

1. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 9*)—AUTHORITY—CIVIL PROCEEDINGS.

The prosecuting attorney of a county has authority, independent of the Attorney General, to institute and prosecute all criminal actions and proceedings, cognizable in the courts of his county, but has no such power or authority, respecting the prosecution of civil proceedings on the part of the state, beyond that expressly conferred by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see District and Prosecuting Attorneys, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. ATTORNEY GENERAL (§ 6*)—POWERS AND DUTIES.

As the chief law officer of the state, the Attorney General is clothed and charged with all the common-law powers and duties pertaining to his office, except in so far as they have been limited by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. ATTORNEY GENERAL (§ 7*)—POWERS AND DUTIES.

In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, the Attorney General has the management and control of civil litigation on behalf of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. §§ 8-10; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 214*)—MODE OF OBJECTION TO PLEADING.

A bill in equity on behalf of the state, signed by counsel other than the Attorney General, is not demurrable for lack of disclosure on its face of authority or direction from him to file the same. Such an objection must be raised by a motion to dismiss or plea in abatement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 487; Dec. Dig. § 214.*]

5. EQUITY (§ 27*)—JURISDICTION—CHARGE OF CRIMINAL NATURE.

If a charge is of a criminal nature, or an offense against the public, and does not touch the enjoyment of property, or health, it is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 88; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

6. NUISANCE (§ 79*)—ABATEMENT—JURISDICTION.

Equity has no jurisdiction to abate a public nuisance, either civil or criminal, at the instance of an individual or the state, not affecting or injuring the enjoyment of property or other personal rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

7. NUISANCE (§ 80*)—PUBLIC NUISANCES—ABATEMENT BY INJUNCTION.

In so far as a public nuisance injures property or substantially interferes with the enjoyment thereof, directly or indirectly, or constitutes a purpresture, excluding citizens from the enjoyment of their civil rights in highways and other public grounds and places, or obstructing or interfering with the execution of the public business, it is abatable by injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

8. INJUNCTION (§ 102*)—CRIMINAL ACTS.

If an injunction is necessary and proper for the protection of such rights, criminality of the injurious act does not bar the remedy in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 176; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

9. NUISANCE (§ 80*)—KEEPING OF GAMING HOUSE—ABATEMENT IN EQUITY.

Though the keeping of a gaming house is a criminal nuisance, punishable and abatable by indictment and conviction, there is no jurisdiction in equity to abate it, at the instance of either an individual or the state, unless it appears to be injurious to personal or property rights and the injury is not otherwise adequately remediable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

10. EQUITY (§ 27*)—JURISDICTION—CRIMINAL REMEDIES—SUFFICIENCY.

Criminal remedies and procedure must be deemed adequate to the maintenance of the public right, in respect to moral and political principles, except in so far as the Legislature may have provided others, since that body, having plenary power over such matters, has seen fit to rely upon existing remedies, and courts of equity are powerless to ordain jurisdiction for themselves.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Brooke County.

Bill by the State against George Ehrlick and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

J. J. Coniff, for appellants. G. W. McClery, H. M. Russell, and Wm. G. Conley, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. On a bill, purporting to be that of the state of West Virginia, not signed, however, by the Attorney General, nor showing, in any way, that that officer authorized the filing of the same, but signed by the prosecuting attorney of a county, and an individual, describing himself as attorney for the state, the circuit court of Brooke county awarded a preliminary injunction, inhibiting the defendants, George Ehrlick and others, from carrying on, or conducting, what is known as a "turf exchange" in said county, extensively resorted to by people from other counties and states, for the purpose of betting on horse races, occurring in different parts of the country, and reported by telegraph. On the maturing and submission of the cause to the court, a decree was made, perpetuating the injunction, from which the defendants have appealed.

The first objection to the bill is its failure to disclose any direction by the Attorney General to institute the suit, his employment of counsel therefor, or his assent to the prosecution thereof; the record being entirely silent as to his attitude. Much authority is cited indicating power and authority in the Attorney General to institute suits on behalf of the state, in proper cases, and the propriety of his doing so, but none indicating that such suits cannot be instituted by the prosecuting attorney of the county, either by virtue of his office, considering it as being independent of, and not subordinate to, that of the Attorney General, or regarding it as a subordinate office in the executive department of justice of the state. The relation of the two offices to one another, their respective powers and duties, and the nature of the litigation all enter into the solution of this question. The office of Attorney General is of very ancient origin, and its duties and powers were recognized by the common law. That of prosecuting attorney is of modern creation, it seems, and its powers and duties are given, imposed, and prescribed by statutory law. 4 Cyc. 1028; Attorney General v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 129. Prosecuting attorneys are generally described as deputies or assistants of the Attorney General (4 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1026), but they are not dependent upon him for their powers in all cases nor in all respects subject to his control (23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 275). In the exercise of his common-law powers, the Attorney General may, no doubt, advise the prosecuting attorney, as he does other officers, since he is regarded as the chief law officer of the state. As the Constitution and laws of the state make the two offices separate and distinct and vest in the prosecuting attorney certain powers and impose upon him certain duties, it seems clear that the Attorney General cannot strip him of the powers expressly given, nor increase the burdens laid upon him. The sense in which the local officer is subordinate to the general one seems to be that they are engaged in the same branch or department of the public business. This makes the relation theoretical, rather than practical. The business, once pertaining actually as well as theoretically to the office of Attorney General, has been divided between the two offices for purposes of convenience. We may say the office of prosecuting attorney has been carved out of that of Attorney General and made an independent office, having exclusive control, to some extent, of business of the state, arising within the county.

No doubt the Attorney General may assist the prosecuting attorney in the prosecution of such business, or perform it himself, in case of the nonaction of the prosecuting attorney, but he cannot displace that officer. He has neither power of removal nor control over him within his own province, so far as it is defined by statute, for, if the division of powers made by the statute were not respected nor observed nor susceptible of enforcement, the object and purpose of the division would be defeated. There would be no individual responsibility, if the powers of the Attorney General and prosecuting attorney were coextensive and concurrent. The one would be no more responsible than the other for the nonenforcement of the laws. Concurrence would produce interference, conflict, and friction in many instances, delaying the disposition of business to the detriment of the state. We think it plain therefore that, in a practical sense, the two offices are distinct and independent; but all the business does not seem to have been divided. Part of the civil business of the state in the county seems to have been reserved to the Attorney General. Section 6, c. 120, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 3778), defines generally the duties of the prosecuting attorney, in the following terms: "It shall be the duty of every prosecuting attorney in this state, to attend to the criminal business of the state in the county in which he is elected and qualified, and also to civil cases in which the state is interested in such county, when required by and under the direction of the auditor; and when he has information of the violation of any penal law committed within his county, shall institute and prosecute all necessary and proper proceedings against the offender, and may in such case issue or cause to be issued a summons for any witness he may deem material. He shall also represent the county in all suits and proceedings for and on behalf of or against the county, or county court, overseers of the poor, or other public authorities of the county, and carefully look after and give attention to the general interests of the county." His authority extends to all the criminal business of the state in his own county. As to civil business in which the state is interested, he can act, on behalf of the state, only when required by the auditor and under the direction of the latter, or when the duty is enjoined by some statute. There are many other provisions imposing specific duties, concerning particular matters, but there is no statute giving him power to represent the state generally in respect to its civil business.

The conclusion just stated implies that the authority of the prosecuting attorney to institute this suit depends upon its character. If it is a criminal proceeding, he had such authority, but, if it is a civil one, he had not, unless it was given by the auditor, and, in the latter case, an inquiry might arise as to whether the auditor is chargeable with any duty or given any authority respecting a matter of this kind. As the bill was framed and is now regarded by its defenders, it is a criminal information, filed for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law. If it can be maintained as such, the filing and prosecution thereof are within the statutory jurisdiction and power of the prosecuting attorney; but, if the procedure is not authorized by the criminal law, nor its object within the auditor's power of direction, it should have been instituted by the Attorney General. Whether the absence of the signature of the latter to the bill, or the lack of disclosure in the bill of his direction to institute the suit, makes the pleading bad on demurrer, is the question most extensively discussed in the briefs; but no authority for any of the contentions is cited. It seems to us, however, that such an objection ought to be raised by a plea in abatement or motion to dismiss. It is not the bill of the Attorney General. The state of West Virginia is the plaintiff, and there is a presumption that no attorney would institute such a suit without authority. It would be inconsistent with his duty and obligation as an officer of the court. When the question is properly raised, the authority of the attorney must be shown (Mullin v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 6 Sup. Ct. 1041, 30 L. Ed. 170; Railroad Co. v. United States, 108 U. S. 512, 2 Sup. Ct. 802, 862, 27 L. Ed. 621, 806); but we think the question was not properly raised.

The charge against the defendants is the keeping and conducting of a gaming house, constituting a public nuisance. Nothing of detriment to the community or the public at large is alleged against them other than the unlawfulness of the enterprise. The bill says they take dishonest profits from the betting, and carry it on with great profit to themselves and at slight risk of loss. It is not alleged that anybody's property is injured, or that the place is in any sense disorderly. The theory of the bill, adhered to in the argument is that the enterprise, tending to corrupt the morals of the public, makes it a nuisance, abatable by injunction.

Jurisdiction in equity to abate nuisances is undoubted and of universal recognition. It is equally well settled that the state may institute suits for that purpose in proper cases, but it is nowhere asserted that either the state or a private individual may maintain such a suit in any and all cases of nuisance. In other words, relief in equity by abatement is not the necessary sequence of the establishment of the charge of nuisance. Some nuisances are criminal, while others are not. Criminal nuisances are abatable by criminal process, and, where this process is adequate, jurisdiction in equity fails, either because adequate legal remedy precludes jurisdiction in equity, or the subject-matter is beyond the scope of equity jurisdiction. If a nuisance, purely criminal, injures or affects a private plaintiff in certain respects, he may resort to equity for relief; but the existence of neither a civil nor criminal public nuisance necessarily calls for interposition by a court of equity. A private person cannot abate it, unless it is specially injurious or prejudicial to him, and the state cannot proceed against it in equity, if it be merely a criminal nuisance, unattended by injury to a personal or property right of some sort, creating necessity for prevention of irreparable injury.

"The cases in which chancery has interfered by injunction, to prevent or remove a nuisance, are those in which the nuisance has been erected to the prejudice or annoyance of a right which the other party had long previously enjoyed. It must be a strong and mischievous case of pressing necessity, or the right must have been previously established at law, to entitle the party to call to his aid the jurisdiction of this court." Van Bergen v. Van Bergen, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 287, 8 Am. Dec. 511; Fisk v. Wilber, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 395; Kingsbury v. Flowers, 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14. "To obtain relief in equity for a private nuisance, the threatened injury must be irreparable, incapable of compensation in damages, and not doubtful or contingent." Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 540, 28 Am. Rep. 378. "There is no case for equity, unless the charge be for injury to the enjoyment of property or other personal rights." Sparhawk v. Railway Co., 54 Pa. 401. "It is elementary law that the subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. The court is conversant only with questions of property and the maintenance of civil rights. Injury to property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction rests. The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not affect any right to property. Nor do matters of a political character come within the jurisdiction of a court of chancery. Nor has the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the public duties of any department of government, except under special circumstances, and where necessary for the protection of rights of property." Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 237, 247; People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, 457; Ocean City Ass'n v. Schurch, 57 N. J. Eq. 268, 41 Atl. 914. "If a charge be of a criminal nature, or an offense against the public, and does not touch the enjoyment of property, it ought not to be brought within the direct jurisdiction of this court, which was intended to deal only in matters of civil right resting in equity, or where the remedy at law was not sufficiently adequate; nor ought the process of injunction to be applied, but with the utmost caution. It is the strong arm of the court, and to render its operation benign and useful it must be exercised with great discretion, and when necessity requires it." Attorney General v. Insurance Co., 2 Johns. Ch. 878; Railroad Co. v. Prudden, 20 N. J. Eq. 530, 536. "A court of equity has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or immoral. It leaves the discretion of these matters to the criminal courts. The remedy at law is presumed to be adequate, but, if it is not so, the relief must come from the lawmaking power, and not from the courts." People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, Syl. point 4; Cope v. Fair Ass'n, 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30; Attorney General v. Insurance Co., 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 371.

The text in Story's Equity Jurisprudence (sections 921 to 924), according equity jurisdiction great latitude to interfere, by injunction, to abate nuisances, is to be taken and understood, not literally, but subject to the principles above stated. Although the language of these sections is very broad, it does not import in terms jurisdiction in equity to enforce the criminal laws or to interfere where the purpose is other than the vindication of personal and property rights. The English decisions referred to by Story, as showing the ancient origin of such jurisdiction, at the suit of the Attorney General, all had such objects. None of them contemplated mere enforcement of criminal laws or the maintenance of public policy. Attorney General v. Cleaver, 18 Ves. Jr. 211, had for its object the inhibition of the manufacture of soap and the preparation of materials used in the manufacture thereof, in a certain place, on the ground that it was offensive and injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the community. No questions of morality or criminality entered into the cause. The court, having concluded that the carrying on of such a trade was not per se a nuisance, directed an issue to a jury to determine whether it was in fact a nuisance. Attorney General v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 123, related to a public highway; its object being to prevent, by injunction, municipal authorities from leaving a highway bridge open so that the general public could not pass over it. Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. Jr. 618, involved an injunction to prevent the defendants from using certain premises as a powder magazine on the ground that it was a public nuisance; it having been erected near a public road and the premises of the plaintiffs, and having also been improperly constructed. This clearly involved a property right. It was so peculiarly and distinctively a bill of that kind that it was entertained at the instance of private parties; but the court, being of the opinion that the evidence did not make out a clear case of nuisance, directed an indictment to be drawn and the question put in issue, in the meantime withholding the injunction. This course was taken because courts of equity are reluctant to exercise this jurisdiction at all, and will not do so except in clear cases. The indictment was directed, not for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law, but to the end that, through it, the chancellor might know whether the carrying on of that trade was unlawful under all the circumstances; it not being per se a nuisance.

Another extensive class of cases, cited in the text of Story's Equity Jurisprudence, is composed of those having for their object the vindication of public rights in respect to property, such as obstructions to highways, public grounds, harbors, and landings. These obstructions are classed by the old writers as "purprestures," signifying inclosures. One who erects a structure in a street, road, park, harbor, or river, or makes inclosures thereon, may be said to take over to himself, or inclose for his sole benefit, the portion so occupied, and withdraw it from the use and enjoyment of all the citizens, to the injury and detriment of the general public. It may be no more to the detriment of one person than to another, so that no individual could enjoin the act as being peculiarly and especially injurious to him. In such cases the Attorney General may proceed in equity on behalf of the public to abate the nuisance, if it be one. Whether it be a criminal nuisance or not is wholly immaterial. If it is indictable as a crime, it does not bar the remedy in equity, because the citizen and the general public have an immediate right to the enjoyment of the thing interfered with. A criminal prosecution is inadequate in such cases, because it does not prevent the doing of the unlawful act. It may ultimately correct the wrong, but, while the process of correction is going on, the public is deprived of an important and valuable right, wherefore the injury is irreparable. In such cases it is not the criminality of the act that gives jurisdiction in equity, but the deprivation of personal and property rights interfered with, injured, destroyed, or taken away by the unlawful act. For the mere vindication of the criminal law and the enforcement of the public policy of the state, let it be founded upon moral or other considerations, the legal remedy by indictment and prosecution is fully adequate and peculiarly appropriate.

The decisions in this country, awarding injunctions to abate purprestures, are numerous. The principle upon which they proceed underlies the decisions in the notable case of In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092. After he had been committed for contempt in refusing to obey an injunction, Debs tested the jurisdiction in equity by a writ of habeas corpus from the federal Supreme Court. In reply to his contention that court asserted right in the government to proceed by injunction to clear from obstruction the artificial highways of the country for the passage of interstate commerce and the transmission of the mails. Debs was the leader of a great strike of railway men, and their organization and method of operation were such as to wholly prevent transportation of every kind through the city of Chicago and other places. The blockade or interference was as complete and effectual as would have been that of structures built entirely across the railroads. Though there were no buildings or structures interposed, there was an occupation of the railroads, the great common carriers of the country, so that nothing could pass. It wrought injury, personal and financial, to all the citizens of the United States, and deprived them of personal rights, such as those of travel and communication. All this constituted more than a crime. It was a material, substantial, incalculable injury to the people. The interference produced the same results that would have come from the erection of buildings or other structures on the railroad so as to prevent transportation. It fell completely and perfectly within the definition of a "purpresture." Other cases illustrating this doctrine are the following: Inhabitants of Raritan v. Railroad Co., 49 N. J. Eq. 11, 23 Atl. 127; People v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 396, 84 Am. Dec. 351; Biddle v. Ash, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 211; People v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 27 Pac. 610; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564. By far the greater number of cases cited by Story are those of purpresture. All the balance involved injuries to property or to the health of individuals. Of course a direct injury to the health of an individual is not remediable by anything other than a preventive process. Besides, offensive trades or pursuits, poisonous and injurious to the health, affect the property of citizens in the vicinity thereof, detracting from the right of enjoyment of dwellings, and interfering with trade in business houses, and sequentially impairing the value of the properties. All these elements enter into the cases holding it to be within this branch of equity jurisdiction.

Such has been the interpretation by the American courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205, is relied upon by counsel for the appellee as having interpreted it otherwise, but it does not do so. The statute involved expressly conferred the jurisdiction exercised in that case, namely, to prevent the use of real estate in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. It declared all places where intoxicating liquors were manufactured, sold, bartered, or given away, in violation of the provisions of the act, to be common nuisances, and authorized the Attorney General, county attorney, or any citizen of the county, in which such nuisance existed, to sue in the name of the state to abate and perpetually enjoin it. Plainly this was a jurisdiction created by statute. It is true that Mr. Justice Harlan, in the discussion of the case, refers to the text in Story as justifying such use of the writ of injunction; but the main purpose of that argument was to sustain the constitutionality of the statute giving the remedy. In Commonwealth v. McGovern, 116 Ky. 212, 75 S. W. 261, 66 L. R. A. 280, the court granted an injunction to prevent the use of certain premises for the holding of a prize fight, on the ground that such use of the property would constitute a public nuisance, but declared, at the same time, that it could not grant an injunction to prevent the prize fight, because the process of the criminal court was adequate for that purpose. It limited the injunction to the prevention of the illegal use of the property only, and this was done under a statute which enjoined upon all judges of courts the duty to suppress or prevent prize fights by the exercise of all the powers vested in them for the prevention of crime. The court interpreted this statute as inhibiting the use of real property for the maintenance or giving of a prize fight. In Cella v. People, 112 Ill. App. 376, an injunction was awarded to restrain the maintenance of a poolroom—a turf exchange—similar to the one involved here, in the village of Venice, just across the river from the city of St. Louis; but in that case the court emphasized the want of equity jurisdiction to prohibit the mere commission of the offense of operating the poolroom or the repetition thereof. It entertained jurisdiction and awarded the injunction, however, on the ground that the maintenance of the turf exchange at that place was a civil nuisance, because the evidence showed that the citizens of the village were greatly annoyed and disturbed by the existence and operation thereof, and that direct financial injury to real estate in the vicinity resulted from it. In closing its opinion the court said: "In our opinion, unless the relief prayed in the bill can be granted, the evidence warrants the conclusion that the law-abiding citizens most directly interested in this case will be driven to the alternative of continuing to suffer intolerable annoyance and disturbance and great financial injury amounting to an insufferable nuisance, or of disposing of their property and business for what it may bring, and abandoning their homes and going with their families elsewhere, to their great loss, to the great public loss to the community in question and to the state." Among other things, it was alleged and proven that the operation of the poolroom interfered with the operation of mills and factories in the community by attracting the employees therefrom.

The Kentucky and Illinois cases just analyzed are all we have found which go even to the extent of their holdings, and in both of them the inability of a court of equity to enjoin the mere commission of crime, or to abate mere criminal nuisances, when the vindication of no personal or property right is involved, is reiterated and emphasized. They adhere to the long line of cases asserting it, among which are the following: State v. Uhrig, 14 Mo. App. 413, holding that equity will not restrain the keeping of an unlicensed dramshop, though the keeping of it is a public nuisance; Cope v. Fair Ass'n, 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30, refusing an injunction to restrain gambling at a fair; People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, refusing an injunction to restrain gambling, pool selling, etc.; Tiede v. Schneidt, 99 Wis. 201, 74 N. W. 798, refusing an injunction to prevent the keeping of slaughterhouses on the banks of a running stream or depositing therein dead animals, such acts being illegal, but no injury to property or property rights being alleged; Ocean City Ass'n v. Schurch, 57 N. J. Eq. 268, 41 Atl. 914, refusing an injunction to restrain the breach of a covenant on the ground that the act covenanted against was criminal, injury to property resulting therefrom having been waived. To these authorities may be added a dictum of the United States Supreme Court in the Debs Case, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092, saying: "Again it is objected that it is outside the jurisdiction of a court of equity to enjoin the commission of crimes. This, as a general proposition, is unquestioned. A chancellor has no criminal jurisdiction. Something more than the threatened commission of an offense against the law of the land is necessary to call into exercise the injunctive powers of the court. There must be some interference, actual or threatened, with property rights of a pecuniary nature; but, when such interferences appear, the jurisdiction of a court of equity arises, and is not destroyed by the fact that they are accompanied by or are themselves violations of the criminal law."

That criminal procedure and remedies are adequate to maintain and uphold the public right in so far as moral and political principles and general state policy are involved is perfectly obvious. In cases of criminal nuisances, there may be, on conviction of the defendant, a judgment of abatement, effectually preventing repetition. 1 Bishop, Cr. Law, § 1079; State v. Noyes, 10 Fost. (N. H.) 279; Wroe v. State, 8 Md. 416; Rex v. Stead, 8 Term Rep. 142; Barclay v. Commonwealth, 25 Pa. 503, 64 Am. Dec. 715; Crippen v. People, 8 Mich. 117. It is also competent for the Legislature, within the constitutional limits of its powers, to declare any act criminal and make the repetition or continuance thereof a public nuisance, so as to enable the courts, on conviction, to pronounce judgments of abatement, or to vest in courts of equity the power to abate them by injunction; but it is not the province of the courts to ordain such jurisdiction for themselves. We have some statutes of that character now relating to violation of the laws regulating the liquor traffic, and others. They stand on the principle underlying the Kansas statute, construed and upheld in Mugler v. Kansas, cited.

It would be a waste of time to examine and discuss the numerous cases, declaring the maintenance or operation of a gaming house a criminal nuisance, and as such indictable. Its criminality gives no right to injunction. An additional element, not shown by this bill, is required, namely, some injury to property or person. Immorality is not enough. There is a broad distinction between immoral acts and those injurious to health. A man can keep himself pure in an immoral atmosphere, but he cannot keep himself well in a poisonous atmosphere. Immorality does not kill, or injure, the body. Foul air or poisonous water does. If we should sustain an injunction on the ground that the act is immoral as well as criminal, we would be bound to award it in all criminal cases, for, in every instance, there is some reason, affecting the body politic, for prohibiting acts and making the commission thereof criminal, and soon there would be no distinction between courts of law and courts of equity in respect to criminal jurisdiction.

From the principles and conclusions stated, it results that the decree complained of must be reversed, the preliminary injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

FITZGERALD et ux. v. FRANKEL et al.
Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. FRAUD (§ 58*)—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS. Fraud is not to be assumed on doubtful evidence or suspicious circumstances, but must be alleged and clearly proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. FRAUD (§ 58*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A transaction may of itself and by itself furnish the most satisfactory proof of fraud, so conclusive as to outweigh the answer of defendants or even the evidence of witnesses, and circumstances attending and following a transaction are often such as to leave not even a shadow of a doubt as to the real object or motive of the parties engaged therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. FRAUD (§ 11*)—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—MATTERS OF FACT OR OF OPINION.

A matter of opinion may amount to an affirmation, and be an inducement to a contract, especially where the parties are not dealing on equal terms, and one of them has, or is presumed to have, means of information not clearly open to the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 44*) — RELIANCE ON FALSE REPRESENTATION — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

If a purchaser has not equal means or information with the vendor, in a case in which he has a right to rely on a false representation, the evidence to show that he did not rely thereon must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character and leave no room for inference or implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

5. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 3*)—RATIFICATION OF FRAUDULENT TRANSACTION — ACCEPTANCE OF RENT.

If, after a party, defrauded of his property by an exchange thereof for an equity in certain real estate, became mentally irresponsible on realizing what he was about to lose, he accepted rent sent by the agent of the owner of the property traded for, after the agent had been informed that he was insane, it cannot be said that the agent was misled by the acceptance of the rent, or that the party defrauded intended thereby to affirm the transaction in which he and his wife were jointly interested and for a rescission of which suit was then pending.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

6. FRAUD (§ 58*)—CONFIRMATION OF FRAUDULENT TRANSACTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

An affirmation must be a solemn and deliberate act, and, when the original transaction is infected with fraud, the confirmation of it is so inconsistent with justice and so likely to be accompanied with imposition that the courts watch it with the utmost strictness and do not allow it to stand but on the clearest evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

7. CONTRACTS (§ 256*)—WAIVER OF RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

No man can be bound by a waiver of his rights unless such waiver is distinctly made with full knowledge of the rights which he intends to waive, and the fact that he knows his rights and intends to waive them must plainly appear.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

8. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 8*) — FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to establish fraud and misrepresentation in procuring an exchange of property so as to entitle complaining parties to relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exchange of Property, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pittsylvania County.

Action by W. R. Fitzgerald and wife against Mandel Frankel and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

S. A. Anderson and A. A. Phlegar, for appellants. Peatross & Harris and Hill Carter, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. The bill exhibited in this case by the appellants, W. R. Fitzgerald and his wife, Sallie J. Fitzgerald, sets out that they were joint owners of certain valuable real and personal property in the county of Pittsylvania, and that they had been induced by fraud and misrepresentation to convey the same to one Maurice Franklin in exchange for certain real estate in the city of Chicago. The prayer of the bill is that the contract entered into between the parties and the deed carrying out the contract, dated November 20, 1905, be set aside, vacated, and rescinded, and that their property be restored to them, and the defendant required to refund the sums paid to him by them under the terms of the contract.

The relief asked for by the appellants rests upon two grounds: (1) Fraud and misrepresentation in the procurement of the exchange of properties; and (2) the mental incapacity of then appellant, W. R. Fitzgerald, to contract.

In the view that we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider the first of these grounds.

It is true, as contended on behalf of the appellees, that fraud is not to be assumed on doubtful evidence or circumstances of mere suspicion, but must be alleged and clearly proven. It is, however, equally well established, that "a transaction may of itself and by itself furnish the most satisfactory proof of fraud, so conclusive as to outweigh the answer of defendants, or even the evidence of witnesses. The circumstances attending and following a transaction are often of such character as to leave not even a shadow of a doubt as to the real object and motive of the parties engaged in it."

* * * Experience attests that in a majority of cases fraud can only be established by circumstances. The motives and intentions of the parties can only be judged of by their actions, and the nature and character of the transaction in which they are engaged. They often furnish more conclusive evidence than the most direct testimony." Hazlewood v. Forrer, 94 Va. 703, 706, 707, 27 S. E. 507.

In the present case the record shows that the appellants owned in Pittsylvania county a very valuable farm, known as their "home place," containing about 600 acres; another less valuable tract containing about 150 acres; five pieces of improved property in the town of Chatham, used as storehouses and offices; a considerable quantity of personal property, consisting of farming implements, stock, crops, etc.; and a solvent investment of $5,000 secured by mortgage. The appellant W. R. Fitzgerald was advancing in life and growing feeble in health, and for this reason he desired to sell his "home place" with a view to investing the proceeds in a way to secure him an income without the care and labor incident to farm life. With this in view he began a correspondence with one C. M. Williams, a Chicago real estate broker. Williams came to Virginia, and, finding that the appellants owned considerable property other than the "home place," he suggested an exchange, through another agent, for the "Willard Apartments" in Chicago, a 21 flat building, valued at $100,000, with a mortgage upon it for $50,000. He had with him a picture and printed description of the property, and expressed the belief that he might be able to exchange the equity of redemption in this property for all of the property the appellants owned, except a small portion of the personalty. He offered to ascertain if the agent in Chicago would entertain a deal, and if so to wire the appellant W. R. Fitzgerald to meet him in Charlottesville and go to Chicago. The so-called Chicago agent was willing to negotiate. Williams, however, did not meet Fitzgerald at Charlottesville, as agreed upon, but went to Chicago a day in advance and met him at the station there, showed him the property, and introduced him to one H. W. Duncanson as the agent for the owner of the property, and introduced the person who was personating Maurice Franklin as "Mandel Frankel."

Agent Duncanson, after taking a list of the properties owned by the appellants, told Fitzgerald that he would talk it over with "his people" and let him know. He said that the property was being held at $100,000, but he thought he could get the deal through. At 2 o'clock he told Fitzgerald that he had not yet been able to see "my people," and to return at 5 o'clock, when things might be in shape to talk definitely. When Fitzgerald returned at 5 o'clock, he found Duncanson with a contract already prepared consummating the exchange of properties, which was signed by Fitzgerald without comment. By the terms of this contract Fitzgerald was to transfer to Maurice Franklin all of his real estate in Virginia, and practically all of his personal property, including the $5,000 mortgage, and the so-called agent of Franklin was to have six days in which to examine the Fitzgerald property and affirm or cancel the contract.

Within the prescribed time, H. W. Duncanson, with one J. B. Smiley, came to Virginia. After examining the property, they expressed dissatisfaction with the Chicago contract, prepared another contract, which included all of the personal property owned by the appellants, some of which was not embraced in the Chicago contract, and further provided that the appellants should in addition give their note for $1,500. This contract was signed by J. B. Smiley and the appellants; W. R. Fitzgerald signing his wife's name. On this occasion the Chicago property was again represented to be worth $100,000, to have cost $75,000, and to be rented for $9,000. The appellants were also given, at the time, pictures and descriptions of the property, which stated that the property was renting for about $9,000. Duncanson and Smiley also represented themselves as agents for Maurice Franklin, the owner of the property, describing him as a wealthy man in bad health, who was at that time in California. Shortly after this agreement was made, deeds of exchange were executed by Maurice Franklin and the appellants. After this suit was brought in April, 1906, and a "lis pendens" had been docketed, a deed was executed by Maurice Franklin conveying the Virginia property to J. B. Smiley.

It is fortunately rare that a record presents such a scheme of fraud and deceit as appears to have characterized these transactions from their inception to their conclusion. It is established that there was no such person as Maurice Franklin, who was represented by Duncanson as the wealthy owner of the Chicago property. This so-called "Maurice Franklin" turns out to have been Mandel Frankel, a young clerk in Duncanson's office, who is shown to have been a tool of Duncanson, ready and willing to sign any paper by any name that his employer might dictate. He files an answer in this cause, admitting his relations with Duncanson, disclosing Duncanson as the real owner of the Chicago property, admitting much of the fraud and deceit that had characterized Duncanson's conduct in the matter, and expressing the belief that unless the transaction was annulled and set aside the appellants would lose their entire property.

J. B. Smiley appears as another tool of Duncanson, actively uniting with him in suppressing the real facts and making a false impression. He files a petition in the cause and an answer to the amended bill, asserting himself to be the owner in fee simple of the Pittsylvania property. In the further progress of the case he admits that Duncanson was the real owner, and asks for an order, which was entered, striking out of his answer so much thereof as sets up an equitable claim in himself to the land in controversy.

H. W. Duncanson, the real owner of the Chicago property, is shown to be concealing his property from his creditors, using for this purpose a fictitious person or a false name, declaring his existence as a real person, describing him as a wealthy man in bad health and a traveler, representing himself as the agent of this myth, and denying any interest in the property, or claiming it all, as he thinks the exigency of the occasion requires.

The Chicago property was purchased by Duncanson in January, 1905, when unimproved, and the conveyance made to his clerk under the false name of Maurice Franklin. Instead of costing, with the improvements put upon it, $75,000, as represented to appellants, it is shown to have cost about $38,000. Instead of renting for $9,000 per annum, as represented to appellants, it is shown to have been renting for little more than enough to pay the expenses including the interest on the $50,000 mortgage upon it. It is shown that the written lease contracts taken by Duncanson from the tenants occupying the building called for a much larger rental than was actually paid, and that this was done to enhance the sale value of the building and to keep up the rental value with other would-be tenants. Duncanson claims that this was a custom in Chicago. It is avowedly a fraudulent purpose, intended to entrap the first unwary victim, and behind such a custom, if it exists, one cannot shield himself in a court of conscience.

About the time this suit was brought, or soon thereafter, a suit was filed in Cook county, Ill., for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgages on the Chicago property involved in this litigation. The weight of the evidence shows that, instead of the property being worth $100,000, as represented to appellants, it is hardly worth more than enough to pay the mortgages resting upon it.

It is insisted that these representations as to the fee simple and rental value of the Chicago property were only expressions of opinion, and sellers' commendation. This is not tenable. The evidence as a whole leaves no room to doubt that the representations as to value were intended to mislead.

In Grim v. Byrd, 32 Gratt. 293, 301, where the principles controlling this case are fully and clearly stated, by Judge Staples, it is said: "Even a matter of opinion may amount to an affirmation, and be an inducement to a contract, especially where the parties are not dealing upon equal terms, and one of them has, or is presumed to have, means of information not equally open to the other."

If the purchaser has not equal means of information with the seller (which is the case at bar), if it be a case in which he had the right to rely upon the representation, the evidence to show that he did not rely upon it must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character. In such cases there ought to be no room for inference or mere implication. Grim v. Byrd, supra.

So far from the appellants not having relied on the representations in question, it appears that the only source of information they had was through those who made the representations, and that reliance upon those representations caused them to make the contract.

The appellant W. R. Fitzgerald, after this suit was brought, received from H. W. Duncanson $137.95 on account of rent derived from the Chicago property, which it is claimed was an affirmation of the original transaction. The evidence shows that, after the appellant realized that he was about to lose his entire estate as the result of this transaction, he grew rapidly worse in mind and body, and became mentally irresponsible. Before this $137.95 was sent, Duncanson had been told that Fitzgerald was insane. It cannot be said, under such circumstances, that Duncanson was misled by the acceptance of this rent, or that Fitzgerald intended by its acceptance to affirm a transaction in which he and his wife were jointly interested, and for a rescission of which they then had a suit pending.

Affirmation must be a solemn and deliberate act. When the original transaction is infected with fraud, the confirmation of it is so inconsistent with justice and so likely to be accompanied with imposition that the courts watch it with the utmost strictness, and do not allow it to stand but on the clearest evidence. No man can be bound by a waiver of his rights, unless such waiver is distinctly made with full knowledge of the rights which he intends to waive, and the fact that he knows his rights and intends to waive them must plainly appear. Wilson v. Carpenter, 91 Va. 183, 21 S. E. 243, 50 Am. St. Rep. 824.

Without prolonging this opinion with further details, it is sufficient to say that the facts established by the voluminous record before us justify the conclusion that the appellants have been, by preparation for the wrong, concealment of the truth, and false statements as to material facts, defrauded of their property; and that they are entitled, at the hands of a court of equity, to relief from the imposition practiced upon them.

The decree appealed from must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for a decree to be entered by the circuit court, rescinding the contract between the parties whereby the exchange of properties mentioned in this cause was agreed to, and vacating and canceling the deed of November 20, 1905, carrying out such contract; and further requiring Maurice Franklin to reconvey to the appellants all of the property, real and personal, in Pittsylvania county, which passed under the deed from them of November 20, 1905, and, in default of such reconveyance being made, to have said property reconveyed to the appellants by a commissioner appointed for that purpose; and further requiring the appellants to reconvey the Chicago property to Maurice Franklin, when the amount paid by the appellants on account of the exchange of properties, whether by bond, note, or money, and the costs which are herein decreed to the appellants, and such costs as may be decreed to them by the circuit court, have been refunded and paid to them.

Reversed.

WHITE OAK COAL CO. v. CITY OF MANCHESTER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

LICENSES (§ 6*)—POWER TO LICENSE—VEHICLES OWNED BY NONRESIDENTS.

The charter of a city provided that the council may grant licenses to owners of wagons, drays, etc., employed in the city for hire, and may require such owners using them in the city to take out a license therefor, and an ordinance declared that no wheel carriage shall be kept in the city for hire unless the owner or keeper thereof procure a license therefor. Held, that the city could not impose a license tax upon the vehicles of a coal company that had no yard within the city, but unloaded coal within the city and delivered it to a purchaser outside the city limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

Appeal from Corporation Court of Manchester.

Action by the City of Manchester against the White Oak Coal Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and proceedings dismissed.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, the White Oak Coal Company, is a corporation engaged in business as a coal merchant at the city of Richmond, with its yards, offices, and stables located in that city, where it pays a license tax on the wagons employed in its business. Having sold a consignment of coal to a customer in Chesterfield county, it caused the cars containing the coal to be stopped on a siding of the railroad company in the city of Manchester, and from that point proceeded to haul the coal in its wagons over the streets of the city to the place of business of the purchaser outside the city limits.

The charter of the city provides that "the council may grant or refuse licenses to owners or keepers of wagons, drays * * * and other wheel carriages kept or employed in the city for hire, and may require the owners and keepers of wagons, drays and carts, using them in the city, to take out a license therefor, and may require taxes to be paid thereon, and subject the same to such regulations as they may deem proper, and prescribe fees and compensation."

The ordinance passed in pursuance of the foregoing provision declares that "no wagon, dray * * * or other wheel carriage shall be kept or employed in the city for hire, directly or indirectly, unless the owner or keeper thereof obtain a license therefor."

Upon the foregoing facts the plaintiff in error controverts the contention that the city had authority to impose a license tax on its wagons.

The general principle is well recognized that the highways of the commonwealth, whether urban or rural, belong primarily to the public, and that the absolute dominion over them is lodged in the Legislature. It is true the control of streets is commonly delegated to the municipalities in which they are located in such measure as the Legislature sees fit to bestow. Nevertheless the use of them remains in the public at large, subject only to such limitations as the municipalities are authorized by law to impose. City of Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 161, 43 S. E. 345; Elliott on Roads & Streets (2d Ed.) § 645. Moreover, it is the policy of the state that each locality shall bear the burden of maintaining its own highways.

Bearing in mind these principles, it is generally regarded as a reasonable exercise of such charter powers to lay a license tax upon vehicles of residents of the municipality and upon persons residing outside of the corporate limits who employ their vehicles in furtherance of business and occupations carried on within the city. But to levy such tax on vehicles of nonresidents whose business or pleasure casually carries them into or through the city would be in derogation of their reserved right to use the highways of the commonwealth and impose intolerable conditions upon the public, and lead to absurd results.

As corollary to these well-settled rules, the grant by the Legislature of municipal control over streets must be construed strictly in the interest of common right.

In Bennett v. Birmingham, 31 Pa. 15, discussing the power of cities to demand such exactions, the court says: "Such statutes and ordinances are contrary to the usual course of taxation and embarrassing to the public, and ought to be strictly construed." In that case, by act of the Legislature, the town council of Birmingham "were authorized to direct all owners of carts, wagons and other vehicles using the paved streets of said borough, to pay such moderate license for such use as they might by ordinance direct." The court held that this grant of power did not authorize the imposition of a tax on vehicles owned by nonresidents and used in hauling goods and produce through the town from one adjacent township to another.

So, also, in the case of Cary v. North Plainfield, 49 N. J. Law, 110, 113, 7 Atl. 42, 43, the court said: "The inconvenience attendant upon the exercise by every municipality in the state of the power of excluding from its limits all unlicensed vehicles engaged in transporting goods or passengers for hire is manifest. Its legitimate operation would require the owners of such vehicles to obtain licenses not only from the authorities of the place where their business had its headquarters, but also from every neighboring town into which their casual engagements might call them, or else to unload their vehicles at the border line. A general law having effects so burdensome or so absurd is not to be anticipated, and only unequivocal language could convince a court that such legislation was intended. The statute now under review is not of this character. Its terms are satisfied by holding that license taxes are to be imposed only by that municipality in which the business or occupation is carried on or conducted." Commonwealth v. Stodder, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679; St. Charles v. Nolle, 51 Mo. 122, 11 Am. Rep. 440; East St. Louis v. Bux, 43 Ill. App. 276.

The same principle is recognized by this court in Frommer v. City of Richmond, 31 Grat. 646, 31 Am. Rep. 746. Frommer lived outside of the city limits, but rented a stall in the city market, where he conducted his business as a butcher. He prepared his meat for market at his residence, and used his carts to haul it to his stall in the market. Upon these facts, the court held that Frommer was amenable to license tax on the carts thus used. The court rested its decision on the ground that the license tax was exacted for the privilege of using the carts on the streets of the city in pursuit of the owner's business in the city.

If the plaintiff in error had established a coalyard within the corporate limits of Manchester, the case would have been analogous to Frommer's case and ruled by it. But it is clear that the sporadic act of hauling a single consignment of coal from the siding in Manchester over the streets of the city to its customer on the outside was not carrying on such a business or occupation within the city as would subject the coal company to the license tax on vehicles imposed by the ordinance.

The conviction and fine imposed for the alleged violation of the ordinance was consequently illegal, and the judgment must be reversed, and the proceeding dismissed, with costs.

LAMBERT v. PHILLIPS & SON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 136*)—LIABILITIES TO THIRD PERSONS—ACTION IN PRINCIPAL'S NAME—AGENT'S LIABILITY.

If defendant was merely the agent of the owner to supervise improvements upon property, and fully disclosed his relation to plaintiff, he would not be liable for work done and materials furnished by plaintiff, unless credit was given to him expressly and exclusively, so that it was error to instruct that the jury should determine the relation between plaintiff and defendant upon all the evidence, and if defendant was not an independent contractor, but an agent of the owner, and fully disclosed his relationship, and credit was given to the owner, and not to defendant, he was not liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 476-491; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 133*)—AGENT'S LIABILITY—CONTRACTS.

That defendant was an independent contractor in making improvements on property, so as to be responsible to employes and others for injuries resulting from his negligence, was not conclusive of whether he was liable for materials furnished in doing the work, but was only a fact to be considered in determining whether credit was given to him or to the owner; that being the criterion of liability for the materials.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS—UNDUE PROMINENCE OF PARTICULAR MATTERS.

In an action for work done and materials furnished in making improvements on property which defendant was superintending, instructions which specifically called the jury's attention to whether defendant was an independent contractor and only slightly referred to the question of whether credit was given to defendant or to the owner, which was the final criterion of liability, were misleading, as giving undue importance to the question whether defendant was an independent contractor, which was but a circumstance for consideration in determining to whom credit was given.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Phillips & Son against G. W. Lambert. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. L. Royall, for plaintiff in error. John A. Lamb, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. Phillips & Son instituted their action of assumpsit against G. W. Lambert to recover the value of certain work and labor done and materials furnished by them as plumbers on two houses situated in the city of Richmond, one at the corner of Broad and Ninth streets, and the other on the corner of Broad and Tenth streets. The property was owned by the Richmond Realty Company, but at the time the said work was done and materials furnished was leased to one Jake Wells, who had employed Lambert to superintend the making of the improvements which he was having put on the property. The question involved in the case is whether or not Lambert was personally responsible to the plaintiffs for the work done and materials furnished by them.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The errors assigned are to the action of the court in giving two instructions asked for by the plaintiff, the refusal to give instruction A offered by the defendant, and the giving of the court's own instruction in lieu thereof.

The instruction given by the court in lieu of the defendant's instruction is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the existence and character of the relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant depending upon a verbal contract, it is the province of the jury to determine from the whole evidence in the case what was the relation between the parties. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Lambert was not an independent contractor, as defined in these instructions, but was merely an agent to supervise improvements to be made at the corner of Ninth and Broad streets, and also if they further believe from the evidence that he (Lambert) made full disclosure of his principal to the plaintiffs, and that credit was given by the plaintiffs to the Hotel Allen Company, and not to the defendant, then the jury should find for the defendant."

This instruction is, we think, erroneous. If, as it hypothetically states, Lambert was merely the agent of Jake Wells, or the Allen Hotel Company, to supervise the improvements to be made upon the property, and made full disclosure of his principal to the plaintiff Lambert was not responsible for the work done and materials furnished unless credit was given to him expressly and exclusively.

Chancellor Kent, in volume 2 of his Commentaries, side page 629, says: "Every contract made with an agent in relation to the business of the agency is a contract with the principal, entered into through the instrumentality of the agent, provided the agent acts in the name of the principal. The party so dealing with the agent is bound to his principal, and the principal and not the agent is bound to the party. It is a general rule, standing on strong foundations and pervading every system of jurisprudence, that where an agent is duly constituted and names his principal and contracts in his name, and does not exceed his authority, the principal is responsible and not the agent. The agent becomes personally liable only when the principal is not known, or where there is no responsible principal, or where the agent becomes responsible by an undertaking in his own name, or where he exceeds his power."

In note 1 American Leading Cases, 454, it is said that: "When the relation of principal and agent exists in regard to a contract, and is known to the other party to exist, and the principal is disclosed at the time as such, the contract is the contract of the principal, and the agent is not bound unless credit had been given to him expressly and exclusively and it was clearly his intention to assume a personal liability."

In Mechem on Agency, § 558, it is said: "Where dealings are had with the agent of a known principal, the legal presumption is, as has been said, that the credit was given to the principal, rather than to the agent personally, and this presumption will prevail in the absence of evidence that the credit was given exclusively to the agent, and the burden is upon the party alleging it." See, also, Meeker v. Claghorn, 44 N. Y. 349; Humes v. Decatur Land Co., 98 Ala. 461, 13 South. 368; Strider v. Wench, etc., 21 Grat. 440, 445; Story on Agency, § 447; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 1120; Clark & Skyles on Law of Agency, § 565.

If the jury believed from the evidence that Lambert was the agent of the party having the improvements made, and that he (Lambert) made full disclosure of his principal to the plaintiff, then the legal presumption was that the credit was given to the principal and not to the agent, unless it further appeared that the credit was expressly and exclusively given to the agent, and the instruction ought to have been so framed as to make this plain to the jury.

From what has been said it is clear that the defendant's instruction A was plainly erroneous and was properly refused by the court.

We are further of opinion that instructions Nos. 1 and 2, given at the request of the plaintiffs, were misleading. Lambert may have been an independent contractor in making the improvements upon the said buildings and responsible to his employes and third persons for injuries resulting from his negligence in doing that work, and yet the owners or lessee of the property may have been responsible to the plaintiffs for the work and labor done and materials furnished. Whether Lambert or the owner or lessee was liable to the plaintiffs depended upon the question: To whom was the credit given? The fact that Lambert was or was not an independent contractor was a fact to be considered along with all the other facts and circumstances of the case in determining to whom the credit was given by the plaintiffs, but it was not decisive of that question. All the instructions given, and especially No. 1, call the attention of the jury to that question specifically, with but little reference to other questions involved in the case, thus tending to impress unduly on the jury that question and the facts bearing upon it, to the disadvantage of the other evidence in the case bearing upon the issue to be determined. Upon the next trial that should be avoided, and the jury left to determine upon all the facts and circumstances of the case to whom the credit was given by the plaintiffs in doing the work and furnishing the materials.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Error to Circuit Court, Essex County.

Application by Peyton Hundley and others against R. G. Neale, oyster inspector for Essex county, Va., for a writ of mandamus. From an order denying the writ, petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

Thos. E. Blakey and Jos. W. Chinn, Jr., for plaintiffs in error. J. N. Stubbs, H. I. Lewis, and Jno. R. Saunders, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This is an application by the plaintiffs in error to the circuit court of Essex county for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant in error to post notices of their application for certain oyster planting grounds, in conformity with the statute, for the purpose of establishing the right of the petitioners to an assignment of such ground.

A jury was waived, and the whole question of law and fact was submitted to the court. The sole issue of fact, agreed upon by the parties, to be determined by the court, as shown by the order of submission, was as follows: "Did the petitioners make application according to law to R. G. Neale, oyster inspector for Essex county, Va., district No. 9, for the oyster bottom described in the petition, and, if so, were the said petitioners the first bona fide applicants for said bottom?"

Upon the evidence the circuit court held that the petitioners had made application according to law for the oyster bottom described in their petition, but that they were not the first bona fide applicants for such oyster bottom; the same having been previously applied for, according to law, by Walter C. Palmer and Garrett & Hunt, respectively, as set out in the answer of R. G. Neale, inspector. Thereupon the writ of mandamus was denied, and the petition dismissed.

The record before us abundantly sustains this action of the circuit court. It appears that on January 3, 1903, Walter C. Palmer filed with the oyster inspector his application for the oyster bottom in controversy. It further appears that Palmer frequently, after filing his written application, applied verbally to the inspector, asking that the ground in question should be assigned to him, and was told by the inspector that his application was on file and was the first to be filed, but that the oyster ground covered by the application was within the Baylor survey, and not, therefore, such public bottoms as it was proper for him to rent out.

It further appears that on February 7, 1903, Garrett & Hunt filed their application for a portion of the ground in dispute, and were informed of Palmer's application and the difficulty in the way of the inspector's acting; and on August 5, 1907, the petitioners filed their application for the oyster bottom in question.

It is satisfactorily shown that from 1903, when the early applications were made for these grounds, up to 1907, when the petitioners made their application, it was not known whether these oyster grounds were within or without the Baylor survey. If they were within the Baylor survey, the inspector had no authority to post notices with respect to them. The matter was in such confusion that nothing could be done until there was a survey re-establishing the line of the Baylor survey. This survey was ordered, and a report made in August, 1907, to the Board of Fisheries by the surveyor, showing that the grounds were without the Baylor survey. After the result of this survey was known, the petitioners, for the first time, filed their application for the oyster grounds in question; and before the report of the surveyor had been confirmed by the Board of Fisheries they presented their petition for this writ of mandamus to compel the oyster inspector to post notices of their application for the purpose of establishing their right to an assignment of the oyster bottoms in controversy.

The bona fide applications of Walter C. Palmer and Garrett & Hunt, respectively, were made and filed long before that of the petitioners was made, and the delay in securing action upon such applications was due to no fault of theirs, and did not prejudice their rights.

Upon the issue submitted to its determination, the circuit court could not have held otherwise, and its judgment must be affirmed.

NORFOLK & P. TRACTION CO. v. O'NEILL.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1046*)—HARMLESS ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF TRIAL COURT.

The misconduct of the court in expressing opinion as to its understanding of the testimony of a witness, made while overruling an objection to a question asked another witness, was not prejudicial, where the witness had testified as the court understood him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4134; Dec. Dig. § 1046.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 379*)—IMPEACHMENT.

The admission of statements, made by the motorman after an accident resulting in injuries in a collision with his car, as to the circumstances attending it, is proper, where the statements were admitted as affecting the credibility of the motorman testifying as a witness, and not as admissions binding his employer, and the jury were so instructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1209; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*) — INJURIES TO TRAVELERS—LIABILITY.

A traveler on a street on which a street car is operated may go on or near the track in passing a wagon standing near the curb, and the motorman must warn her of the approach of the car, where there is danger of running her down, and must slow down his car so as to avoid injuring her, if he can do so in the exercise of reasonable care after he ought to have seen her peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 172-177; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a bicycle rider struck by a street car, the evidence showed that the rider went on or near the track in passing a wagon standing near the curb, and the proof was conflicting whether the accident occurred before or after the car had passed the wagon, an instruction that the car had the right of way at the point at which the accident occurred, and that if the motorman was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, and plaintiff was not approaching a place of obvious danger, the motorman owed no duty to slow down his car, covered both phases of the case and left the jury to determine at what point plaintiff was injured, rendering it proper to refuse instructions assuming that the accident did not occur until after the car had passed the wagon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1003*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A verdict contrary to the preponderance of the evidence, but supported by evidence, rendered on proper instructions, will not be disturbed.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Vivian W. O'Neill, an infant, by her next friend, against the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. W. Anderson and J. R. Tucker, for plaintiff in error. Jeffries, Wolcott & Wolcott, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. Vivian W. O'Neill, an infant nine years of age, whilst riding on a bicycle on Olney road, in the city of Norfolk, upon which was operated a double line of street railway tracks, was injured by a street car of the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company. To recover damages therefor she instituted her action, by her next friend, in which there was a verdict and judgment in her favor. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The first error assigned is to the action of the court in expressing an opinion as to its understanding of what O'Brian, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, had stated. Another witness was asked if he knew whether or not the car which inflicted the injury rang its gong as it approached the place of the accident. This question was objected to upon the ground that the motorman was under no obligation to ring the gong unless he saw that the plaintiff (who was riding in the same direction in which the car was moving and near the track) was going to get in front of his car, and that O'Brian had not stated, as the plaintiff claimed he had, that in going around a wagon she was so near the track as to be in danger from the car. The court, in ruling upon this objection, said, in substance, that it understood the witness O'Brian as plaintiff's counsel did, and overruled the objection, but expressly told the jury that the court's understanding of O'Brian's evidence was not to have any weight with them.

While it might have been better to have overruled the objection without expressing any opinion as to what its understanding of O'Brian's testimony was, clearly no prejudice resulted to the defendant from the court's action, since it plainly appears from the stenographer's notes of the evidence that O'Brian testified as the plaintiff's counsel and the court understood him. His credibility was, of course, for the jury, and the court expressed no opinion on that question.

Neither did the court err in permitting Dr. Woodward and Mr. Miller to testify as to a statement made by the motorman after the accident in reference to the circumstances attending it. That evidence was admitted as affecting the credibility of the motorman's testimony, and not as an admission binding his company, and the jury were so informed by the court.

The plaintiff offered 3 instructions, all of which were given. The defendant offered 23, of which 17 were given. The action of the court in giving those asked for by the plaintiff and in refusing to give 6 of those offered by the defendant is assigned as error; but the only grounds of objection to the action of the court pointed out in the petition apply to instruction No. 1 given for the plaintiff, and instructions L and M of the defendant refused by the court.

The objection made to the plaintiff's instruction No. 1 is "not as to the contents of the instruction, but the omission from it of any charge as to contributory negligence."

That instruction is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, immediately preceding the injury complained of, the plaintiff was riding upon and along Olney road, in the city of Norfolk, as alleged in the declaration, and that the defendant's car was approaching her from behind, both going in the same direction, and that by reason of a wagon standing near the curb on said street there was left a narrow space between said wagon and the street car track, and that the motorman of said car either saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care ought to have seen, that the plaintiff was about to ride near to or upon the track at that place in passing said wagon, and that she would be in danger of being injured if overtaken by the car at that place, it was the duty of the motorman to give the plaintiff timely warning, unless he saw that his approach was observed by her, and to reduce his speed to a point sufficient to enable him to stop his car if it became necessary to avoid a collision, and to continue to run at such guarded rate of speed until the plaintiff reached a place out of danger of a collision with said car, and if they believe from the evidence that the said servants of the defendant could by the exercise of ordinary care have performed their duty in this respect in time to have avoided the accident, but failed to do so, and that as a direct and proximate result of such failure the plaintiff was injured as alleged in the declaration, they must find for the plaintiff."

If the jury believed the facts hypothetically stated in that instruction, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, even if she had been guilty of negligence in going on or near to the railway track in passing around the wagon. She had the right to go upon or near the track in passing the wagon, and it was the duty of the motorman to warn her of the approach of the car, if there was danger of running her down, and to slow down his car so as to avoid injuring her if he could do so in the exercise of reasonable care after he saw, or ought to have seen, her peril. That is all that the instruction required of him and was plainly right. See Richmond Traction Co. v. Clarke, 101 Va. 382, 386-389, 43 S. E. 618, and authorities cited.

The defendant's instruction L, rejected by the court, was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the defendant's car had the right of way at the point on the street at which this accident occurred, and if you believe from the evidence that he was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, and that the plaintiff, as he approached her, was riding a bicycle down the street with her bicycle under control, and far enough from the track for the car to pass her in safety, the motorman owed the plaintiff no duty to slow down or stop the car."

The defendant's instruction M, which the court also refused to give, was substantially the same as instruction L, as stated in the petition.

The court gave the defendant's instruction O, which was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the defendant's car had the right of way at the point on the street at which this accident occurred, and if you believe from the evidence that he was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, and that the plaintiff, as he approached her, was riding a bicycle down the street of the city, with her bicycle under control, and far enough from the track for the car to pass her in safety, and was not approaching a place of obvious danger of her turning in front of the car, then the motorman owed her no duty to slow down or to stop the car."

The objection made to the court's action in refusing instructions L and M is that instruction O assumes that the accident occurred before the car had passed the delivery wagon standing near the track, while there was evidence tending to show that it did not occur until after the car had passed the wagon, which latter phase of the case was intended to be cured by instructions L and M.

As we construe instruction O, it does not assume at what point the accident occurred. It covers both phases of the case, and leaves the jury to determine at what point the plaintiff was injured.

The 20 instructions given in the case covered every aspect of it, and some of them two or three times, and submitted the case to the jury as favorably to the defendant as it was entitled to have it submitted.

The refusal of the court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence is assigned as error.

Without discussing in detail the evidence, which is conflicting, we are of opinion that, while the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the defendant's theory of the case—that the plaintiff's injury was caused by her losing control of her bicycle and falling against and under the car as it passed her—yet there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury that the accident was the result of the defendant's negligence. This being so, and there being no error in the manner in which the case was submitted to the jury to the prejudice of the defendant, the judgment of the trial court, under the well-settled practice, must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Error to Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Action by J. Thompson Brown against the Lynchburg National Bank. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Harrison & Long, for plaintiff in error.
Wilson & Manson and Lee & Howard, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The plaintiff in error brought this action to recover a balance alleged to be due him on a deposit account by the Lynchburg National Bank of $3,066.20. The bank denied its liability, except for the sum of $139.90, which amount it tendered, and as to the residue issue was joined upon the plea of non assumpsit. The defendant in error demurred to the evidence, and, the verdict of the jury having been rendered, the court entered judgment for the defendant, and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded Brown.

The evidence tends to prove: That the plaintiff in error had been for many years a depositor with the defendant bank; that beginning with August, 1900, and continuing until December, 1903, an employe or employes of the bank, from time to time, embezzled the funds of the bank and fraudulently entered the amounts so taken against the account of plaintiff in error. It was the custom of the bank to render monthly to plaintiff in error a statement of his account, consisting of his canceled checks for the past month, a machine-made slip, represented to contain a list of these checks, and a statement showing the totals of debits and credits, and the balance to the credit of plaintiff in error. Brown did not keep a passbook, but relied solely on these statements rendered by the bank. His examination of these statements consisted of seeing that his checks as drawn were returned to him as vouchers, that his signature to the checks was genuine, and that the checks returned corresponded with the stubs from which they were taken, and by verifying the total debits and credits. He did not check the individual checks with the items on the machine-made list of checks, but assumed that the machine-made list of checks corresponded with the checks returned with it and correctly represented his withdrawals from the bank, and he did not examine it to see if it contained any item of charge against his account not represented by a check. In the method of examination he pursued, he discovered nothing about the statements of his account returned to him which put him upon notice of any wrongdoing until about the middle of November, 1903, when he received notice of an overcheck. He had received frequently within the past three years notices of overchecks, but had assumed that the bank was keeping his account honestly and correctly. At the time mentioned, however, November, 1903, the amount of the overcheck attracted his attention, and he called for his checks for the current month of November to be sent to him, and upon receiving them he made a critical examination, checking up each check with the machine-made list of checks, and discovered that the checks returned did not correspond with that list, that the list contained more items than there were checks, and that apparently some of his checks had been used as a basis of charge against his account more than once. For example, the machine-made list of checks contained two items of $33 and two of $23.75, though he had only drawn one check for each of these amounts. He proceeded to examine his account for several years back, and discovered that false entries had been systematically made from month to month, extending from August, 1900; the false entry always corresponding in amount with some check drawn by him. The sums thus withdrawn from the funds of the bank and fraudulently charged against his account amounted, with interest, to about $3,000. The president of the bank admitted that this money had been stolen by some agent or employé of the bank.

It is difficult to conceive of a fraud more easy of detection than the one under investigation. As soon as a comparison was made by plaintiff in error between the machine-made slip and the checks which he had drawn, the fraud was discovered, and yet plaintiff in error had for three years accepted the bank's statements without question. If upon this evidence the case had been submitted to the jury, and it had found a verdict for the defendant, it could not have been disturbed.

As was said by this court in Bank of Richmond v. Richmond Electric Company, 106 Va. 347, 56 S. E. 152: "A bank depositor is under obligations to the bank to examine within a reasonable time and with ordinary care the account rendered in the passbook and the vouchers returned by the bank to him, and to report any errors discovered without unreasonable delay. The examination need not be so minute as to exclude any possibility of error, but it should be made in good faith and with ordinary diligence, and such care should be used as is required by the circumstances of the particular case."

In Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 6 Sup. Ct. 657, 29 L. Ed. 811, a like doctrine is announced. In that case, "the main dispute," said Mr. Justice Harlan, "is as to the right of the depositor to question the account rendered by the bank, so far as it charges him with certain checks which he signed, but which, before payment, were materially altered by his clerk, without his knowledge or assent." The facts of that case are as follows: Berlin was the confidential clerk of Cooper from January, 1878, to March, 1881, and had the entire management of his office, kept his books, and had full charge of Cooper's account, as agent of Ashburner & Co., with the bank. With the full knowledge of Cooper, Berlin filled up all checks drawn upon that account, entering on the stub of the checkbook the date and amount of each check, the name of the payee and the purpose for which it was drawn. Pursuant to Cooper's instructions, or in the regular course of business, he filled certain checks between September 11, 1880, and February 13, 1881, which, being signed by Cooper and delivered to him, were altered by Berlin before they were taken from the office. The teller of the bank testified that the checks, when presented by Berlin, were always carefully examined by him as to signature, amount, date, and indorsement, and that there was nothing about the checks to excite suspicion or to suggest alteration or erasure. Upon the checks so altered, Berlin received from the bank the full raised amount, out of which he paid to Cooper or to his use the several amounts for which they were originally drawn, and appropriated the balance to the discharge of gambling debts which he had contracted. The entries in the checkbook were made by Berlin and were correct, but he forced the footings of the stubs by making false additions equal to the increase of the altered checks. Cooper's passbook was written up at the bank in October, 1880, November, 1880, and January, 1881, and balances struck showing the amounts to his credit on those dates. Upon each occasion the book was returned with all checks that had been paid subsequent to the previous balancing, including the altered checks. Across the face of the passbook on the first balancing was written, "62 vouchers returned," on the second "79 vouchers returned," and on the last "66 vouchers returned." Each time the passbook was returned with the vouchers, Berlin destroyed such of the checks as he had altered. Berlin stated that Cooper was in the habit of examining his checkbook from time to time, and it is clear that the latter knew of these balancings, for he testifies that his account with the bank was balanced from time to time, which was done by the bank writing up the passbook and returning the checks that had been paid by it; that when the passbook was so returned it went to the clerk, Berlin, who then balanced the checkbook, that being one of the duties imposed upon him; that witness took no part in such balancings, but Berlin generally showed him the vouchers that were returned, because he liked to look at them, but he never gave Berlin any particular instructions so to do. Cooper testified, also, that he was in the habit of looking over his checkbook and keeping track of the balance, and that when he asked Berlin as to the balance his answer agreed with about what he supposed was in the bank. He also knew the object of such balancings, for he testified that he had been a dealer with the bank for upwards of 18 years, and that he knew it was its custom, as well as the custom of all banks, to balance at intervals the passbooks of its depositors and to return the same when balanced, accompanied by the checks drawn by the depositor and charged to the account, as the vouchers of the bank for such payments. Cooper states that the forgeries were discovered by him about the 1st or 2d day of March, 1881. Berlin having stayed away from the office for a day, he compared his passbook with the stubs of the checkbook, and ascertained that a certain number of checks appearing on the stubs were not charged against him in his passbook, and did not appear to have been returned by the bank, while others which appeared on the passbook to have been charged against and returned to him did not appear by the stub of the checkbook to have ever been drawn. Thereupon he sent his passbook to the bank to be balanced, and it was balanced on March 2, 1881. Cooper admits that if on any of the several balancings he had made such examination of his checkbook and passbook as was done on March 1, 1881, he would have easily discovered that his account had been charged with altered checks, and that for the previous 5 or 10 years he knew of various means adopted by bankers and merchants to prevent the raising or alteration of checks, but he had not employed or used any of them. Upon one occasion, the date not given, he discovered by adding up the footings of the checkbook an error, and spoke to Berlin about it. The latter having replied that it was very seldom he was caught in a mistake, Cooper believed him and looked no further into the matter.

Upon this evidence the circuit court directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error. Mr. Justice Harlan, in his opinion, fully discusses the authorities, and the result of his investigation is stated in the syllabus as follows: "When a bank depositor sends his passbook to the bank to be written up, it is his duty upon its return, either in person or by duly authorized agent, to examine the account and vouchers returned within a reasonable time, and give to the bank timely notice of any objections thereto. If he fails to do so, he may be estopped from questioning the conclusiveness of the account. If the examination is made by an agent, it must be done in good faith and with ordinary diligence; and, where such agent himself commits forgeries which mislead the bank and injure the depositor, the latter is not protected, in the absence of at least reasonable diligence in supervising the conduct of the agent. In this case it was error to direct a verdict for the plaintiffs, as the questions whether the depositor is estopped, whether the bank exercised due caution before paying the altered checks, and whether a certain check was indorsed in blank or for deposit, are for the jury." Justice Harlan concludes his opinion as follows: "It results from what has been said that the court erred in peremptorily instructing the jury to find for the plaintiffs. Both causes of action are peculiarly for a jury to determine, under such instructions as may be consistent with the principles announced in this opinion. Whether the plaintiffs are estopped by the negligence of their representative to dispute the correctness of the account as rendered by the bank from time to time is, in view of all the circumstances of this case, a mixed question of law and fact. As there is, under the evidence, fair ground for controversy as to whether the officers of the bank exercised due caution before paying the altered checks, and whether the depositor omitted, to the injury of the bank, to do what ordinary care and prudence required of him, it was not proper to withdraw the case from the jury."

In the case of Brown v. Bank, the bank demurred to the evidence, and the judgment upon the demurrer was rendered in its favor. Here, too, as in the case of Bank v. Morgan, the cause of action was one peculiarly for the jury to determine, and we think that the court erred in taking it from the jury.

It is true that the fraud was perpetrated in this case in a very crude and simple manner. It is not a case of forgery, which if cleverly performed is difficult of detection, but consisted merely in making a double charge for the amount represented by a single check, which could have been detected, as the petition for the writ of error admits, by adding up the amounts on the stubs of the checkbook and comparing the total with the total shown on the statement of "checks as per list." As a matter of fact, as soon as plaintiff in error did this, the fraud was discovered. But, on the other hand, it is to be remembered that the bank is the debtor of the depositor, and that it is under obligation to keep careful and faithful accounts with its depositors, to scrutinize checks, and to exercise proper care and skill to prevent or to discover fraud.

It is true that the employé of the bank, in the perpetration of a fraud upon a depositor, is not the agent of the bank; but in this case, for three years, one or more employés of the bank had engaged in systematically defrauding the plaintiff in error, and in the concealment of those frauds by making and rendering false accounts.

The court is of opinion that looking to the long course of dealing between the parties, the numerous occasions upon which the money of the bank had been abstracted and charged to the account of plaintiff in error, to the monthly accounts (more than 30 in number) rendered by the bank to plaintiff in error through its employés, to the probability that such fraudulent practices could not have been perpetrated and successfully concealed through so long a period unless participated in by more than one of the employés of the bank, and regard being had to the relations which exist between a bank and its depositors, and to the reciprocal duties owing from one to the other, it was a case for a jury to determine, under proper instructions from the court.

The judgment of the corporation court must therefore be reversed, and this court will proceed to enter such judgment as that court should have rendered.

THOMPSON v. NORFOLK & P. TRACTION CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§§ 320, 347*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—STREET CARS—TIME TO ALIGHT—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries to a street car passenger as she was attempting to alight, whether defendant's alleged premature starting of the car before plaintiff had time to alight, or plaintiff's alleged negligence in attempting to alight before the car stopped, was the proximate cause of the accident, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. §§ 320, 347.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 72*)—VERDICT—VACATION.

A verdict should not be disturbed even by the trial court, unless plainly against the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 146-148; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 72*)—VERDICT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a street car passenger, the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain a finding either way that plaintiff alighted before the car stopped, or that the car started prematurely before plaintiff had time to alight, a verdict for plaintiff, accepting the latter alternative, should not have been set aside as against the weight of the evidence, under the rule that to warrant a new trial, where the evidence is conflicting, the evidence must be insufficient to warrant the finding.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Virginia D. Thompson against the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, with directions.

Ed. R. Baird, Jr., for plaintiff in error. W. H. Venable and H. W. Anderson, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Mrs. Virginia D. Thompson brought suit in the court of law and chancery of the city of Norfolk to recover damages for injuries received by reason of the negligence of the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company. Upon the trial the jury found a verdict in her favor for $3,000, which the court set aside, and at a subsequent trial, neither party offering any testimony, a judgment was entered for the defendant. The record of the first trial is preserved by proper bills of exceptions, and the case is before us upon a writ of error.

Mrs. Thompson was a passenger on a car of the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company, and her account of the occurrence is that: She rang the bell to stop the car, intending to alight at Madison street, but her signal was not obeyed, and she waved her hand to the conductor, and the car was brought to a standstill. She arose from her seat while the car was in motion and had gotten to the door when the car stopped, and she then stepped upon the platform. There was at the time no one upon the platform but herself and the conductor. Her statement of what then occurred is as follows: "I was holding onto the rail that goes down from the car, and I had hold of this with my right hand, and in attempting to alight from the car on the street I had one foot—say the platform is here, in attempting to put the other foot on the street, the car threw me suddenly, and it broke this arm, but I did not know it was hurt." She then goes on to describe with more particularity the injuries which she received, with respect to which it is sufficient to say that they were of such a character that we are unable to say that the verdict was excessive in amount.

Her statement is corroborated by the testimony of her granddaughter, a child 10 years of age, but who was not objected to as a witness. Mr. and Mrs. Childress also testify that they saw Mrs. Thompson come out on the end of the car, that she had hold of the railing and was about to step off, and just before she got her other foot upon the ground the car started and threw her.

Five disinterested witnesses, who were passengers upon the car at the time of the accident, testify in behalf of the defendant company. Their testimony is in conflict with that of the plaintiff in error.

There was no exception taken to the instructions given by the court to the jury. The question for decision therefore is purely one of fact.

It is true that the case does not come before us as upon a demurrer to evidence, and that, as was said by this court in Chapman v. Virginia Real Estate Company, 96 Va. 188, 31 S. E. 74, when the judge who presided at the trial is dissatisfied with the verdict and grants a new trial, some latitude must be allowed to his discretion. It is also true, as was said in Marshall v. Valley R. Co., 97 Va. 854, 34 S. E. 455, while approving Chapman v. Va. Real Estate Co., supra, that "the verdict of a jury, however, is entitled to great respect, and should not be disturbed, even by the trial court, unless plainly against the weight of the evidence."

This case seems to be very similar to that of Morien v. Norfolk & Atlantic Terminal Co., 102 Va. 622, 46 S. E. 907, in which Judge Harrison says: "The contention of the defendant company is that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was the result of her own negligence in alighting from the car while it was in motion and slowing down to stop. The clearly defined issue of fact therefore submitted to the jury was, had the car stopped, or was it still moving, when the plaintiff attempted to alight? The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, if the jury believed it, fully sustained her contention that the car had stopped, and the evidence of the defendant was ample, if the jury believed that, to sustain its contention that the car was still in motion when the plaintiff attempted to alight. The jury accepted as true the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff and returned a verdict in accordance therewith."

In Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Hogue, 105 Va. 355, 54 S. E. 8, Judge Cardwell, speaking for the court, says: "There is nothing better settled in this jurisdiction than that the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given to their evidence in a particular case are properly to be determined by the jury. * * * The mere fact that the court doubts the correctness of the verdict, or if on the jury would have rendered a different verdict, will not be sufficient to justify setting aside the verdict found by the jury. To warrant a new trial in cases where the evidence is conflicting, the evidence must be insufficient to warrant the finding of the jury."

We are of opinion that the court of law and chancery should be reversed, and this court will proceed to enter a judgment in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed.

CITIZENS' BANK OF NORFOLK v.
SCHWARZSCHILD & SULZ-BERGER CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

PAYMENT (§ 85*)—PAYMENT BY MISTAKE—RECOVERY.

Where a bank paid certain coupons payable to bearer at its banking house on surrender of the coupons under the mistaken belief that the debtor had money in the bank available for the purpose, the bank could not recover the money so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 272-281; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk against the Schwarzschild & Sulzberger Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Seldner, for appellant. Tobert W. Shultice, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action of assumpsit to recover money paid by the plaintiff under an alleged mistake of fact. Upon the issue of nonassumpsit, the whole matter of law and fact was submitted to the court and a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant.

The material facts of the case are that on the 4th day of November, 1907, the defendants, the Schwarzschild & Sulzberger Company, a corporation, presented through the Norfolk National Bank of Norfolk for payment 15 coupons of $70 each, due on the 1st day of that month, taken from bonds held by the defendant. The bonds from which the coupons were taken were issued by the Jamestown Hotel Corporation and held by the defendant. The coupons were in the following words:

"$70.00.

"The Jamestown Hotel Corporation will pay to bearer, at the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk, Virginia, upon surrender of this coupon, seventy dollars in gold coin of the United States, on the first day of November, A. D., 1907, for one year's interest then due on its bond, No. 1.

"Chas. M. Barnett, Treasurer."

At the time the coupons were presented for payment at the plaintiff bank, the Jamestown Hotel Corporation, the maker thereof, had on deposit with the plaintiff the sum of $1,898.97; but on the 16th day of the preceding month an execution creditor of the hotel corporation whose judgment amounted to more than $14,000 caused a summons on suggestion to be served upon the plaintiff bank. When the summons was served upon the president of the plaintiff bank, he notified the other officers of the bank and the bookkeeper in charge of the account not to pay out any part thereof except by order of the court. Subsequently, and before the coupons in question were paid, the existing account of the hotel corporation which had been garnished in the hands of the plaintiff was transferred from the active ledger of the bank to the inactive department and marked "Corp.," and a new account opened with the hotel corporation, then in a failing condition and being operated under the direction of the court. When the coupons were presented for payment, the plaintiff bank had changed its clerks and a new clerk misread the word "Corp." for "coupons," and, thinking that the hotel corporation's account marked "Corp." was set apart for the payment of coupons, as the bank's habit was, paid them and charged them to that account. The mistake was not known until some two weeks afterwards, when the president of the plaintiff bank, in looking over the hotel corporation's account to ascertain the amount to its credit when the summons on suggestion was served upon him, discovered it. The plaintiff bank at once notified the defendant of the mistake, offered to return the coupons, and requested repayment, which after some months of correspondence was refused. The plaintiff bank was compelled to pay the whole $1,898.97 in its hands when garnished to the execution creditor, and will lose the $1,050 paid the defendant, unless it can recover it from the defendant, as the hotel corporation is insolvent.

The general rule is that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered; but the payment of a check or note by a bank upon which it is drawn or at which it is made payable under the mistaken belief that the drawer of the check or the maker of the note has sufficient funds to his credit to pay the check or note seems to be an exception to the general rule. The cases do not seem to be entirely agreed upon what principle this exception is based, but the great if not the overwhelming weight of authority maintains this exception to the general rule. Some place it upon the ground that there is no privity between the holder of the check or note and the bank; others upon the ground that, since the bank always has the means of knowing the state of the depositor's account by simply looking at its own books, the payment is not a payment by mistake within the meaning of the legal rule which permits a recovery; others still place their decision upon both grounds.

In Bank v. Hull, Dud. 259, one of the earliest American cases that we have found, the Supreme Court of South Carolina said that: "The question was one to be decided rather upon authority than general reasoning on the subject. No part of a commercial community is more interested in commercial usages than banks, and they cannot complain when they are required to strictly conform to them. They cannot always guard against fraud and imposition, but they may against mistakes depending on an inspection of their own books and accounts. * * * They accepted and paid the check presented by the defendant for and on account of Hepton, the drawer, whose money they kept for his convenience and accommodation. The privity of contract was between them and their customer, Hepton, and not between them and one who may have happened in the course of dealing to present a check drawn by Hepton."

In First National Bank v. Burkham, 32 Mich. 328, 331, Judge Cooley said in discussing this question: "But we think it would be an exceedingly unsafe doctrine in commercial law that one who has discounted a bill in good faith and received in its payment the strongest possible assurance that it was drawn with proper authority should afterward hold the money subject to such a showing as the drawee might be able to make as to the influences operating upon his mind to induce him to make payment. The beauty and value of the rules governing commercial paper consist in their perfect certainty and reliability. They would be worse than useless if the ultimate responsibility for such paper as between payee and drawee, both acting in good faith, could be made to depend upon the motive which influenced the latter to honor the paper."

In Oddie v. National City Bank, 45 N. Y. 735, 6 Am. Rep. 160, the Court of Appeals of New York (Chief Justice Church) in discussing this question said: "When a check is presented to a bank for deposit, drawn directly upon itself, it is the same as though payment in any other form was demanded. It is the right of the bank to reject it, or to refuse to pay it, or to receive it conditionally, as in Pratt v. Foote, 9 N. Y. 463; but if it accepts such a check and pays it, either by delivering the currency or giving the party credit for it, the transaction is closed between the bank and such party, provided the paper is genuine. * * * The bank always has the means of knowing the state of the account of the drawer, and, if it elects to pay the paper, it voluntarily takes upon itself the risk of recovering it out of the drawer's account or otherwise."

In Manf. Nat. Bank v. Swift, 70 Md. 515, 17 Atl. 336, 14 Am. St. Rep. 381, it was said that, if any other rule prevailed, "no one could know when he could safely receive payment of a check." It is further said: "It is the duty of a bank to know the state of its depositor's account, and, if it makes a mistake, it must abide the consequences. The presentation of a check is a demand for payment. If it is paid, all the rights of the payee have been satisfied, and he is not entitled to ask any questions. It would forever destroy the character of a bank in all commercial circles if, when it was ready and willing to pay a check, it permitted the holder to inquire if the drawer had funds there to meet it. It is a matter with which he has no concern. In the absence of fraud on the part of the holder, the payment of a check by a bank is regarded as finality, and the fact that the drawer had no funds on deposit will not give the bank any remedy against the holder."

In National Bank of New Jersey v. Berrall, 70 N. J. Law, 757, 58 Atl. 189, 66 L. R. A. 599, 103 Am. St. Rep. 821, 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 630, it was held that where a payee of a check, after indorsing it generally, deposits it to his account in his own bank by which it is forwarded to the bank upon which it is drawn for collection, and the latter bank pays it by mistake, there is no privity between the paying bank and the payee to support an action by the former against the latter to recover the amount of the check as for money paid by mistake. It was further held in that case that, aside from the question of privity, the payment cannot be said to have been made by mistake, where the alleged mistake consists in having overlooked the fact that payment of the check had been stopped; for a bank is under no legal obligation to the holder thereof to pay a check drawn upon it, and the bank being bound to know the state of its depositors' accounts, if it does make payment of a check to a bona fide holder who is without notice of any infirmity therein, the transaction is closed as between the parties to the payment.

Morse in his work on Banking says without qualification that, if a bank pays or accepts a check under the misconception that it has funds, it cannot recover from the holder, but it must look to the drawer alone for redress, except that under the clearing house rules a check paid through the clearing house may be returned within a certain time if the funds are found insufficient. 2 Morse on Banking, § 455. See, also, generally, Bantench v. Dorrien, 6 East. 199; Levy v. Bank of United States, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 234, 1 L. Ed. 814; First Nat. Bank v. Devenish, 15 Colo. 229, 25 Pac. 177, 22 Am. St. Rep. 394; Riverside Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 74 Fed. 276, 20 C. C. A. 181; 5 Cyc. 534, 535.

The coupons which were paid were payable to bearer at the plaintiff bank and possessed all the qualities and incidents of commercial paper. Arents v. Commonwealth, 18 Grat. 750, 766, 767, and cases cited. Their payment under the facts disclosed by the record would no more entitle the plaintiff bank to recover from the defendant than if the paper paid had been the Hotel Corporation's check, bill, or note. The same reasoning that applies in the one case is equally applicable in the other. If there be no privity in the one case, there is none in the other, and, if the misapprehension as to the state of the maker's account is not a mistake within the meaning of the legal rule which permits a recovery in the one case, it is equally not such a mistake in the other.

While the reasoning of the courts in the cases quoted from that there can be no recovery in a case like this is not altogether satisfactory, the conclusion reached by them is sustained by the great current of authority, and seems to be in accord with commercial usage.

We are of opinion, therefore, to affirm the judgment complained of.

Affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1194*)—REVERSAL IN PART AND REMAND—EFFECT IN LOWER COURT OF DECISION.

The decree in a suit to falsify and surcharge the accounts of trustees regularly settled and confirmed, and to set aside sales of real estate by trustees to themselves, was on appeal reversed so far as it sustained said sales, in all other respects was affirmed, and was remanded for further proceedings. Held, that the affirmance of the decree with respect to the matter of surcharge and falsification was a finality as to all the accounts which the trustees had settled prior to the suit, including an item not mentioned in the bill, and not brought to the attention of either court, as it properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and by exercise of reasonable diligence might have been brought forward at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1194.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 586*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY — POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE EVIDENCE.

A bond executed by M. to J. and paid must be held to have covered a certain item; the deposition of M. to that effect being clear and positive, being fortified by a statement in the handwriting of J., and being corroborated by the attitude of J., with respect to the matter from which the item arose, as shown by the uncontradicted depositions of M. and another, and there being on the other side merely the negative testimony of J., with an admission that he could not remember how the figures were reached.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Rappahannock County.

Suit by Mary A. Smith and others against Robert E. Miller and another, trustees, and others. From the decree against John B. Miller, trustee, he appeals. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

H. G. Moffett and J. A. C. Keith, for appellant. E. T. Jones and O'Flaherty & Fulton, for appellees.

KEITH, P. This case is a sequel to that of Smith v. Miller, reported in 98 Va. at page 535, 37 S. E. 10. The parties then before the court are before us now, either in person or by representation.

The original bill was filed to surcharge and falsify the ex parte accounts of Robert E. and John B. Miller, who were the trustees of John Miller under a deed dated October 5, 1872. Those accounts had been regularly settled and confirmed in the county court of Rappahannock. The bill alleged that the trustees had failed to charge themselves with a large number of items with which they were properly chargeable, varying in amounts from a sum as small as $5 up to one amounting to as much as $2,650. These items are mentioned to show the care with which the accounts were scrutinized by the parties in interest when the bill was filed to surcharge and falsify them.

Another ground of complaint in the bill was that the trustees had become purchasers at the sale made by them of two parcels of land; one containing 275 acres, and the other 600 acres, known as the "Hog Back" tract.

The circuit court, as the result of a long and tedious litigation, the record of which covers nearly 800 pages, sustained some of the items surcharged and falsified in the bill, and overruled others, and denied the relief prayed as to the two tracts of land just mentioned.

On appeal by the plaintiffs from this decree, this court was of opinion that the decree was erroneous with respect to the two tracts of land containing respectively 275 and 600 acres, and to that extent reversed the decree; but it was "further decreed and ordered that in all other respects the said decree of February 12, 1898, be affirmed." The cause was remanded for further proceedings, as a result of which the lands before mentioned were resold at a price considerably in excess of that which they had brought at the first sale, accounts were ordered, reported, and excepted to, with the result that decrees were entered in June, 1908, and at the July term, 1908, by which John B. Miller was charged with the sum of $600, with interest thereon from the 14th day of April, 1882, and with one-fourth of the proceeds of the resale of the "Hog Back" tract.

Though the accounts of the trustees, which had been regularly settled and confirmed, were closely scrutinized by the parties in interest, neither in the court below nor in this court was the item of $600, now in dispute, ever referred to. It appears in the original record, at page 124, under date of April 14, 1881, as a credit to the trustees of cash paid the administrator of Mary Miller; but it does not appear that the trustees charged themselves with that sum. If it was improperly omitted, it was a proper subject of surcharge and falsification, which the parties had ample opportunity to make.

Our procedure with respect to surcharge and falsification of settled accounts is liberal and simple. As far back as Shugart's Adm'r v. Thompson's Adm'r, 10 Leigh, 452, it was held, that where on an order of account proofs are adduced, which, though they do not sustain the specific objections taken to the bill, ascertain that the settlement may be justly surcharged in other respects, although according to the strictest and most formal practice the plaintiff may be required to amend his bill and urge therein the objections made to the settlement shown by the evidence, yet it is competent for the court to dispense with this proceeding, and permit the plaintiff to proceed in respect to the objections shown by the evidence in like manner as if they had been noticed by the bill; but, if the defendant objects that he was surprised by the new objections to the account, the court may and ought to give him time to combat them, and, if he urge the privilege he would have by answer to an amended bill to explain and defend the account in these respects, such privilege should be secured to him, by allowing him to file his affidavit containing such explanation and defense, and by giving to such affidavit the like credit and effect as his answer containing the like matter would be entitled to."

In Corbin v. Mills, 19 Grat. 438, it is said: "The accounts of an executor, which have been regularly settled in the mode prescribed by law, are to be taken as prima facie correct. They are liable to be impeached on specific grounds of surcharge and falsification to be alleged in the bill; but the court will not decree an account, upon a general allegation that the settled accounts are erroneous. When an account has been ordered upon a proper bill, if an additional objection to the settled accounts is discovered in the progress of the cause, the plaintiff may raise the objection before the commissioner, with a proper specification in writing, and the defendant may meet the objection by an affidavit, which shall have the same weight as an answer would have had if the matter had been alleged in the bill." And that is the established mode of procedure in this state. Dickinson v. Helms, 29 Grat. 466; Leake's Ex'r v. Leake, 75 Va. 804; Blackwell's Adm'r v. Bragg, 78 Va. 540; Davis v. Morris, 76 Va. 34.

The accounts of the trustees, therefore, which were regularly settled before the county court of Rappahannock, are prima facie correct, except so far as they were surcharged and falsified in the mode indicated; and this remedy was open to any party in interest who felt himself aggrieved.

When the circuit court entered its decree, and that decree was appealed from and with respect to all items of surcharge and falsification was affirmed by this court, it was a finality, not only with respect to the particular items to which the attention of the court was called, but with respect to all the accounts which the trustees had settled before the institution of the suit.

"Every decision of the Court of Appeals, whether it be upon an interlocutory or a final decree, is in its nature final, * * * and the quality of finality is imparted to the decree appealed from, whether that decree was final or interlocutory." Matthews v. Progress Distilling Co., 108 Va. 777, 62 S. E. 924; Campbell's Ex'r v. Campbell's Ex'r, 22 Grat. 649.

"Appellant therefore may well rely upon his plea of res judicata, which applies, except in special cases, not only to all matters actually adjudicated on the former hearing, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, or which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time." Diamond State Iron Co. v. Rarig, 93 Va. 595, 25 S. E. 894.

Every litigant should have opportunity to present whatever grievance he may have to a court of competent jurisdiction; but having enjoyed that opportunity, and having failed to avail himself of it, he must accept the consequences. "It is to the interest of the republic that there should be an end to controversy."

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in charging the appellant with the sum of $600 and accrued interest.

With respect to the other assignment of error, it appears to depend upon a question of fact. John B. Miller, the appellant, executed to Edward T. Jones a bond for $400, of date February 5, 1903. On September 23d of that year, that bond, with its accrued interest, was paid. In Miller's deposition he states that this bond was the result of a settlement between himself and Mr. Jones, in which he was charged with $341.51, which he claims was the one-fourth interest of Mr. Jones in right of his wife in the original sale of the "Hog Back" tract; a fee, for which Mr. Jones held him responsible, of $25.43; and one-fourth of $187.70 due Mr. Jones as administrator—making an aggregate of $413.21. For some reason, which does not clearly appear from the record, the item of $341.51 was reduced to $318.81, making, together with the other items, $390.51, to which was added $9.49 for sundries, and the bond given for the aggregate sum of $400, which has been paid as before stated.

Mr. Jones in his statement admits that the exhibit filed with Miller's deposition is in his handwriting, but says that he cannot recall how the figures were reached. Miller claims that Mr. Jones agreed not to hold him responsible for the profits on the resale of the "Hog Back" tract, because he (Jones) had thought that the sale made by the trustees, which was subsequently annulled by a decree of the Court of Appeals, was a good one, and that Miller should be held to it; but this Mr. Jones, in his statement referred to, denies. Mr. Miller's recollection of the transaction is in a measure corroborated by the depositions given by himself and R. E. Miller in this suit (see original record, pp. 399, 510), in which it is shown that Jones considered the price at which the land sold was a good one and more than he (Jones) or any one else would give for it; and these statements are nowhere denied in the record.

When we consider that the deposition of the appellant John B. Miller is clear and positive, that it is fortified by the production of a statement in the handwriting of Mr. Jones, and is corroborated by the attitude of the latter with respect to the sale of the "Hog Back" tract of land, as shown by the uncontradicted depositions of R. E. and John B. Miller, and that upon the other side there is the negative testimony of Mr. Jones, we are obliged to conclude that the bond of $400 embraced the share of Mr. Jones in the proceeds of sale of the "Hog Back" tract, and was given in settlement of his interest in the purchase money.

It presents for decision a question in no respect involving the credibility of the parties to the controversy. Doubtless both of them have stated the facts as they believe them to be, but for the reasons stated we are of opinion that the decree appealed from is erroneous in charging the appellant with the payment to E. T. Jones of one-fourth of the proceeds of the resale of the "Hog Back" tract.

The decrees of the circuit court must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, to be had therein not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

RIVERSIDE RESIDENCE CO., Inc., v.
HUSTED.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS. (§ 32*) —
CONTRACT OF SALE—NATURE OF REMEDY.

A court of law cannot rescind a contract for the sale of real estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 342*) — CON-TRACT — BREACH BY VENDOR — VENDOR'S REMEDIES.

On breach of a contract by a vendor, the vendee may abandon possession and set up the breach as a defense when sued for the purchase price, or, if he has paid a part or the whole of the purchase money, he may sue at law to recover it, having abandoned the premises or restored them to the vendor, or he may sue in equity for a rescission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 1018, 1019; Dec. Dig. § 342.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 334*)—BREACH
BY VENDOR—PURCHASE MONEY—RECOVERY.

Plaintiff purchased certain lots for a residence on installments. Plaintiff had paid over a third of the price when she discovered that defendant had permitted a race track corporation to remove the soil from the greater part of the lots, and excavate them. Held, that possession never having been delivered, and defendant having placed itself in such a position that it could not deliver the land sold in substantially the condition it was in when the contract was made without plaintiff's fault, she was entitled to recover the money paid.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Lily B. Husted against the Riverside Residence Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. Randolph Hicks, for plaintiff in error.
Tazewell Taylor, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The plaintiff in error, which was the defendant in the trial court, entered into an agreement with the defendant in error by which it sold and undertook to convey to her lots Nos. 6 and 7, in block No. 1, as laid out on map of the defendant company of record in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Norfolk county, for the price of $1,500, $100 to be paid in cash, and monthly installments of $37.50 thereafter, until the whole sum of $1,500 was paid, at which time the defendant company was to convey the lots in fee simple, free from all liens, to the plaintiff. The latter paid the cash payment and monthly installments until she had paid the sum of $587.50, but possession was never delivered to her. After the making of the agreement, the defendant, according to the allegations in the first count in the declaration, permitted, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, a race track corporation to enter upon and remove the soil from the greater part of the lots, the excavation varying in depth from a few inches to six feet, and, as the plaintiff claims, destroyed their value for the erection of buildings thereon, the purpose for which she purchased the lots.

When the plaintiff ascertained the condition of the lots by reason of the said excavation and removal, and that the defendant could not convey to her, as she claims, what she had agreed to purchase, she instituted her action of assumpsit to recover from the defendant what she had paid on the lots, with interest. There was a verdict and judgment in her favor for the amount claimed, and to that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The first error assigned is to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the special count in the declaration.

The ground of that objection is that the count does not aver that the consideration of the contract wholly failed.

The agreement, in substance, so far as it is material to the questions involved in this case, is substantially set out in the count, and the amount she had paid on the purchase price. It then avers that since the making of the contract "the said defendant in disregard of the rights of the plaintiff has permitted and allowed certain other people, to wit, Boulevard Land Corporation and Jamestown Jockey Club, Inc., to enter in and upon said lots which the said defendant had contracted to sell to said plaintiff, and to excavate and carry off the soil thereof, to the great detriment and damage of said property, as a result whereof said property is largely destroyed so far as uses for which it was generally intended and for which it was specially intended by this plaintiff in purchasing the same; that said property at the time of said purchase was particularly adapted for residential purposes owing to the fact that the same was located upon the Elizabeth river, and the high character of the land constituting the same made it especially valuable and attractive, and this was the prime motive actuating the plaintiff in purchasing the same. By reason of the premises, the value of said property has been greatly depreciated and destroyed, and especially is this so, so far as this plaintiff is concerned; that said acts were committed without her knowledge, sanction, or consent, she never having been let into possession of said property, and she has been making payments on said purchase in ignorance of the same. She further avers that it is impossible to restore the land to its original condition so as to adapt it to the uses for which she intended it, and that, therefore, there is a failure of consideration so far as said land is concerned."

A purchaser who buys real property, as was said in Newberry v. Ruffin, 102 Va. 73, 78, 45 S. E. 733, 734, "the title to which is bad, may choose between a variety of remedies for his relief, and by the remedy chosen he elects to affirm or disaffirm the contract. A court of law cannot rescind the contract, but a vendee may abandon the possession of the premises and set up the want of title as a defense when sued for the purchase money; or, if he has paid a part or the whole of the purchase money, he may sue in a court of law and recover it back, having in the meanwhile abandoned the premises or restored them to the vendor, or he may file his bill in equity on failure of the title, praying that the contract be in terms rescinded."

Where, as in this case, no possession was ever delivered, and the vendor has placed himself in a position, or has permitted himself to be placed in the position, without fault on the part of the vendee, that he cannot deliver the land sold in substantially the condition it was when the contract of purchase was entered into, he is really in no better condition than if the title to the property sold was bad, and it would seem to be clear that the vendee, who has paid a part or the whole of the purchase price, may elect to disaffirm the contract and sue at law and recover the purchase money paid by him.

It is said in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 644, 645, that "a total or substantial failure of the consideration in reliance upon which a party has entered into a contract constitutes ground for him to abandon the contract or treat it as rescinded. This ground of rescission or abandonment is strongly analogous to the nonperformance, and it is obvious that the two may frequently be identical. * * * When a party wishes to rescind a contract on the ground of failure of consideration, if the failure has been partial only and a subsisting executed part performance is in his hands, and there has been no fraud on the part of the other, rescission will not be allowed." See Beetem v. Burkholder, 69 Pa. 249; Johnson v. Jennings, 10 Grat. 4, 60 Am. Dec. 323; Buena Vista Co. v. McCandlish, etc., 92 Va. 297, 23 S. E. 781.

The special count in the declaration, as we understand and construe it, avers a state of Facts which, if true, shows that the plaintiff has never received anything under the contract of sale; that the defendant cannot convey what he agreed to convey; and that there is therefore a substantial if not a total failure of consideration. The demurrer to that count was therefore properly overruled by the court.

The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in giving the instruction asked for by the plaintiff.

The instruction objected to is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff cannot get the lots in substantially the physical condition in which they were when she contracted for same that then and in that event she cannot be made to take the same against her objection, and is entitled to the return to her, with interest, of so much money as she paid on said contract."

The court also gave the following instruction for the defendant: "The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff in this cause cannot recover unless the consideration of the contract shown in evidence wholly failed. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff lots Nos. 6 and 7, in block 1, in the declaration mentioned, to be paid for in installments, and that deed to the property was not to be delivered until all of the installments are paid, then the defendant has until the last installment falls due to restore said lots to substantially their original condition, if the same can be so restored, and, if from the evidence the jury believe that said lots can be so restored, the plaintiff cannot recover."

These instructions, the only instructions given, presented the respective contentions of the parties. There was no controversy as to the fact that there had been an excavation and removal of the surface of the lots, and that their physical condition had been materially changed. The only question really was whether or not the lots could be restored substantially to the condition they were in when the agreement to sell and purchase was made. That question was submitted to the jury as favorably to the defendant as it was entitled to have it submitted. There was evidence tending to sustain the contentions of each party, and sufficient, if the jury believed it, to support a finding either way—certainly to sustain a finding in favor of the plaintiff.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the court did not err to the prejudice of the defendant in instructing the jury; and we are further of opinion that it did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict in favor of plaintiff and grant a new trial.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

BROWN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 9, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A party cannot complain of the admission of evidence, over his objection, to establish a fact proved by testimony received without objection, in the absence of a showing that he was prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 20*)—EVIDENCE OF RELATION.

Where a third person testified that he was sent by defendant to confer with plaintiff as to an adjustment of plaintiff's claim, the court did not err in permitting plaintiff to testify that the third person had charge of making settlements for defendant.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 231*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—RELIANCE ON CARE OF MASTER.

Where, in an action for injuries to a servant caused by a defective tool, there was no testimony that the master had delegated to plaintiff the duty of providing safe tools, an instruction that a servant may assume that the tools furnished are safe and suitable was not erroneous.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by H. P. Brown against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for appellant. Martin & Earle, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The following statement is set out in the record: "This action was brought by the plaintiff, to recover of defendant $1,000 damages, alleged to have been sustained by him by the falling of a rail on his foot April 1, 1907, whilst he was in the employ of defendant, as section foreman of a gang of hands, engaged at or near Pelzer, S. C., in laying rails; the specific act of negligence being that a pair of tongs in use by said gang broke, thus causing the rail to fall on plaintiff's foot. The case was tried before Judge Hydrick and a jury, at fall term of the court of common pleas for Anderson county, S. C., and resulted in a verdict for $100, upon which judgment was entered. In due time the defendant gave notice of its intention to appeal." The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that the injury suffered by the plaintiff was caused by his own lack of care, and that he negligently contributed to said injury.

The first exception is as follows: "Because the court erred in allowing plaintiff, after objection, to testify as to the manner of unloading rails with a rope, the same being inapplicable to any issue in the case, and the effect of such unloading being purely speculative, and a matter of opinion." This exception cannot be sustained for the reason that there was other testimony to the same effect, introduced without objection; and, further, it was not made to appear that said testimony was prejudicial.

The second exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in permitting plaintiff to say, objection being made, that Mr. Martin had charge of making settlements; there being no scintilla of proof that Mr. Martin had authority to make settlements for respondent." This exception must be overruled, for the reason that Martin testified he was sent by the defendant to confer with the plaintiff, with reference to an adjustment of the claim.

The third exception is as follows: "Because it appearing that it was the duty of the plaintiff to inspect the tools with which he worked, it was error on the part of the circuit judge to charge as follows: 'The servant has a right to assume that the master has discharged the duty imposed on him by law for the safety of his servants. In other words, he may rely upon it that the tools and appliances furnished are safe and suitable, and that the working force is sufficient'; the error being that, it being shown that these duties had been delegated to the master, in this instance to the plaintiff, if there was any negligence on his part, he cannot complain, because his negligence contributed to the accident." There was no testimony tending to show that the duties therein mentioned had been delegated by the defendant to the plaintiff. Furthermore, the charge contained a sound proposition of law; and, if the defendant desired that there should be an additional charge, it was its duty to submit requests to that effect.

The fourth exception is as follows: "Because the circuit judge erred in limiting in his charge the defense to the single one of contributory negligence, which implies negligence on the part of the defendant, whereas defendant set up as a defense that plaintiff's own negligence brought about his injury." His honor, the circuit judge, stated clearly to the jury the issues raised by the pleadings; and, when the charge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen that it is free from the assigned error.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

NORTON et al. v. COLUMBIA ELECTRIC ST. RY., LIGHT & POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 8, 1909.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 82*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A charge that one cannot recover for personal injuries, if his negligence concurred with the negligence of the defendant and contributed to the injury as a proximate and immediate cause, is correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

A charge, in an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence and willfulness, that plaintiff cannot recover if his negligence concurred with the negligence of the defendant and contributed to the injury as the proximate cause, is not erroneous because it omits to charge that the doctrine of contributory negligence does not apply to a willful act, when no such charge is requested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 637; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 333*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ALIGHTING FROM CAR.

A charge that it is negligence on the part of a passenger to step off of a moving street car, when the circumstances are such as to make the danger obvious to a person of ordinary prudence and sense, is correct.

4. TRIAL (§ 234*) — INSTRUCTIONS — SUFFICIENCY.

A charge that it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove the allegations of the complaint before he can recover is correct.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; C. G. Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Norton and another against the Columbia Electric Street Railway, Light & Power Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Logan & Edmunds, for appellants. Barron, Moore & Barron, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff Mary E. Norton through the negligence and willfulness of the defendant. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That on or about the 17th day of May, 1906, at about 7 o'clock in the evening, the plaintiff Mary E. Norton, having been received by the defendant as a passenger on one of its cars going north on Main street, endeavored to alight therefrom, said car being at said time standing still at or near the Transfer Station on Main street, at the corner of Gervais street, having stopped at said place for the purpose of taking on and letting off passengers, as these plaintiffs are informed and believe; and while alighting therefrom the defendant negligently, carelessly, willfully, wantonly, and recklessly caused the same to be suddenly and without warning started forward, thereby throwing the plaintiff Mary E. Norton violently from said car to and upon the ground." The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and set up the defense of contributory negligence. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiffs requested his honor, the presiding judge, to charge that, "when a party sets up contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it admits negligence on its own part." In refusing the request he said: "If the jury conclude that the negligence of the plaintiff combined and concurred with the negligence of the defendant, and contributed to the injury as a proximate and immediate cause of it, of course then the plaintiff could not recover, if the jury so conclude." The appellant assigns error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, "in so charging, and not instructing the jury, in any part of the charge, that the doctrine of contributory negligence, as laid down therein, had no application to a willful, wanton, or reckless act." The exception cannot be sustained, for the following reasons: (1) The charge stated correctly a general proposition of law. (2) The circuit judge was not requested to charge the proposition for which the appellant contends. (3) At the close of the general charge, the presiding judge said: "Now, Mr. Edmunds, you can select such propositions as you wish that I have not covered by my general remarks." And, although Mr. Edmunds called to his attention several propositions of law, he did not mention the one in question. These views dispose of the first, second, and third exceptions.

The next assignment of error is: "Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in response to defendant's second request to charge, which was as follows: 'It is negligence on the part of a passenger on a street car to step off of a car while in motion without giving notice of intention to alight therefrom, and, this being established, the plaintiff cannot recover'—in charging: 'I cannot charge you that, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen of the jury, in the phraseology of the charge. Now, when the circumstances are such as to make the danger of alighting obvious to a person of ordinary prudence and sense, then under those circumstances the plaintiff could not recover.'" The statement of the law by the presiding judge was correct in itself, as well as when considered in connection with the entire charge.

The last assignment of error is: "In charging the jury as follows (reads third request of defendant): 'Before the plaintiffs can recover in this action, the jury must be satisfied, by the preponderance of the testimony, its greater weight, that the plaintiff attempted to alight from the car while it was standing still, and that, while she was attempting to alight from a standing car, it suddenly, and without warning, started forward, and she was thrown from the car, whereby she was injured—that is practically the allegation of the complaint; the complaint being: "That on or about the 17th day of May, 1906, about 7 o'clock in the evening, the plaintiff," etc." The facts upon which the request was based are practically set out in the complaint, and were sustained by the testimony of the plaintiff Mary E. Norton when examined as a witness. The ruling of the presiding judge simply meant that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove the allegations of the complaint before she could recover, and in this we see no error.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

TOALE v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 16, 1909.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGE—CONTRACT LIMITING LIABILITY.

A telegram, which was delivered for transmission, recited that the company transmitted and delivered messages only on conditions limiting its liability, "which have been assented to by the sender of the following message," and that it would not be liable for delays in transmission, or delivery, where a claim was not presented in writing within 60 days. Held that the words quoted are as effectual to bind the sender to such condition as if it had contained the words "which are now assented to by" the sender, "one of the parties to the contract."

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County.

Action by P. P. Toale against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 76 S. C. 248, 57 S. E. 117.

W. H. Barrett and Davis, Gunter & Gyles, for appellant. Hendersons, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's failure to deliver a telegram. The facts are stated in the opinion of the court, upon the former appeal in this case, which is reported in 76 S. C. 248, 57 S. E. 117. The testimony shows that the plaintiff requested the defendant's agent to hand him a blank, in order that he might write the message, which he desired to have transmitted; that the agent did not hand him the blank in use by the initial office, but one in use at the office of delivery.

The following is a copy of the telegram which the plaintiff delivered to the agent of the company for transmission: "The Western Union Telegraph Company, Incorporated. 23,000 offices in America. Cable service to all the world. This company transmits and delivers messages, only on conditions limiting its liability, which have been assented to by the sender of the following message. Errors can be guarded against only by repeating a message back to the sending station, for comparison, and the company will not hold itself liable for errors or delays, in transmission or delivery, of unrepeatable messages, beyond the amount of tolls paid thereon, nor in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days, after the message is filed with the company for transmission. This is an unrepeatable message, and is delivered by request of the sender, under the conditions named above. Robert C. Clowry, President and General Manager. Sent by C. D. Rec'd by R. D. Check 14 Paid 33c. Send. Dated Jan. 22, 1904. To J. B. Corbitt, Postmaster, Perry, S. C. Have horse and buggy ready for Mr. Vann and myself arrival of freight train. P. P. Toale." Indorsed on back: "RXRd (ch) 8:30 p. m."

The form of the blank in general use by the initial office contained the following provisions: (1) "Send the following message, subject to the terms on the back hereof, which are hereby agreed to." (2) "The company will not be liable for damages in any case, where the claim is not presented in writing, within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission."

The defendant interposed the defense that no claim for damages was presented in writing to the defendant within 60 days after the filing of the message for transmission. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500, and the defendant appealed.

His honor the presiding judge charged the jury that the contract offered in evidence does not on its face amount to a contract to make a claim within 60 days, or be barred. This charge is made the basis of the principal assignment of error. The plaintiff testified as follows: "By the Court: Q. Mr. Toale, you see that printed matter up there on that blank? A. Yes. Q. Did you read that when you signed that message? A. No, sir. Q. Your attention called to it? A. No. Q. The agent say anything to you about that printed matter, at the head of the blank? A. No, sir. Q. What did you suppose it was? A. I took it to be some condition which the company required to be carried out. I had not read it, and did not know anything about it. I did not think it had any bearing on the message, or otherwise I should have asked." In the case of Young v. Tel. Co., 65 S. C. 93, 43 S. E. 448, the court quotes with approval the following, from 25 Enc. of Law,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

804, 805 (1st Ed.): "Ordinarily a party is not bound by any rule or regulation by which a carrier seeks to limit his liability, unless the same has been brought to his notice, but in the case of telegraph companies, where the message blanks are so arranged that a party in affixing his signature to the message signs a printed contract, it is conclusively presumed that he thereby assents to the terms of such contract, and is bound by them, although he may not have read or noticed them, or even been able to read them. In the absence of fraud or imposition a party to a contract, which has been voluntarily signed and executed by him, with full opportunity for information as to the contract, cannot avoid it on the ground of his own ignorance, or omission to read it." Continuing, the court says: "The cases of Bethea v. R. R. Co., 26 S. C. 92, 1 S. E. 372, and Daniels v. R. R. Co., 62 S. C. 1, 39 S. E. 762, sustain this principle. If, therefore, the plaintiff wrote the message on a blank of the defendant, containing the stipulation aforesaid, it was binding on him."

This principle is not contested by the plaintiff's attorneys, who, in their argument say: "It has been frequently decided, and we most freely admit the proposition, that if the sender signs a blank, embodying a contract, which includes a 60-day stipulation, then the plaintiff is bound by the same, although he fails to read the contract, and although he was absolutely ignorant of its contents." They, however, insist that the principle just stated is inapplicable to the facts of this case; and the proposition for which they contend is thus stated in their own language: "We submit that the gist of this decision (Young v. Tel. Co., 65 S. C. 93, 43 S. E. 448) is that, if a sender signs a blank, in which the important words 'Send the following message subject to the terms printed on the back thereof which are hereby agreed to' are included having expressly stipulated that he agreed to the terms referred to, then he would be held to be bound thereby, even though he were ignorant of what the terms were; but, in the absence of such contracting words, he is not bound. In other words, it is the familiar law of contract over again, namely, that a party who signs a contract without reading it is bound nevertheless, but to apply to this case, and by analogy, we submit that, if the blank signed does not constitute a contract, then the sender is not bound." The plaintiff's attorneys rely upon the italicized words in the following language, which we quote from the last-mentioned case: "If he wrote the message on a blank of the Postal Telegraph Company, and delivered it to the defendant to be forwarded, it must be conclusively presumed that he did not intend to enter into a contract with the Postal Telegraph Company, but with the defendant. If he did not intend to enter into a contract with the Postal Telegraph Company, its name may be regarded as struck out of the blank. When he delivered to the defendant a written message on a form, in which he directed it to send the message subject to the terms and conditions printed on the back thereof, and which he in express terms agreed to, he was as much bound by the stipulations therein as if he had used one of its blanks." These italicized words were not used for the purpose of limiting the general rule, which had already been stated, but to emphasize the fact that there was an express agreement, manifesting an intention to adopt the provisions in the blank originally intended for the use of the Postal Telegraph Company, and to make them applicable to the contract with the Western Union Telegraph Company. That case is conclusive of the question under consideration. When a contract recites the fact that a party thereto has agreed to certain conditions, it is binding, without further stating that he now agrees to them. And, as the plaintiff himself was the sender of the message, the words of the telegram "which have been assented to by the sender of the message" are as effectual to bind the plaintiff as if it had contained the words "which are now assented to by P. P. Toale, one of the parties to the contract." The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

WALDRON et al. v. WALLER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. April 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 181*)—ALTERATION BY PARTY—EFFECT.

If, after execution, a deed for land be altered by the grantee or by his privy so as to make it describe land not granted thereby, its operation as an executed contract is not affected, and the title vested by it is not disturbed. The effect of such unauthorized alteration is to deprive the party making it of all future benefits of an executory nature or obligation which he might have derived under the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 553; Dec. Dig. § 181; * Alteration of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 122-132.]

2. DEEDS (§ 181*)—ALTERATION—EFFECT UPON RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Such unauthorized alteration of a deed will not entitle the grantor by a suit in equity to set aside his deed and be reinvested with the title to the land conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 553; Dec. Dig. § 181; * Alteration of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 122-132.]

3. DEEDS (§ 51*)—ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 7*)—ALTERATION — REDELIVERY — REACKNOWLEDGMENT.

If, after it has been executed and delivered, a deed for land, with the consent of the grantors, be altered so as to make it describe a larger boundary, in order to make it effective to convey the additional land it should be redelivered, and, if it has been acknowledged before the alteration, it should be again acknowledged.

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 47*) — PROCEEDINGS AND RELIEF.

In a suit by a grantor to set aside a deed and be reinvested with the title to the land conveyed on the ground that the same has been altered without his consent, the grantee therein, on his cross-bill answer, charging that the land covered by the alteration represents the land actually purchased and paid for, and of which possession was given, and on which valuable improvements have been made, with the knowledge and consent of the grantor, may have specific execution of the original contract, and the grantor decreed to make a new deed correcting the mistake in the original deed, and, in default thereof by him, have a commissioner appointed to make, execute, and deliver such corrected deed on his behalf.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Bill by Hester A. Waldron and another against Sarah A. Waller and others. Decree for defendants, and complainants appeal. Modified, and as modified affirmed.

G. R. C. Wiles, for appellants. Douglas W. Brown and Stokes & Bronson, for appellees.

MILLER, P. Hester A. and M. H. Waldron, May 2, 1906, sued Sarah A. Waller and her four infant children in the circuit court of Mingo county, seeking to set aside and vacate a certain deed made by them April 13, 1904, to the said Sarah A. Waller and George Waller, her husband, and to have the title to the lots conveyed reinvested in them, by which deed, in consideration of $1 in hand paid and acknowledged, and the further sum of $100 to be paid in six months, evidenced by note, they released and quit-claimed to said grantees all their right, title, and interest in and to a certain lot of land in Fairfax, Mingo county, conveyed to them December 8, 1902, by A. J. Gauze and wife, describing it by metes and bounds; and also purporting to convey with covenants of general warranty a certain lot adjoining the first, bounded as follows: "Beginning at a stake on the line of the Norfolk & Western Railway right of way, at a point 36 feet from the line of the lot now owned by the said Eva Deskins; thence with the line of said right of way 25 feet to a stake, running in a northwesterly direction; thence south 61.30 degrees and 5 minutes west about 150 feet to the water edge of Tug river; thence with the meanders of said river to a bunch of grape vines at the corner of the lot now owned by the said Sarah A. Waller, standing near the water edge; thence with the line of said lot to the beginning"—the object of said deed being, as recited on its face, to settle and compromise a chancery suit then pending in said court, involving a dispute as to a boundary line of said lots; and also seeking to set aside another deed made May 26, 1904, by said George Waller to the said Sarah A. Waller, and her said infant children, conveying to them the same lot, and for general relief. On final hearing March 8, 1907, on bill, answer of Sarah A. Waller, and separate answer of said infant defendants, by guardian ad litem, and depositions taken and filed, the court below, being of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief prayed for, dismissed their bill, and they have appealed.

It is conceded with respect to the deed of April 13, 1904, as originally executed and delivered, one of the calls in the boundary of the last lot conveyed, which reads, "thence south 55 degrees and 5 minutes west about 150 feet to the water edge of Tug river," was changed before recordation so as to read, "thence south 61.30 degrees and 5 minutes west about 150 feet to the water edge of Tug river," and that as recorded it has on its face, following the acknowledgment, a memorandum made April 23, 1904, by the county surveyor, of a resurvey of the lot conveyed, changing said course from "S. 55° 5' " to "S. 61.30° W." However, in the deed from George R. Waller to Sarah A. Waller and children, made May 26, 1904, the description of the lot is the same as in the original.

The only evidence taken on behalf of defendants is the testamentary of Gaujot, the surveyor who made the resurvey, who says, respecting this survey and the change made by him in the deed: That on the day he resurveyed the lot and made the change in the description, and made the memorandum thereof on the deed, he received a message to come to Naugatuck, and when he got there he found the Wallers wanted him to run out the true course of the lot which he understood had been recently purchased by them from the Waldrons; that he did the surveying in the presence of M. H. Waldron, and in running these courses and distances he found that the change in the course as shown in the memorandum and made by him on the deed was necessary; that Waldron was present at the time and consented that the change should be made, and, when made, that he consented to the redelivery of the deed, and was present when he redelivered the deed to the Wallers; that he took supper with the Waldrons the same evening and heard Waldron talk the matter over with Mrs. Waldron and tell her he had made the change in the deed, and heard her say, "It was all right with her"; that before making the resurvey they waited for Waldron to come, and when he came he pointed out the monuments to him by which to make it; and that the making of the change in the deed was perfectly satisfactory to the Waldrons.

Besides their own depositions, the plaintiffs took the testimony of Henry P. Clark, a relative, and of their son, E. H. Waldron. Waldron admits his presence at the survey, as well as that of Clark, but denies that he consented to the change, and both he and Mrs. Waldron deny the alleged conversation the same evening in the presence of Gaujot, as testified to by him, and they also deny that she then consented to the change as made, or that either of them knew the change had been made until a short time before suit brought, but on the contrary, Waldron testifies (his testimony being objected to by defendant for incompetency) that in a conversation with George Waller, now deceased, he refused his request to make the change, but did say to him that, if Mrs. Waldron wanted to change it, he could get her to make a new deed. Mrs. Waldron admits that her husband was her agent, and acted for her in the transaction with the Wallers. The witness Clark admits he carried the chain for Gaujot in making the resurvey, that Waldron was present, but that he heard him say to George Waller he would not make a new deed, or change it, that he should go and see Mrs. Waldron, and if she would change it it would be all right. He admits that when the resurvey was being made there seemed to be no dispute as to the lines, and that after Gaujot got through his surveying Waldron seemed satisfied.

It does not appear from any evidence in the case what was the real object of making the change in the deed. It is intimated in the evidence of the surveyor that the change was necessary in order to make it close; but in the answer of Mrs. Waller calling for affirmative relief, and which she asks may be treated as a cross-bill, and to which there was no special replication controverting the allegations thereof, she alleges: That the strip of land purchased by her and her husband was not correctly described in the deed as originally made; that the change or alteration made therein by Gaujot was necessary to make it conform to the contract of purchase; that the land covered by the deed as changed and altered is the exact lot of land which the plaintiffs sold to her and her husband; that the change was made in the deed with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, and without any fraudulent purpose or intent on the part of the grantees; that since then she has placed on the property large and valuable improvements, costing many hundreds of dollars, and has been in the actual possession and occupancy of the property described with the full knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs therein until the institution of this suit; and that they are now seeking, with fraudulent purposes and by means thereof, to obtain from her and her children, for the paltry sum of $100, the original purchase money tendered, property worth thousands of dollars.

What then are the rights of the parties? The bill seems to have been framed and to proceed upon the theory that where a deed of conveyance has been altered by or at the instance of the grantee, in a material matter, such alteration not only destroys the deed, but also entitles the grantor to be re-invested with the title to the land as conveyed. This, however, is not the law. As stated by Mr. Devlin (1 Devlin on Deeds, § 460): "The true rule seems to be that if the deed is altered after execution by a party claiming some benefit under it, or by his privity, its operation as an executed contract is not affected." And that: "Titles vested by it are not disturbed, but the party making the alteration is deprived of all future benefits that he might have derived from it, and cannot enforce any executory obligation contained in it." When the title to land has once vested, any alteration in the deed, made by the grantee, though material, will not deprive him of his title or reinvest it in the grantor. If anything is destroyed by the alteration, it is the deed, and not the title. A deed may be altered, mutilated, changed, or wholly destroyed so as to be no longer competent evidence, or capable of being introduced in evidence, yet the title vested by the grant is not thereby destroyed. 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 461a, and cases cited; 2 Cyc. 721, 722, and cases; Seibel v. Rapp, 85 Va. 30, 6 S. E. 478; Vaughn v. Moore, 89 Va. 925, 17 S. E. 326; Grayson v. Richards, 10 Leigh (Va.) 57; Ferguson v. Bond, 39 W. Va. 561, 20 S. E. 591. This is not a case like that of Philip Carey Mfg. Co. v. Watson, 58 W. Va. 189, 52 S. E. 515, and cases of that class, relied on by plaintiffs, where an altered instrument is offered in evidence by a party in support of some right of action claimed by him under it. In such a case the material alteration in the instrument deprives the holder responsible for it of any executory rights or right of action thereon, and destroys its evidential force and effect. 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 460; Burgess v. Blake, 128 Ala. 105, 28 South. 963, 86 Am. St. Rep. 78, and monographic note.

But what effect may be given to a deed so materially altered as to the property not originally covered or conveyed by it? The authorities we think make it clear that, although such alteration may have been with the consent of the grantors, the deed cannot operate to invest in the grantee land not covered by the original grant, without a redelivery of the deed by them, and, if it has been acknowledged before the alteration, the deed should be again acknowledged. 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 462a, citing among other cases, Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 13 Sup. Ct. 426, 37 L. Ed. 350. The evidence of the surveyor in this case tends in a slight degree, but we think not sufficient, to show a redelivery of the deed to the grantees after the alteration was made by him, and there is no claim that after the modification of the deed it was reacknowledged, and only by a reacknowledgment by Mrs. Waldron, a married woman, could she be divested of her title in the land not covered by the original deed.

But could and should any relief have been granted plaintiffs on their bill? It is clear they cannot, as prayed for, be reinvested with the title to the land covered by their original deed. They have not framed their bill with the view of removing a cloud from the title to that part of the lot not covered by the original deed, and we do not think that on the bill and evidence and the prayer for general relief they are entitled to any such relief.

But is Mrs. Waller upon her cross-bill answer entitled to have the alleged mistake in the original deed now corrected so as to recover the lot according to the altered description therein, and according to the original contract, as she alleges it? She specifically alleges in her answer that the original contract covered the lot as now described in the altered deed and for which she and her husband paid full consideration, and were put in the actual possession of the property, and that they have placed valuable improvements thereon, with the knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of the plaintiffs. These allegations of her answer are not controverted by the plaintiffs, and, if constituting good grounds for relief and well pleaded, must be taken as true. We think the allegations of this answer sufficient, for if the contract was as alleged, and there was a mistake in the original deed, and defendants have been in possession of and improved the lot with the knowledge, consent, and acquiescence of the plaintiffs, there has been such partial execution of the original contract as to entitle defendants to specific execution thereof, and to a correction of the deed in conformity thereto, and to be quieted in their right and title to the lot.

A decree will therefore be entered here, in modification of the decree appealed from, that the plaintiffs do within 30 days from the date this cause is redocketed in the circuit court make, execute, and deliver to defendants a deed of correction describing the last-mentioned lot therein according to the description thereof contained in the original deed of April 13, 1904, as recorded, and that, if they shall fail to do so, then that a special commissioner be appointed by the circuit court for that purpose, who shall make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to defendants such a deed for and on behalf of plaintiffs; and the cause will be remanded to the circuit court for the purpose of seeing that the mandate of this court is faithfully executed; and the appellees, who have substantially prevailed here, will have costs incurred in this court, as well as in the circuit court, whose decree, except as modified, will be affirmed.

BUTCHER'S HEIRS et al. v. KUNST et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 84*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINALITY.

Where an appeal from a judgment or order of a county court appointing, or refusing to appoint, an administrator has been allowed by, and docketed in, a circuit court, and the person appealing has right of appeal, the order of dismissal thereof by the circuit court, as improvidently awarded, will be treated as a final judgment, from which a writ of error will lie to this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 528-547; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 18*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ACT—NONRESIDENT.

A distributee of the estate of one dying intestate in this state, and who would, if a resident of this state, be entitled to precedence in administration, and as the law was prior to 1903 would, notwithstanding such nonresidence, have been entitled to administer on such estate, is now by amendment of chapter 13, p. 83, Acts 1903 (section 3258, Code 1906), wholly disqualified to act as such administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 20*)—APPOINTMENT—REVIEW—PERSONS ENTITLED.

But though such nonresident distributee be disqualified by nonresidence to act as administrator, nevertheless his interest as distributee entitles him to be heard, by protest, objection, and advice in the appointment of a proper and competent person, with right of appeal to the circuit court, and writ of error to this court.

where there has been any abuse of the discretion of the court below in such appointment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 333*)—DEATH OF PLAINTIFF IN ERROR—EFFECT.

On the death of such nonresident distributee pending a writ of error brought by him to this court, though such death be suggested on the record of this court, and order be made reviving the cause in the name of his next of kin or next friend by whom the writ of error is prosecuted, the case may be heard and disposed of here on its merits upon the writ of error as originally awarded, without reference to such death, as provided by section 3900, Code 1906.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846-1850; Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 17*)—FAILURE OF DISTRIBUTE TO APPLY—APPOINTMENT OF CREDITOR.

By authority of section 3258, Code 1906, if no distributee of an estate apply for administration within 30 days from the death of the intestate, the county court may grant administration to a creditor, or to any other person, without waiting for an adjudication as to the sanity or insanity of a resident or nonresident distributee thereof, the statute imposing no such limitations on the appointing authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 43-59; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 23*)—TWO GRANTS OF ADMINISTRATION.

While the general rule is that there cannot be two valid grants of administration on the same estate at the same time, within the same state jurisdiction; and the second is a nullity while the first continues, yet such rule is inapplicable to the case of a temporary commitment of such estate to the sheriff as curator thereof, pending the determination of the right of administration by the county court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 128, 129; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

7. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 17*)—ADMINISTRATION—PERSONS ENTITLED.

While the county court may rightfully require evidence of a creditor's claim as a condition precedent to his appointment as administrator of an estate, yet, as the statute authorizes the appointment of any other person, if such appointee be not in fact a creditor, if he be otherwise competent to act, his appointment will not be invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 43-59; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

8. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 20*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT.

An order of the county court appointing an administrator, whether distributee, creditor, or other person, will not be set aside on writ of error to this court, unless it plainly appears that there was abuse of the discretion of the county court in making such appointment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

9. JUDGMENT (§ 9*)—VALIDITY—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

The rule in this state is that a judgment pronounced by a judge disqualified by personal interest to give judgment is not void, but voidable only, as being a decree not according to law, and to be set aside only when brought under review, and objection taken at the proper time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 237-239; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

10. QUESTION NOT DECIDED.

Quære: Where two of three commissioners of a county court are interested so as to be disqualified by reason thereof to give judgment in the matter of appointment of an administrator, there being no provision of law for calling in another commissioner, and no other tribunal with jurisdiction to make such appointment, would not they, ex necessitate, have jurisdiction to sit in judgment?

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Taylor County.

Contest to determine the right and priority to administration of the estate of Adolphus Armstrong, deceased, between Louisa Butcher and others and G. H. A. Kunst and others. From the final order of the county court appointing Kunst administrator of the estate, Louisa Butcher and such others appealed to the Circuit court, which court dismissed the appeal, and Louisa Butcher and such others bring error. On death of said Louisa Butcher pending hearing on writ of error, said cause was revived and proceeded in by George Woofter and others as heirs and next of kin. Affirmed.

Dent & Dent, B. F. Bailey, and C. P. Guard, for plaintiffs in error. John L. Hechmer, for defendants in error.

MILLER, P. This case had its origin in a contest over the right and priority of administration of the estate of Adolphus Armstrong, deceased, begun in March, 1907, in the county court of Taylor county, and continued on appeal of Louisa Butcher by George Woofter and others, her next of kin, to the circuit court of said county, from the final order of the said county court appointing, on motion of creditors and others, G. H. A. Kunst, administrator of said estate. The case is here upon a writ of error to the judgment of the said circuit court dismissing said appeal.

On June 18, 1908, since the case was docketed here, the death of Louisa Butcher, pending this writ of error, being suggested on motion of said Woofter and others, it was ordered that the case be revived and proceeded in in their names in place of said Louisa Butcher. On final hearing, September 4, 1908, said Kunst moved the court as follows: First, to require plaintiffs in error to mature the case as to L. E. Matz, not served with process; second, to require plaintiffs in error to amend their petition so as to bring in as defendants Eugene Sommerville and L. E. Matz, the latter in his representative capacity; third, to set aside the order of revival herein, and, in support thereof, exhibited a certified copy of the will of said Louisa Butcher, and of the order of the county court of said Taylor county appointing

W. B. Lynch executor; fourth, to dismiss the writ of error and supersedeas, on the ground that the judgment appealed from, dismissing the appeal as improvidently awarded, is not a final judgment on the principles of the cause, from which an appeal lies to this court. So far as the record shows, Matz has no individual interest to subserve, wherefore not a necessary party. He appeared by petition in the county court as foreign guardian of the said Louisa Butcher, appointed by the probate court of Monroe county, Ohio, which court also adjudged her an imbecile, and incapable of taking care of and preserving her property, and also joined in the motion of creditors to appoint said Kunst administrator. The death of Louisa Butcher annulled the authority of the said Matz as a representative of deceased, and therefore he is no longer a necessary party. In the county court Eugene Sommerville appeared by petition, claiming right of administration by virtue of a power of attorney and nomination therein of said Louisa Butcher, and also filed a protest in writing against the appointment of any other person. He did not appeal from the order appointing said Kunst, and has not appeared to cross-assign errors in this court. The question of Sommerville's right of administration and the questions presented by the other motions are all involved in the merits of the controversy presented upon this writ of error, if the judgment below was final, so as to give us jurisdiction, and need not be separately considered.

The order of the circuit court was that the appeal be dismissed as improvidently awarded. It is argued on behalf of Kunst that this order was, in effect, only a refusal of the appeal, and not an adjudication of the rights of the parties, and that, no appeal having been applied for or allowed by a judge of this court, as provided by section 3634, Code 1906, and there being no final adjudication by the circuit court, this court is without jurisdiction of the case, and the writ of error should be dismissed. We do not think this position well founded. An appeal was allowed by the circuit court; and, if appellant Louisa Butcher had right of appeal from a judgment denying her right and priority of administration, or right to nominate said Sommerville, or right of protest against the appointment of said Kunst, she had right of appeal to the circuit court, by virtue of section 1261, Code 1906, and to writ of error to this court by virtue of section 4038, Code 1906, entitling her to a writ of error to the judgment or order of the circuit court in controversy concerning the probate of a will or the appointment of a personal representative, guardian, committee, or curator. In Bridgman v. Bridgman, 30 W. Va. 212, 216, 3 S. E. 580, a like order of the circuit court dismissing an appeal was treated as equivalent to the affirmation of the order of the county court, and we think we should so treat the judgment in this case. The dismissal of the appeal, so far as the record shows, could have been upon no other ground except want of error in the judgment of the county court. That judgment was final, and determined the right of administration as between the contestants. And although the motion may not have been well founded, and the court may have given a wrong reason for its judgment, it must necessarily be treated as final and conclusive, and from which a writ of error may be prosecuted to this court.

So far as the record shows, Louisa Butcher was the sole heir and distributee of the estate of Adolphus Armstrong. She was a very old woman, some 80 years of age, and being of weak mind, insane, according to her West Virginia next of kin, and an imbecile in the judgment of her appointees, Sommerville and Wilson, and of the probate court of Ohio and being about to come into possession of an estate of some $200,000 or $300,000, it was natural that she should suddenly develop many friends, next of kin, and without kinship, ready and anxious, voluntarily or involuntarily, to help her manage and dispose of it. Sommerville and his co-appointee, Wilson, were quick in securing a power of attorney from her, making them her agents to collect, manage, sell, and convey said property, and nominating them as administrators of the estate of said Armstrong. Woofter and others, her West Virginia friends and next of kin and prospective heirs, were naturally interested, and on their motion in said county court, prior to the appointment of said Kunst, the estate of said Armstrong was by said county court, pending the question of the right and priority of administration and the appointment of a personal representative, committed to the sheriff, as curator thereof, and who, so far as this record shows, is now in charge of it. In the proceedings before the county court these two sets of friends and representatives were opposed to each other, and there was a third friend, Matz, who, having had himself appointed guardian in Ohio, took the side of Kunst, joining in the motion of creditors for his appointment as administrator. Sommerville and Wilson on the one side, and Woofter and others, appellants, on the other, though hostile, in the proceedings before the county court, claim right of priority of administration by right of nomination of said Louisa Butcher and of her supposed rights to precedence as sole distributee; and it is by virtue thereof that Woofter and others appeared and protested before the county court, and afterwards appealed to the circuit court, and are now prosecuting this writ of error.

Two questions are presented, the answers to which will settle the controversies between these two sets of conflicting claimants, and will also, for the most part, also settle the controversies between them and the said Kunst. The first question is, Had Louisa Butcher, as distributee of said estate, the right of administration or the right of nomination as claimed? Second, if she had not such right, had she, by virtue of her interest in said estate, right of protest, and advice in the appointment of an administrator, and right of appeal from the adverse judgment? Prior to the amendment of section 4, c. 85, Code 1899 (Acts Leg. 1903, p. 83, c. 13) now section 3258, Code 1906, if sole heir and distributee, and a competent person, she would have had precedence in right of administration, but by that amendment, being a nonresident, that right was wholly taken away. That amendment added the proviso: "That no person not a resident of this state shall be appointed or act as such personal representative, unless the decedent be a nonresident of the state at the time of his death, and names in his will a nonresident as his executor." It is quite evident that counsel on both sides in this controversy have overlooked this amendment. Nor do we know of any law giving her right of nomination or appointment of a resident administrator. Without such authority given by statute her nomination would not bind the court in exercising sound discretion in the appointment of some suitable person. 18 Cyc. 92. The statute is plain, and does not call for interpretation. Its terms clearly precluded Louisa Butcher, a nonresident, from administering said estate, and her appointees and next of kin acquired no rights under her to administer thereon. This answers the first question.

The second question we answer in the affirmative. Being the sole distributee, she was vitally interested in the proper and the just administration of the estate, and, though herself disqualified by law to administer, she had the right to be heard on protest against the appointment of an improper or disqualified person, and to appeal from any order of the county court in which there should be any abuse of its discretion, and, if aggrieved by the judgment of the circuit court dismissing her appeal, she has the right to a writ of error thereto from this court.

Whether or not Woofter and others, her next friends and distributees of her estate, were entitled, on suggestion of her death, to have had this cause revived in their names we need not decide; for, without such suggestion, we think the case may be heard and disposed of here on its merits, upon the writ of error as originally awarded, without reference to her death, for it is provided by section 3900, Code 1906, that "if, in any case of appeal, writ of error, or supersedeas, which is now or may hereafter be pending, there be at any time in an appellate court, suggested or relied on in abatement, the death of a party, or any other fact, which, if it had occurred after verdict in an action, would not have prevented judgment being entered (as if it had not occurred) the appellate court may, in its discretion, enter judgment or decree in such case as if the said fact had not occurred."

Coming then to a consideration of the errors assigned, the first is that the county court had no authority, prior to an adjudication of the sanity or insanity of Mrs. Butcher, simply because 30 days from the date of the death of the intestate had expired, to appoint a creditor administrator. But the statute puts no such limitation upon the court. Said section 3258, Code 1906, provides that "if no distributee apply for administration within thirty days from the death of the intestate, the court may grant administration to one or more of his creditors, or to any other person." Nor does the statute impose any other condition precedent to the appointment of a creditor. If the sole distributee be insane, as appellants have treated Mrs. Butcher, she would be wholly incompetent, if a resident and otherwise qualified, to administer the estate.

Next it is claimed that the court was without authority, without good cause shown and notice to him, and had no right or authority to revoke the powers of the curator, and on motion of a creditor appoint him administrator. This proposition is based upon the general rule that there cannot be two valid grants of administration on the same estate at the same time, within the same state jurisdiction, and that the second appointment is a nullity while the first continues. Counsel cite 18 Cyc. 113, and Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Grat. (Va.) 85. But we do not understand this rule to be applicable where, as in this case, and as set forth by appellants in their petition for appeal to the circuit court, the estate has been committed to the sheriff temporarily, until proper administration thereof can be determined and settled. This, we think, has been the practice in this state and in Virginia. Such temporary appointment, pending the appointment of a permanent administrator, is, in effect, an appointment pendente lite, to act only during the continuance of the litigation that was the occasion of his appointment, and his powers cease with the termination of the suit or proceeding. 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 803, note 2, and cases cited. No notice to the curator therefore was required.

Next it is said that it is necessary for a creditor applying for administration to establish, by affidavit or otherwise, the nature, character, and amount of his debt, and that his debt is not fictitious. A probate court we perceive might very properly require satisfactory proof of the creditor's claim as a condition precedent to his appointment, but the statute gives right to appointment of any other person, and though the appointee be not a creditor in fact, if he be, in the judgment of the court, a proper person, he is not disqualified or incompetent to act.

Next it is said that the right of a distributee to administer the estate, the estate being solvent, is paramount to that of a creditor. This, in general, is a correct proposition. The answer to it, however, as applied to this case is that no distributee, qualified and competent, has applied for administration. But it is not applicable to the case in hand. It is said that by the death of Louisa Butcher the rights of appellants to administer the estate of Armstrong have become fixed and determined, and that we should now reverse the judgment below, appointing Kunst, and let them, or one of them, in to administer said estate. But they are not distributees of the estate of Armstrong. Louisa Butcher, if sole distributee of that estate, became invested with the title thereto before her death, and appellants can in no sense be said to be distributees thereof, entitling them to preference in the administration of his estate. The personal estate of Armstrong, after payment of his debts, must go from his administrator into the hands of the executor or administrator of Louisa Butcher, subject to the payments of her debts and specific legacies, if any, and not directly to her legatees or distributees. But suppose the death of Louisa Butcher did give right of administration to appellants, would they not first be required to make application to the county court therefor? Certainly this court cannot settle their rights in the first instance. This is an appellate court. Section 3239, Code 1906, among other things provides that "if after administration is granted to a creditor, or other person than a distributee, any distributee, who shall not have before refused, shall apply for administration there may be a grant of probate or administration in like manner as if the former grant had not been made, and the said former grant shall thereupon cease." The word "may" in this statute was held in Hutcheson v. Priddy, supra, to mean "must." This case and Hunt v. Wilkinson, 2 Call (Va.) 49, 1 Am. Dec. 534, cited therein, are authority also for the proposition that no notice to the curator of the appointment of a permanent administrator is required.

Lastly it is affirmed that the order of the county court is absolutely void, for the reason that John Henry, president of the county court, is a stockholder of the First National Bank, one of the petitioning creditors, and on whose motion Kunst was appointed administrator, wherefore interested. The record of the judgment appealed from does not show that either of the commissioners who presided at the time of the appointment of Kunst were stockholders, or otherwise interested in said bank. But it is sought to make this appear by a supplemental petition filed by appellants in this court, and the record of certain supplemental proceedings filed therewith, had before said court, on the petition of said bank and others to revoke the authority of the curator of said estate, and finally heard thereon, and upon the cross-petitions of said curator seeking to have his appointment confirmed, and of said Woofter asking that the appointment of said Kunst be revoked, and that he as a distributee be appointed to administer said estate. This record shows that upon the hearing of said several petitions on April 30, 1907, by the two commissioners, said Henry having retired, the court refused to set aside the order appointing Kunst, and that said two commissioners, not being able to agree to the confirmation of said curator, the further consideration of that matter was postponed. No appeal was taken from this judgment to the circuit court, and certainly we have no jurisdiction to grant or entertain a writ of error directly to that judgment of the county court. We are cited by counsel to Hall v. Thayer, 105 Mass. 219, 7 Am. Rep. 513, and to 17 Cyc. 734, for the proposition that a stockholder of a corporation cannot sit in judgment in an action in which his corporation is a party, such interest being sufficient to disqualify him, and for the further proposition that a decree or order of appointment of a judge of probate thus disqualified is absolutely void. While the latter proposition seems to be the law in some jurisdictions, in this state a different rule obtains. As was said in Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 305, 28 S. E. 370, 372: "In this state, where there is no statute bearing directly on the point, such a decree is not void, but only voidable, as being a decree not according to law, and to be set aside when brought under review, and upon objection taken." If upon this writ of error we were permitted to look into the supplemental record, we would see it there stated that two of said commissioners, namely, Morrow and Henry, are stockholders in said bank. The question would then be presented whether, there being no other tribunal having jurisdiction of matters of probate of this character, these commissioners, though interested, would not ex necessitate have jurisdiction to sit in judgment. See Coal Co. v. Doolittle, 54 W. Va. 210, 230, 231, 46 S. E. 238. In the Massachusetts case cited another probate judge was called to preside. No provision for this is made in our law so as to call in other commissioners. That case was an appeal from the judgment of another judge, refusing to set aside and vacate a prior appointment because the judge presiding was interested. But we cannot consider the supplemental record on this hearing, and the judgment there complained of is not before us. The record of the judgment which we have before us shows no abuse of the discretionary power of the county court to make the appointment of the defendant in error. It is true that in the protest of Woofter and others against the appointment of Kunst, filed in the county court, it was charged, and sworn to, on information and belief, that Kunst, for certain reasons alleged, was not a proper person to appoint; but this protest was not evidence, and the record fails to show that any proof of these charges was offered. Besides the court had other papers and documents before it. It may have heard evidence not in the record for all we know.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court and the order of the county court should be affirmed.

SHREVE v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

RAILROADS (§ 72*)—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—CONDITION OR COVENANT.

The provision in a deed of land to a railroad company that it is made "in consideration of the said railroad company agreeing to erect and maintain a depot on the land conveyed" is not a condition subsequent, entitling the grantor to recover the land in ejectment on a failure of the company to erect such depot, but is only a covenant or agreement.

Error to Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Action of ejectment by R. W. Shreve against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company and others. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Greever & Gillespie, for plaintiff in error.
Henry & Graham and S. D. May, for defendants in error.

CARDWELL, J. This litigation arises out of the following state of facts: On the 19th day of August, 1889, Geo. W. Gillespie and wife were the owners in fee simple and in the possession of about 400 acres of land in one boundary, situated in the rich lands, on Clinch river, Tazewell county, Va., and by deed of that date they conveyed two parcels of the 400 acres, aggregating about 3 acres, to the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the granting clause being as follows:

"Witnesseth, that in consideration of the said the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company agreeing to erect and maintain a depot on the land conveyed by this deed, the said George W. Gillespie and Barbara E. Gillespie, his wife, do grant unto the said the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for depot and railway purposes all those two certain tracts, pieces or parcels of land, lying in Tazewell county, state of Virginia, situate in the rich lands."

The covenants contained in the deed are general and in this language:

"And the said George W. Gillespie and Barbara E. Gillespie do covenant that they will warrant generally the property hereby conveyed, that they have the right to convey the said lands to the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, that the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company shall have quiet possession of the said lands free from encumbrances; that they will execute such further assurances of the said lands as may be requisite, and that they have done no act to encumber the said lands."

The Norfolk & Western Railway Company claims and holds under successive conveyances from the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company the title vested in the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company by the deed of August 19, 1889, and at the point of the location of the land the railroad had been built, and the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company and its successor to the title has had possession of the land ever since the deed was made in August, 1889, up to the institution of this suit—or, as one witness says, "ever since it was staked off."

By deed dated April 14, 1890, Gillespie and wife conveyed the remainder of their boundary of the 400 acres of land to the Tazewell Land & Improvement Company, in which conveyance the three acres theretofore conveyed to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company is expressly excepted, but the conveyance, after reciting that "the land company had purchased the land conveyed and are engaged in laying out in a town and expect to expend large sums of money in the improvement and building up of said town, relying on the said agreement of the N. & W. Rd. Co. to comply with their said contract to wit, to erect and maintain a depot on said two pieces of land," contains this clause:

"Now, in consideration of the premises, and for the consideration aforesaid, the parties of the first part hereto do hereby grant, assign and transfer unto the party of the second part hereto, all their right, title and interest in and to said contract between themselves and said Norfolk and Western Railroad Company. This assignment and transfer of said contract is without recourse on the parties of the first part."

By deed of June 24, 1904, the Tazewell Land & Improvement Company conveyed to R. W. Shreve the land acquired by it under the said deed from Gillespie and wife, which deed to Shreve contains this clause:

"There is also excepted and reserved from this conveyance any right, title, and interest in three acres of land in two parcels conveyed by George W. Gillespie and wife to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for depot and railroad purposes by deed dated the 19th day of August, 1889, * * * but the said party of the first part grants, conveys, assigns, and transfers to said Robert W. Shreve, any right, title, claim or interest which the said party of the first part now holds under and by virtue of the deed from George W. Gillespie and wife to said company, dated the 14th day of April, 1890.

There has never been any depot house built on the two lots in question, but there was a section house erected on the lots, and switches and sidings placed on them, and the railway company has never refused to build a depot on the premises, but has repeatedly stated that it would do so as soon as the business at that point (the name of which is Doran) was of such magnitude as to warrant it; and this action of ejectment was brought by R. W. Shreve in 1907 against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to recover the possession of the said two parcels of land.

At the trial of the cause, upon the plea of the general issue—not guilty—both parties agreed to submit the matters of law and fact to the judge of the court for decision; and the court at its December term, 1907, rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, to which judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The learned and exhaustive arguments for both plaintiff in error and defendant in error have taken a very much wider range than our view of the case would require, and we shall not attempt to review the numerous authorities to which we have been cited as bearing upon the questions: First, whether the language and stipulations of the deed of August 19, 1889, from Gillespie and wife to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, constitute and make a condition subsequent, to be performed by defendant in error; and, second, if such is the true construction of the deed, and that condition subsequent has not been performed but has been broken, has plaintiff in error the right to recover the land in this his action of ejectment?

In our view of the case the primary and controlling question is whether or not the language of the deed by clear and unmistakable terms affixes to the grant in the deed a condition subsequent, upon the breach of which the land and the right of re-entry thereon reverted to the grantors, or whether the language of the deed relating to the consideration is a naked promise, and, at most, only a covenant.

It will be observed that the deed in question does not, as is the usual form, affix to the grant a condition subsequent, but the only language used to indicate an intention to attach a condition to the absolute grant of this land to the grantee is that the grant is "in consideration of the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company agreeing to erect and maintain a depot on the land conveyed. * * *" No time is mentioned when this promise or agreement is to be carried out, nor is there any specification as to character or quality of the depot to be erected and maintained; nor is there expressed a reservation of title to the land in the grantors by reversion upon the breach of the promise or agreement made by the grantee, nor any intimation of the right to re-enter upon the land upon the breach of the promise or agreement to erect or maintain a depot on the premises.

In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error it is conceded to be too well settled to admit of citation of authority that "conditions subsequent are not favored in law, and are construed strictly because they tend to destroy estates; and the vigorous exacting of them is a species summum jus, and in many cases hardly reconcilable with conscience."

It is also recognized that "in the construction of every instrument, where the courts are asked to say whether the language used creates a covenant or a condition, the intention of the parties governs. If the parties to the instrument say upon its face that there is to be a forfeiture if its terms are not complied with, then the forfeiture is declared regardless of results; and the converse is equally true."

So, as stated in Union Stockyards Co. v. Packing Co., 140 Fed. 701, 72 C. C. A. 195, in determining the intention of the parties, and whether the terms of the instrument create a covenant or a condition, it becomes necessary to consider "the language employed, the situation of the parties, their relation to the subject of the transaction, and the object in view."

We have already adverted to the language employed in the deed, and we will now look in that connection to "the situation of the parties, their relation to the subject of the transaction, and the object in view."

The undisputed and pertinent facts to be considered in this connection are that, shortly after the Clinch Valley Division of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company was completed, there was some indication that a depot would be needed at Doran. The railroad company was looking out for a place to locate the depot when it became necessary to erect it, and Gillespie, under whom plaintiff in error claims, who owned, as stated, about 400 acres of land at that place, conceiving the idea, doubtless, that a town might be laid out and built up there, making a depot at Doran not only desirable, but necessary, offered to give the railroad company a lot of land necessary for the railroad's purposes if it would erect and maintain a depot there, and the railroad company accepted the proposition, and a deed was drawn to that effect. This is, as counsel for plaintiff in error say, the plain import of the language used in the deed; and they further say "that a depot was not necessary at the time the conveyance was made, and perhaps has not been necessary since is claimed by the company and established by the record." In other words, Gillespie voluntarily offered to give the land needed for a depot at Doran, and the railroad company accepted the offer; the only binding effect being predicated upon the promise or covenant on the part of the railroad company to build and maintain the depot when the conditions at that point, in the economical and successful operation of the railroad as a public service corporation, required it.

As counsel for plaintiff in error further say, "both parties to the deed knew that railroad companies could only erect depots at those places where the needs of the public required them," and the point at Doran was not an exception to that rule. But, although the loss to Gillespie of the increase in the value of the residue of his 400-acre tract of land resulting from the public needs not requiring a depot at Doran may be ever so great, this does not so change the rule of construction of his deed under which plaintiff in error seeks to maintain this action of ejectment to recover the land conveyed. Neither the language of the deed in question nor the subsequent conveyance of the residue of the 400-acre tract of land indicates an intention on the part of Gillespie that the title to the 3 acres conveyed to the railroad company for a depot site should revert to him in the event that no depot was built thereon. Not only is there no language used in his deed to the railroad company to declare a forfeiture in that event, but when read in the light of his subsequent conveyance to the land company, in which he expressly excepts therefrom the 3 acres theretofore conveyed to the railroad company and only assigns to the land company such right, title, or interest as he had "in and to said contract between themselves and the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company," and this "assignment and transfer" too "without recourse" to the grantors, it cannot be doubted that Gillespie regarded that he only held a covenant on the part of the railroad company to erect and maintain a depot at Doran, and did not consider that the title and possession of the land would revert to him in the event that the public needs did not warrant the erection and maintenance of the depot contemplated. If such was not the construction of the conveyance, as understood by the grantors, it is inconceivable that they would have omitted therefrom language plainly declaring that the title and possession of the land conveyed was to revert to them in the event that a depot was not erected and maintained on the land granted.

Almost the identical question presented here—i. e., the comparative weight and standing to be given in a court of law to a promise or covenant, and a condition subsequent—was considered by this court in King v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 99 Va. 625, 39 S. E. 701, and there the stipulations in the conveyance which were the subject of litigation were construed as covenants, and not conditions. The court, speaking through Harrison, J., and after a statement as to the contentions of the parties and the settled rule of law governing in construing the conveyances, said: "We are of opinion that the language employed in the deeds under consideration is apt language to create a fee simple, and that the superadded words under the authorities amount to covenants rather than conditions. The deeds are not voluntary, as contended, but are based upon the benefits to accrue to the reserved property of the grantor by reason of the use of the granted premises as a railroad terminal. Hence they must be interpreted as any other deeds based upon a valuable consideration. The language is to be taken most strongly against the grantor, and most favorably to the grantee."

The features of the conveyance under consideration in that case were stronger in favor of a construction that a condition, and not a covenant, was intended by the contracting parties, than are those contained in the deed we now have under consideration. In fact, the language in the deed before us in apt words creates a fee simple in the land granted, and there are no superadded words declaring in express terms or by clear implication, or in any terms whatever, that the nonperformance of the promise and agreement of the grantee stated to be the consideration moving the grantor to make the conveyance should operate as a forfeiture of the land, giving the grantors the right to re-enter and possess themselves of it. In such a case, as is also said in the opinion just cited, the courts will incline to construe the language of the deed as creating only a covenant and not a condition, thus adopting the more benignant construction upholding the instrument, and leaving the parties to pursue their appropriate remedies for a breach of covenant.

The principles of law adverted to are fully recognized in Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, and in Alex. & Wash. R. Co. v. Chew, 27 Grat. 547, where they are discussed at some length; the opinion saying: "When the grantor seeks to destroy an estate which he himself has created, it must plainly appear that the act is within the very terms of the condition and breach. It is not sufficient to show mischiefs and even losses which might have been provided against had they been foreseen. The fact that they were not and could not have been anticipated may be a sufficient reason for the failure to provide a remedy; but they cannot justify the courts in so enlarging the operation of the covenant as to make them a ground of forfeiture."

They are discussed, also, by the leading text-writers and commentators of the law, and the uniform view taken is in accord with the decided cases mentioned above and to follow. 1 Sharswood & Budd's L. Cas. in the Amer. L. of R. Prop. p. 123 et seq.; 4 Kent's Com. (2d Ed.) pp. 122-129; 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) pp. 265, 266; 2 Minor on R. Prop. § 529; 2 Dev. on Deeds, § 970, and notes.

In Greene v. O'Connor, 18 R. I. 56, 25 Atl. 692, 19 L. R. A. 262, the deed conveying land contained these words: "This conveyance is made upon the condition that the said strip of land shall be forever kept open and used as a public highway and for no other purpose." Held to create a covenant, and not a condition subsequent, as claimed by the plaintiff; the opinion saying: "The clause in question is merely a declaration of the purpose for which the land conveyed was to be used and improved, to wit, as a highway. It contains no language which imports that the grant shall be void in case the purpose for which the land is conveyed is not carried out, nor does it reserve to the grantors and their heirs the right in that event to re-enter on the land and resume possession of it as of their former estate. Moreover, the purpose declared is in its nature general and public, and not one inuring specially to the benefit of the grantors. Such a declaration does not create an estate on condition, but merely imposes a confidence or trust on the land, or raises an implied agreement on the part of the grantee to use the land for the purpose specified."

It is very true that the court in that case quotes the statute governing such conveyances, but that fact does not detract from the force of the discussion of the general principles controlling in determining whether the language used in a conveyance of land should be construed as creating a covenant or a condition subsequent.

In Rawson v. Inhabitants of School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen (Mass.) 125, 83 Am. Dec. 670, the opinion by the court, Bigelow, C. J., after stating that a deed will not be construed to create an estate on condition, unless language is used which, according to the rules of law ex proprio vigore imports a condition, or the intent of the grantor to make a conditional estate is otherwise clearly and unequivocally indicated, and that conditions are not to be raised readily by inference or argument, says: "We believe there is no authoritative sanction for the doctrine that a deed is to be construed as a grant on a condition subsequent solely for the reason that it contains a clause declaring the purpose for which it is intended the granted premises shall be used, where such purpose will not inure specially to the benefit of the grantor and his assigns, but is in its nature general and public, and where there are no other words indicating an intent that the grant is to be void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled."

"If it be asked whether the law will give any force to the words in a deed which declare that the grant is made for a specific purpose or to accomplish a particular object, the answer is that they may, if properly expressed, create a confidence or trust, or amount to a covenant or agreement on the part of the grantee. Thus it is said in Duke of Norfolk's Case, Dyer, 138b, that the words 'ea intentione' do not make a condition, but a confidence and trust. See, also, Parish v. Whitney, 3 Gray (Mass.) 516, and Newell v. Hill, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 180, and cases cited.

But, whether this be so or not, the absence of any right or remedy in favor of the grantor under such a grant to enforce the appropriation of land to the specific purpose for which it was conveyed will not of itself make that a condition which is not so framed as to warrant in law that interpretation. An estate cannot be made defeasible on a condition subsequent by construction founded on an argument ab convenienti only, or on considerations of supposed hardship or want of equity."

We are of opinion that the deed under review does not admit of the construction contended for by plaintiff in error, but that its language creates only an agreement or covenant on the part of the grantee, and that the judgment of the circuit court in favor of defendant in error in this action of ejectment is plainly right.

Having taken this view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the remaining question, whether upon the breach of a condition subsequent annexed to a grant of land an assignee of the grantor's right to recover the land can maintain an action of ejectment.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

WASHINGTON, A. & MT. V. RY. CO. v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 124, 125*)—OBLIGATION OF MASTER.

A master must use ordinary care to provide reasonably safe and suitable appliances for his servants, and must inspect the same from time to time and use ordinary care to discover and repair defects; but, unless he knows or by the use of ordinary care ought to have known that an appliance has become defective, he is not liable for an injury resulting therefrom.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the breach of duty assigned on the part of a master was its negligence in permitting a trolley pole on a car to get out of repair, there could be no recovery for injuries to a servant struck by the pole falling from the car, unless it was proved that the trolley pole was out of repair, that the defect was the proximate cause of the accident, and that the master knew or ought to have known of the defect by the use of ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-908; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the breach of duty relied on for a recovery for a personal injury is the failure to keep premises in reasonably safe repair, the declaration must aver either that defendant had notice of the unsafe condition or set out facts from which such notice will necessarily be inferred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 816-836; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

A declaration in an action for injuries to a track hand struck by a trolley pole falling from a passing car, which alleges that the master negligently failed to exercise reasonable care by allowing the pole to get out of repair, that, as the car passed plaintiff, the pole became unfastened and fell, striking plaintiff, knocking him down, etc., is defective for failing to expressly aver that the defect in the pole was the cause of the injuries or to set out facts justifying such an inference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 816-836; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where every allegation of fact in a declaration in an action for injuries to a servant may be true without rendering the master liable for the injuries sustained, the declaration is clearly bad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 816-836; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Alexandria County.

Action by David H. Taylor against the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

James R. & H. B. Caton and Moore, Barbour & Keith, for plaintiff in error. Samuel P. Fisher and John M. Johnson, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The amended declaration upon which the case was tried is as follows:

"David H. Taylor, plaintiff, complains of the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of Virginia, who was summoned to answer the plaintiff of a plea of trespass on the case, for this, to wit, that heretofore, to wit, on the 27th day of June, 1907, the said defendant was engaged in operating an electric railway within the state of Virginia and through the county of Alexandria, in which said county the injury hereinafter complained of occurred; that said plaintiff before and at the time of said injury was employed by the said defendant as a track hand to work upon and keep in order the roadbed and track of the said defendant upon which its cars and trains were run, and thereupon it became the duty of the defendant to exercise reasonable care to protect the plaintiff from injury from its cars and trains while working upon its said roadbed, yet said defendant did not exercise reasonable care to protect the plaintiff from injury from its cars and trains while working on said roadbed, but carelessly and negligently failed so to do by not keeping in order, but allowing to become out of repair, a certain trolley pole on one of its cars, so that on the day and year aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, while the said plaintiff was working on the south bound or west track, when a certain train thereon approached, and the said plaintiff and his fellow workmen moved a safe distance to the side of the train to allow the said train to pass, and, as the said train was passing them, the said trolley pole attached to the motor car of the same became unfastened or detached from the said car in some manner unknown to the plaintiff, and fell over the side of the said car on which the said plaintiff was standing and struck the said plaintiff, knocking him down, and at the same time the rope from said trolley pole fastened to said motor car became entangled about the body of the said plaintiff and dragged or jerked him under, or his right leg beneath, the wheels of the rear car of the said train, and the rear car and the wheels thereof passed over the said leg, whereby the said plaintiff's said right leg was so greatly bruised, mashed, torn, and mangled that it became and was necessary to amputate the said leg below the knee. Wherefore, by reason of the injury to the said plaintiff, he has sustained damages to the extent of $5,000, and therefore he brings his suit."

The defendant's demurrer to the declaration was overruled, and upon the trial there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The first error assigned is to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration.

The principal objection made to the declaration is that it does not aver that the defendant knew or ought in the exercise of ordinary care to have known of the alleged defective condition of the trolley pole, the fall of which caused the plaintiff's injuries.

While it is the plain duty of the master to use ordinary care to provide reasonably safe, sound, and suitable appliances and instrumentalities for the use of his servants, and to examine and inspect the same from time to time, and to use ordinary care to discover and repair defects, still, unless he knows or in the use of ordinary care ought to have known that such machinery or appliances have become defective or unsafe, he is not liable for injuries resulting therefrom. Va. & N. C. Wheel Co. v. Chalkey, 98 Va. 62, 66, 34 S. E. 976, and authorities cited; N. & W. R. Co. v. Jackson's Adm'r, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. 370; Va. Portland Cement Co. v. Luck, 103 Va. 434, 435, 49 S. E. 577.

As the only breach of duty assigned in the declaration on the part of the defendant was its negligence in permitting the trolley pole to get out of repair, there could be no recovery in the case, unless it was made to appear, not only that the trolley pole was out of repair and that defect was the proximate cause of the accident, but that the defendant knew, or ought in the use of ordinary care to have known, of its defective condition. Since it was necessary to prove this, it was also necessary to allege it.

This was expressly held in N. & W. R. Co. v. Jackson's Adm'r, supra, in passing upon the declaration in that case. One of the objections made to the first count in the declaration in that case and sustained by the court was that it did not aver that the alleged defects in the push pole were known to the defendant, or ought to have been known to it.

In Va. Portland Cement Co. v. Luck, supra, in passing upon the demurrer to the declaration, while not expressly stated, it is clearly implied that, where the breach of duty relied on for a recovery is the failure to keep the premises in reasonably safe repair, the declaration must aver either that the defendant had notice of the unsafe condition of the premises, or set out facts from which it was necessarily to be inferred that the company was aware of the unsafe condition of its premises. See pages 434, 435 of 103 Va., 49 S. E. 577.

Neither is it expressly averred that the defect in the trolley pole was the cause of the plaintiff's injuries; nor can this necessarily be inferred from the facts stated.

Every allegation of fact in the declaration may be true, and yet the defendant may not be liable to the plaintiff for the injuries suffered by him. Where that is the case, the declaration is clearly bad.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the court erred in overruling the demurrer; that its judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, the demurrer to the amended declaration sustained, and the cause remanded with leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, if he be so advised, and for further proceedings not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

SCHNURMAN'S EXECUTRIX v. BIDDLE & CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 151*)—CUSTODY OF PROPERTY—TRUSTEE.

Title to a bankrupt's property vests in the trustee, and he alone can sue to recover it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 193; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 26*)—APPOINTMENT—BOND WITH SECURITY—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Code 1904, § 2642, provides that, where the will directs that an executor shall not give security, the court or clerk shall not require it, unless, on the application of any interested person, or upon its own knowledge, it thinks security should be required. Plaintiff was adjudicated a voluntary bankrupt and died without having been discharged, and his executrix, who, under the will, was not required to give security, applied for a discharge. Creditors of the bankrupt moved to require the executrix to give bond which she resisted on the ground that all of his creditors, including the moving parties, had filed their claims in the bankruptcy proceedings, and that the petitioning creditors had no interest in the property now in her hands, it being property not belonging to the bankrupt at the time of adjudication, and that there was nothing to show that the bankrupt's estate would not be discharged from bankruptcy. Held, that the chancery court as a probate court had a wide discretion under the statute which would not be interfered with unless plainly abused, and that there was no abuse of discretion in requiring the widow to give bond to preserve the estate pending the bankruptcy proceedings for those interested therein.

Error to Chancery Court of Richmond.

Proceedings by Biddle & Co. and others against Henry Schnurman's executrix. Order revoking defendant's powers as executrix upon her refusal to execute a bond with sureties as required by order of court, and she brings error. Affirmed.

O'Flaherty & Fulton, for plaintiff in error.
Stern & Stern, for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. Schnurman was adjudicated a bankrupt at Richmond November 9, 1907. The appellees Biddle & Co. and others were named by him in his schedules as his creditors, and proved their debts. He never applied during his lifetime for his discharge in bankruptcy, and died April 10, 1908, leaving a will in which his wife was named as executrix, and requesting that no security be required of her on her bond as such. She qualified in the chancery court of the city of Richmond on April 17, 1908, giving a bond without security in the penalty of $8,000. On May 25, 1908, the appellees moved the court to require the executrix to give security, and the court entered an order that on June 1st she should execute a bond in the penalty of $2,500 with security.

The executrix denied the right of the creditors, Biddle & Co. and others, to move the court for security on her bond as executrix; it being admitted that they were creditors of Henry Schnurman, deceased, on debts arising prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy by her testator. She further proved that Henry Schnurman filed his petition in bankruptcy in the United States court for the Eastern district of Virginia; that with this petition he filed all schedules required by law, and among them the schedule showing all the assets and estate of the bankrupt, and the names and addresses of all of his creditors, including among them the parties making the motion for security on her bond; that on the 9th day of November, 1907, Schnurman was duly adjudicated a bankrupt under the acts of Congress relating to bankruptcy (Act March 2, 1867, c. 176, 14 Stat. 517, as amended by Acts July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418]; Feb. 5, 1903, c. 487, 32 Stat. 797 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 1024]); that he surrendered all his property and fully complied with all the requirements of all acts and all orders touching his bankruptcy; and that said proceedings in bankruptcy have been and still are pending in the District Court of the United States. On June 1, 1908, she, as executrix, filed her petition in the bankrupts' court, praying that the estate of her testator might be decreed to have a full discharge of all debts provable against it, except such debts as are excepted by law from such discharge, and that on the same day the judge of the district court "ordered that a hearing be had upon the petition on the 15th day of June, 1908, and that all known creditors and other persons in interest may appear and show cause, if any they have, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted."

The executrix, further answering, states that she is advised that the creditors of Schnurman have all filed their claims in the bankruptcy proceeding, and will participate with the other creditors in the proceeds arising from the bankrupt's estate; that she had complied with the law and executed a bond as required by the chancery court by its order, and had collected all the estate as far as she knows, as shown by the appraisal of the estate adopted by her as an inventory, to wit, the proceeds of an insurance policy No. 112842 in the Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia upon the life of Henry Schnurman, amounting to $1,743.28, and that she has proceeded to pay and is paying the debts of Schnurman arising since his adjudication as a bankrupt; that she is advised that the parties above named, who it is admitted were creditors of Henry Schnurman at the time of his adjudication in bankruptcy, have no interest in this estate in her hands; that they cannot claim anything more than the trustee or assignee in bankruptcy can claim, and the trustee in bankruptcy is making no claim for this money; that she is advised that, under the bankruptcy laws of the United States, the creditors of the bankrupt have an interest only in such property as the bankrupt had at the time of his adjudication as a bankrupt; and that such creditors have no interest whatever in the estate now in her hands, and, if the right of the creditors did depend upon the discharge of the bankrupt's estate, which she denies, there is nothing before this honorable court to show that the bankrupt's estate will not be discharged from bankruptcy.

On the 3d day of June, 1908, the executrix declining to execute a bond with surety, her powers were revoked, and the case is before us upon her petition for a writ of error to that order.

Section 2642 of the Code of 1904 provides that: "Where the will directs that an executor shall not give security, the court or clerk shall not require it of him, unless on the application of any person interested, or upon its or his own knowledge it or he thinks security ought to be required."

Schnurman was adjudicated a bankrupt during his lifetime upon his own petition. He died without having been discharged. His widow and executrix has applied for a discharge, but that, so far as this record discloses, has never been granted. The whole subject is before the District Court of the United States. It and it alone can determine whether or not the estate of the decedent will ever be entitled to a discharge from its indebtedness. The order appealed from was merely to preserve the estate of the bankrupt, whatever it might be, for the benefit of whom it might concern. The chancery court, sitting as a court of probate, is under the section above referred to clothed with a wide discretion, the exercise of which should not be interfered with except in a case where it has been plainly abused.

It is true that the title to all the property of a bankrupt vests in the trustee, and that the trustee alone can sue to recover it; but the proceeding under review is in no sense for the recovery of property. It is merely an application to the court to require security to be given for the safety of a fund in which the applicants deem themselves interested. The court could have taken the same action at the instance of its clerk, or as a result of its own knowledge upon the subject.

We are of opinion that the court has not exceeded in its order the proper exercise of the discretion with which it is clothed; and its judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by A. E. Garrett against J. G. McCrorey. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. R. Peterson and Thos. H. Willcox, for appellant. Starke, Venable & Starke, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by A. E. Garrett to recover of J. G. McCrorey damages for injuries sustained by him from the falling of an awning which was maintained by the defendant over the pavement in front of his store on Main street in the city of Norfolk.

The record shows that the defendant was the lessee of a storehouse situated on the north side of Main street, in the city of Norfolk, in which he conducted a mercantile business. On the front of said store he had erected an adjustable awning, called "Coyle's frame," 50 feet in length and weighing 250 pounds. The flaps of the awning were elevated above the street 7 feet, and the awning when lowered projected from the building over the sidewalk about 5 feet. On the day of the accident, a high wind was blowing, and, as the plaintiff was walking along the north side of Main street, the awning fell and struck him, causing the injuries complained of.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for $2,000, which we are asked to review.

The first assignment of error is that the lower court improperly overruled the defendant's demurrer to the first count of the declaration. The second assignment of error is that the court refused to grant for the defendant an instruction which is set out in bill of exceptions No. 3. The third ground of objection is to the action of the court in giving for the plaintiff an instruction which is set out in bill of exceptions No. 4.

These three assignments of error involve but one question, and they will therefore be considered together. The question presented by each is whether or not a person maintaining a movable awning in front of his place of business in a city owes the duty of safety to the public using the street, and is liable to a person who, without fault on his part, is injured by its fall, regardless of the care or skill observed in its construction and maintenance; in other words, that the test of liability is not the lack of proper care on the part of the owner of the awning, but the fact of resulting injury, through no fault of his, to the party using the street.

It is well settled that public highways, whether they be in the country or in the city, belong, not partially, but entirely, to the public at large, and that the supreme control over them is in the Legislature. It is also an established general rule that any unauthorized obstruction which unnecessarily impedes or incommodes the lawfulness of a highway is a nuisance at common law. City of Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 181, 43 S. E. 345.

So far as the right of the public to travel unmolested over the highway is concerned, the dominion of the people is absolute, and is not confined to obstructions on the surface of the street, but extends with equal emphasis to encroachments upon the public right either below or above the surface. Indeed, an obstruction above the street that may injure the traveler is more dangerous than one on the ground, because the latter is more readily seen and avoided.

In Wood on Nuisances (3d Ed.) vol. 1, § 275, the principle governing cases of this nature is stated as follows: "As has been previously stated, every person in traveling upon a public street has a right to absolute safety, while in the exercise of ordinary care, against all accidents arising from obstructions of or imperfections in the street, and this applies as well to what is in the street as to what is over it." Further this author says: "It would seem that all signboards, cornices, blinds, awnings, and other things projecting over a walk, or so situated with reference thereto that if they fall they may do injury to travelers, are nuisances unless so secured as to be absolutely safe, and the person maintaining them is liable for all injuries arising therefrom except such as are attributable to inevitable accident."

In Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 647, it is said: "It is not necessary, in order to constitute a nuisance, that there should be an actual physical obstruction to the public use upon the surface of the highway, for its use may be rendered as dangerous by objects above the way as by obstructions upon the surface." And at section 613 it is said: "So, too, they are liable for negligently suffering awnings or structures to project over sidewalks and thus cause injury to those rightfully using the street." See, also, Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, § 1033. The doctrine announced by these authors is supported by reason and authority. Tarry v. Ashton, 1 Q. B. Div. 314; Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458, 8 Am. Rep. 354; Congreve v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 79; Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52; O'Hanlin v. Carter Oil Co., 54 W. Va. 510, 46 S. E. 565, 86 L. R. A. 893; Bohen v. City of Waseca, 32 Minn. 176, 19 N. W. 730, 50 Am. Rep. 564; McHarge v. Newcomer, 117 Tenn. 595, 100 S. W. 700, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298.

In Congreve v. Smith, supra, it is said: "The general doctrine is that the public are entitled to the street or highway in the condition in which they placed it; and whoever, without special authority, materially obstructs it, or renders its use hazardous, by doing anything upon, above, or below the surface, is guilty of a nuisance; and, as in all other cases of public nuisances, individuals sustaining special damage from it, without any want of due care to avoid injury, have a remedy by action against the author or person continuing the nuisance. No question of negligence can arise; the act being wrongful."

In the case of Clifford v. Dam, supra, it is said: "The public are entitled to an unobstructed passage upon the streets, including the sidewalks of the city." And in speaking of the obstruction in that case the court said: "It was not necessary to prove negligence. The action was not based upon negligence but on a wrongful act for which the defendants were responsible."

These authorities, and others that might be cited, lead to the conclusion that, unless justified by legislative authority, the owner of an awning erected and maintained over a public street becomes as to persons lawfully using the street an insurer. He maintains the same at his own peril, and any one receiving an injury from such awning, being himself free from blame, has a good cause of action against the owner thereof, regardless of the question of his negligence in the construction and maintenance of such awning.

We are therefore of opinion that the three assignments of error under consideration are not well taken.

The only remaining objection that we need notice is that taken to the action of the court in refusing to permit the defendant to introduce the stenographic report of the testimony of Dr. S. E. Brown, taken at the first trial of the case; the ground for the introduction of the stenographer's notes being that Dr. Brown was ill and unable to attend.

This court has held, in a recent case, that where a witness has died between two trials, who was cross-examined by the attorney for the commonwealth at the first trial, his testimony at the first trial may be proved on the second; but this case recognizes that different principles apply where the witness who testified at the former trial is living. Parks v. Commonwealth, 109 Va. —, 63 S. E. 462.

In the case at bar the record shows that the absent witness was confined to a hospital in the city of Norfolk with an attack of typhoid fever. The defendant knew when the case was called for trial that this witness was absent and could not be present at that trial, but nothing was said until the trial was in progress, when the offer was made to introduce the stenographer's notes of this witness' testimony taken at a former trial. If the evidence of this witness was material, the defendant should, when the case was called, have moved for a continuance in order that he might secure the presence of the witness at some subsequent time, and not have waited until the trial was in progress to substitute for the living witness the stenographer's notes of his evidence at a former trial. This is not permissible under our practice. See Wise Terminal Co. v. McCormick, 107 Va. 376, 58 S. E. 584.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

LYNCHBURG MILLING CO. v. NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK OF LYNCHBURG.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 150*)—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

A demurrer to evidence does not invade the province of the jury as triers of disputed facts, but simply calls on the court to determine whether as matter of law the evidence, though true, warrants a judgment for demurree.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 523*)—OWNERSHIP OF DRAFT—EVIDENCE.

Circumstances in evidence in garnishment proceedings for the proceeds of a draft drawn by defendant on plaintiff in favor of the C. bank, and by it sent to garnishee bank, with bill of lading for grain shipped by defendant attached, for collection, are not inconsistent with the prima facie ownership of the payee under the negotiable instruments law (Code 1904, § 2841a24), supported by defendant's letter to garnishee, put in evidence by plaintiff, declaring the fund to be the property of the C. bank; the circumstances being that the C. bank, which was not a party to the proceedings, asserted no claim therein, that defendant waived protest and notice, that after the draft had been dishonored, and returned to the C. bank, plaintiff wrote defendant to return it and it would be honored, that when it came back the second time there was attached a penciled memorandum bearing defendant's initials, "Please send back and present again," and that the C. bank stamped on the bill of lading that it was not responsible for the quantity, quality, or delivery of the grain, and indorsed the draft without recourse.

Error from Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Garnishment proceedings by the Lynchburg Milling Company against the National Exchange Bank of Lynchburg. Judgment for garnishee. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Harrison & Long, for plaintiff in error.
Caskie & Coleman, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, the Lynchburg Milling Company, brought an action of assumpsit against the White & Rumsey Grain Company of Chicago, Ill., for the recovery of $550, at the same time issuing an ancillary attachment and designating the defendant in error, the National Exchange Bank of Lynchburg, Va., as being indebted to and having effects of the defendant in its possession.

The Exchange Bank answered, denying the suggestion, but stated by way of explanation that it had received from and on account of the Continental National Bank of Chicago a draft drawn by the defendant, the White & Rumsey Grain Company, on the plaintiff, the Lynchburg Milling Company, in favor of the Chicago bank for $533.35, for collection, to which draft a bill of lading was attached for a car load of oats shipped by the defendant to the plaintiff; that the draft was paid by the plaintiff to respondent, and the amount placed to the credit of the Chicago bank, but the fund was not remitted because of the pendency of the attachment. Whereupon the plaintiff suggested that the garnishee had not fully answered, and a jury was impaneled to inquire whether the amount in the hands of the Exchange Bank was the property of the defendant, the White & Rumsey Grain Company, or of the Chicago bank.

At the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiff on that issue, the Exchange Bank demurred to the evidence, and to a judgment sustaining the demurrer this writ of error was allowed.

The first assignment of error involves the action of the court in compelling the plaintiff to join in the demurrer to the evidence.

The plaintiff insists that it had an absolute right to a trial by jury under the statute, of which it was deprived by the court's action in requiring it to join in the demurrer. But that assignment is founded on a misconception of the office of a demurrer to evidence. It does not invade the province of the jury as triers of disputed facts; but, assuming that the evidence demurred to is true, the court is called on to determine whether such evidence as a matter of law warrants a judgment for the demurree. In other words, it is a supervisory power over jury trials, invoked and exercised by the courts, whose duty it is to decide questions of law arising upon undisputed facts.

In 6 Ency. of Pleading and Practice, 439, it is said: "There is nothing in this practice which is in contravention of jury trial"—citing Hopkins v. Nashville, etc., Ry. Co., 96 Tenn. 409, 34 S. W. 1029, 32 L. R. A. 354.

That case contains an exhaustive review of the authorities, and shows that the practice obtains in about one-half of the states of the Union, while in the United States courts and the courts of other states much more drastic methods prevail, such as directing verdicts and ordering nonsuits. The practice has come down to us from the common law, and is too thoroughly embedded in our jurisprudence to admit of serious question.

The next assignment ascribes error to the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence.

As remarked, the sole issue of fact was whether the avails of the draft in the hands of the Exchange Bank were the property of the White & Rumsey Grain Company or of the Chicago bank.

The negotiable instrument act (Va. Code 1904, § 2841a24) declares that "every negotiable instrument is deemed prima facie to have been issued for a valuable consideration, and every person whose signature appears thereon to have become a party thereto for value."

The Lynchburg Milling Company can stand on no higher ground in respect to this litigation than the maker of the draft, the White & Rumsey Grain Company, would have occupied at the suit of the Chicago bank. In either case, under the statute, the Chicago bank would prima facie be deemed a holder for value.

In addition to this prima facie presumption, the Lynchburg Milling Company put in evidence a letter written by the White & Rumsey Grain Company to the Exchange Bank in which it expressly declares that the fund in controversy is "the property, not of our company, but of your correspondent, the Continental National Bank."

In the case of Oeters v. Knights of Honor, 98 Va. 201, 205, 206, 35 S. E. 356, in discussing the effect of certain letters from the defendant to the plaintiff, Keith, P., in delivering the opinion of the court, observes: "They could not have been introduced by the defendant, but when offered by the plaintiff were, of course, admitted. The statements made in them were clearly relevant to the issue before the jury, are uncontradicted by any evidence in the record, and are, therefore, to be taken as tending to prove the facts stated in them. We need not undertake to measure and define their exact probative force and effect. It is enough that they are declarations of the defendant offered by the plaintiff, and are germane to the issue"—citing Downer & Co. v. Morrison, 2 Grt. 238, 250.

In this state of the case the burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove that the White & Rumsey Grain Company was the owner of the fund and that the Chicago bank held the draft, not for value, but for collection merely. If that had been the true theory of the case, the Chicago bank would have had no interest in concealing the fact, and the deposition of one of its officers would have put the question at rest.

The plaintiff, however, did not undertake to disprove the prima facie title of the Chicago bank by direct evidence, but chose rather to rely on certain circumstances as tending to sustain its contention. For instance, it was said that the Chicago bank had not asserted claim to the fund or employed counsel to maintain it. But the fact must not be lost sight of that the bank was not a party to the litigation, and, doubtless, preferred to leave the defense to the White & Rumsey Grain Company, which was a party, and would have been liable over to the payee in the event the fund was held subject to the plaintiff's attachment. In its correspondence with the Exchange Bank, the Chicago bank uniformly claimed the proceeds of the draft, and acted under the advice of counsel in Chicago.

Our attention has also been called to the circumstances that the drawers waived protest and notice, and that, after the draft had been dishonored and returned to the Chicago bank, the plaintiff wrote the defendant to return the draft and it would be promptly honored. When the draft came back the second time, there was a slip attached with a pencil memorandum bearing the initials of the White & Rumsey Grain Company, "Please send back and present again," and also that the Chicago bank stamped on the bill of lading that it was neither responsible for the quantity, quality, nor delivery of the goods, and indorsed the draft without recourse.

We do not regard these circumstances inconsistent with the Chicago bank's bona fide ownership of the draft. The drawer, a wholesale grain company, resided in Chicago, and the draft was drawn on a customer in a distant state. In the event the draft was not paid, the Chicago bank would have had ready recourse against the drawer, and it seems to us that its action was not incompatible with ordinary business methods and the dictates of common prudence.

Lastly, the ruling of the court in excluding certain correspondence between the Lynchburg Milling Company and the White & Rumsey Grain Company is made the ground of exception.

The excluded letters, if admissible, possessed very little probative value, and could not have affected the result, so that the error, if error there was, in excluding the letters, was harmless.

Upon the whole case the judgment is plainly right and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

POTOMAC POWER CO. v. BURCHELL et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 320*)—PROCEEDINGS BY WATER POWER COMPANY—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION—EFFECT AS TO ACQUIREMENT OF TITLE.

In view of Code 1887, § 1079 (Code 1904, p. 584), relating to condemnation proceedings, and providing that, on payment into court of the sum awarded as compensation for land, the title shall vest in a company taking land in fee simple, where it appears that money was paid into court by a water power company, and the commissioners' report was confirmed by consent, and that the compensation awarded was ordered to be paid to the attorney of the owner of the land taken, whatever title he had vested by force of the proceedings in the company in fee simple.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 852; Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 397*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — VARYING OR CONTRADICTING A WRITTEN CONTRACT.

A plain and unambiguous contract in writing is within the direct terms of the rule which forbids parol evidence to vary or contradict a written instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1756-1765; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 317*)—PROCEEDINGS BY WATER POWER COMPANY—CONTRACT DIVESTING TITLE—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT.

The title to land condemned by a water power company having vested in the company by force of the statute and the terms of the contract between the company and the landowner, any provision or stipulation in the contract by which the title was to be divested is to be regarded as a condition subsequent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 155*) — MEANING — "CONDITION SUBSEQUENT."

A "condition subsequent" is one to be performed or fulfilled after the vesting of the estate, and the intent of which is to defeat it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 488-495; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1402-1404; vol. 8, p. 7610.]

5. DEEDS (§ 155*)—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT AS NOT BEING FAVORED IN LAW.

Conditions subsequent are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 488-495; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

6. DEEDS (§ 167*)—CONDITION SUBSEQUENT—BREACH—RELIEF IN EQUITY.

A contract between the owner of land and a water power company proceeding to condemn it provided that, on payment of the money by the commissioners into court, it should be considered as a complete satisfaction and answer to all objections on the part of the owner, and that the report was to be confirmed and the title to the land vested in the company. It then provided that the company before using the land for any purpose should pay the owner $100 within five years, and that, if it failed to do so within such time, the title should revert to the owner. Held, that the provision for the reversion of the title on failure to pay was, in contemplation of a court of equity, a penalty or forfeiture, the object of which is to secure the payment of money, against which a court of equity would relieve.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

7. DAMAGES (§ 85*)—PENALTY FOR NONPERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

The general principle is that, whenever a penalty is inserted merely to secure the performance or enjoyment of a collateral object, the latter is considered as the principal intent of the instrument, and the penalty only as accessory, and intended only to secure due performance or damage really incurred by nonperformance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 179-185; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

8. EQUITY (§ 24*)—RELIEF AGAINST PENALTIES FOR NONPERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

The true test by which to ascertain whether relief against a penalty for nonperformance of a contract can be had in equity is whether compensation can be made, and, if it cannot be made, equity will not interfere, but, if it can, it will grant relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 69-76; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

9. EQUITY (§ 24*)—RELIEF AGAINST PENALTY TO SECURE PAYMENT OF MONEY.

If a penalty provided for in a contract is merely to secure payment of money, courts of equity will relieve the party on payment of the principal and interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 69-76; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fairfax County.

Suit by the Potomac Power Company against Landon Burchell and others to quiet title. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Moore, Barbour & Keith, for appellant.
Norton & Boothe, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The Potomac River Power Company in June, 1898, gave notice that it would on the 18th of the ensuing July apply to the county court of Fairfax for the appointment of five disinterested freeholders, pursuant to section 1085 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 586), to ascertain a just compensation to the owners thereof for such land as was proposed to be taken by that company for its purposes.

In accordance with this notice, five freeholders were appointed, who, acting in obedience to the order of court, returned their report, dated the 31st of October, 1898, in which they stated that they had ascertained that the sum of $150 would be a just compensation for the land taken.

At the January term, 1899, of Fairfax county court, it appearing that the Potomac Power Company had paid into court the sum of $150 ascertained by the commissioners, the matter was referred to W. P. Moncure, a commissioner of accounts, to report as to its distribution, and it was further ordered "by consent of parties that the report of the commissioners filed herein be and the same is hereby confirmed and recorded together with the plat that accompanies it in the deed books of this county, and this matter is continued."

At the ensuing February term the following order was entered:

"Potomac River Power Co. v. N. W. Burchell, etc.

"The report of W. P. Moncure, commissioner of accounts, is now filed in this cause. No exceptions being made to same, the said report is now confirmed. And the court doth adjudge and order that out of the money in his hands the clerk to pay the costs and commissions incident to this case and the balance to pay to C. Vernon Ford, attorney for N. W. Burchell, and take his receipt for the same. And this order is final."

There the matter rested until January, 1905, when the Potomac Power Company, the successor of the Potomac River Power Company, filed its bill, in which it shows that on the 9th of January, 1899, it entered into a contract in writing with Norval L. Burchell, in which it was set forth and agreed that the power company had instituted proceedings to acquire for its purposes by condemnation a certain parcel of land in said county containing three acres, more or less; that commissioners had allowed Burchell the sum of $150 for said land; that Burchell excepted to their report; that it was finally agreed that, upon the payment into court of the sum of $150, the exceptions to the report of commissioners should be withdrawn, the court to dispose of the money as might be proper and the report confirmed; that the title acquired by said company, however, in said condemnation proceedings, should be subject to the condition that said company should pay Burchell the further sum of $100 before using said land for its purposes or any purpose; and that such payment should be made on or before five years from the date of the agreement, and, in event the payment should not be made in the time specified, then the title of said company to revert to Burchell, and the said company to convey by special warranty to Burchell the title acquired by the condemnation proceeding, but upon payment by said company to Burchell of said sum of $100 within the time specified its title to said parcel of land should become absolute and unconditional so far as Burchell and his heirs should be concerned, and Burchell was then to convey the said parcel of land to the said company, its successors and assigns, with special warranty, free of all liens and incumbrances which might be placed thereon by said Burchell. The bill further shows that Burchell died some time prior to January 9, 1904, a nonresident of the state of Virginia; that he had never made any demand on the complainant for the payment of said sum of $100, and that, up to the time of filing the bill, no executor or administrator of his estate had qualified in Virginia, so that there was no one to receive the money due to him or his estate; that complainant is ready and desires to make the payment, with interest if it is proper; that Burchell left surviving him his widow and several children, his heirs at law; that complainant was willing to have waived, though it did not do so, the legal requirement that the $100 should be paid to the personal representative of Burchell, and was willing to make payment to the widow and heirs at law, and take a deed from them, but was afterwards advised that Edward Burchell, one of the children, was non compos mentis; that no deed had ever been tendered to complainant in accordance with the agreement, and complainant prays that the cloud resting upon its title by reason of the provisions of the agreement of the 9th of January, 1899, between the Potomac Power Company and Burchell be quieted, and that complainant may have such other relief as his case requires.

The defendants answered this bill at length. They admit that Burchell was at the time he entered into said agreement and at the time of his death, which occurred in January, 1899, a nonresident of the state of Virginia, and that, so far as they are informed, he never made any demand upon the complainant, and that no executor on the estate of Burchell had ever qualified in Virginia. They deny that there was any obligation upon Burchell or upon his executor to make any demand upon the Potomac Power company for the payment of the sum of money in question, and further aver that at all times within the five years mentioned in the agreement Landon Burchell, who acted for his father in the preparation of said agreement, and who is the executor and trustee under his will, resided in the city of Washington, and was prepared and authorized to accept the money in controversy, if there had been any desire upon the part of the power company to make payment of it.

That Burchell at the time the commissioners reported and fixed the compensation at the sum of $150 had promptly excepted upon the ground that the amount allowed was totally inadequate, and that he was preparing to show that said parcel of land on account of its peculiar location was of value largely in excess of the sum fixed by the commissioners; that after Burchell had filed his exceptions, in order to avoid protracted and costly litigation, an agreement was reached between the power company and Burchell, a copy of which is filed with plaintiff's bill. The answer states the defendants' view of the negotiations which led up to the contract filed with the bill at great length; the substance of it being that the sum of $100 provided for in the contract was not considered by Burchell as representing the value of the property, which it is claimed was and is, greatly in excess of said sum, but that the real purpose and intention of said agreement was to give to the power company an option during the period of five years, by force of which upon the payment of $100 within the time limited the title of Burchell to the three acres of land was to be divested, and the deed was then to be made by Burchell conveying it with special warranty to the Potomac Power Company.

A good deal of evidence was taken in support of this view, which resulted in the decree of the circuit court of Fairfax by virtue of which a commissioner was appointed with instructions to convey to Landon Burchell, to be held by him in trust in accordance with the terms of the will of Norval W. Burchell, all the right, title, and interest acquired by complainant and those under whom it claims under the condemnation proceeding in accordance with the agreement of January 9, 1899; and from that decree an appeal was allowed by this court.

Reference is made in the record to the source of Burchell's title as having been founded upon a sale for delinquent taxes assessed against the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company, which had at one time owned the land in controversy; but we have not thought it necessary to discuss that question, as that corporation is not named as a defendant in the bill, and is taking no part in this litigation. We have set forth in detail the condemnation proceeding in the county court of Fairfax, for upon the legal effect of that proceeding this whole controversy rests.

By section 1079 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 584) it is provided that "the sum so ascertained to be a just compensation may be paid to the person entitled or into court. * * * Upon such payment the title to * * * the land for which said compensation is allowed shall be absolutely vested in the company in fee simple."

In Southern Ry. Co. v. Gregg, 101 Va. 308, 43 S. E. 570, it is said: "The payment of the fund into court was a condition precedent to the vesting of the title, and, as soon as it was paid, the title did vest absolutely."

It appears from the condemnation proceeding in this case that the money was paid into court, and that the report of the commissioners was confirmed by consent of the parties, and not only that, but it further appears that the sum ascertained by the commissioners was by order of the court paid to the attorney of N. W. Burchell, the owner of the land taken. Whatever title Burchell had by force of this proceeding vested in the Potomac Power Company in fee simple.

The contract of January 9, 1899, is in writing. It is plain and unambiguous, and is within the direct terms of the rule which forbids us to receive parol evidence to vary or contradict a written instrument. Towner v. Lucas, 13 Grat. 705; Slaughter v. Smither, 97 Va. 202, 33 S. E. 544.

The contract recites: "Whereas the commissioners appointed by said court to ascertain a just compensation to be paid the owner or owners of said land duly and regularly made their report to said court, and therein and thereby assessed and fixed the amount to be paid by said company for said land at $150, and

"Whereas, the said N. W. Burchell, claiming to be the owner of said land, is dissatisfied with the amount so allowed, and has filed exceptions thereto and has agreed in consideration of this agreement to withdraw his said exceptions and consents to the confirmation of the said report:

"Now, therefore, this agreement witnesseth, that the parties hereto have agreed and do hereby covenant and agree to and with each other as follows:

"First. That, upon the payment of said sum of one hundred and fifty dollars into said court, such payment shall be considered as a complete satisfaction and answer to all objections and exceptions to said report, and thereupon the said report to be confirmed by a consent order vesting in said party of the second part title to said land, the said sum of $150 to be disposed of by the court as it may determine right and proper.

"Second. That the title so to be acquired by the said party of the second part as aforesaid shall be subject to this condition: that the party of the second part shall pay to the said Burchell the further sum of one hundred dollars before using said land for its purposes or any purpose, provided that such payment of said additional one hundred dollars shall be made on or before five years from this date, and in the event the said party of the second part shall fail to make such further payment of one hundred dollars within the time aforesaid, then and in such event, all title acquired by party of the second part to said land as aforesaid shall revert to said Burchell, and the party of the second part shall and will convey unto the said Burchell, with special warranty, all the right, title, and interest acquired by it under said condemnation proceedings."

This contract recognizes in explicit terms the force and effect given to condemnation proceedings by section 1079 of the Code of 1887 upon the title to land where the terms of the statute have been complied with, and, if any added force could be given to the statute by agreement of parties, it is to be found in the terms of this contract, which declares that the payment of $150 into court should be considered as a complete satisfaction and answer to all objections, and that thereupon the report was to be confirmed by a consent order vesting in the party of the second part title to the land. The title having vested, any provision or stipulation in that contract by which the title was to be divested is to be regarded as a condition subsequent.

A condition subsequent is one which is to be performed or fulfilled after the vesting of the estate, and the intent of which is to defeat it. 2 Minor, 266. And it is well settled that conditions subsequent are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates. People's Pleasure Park Co. v. Rohleder, 109 Va. —, 61 S. E. 794.

The contract having already provided that upon the payment of the money awarded by the commissioners into court it should be considered as a complete satisfaction and answer to all objections on the part of Burchell, and that the report was to be confirmed and the title to the land vested in the power company, it was then provided that, before using the land for its purposes or any purpose, the power company should pay to Burchell the further sum of $100 within five years from the date of the agreement, and that, if it failed to make such further payment within the time aforesaid, the title of the power company should revert to Burchell.

In the contemplation of a court of equity, the provision that, upon the failure to pay the specified sum within the time limited, the title should revert to Burchell, is a penalty or forfeiture, the object of which is to secure the payment of money, against which a court of equity will relieve.

"The general principle now adopted is that, whenever a penalty is inserted merely to secure the performance or enjoyment of a collateral object, the latter is considered as the principal intent of the instrument, and the penalty is deemed only as accessory, and therefore as intended only to secure the due performance or the damage really incurred by the nonperformance. In every such case the true test by which to ascertain whether relief can be had in equity is to consider whether compensation can be made or not. If it cannot be made, then courts of equity will not interfere. If it can be made, then if the penalty is to secure the mere payment of money, courts of equity will relieve the party upon paying the principal and interest." 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 1314.

In Hacket v. Alcock, 1 Call, 533, it is said: "A court of equity will always relieve against a penalty, where compensation can be made."

In Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Munf. 332, 6 Am. Dec. 519, it is said: "Equity is not fond of taking advantage of forfeitures arising merely from a lapse of the time specified; and it is the constant course of courts of equity to relieve against such forfeitures on making adequate compensation."

In the case of Asher v. Pendleton, 6 Grat. 628, Pendleton and Asher had purchased a tract of land at public auction jointly upon credit and under a written contract between them, which provided that, if Pendleton failed to pay all or any portion of his share of the purchase money so that Asher had to pay it, Asher should have the whole land, and repay to Pendleton any portion of the purchase money he had paid. Pendleton failed to pay and Asher paid in full. It was held by the court that this provision was a penalty against which a court of equity would relieve.

The condition upon which a court of equity grants relief against a forfeiture or penalty is that compensation for nonperformance can be made; and in this case it is easy of ascertainment. The stipulation not performed was for the payment of $100 in cash on or before a given day in January, 1907. The money was not paid, and as was said by this court in Bethel v. Salem Imp. Co., 93 Va. 354, 25 S. E. 304, 33 L. R. A. 602, 57 Am. St. Rep. 808: "The measure of damages for a failure to pay money is, with few exceptions, the principal sum with legal interest thereon from the time the payment was due."

In Selden v. Camp, 95 Va. 527, 28 S. E. 877, Judge Harrison, speaking for the court, says: "Mere default in the payment of money at a stipulated time generally admits of compensation, and hence the time of payment is rarely of the essence of the contract, and when time is not of the essence of the contract, and compensation can be made, courts of equity can grant relief even against the failure to perform punctually conditions precedent."

We have then this case: By force of the condemnation proceedings in the county court of Fairfax, the title to the land involved in this litigation was vested in the Potomac Power Company. The contract of January 9, 1899, between Burchell and the Potomac Power Company, is fully set out in the writing filed as an exhibit with the bill. There is no suggestion of any fraud, accident, or mistake with respect to the terms of this contract; and, being plain and unambiguous, it is within the rule which excludes parol evidence to vary or contradict a written instrument. The stipulation contained in the contract with respect to the payment of $100 within five years, and, in the event that it was not paid within that time, that the title which had vested in the power company should revert to Burchell, is a penalty or forfeiture, the nonperformance of which admits of compensation, and against which a court of equity will relieve.

From all of which it follows that the decree of the circuit court of Fairfax must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. Reversed.

FARMERS' MFG. CO. v. WOODWORTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—CONTRACTS.

A contract in writing, complete on its face, cannot be altered by parol evidence of inconsistent agreements previously or contemporaneously made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2030-2047; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 434*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—INCOMPLETE CONTRACTS.

A partnership wrote to plaintiff, stating that it would build a steel structure as per plans submitted. Plaintiff accepted the proposition. The plans referred to were blueprints drawn to no scale, and containing no specifications. Defendant's company erected the device, but it was condemned as unsafe. Held, in an action for breach of contract, that parol evidence was admissible to show that plaintiff was ignorant of the mechanism of the machine to be built; that defendant's company were mechanical experts; that plaintiff submitted the model to them, and that they submitted a plan of the device, and assured plaintiff that, if built according to that plan, it would meet the specified requirements, and that the machinery would be safe; that plaintiff gave the contract to defendant relying upon such warranties; that the machinery was wholly worthless; and that the representations made to induce plaintiff to enter into the contract were false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 434.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 152*)—COMPETENCY—DEATH OF PARTY TO CONTRACT.

An agent of a corporation is not rendered incompetent to testify as to a contract by the death of a member of a partnership with whom the contract was made.

Error to Circuit Court, City of Norfolk.

Action by the Farmers' Manufacturing Company against A. L. Woodworth. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff alleges error. Reversed.

Jeffries, Wolcott & Wolcott, for plaintiff in error. V. H. Kellum and Brooke & Brooke, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, the Farmers' Manufacturing Company, applied to the late firm of T. W. Godwin & Co., of which the defendant in error, A. L. Woodworth, is the surviving partner, to manufacture for it an amusement device called a "revolving parachute," the general design of which is described as follows: "A circular platform was to be elevated by means of a revolving upright screw, or shaft, driven by electric power applied to machinery at its base. As this shaft revolved the platform was forced upward, and when it reached the top of the shaft was stopped, and the platform released and left free to descend by gravitation, revolving around the shaft."

Numerous interviews were had between the parties touching the construction of this contrivance, which culminated in the following correspondence:

"Norfolk, Va., July 3, 1906.

"J. Frank East, Esq., Norfolk, Virginia.

"Dear Sir: We beg to advise you that we will build the steel structure, with sixty feet of screw as per plans submitted and erect the same on the foundation prepared by you, * * * for the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars. It is further understood that you are to transport all the material, taking the same from our works and delivering the same at the point and alongside the foundation where the structure is to be erected, * * * and free of cost to the builders. That the structure shall be ready for delivery at our works by the 15th of September, 1906. The brake and air cushion shall be efficient for the purpose intended. The tower roof shall be of galvanized metal and oval in form. The two approaches for reaching the floor of the observation tower shall be inclosed. All black iron work to be covered with two coats of mineral paint. The structure and mechanism to be built on the lines of the illustrated model submitted.

"Respectfully submitted,

"T. W. Godwin & Company."

"Norfolk, Va., July 10, 1906.

"Virginia Iron Works, (T. W. Godwin & Company), Norfolk, Virginia.

"Dear Sir: We are in receipt of your favor of the 3rd, reference to building the steel structure and accept proposition, and ask that work proceed with all possible dispatch.

"Yours respectfully, Farmers' Mfg. Co.,
"By J. Frank East."

When completed, the structure was erected on the grounds of the Jamestown Exposition Company, but it proved unsatisfactory, and was condemned by the mechanical expert of that company, whose duty it was to inspect and pass on all structures set up on the grounds. It was pronounced unsafe and dangerous to human life, and its operation within the grounds forbidden.

Thereupon this action of assumpsit was brought by the plaintiff in error against Woodward, surviving partner of himself and T. W. Godwin, deceased, to recover damages for their alleged breach of contract in connection with the construction of the machine. To a judgment on behalf of the defendant this writ of error was allowed.

There are three counts in the declaration, which may be thus summarized:

(1) That the plaintiff was ignorant of the nature and mechanism of the machine and how it ought to be built so as to operate properly, and whether it could be used with safety to human life, and so constructed that the platform would ascend and descend in 10 minutes (that being the speed agreed on in order to make it a financial success). That T. W. Godwin & Co. were mechanical experts and skilled in such matters, and the plaintiff submitted the model to them and explained the purposes for which the device was intended, telling them that it must be so constructed as to be capable of being operated with safety and within the time limit prescribed, and that, unless assured that these essentials could be attained, the plaintiff did not desire the machine to be made. That the manufacturers submitted a plan of the device, and assured the plaintiff that, if built according to that plan, it would meet the specified requirements, and promised and warranted that, if they were awarded the contract of construction, the machine would be safe and suitable for the purpose mentioned. That the plaintiff, relying upon these warranties, and in consideration thereof, gave the contract to T. W. Godwin & Co. That the warranties were broken in the particulars set forth in the declaration, and the machine was wholly worthless for the purposes intended.

(2) The second count is founded upon the false representations of T. W. Godwin & Co. as to a fact within their knowledge as experts that the machine, if constructed by them according to the plans submitted, could be operated without danger to human life and at the required speed, and would be suitable for the uses contemplated. That, relying upon these representations, the plaintiff entered into the contract, and that the representations were false and the machine worthless.

(3) The third count alleges the breach of an implied warranty on the part of the manufacturers, that the machine contracted for would be reasonably suitable for the purposes intended, which purposes were known to them—and also the fact that the plaintiff relied on their judgment and skill in the construction of the device.

The plaintiff set out circumstantially what it expected to prove under the several counts of the declaration; but, upon objection, the court excluded the evidence, being of opinion that the correspondence contained in the letters of July 3 and 10, 1906, constituted a complete written contract between the parties, the terms of which it was not permissible to vary or add to by parol evidence. The trial proceeded upon that theory; and naturally resulted in a verdict for the defendant.

The legal proposition is not controverted that a contract in writing, complete on its face, cannot be altered or contravened by parol evidence of inconsistent agreements and undertakings previously or contemporaneously made. Towner v. Lucas, 13 Grat. 705; Virginia Hot Springs Co. v. Harrison, 93 Va. 569, 25 S. E. 888; Slaughter v. Smither, 97 Va. 202, 33 S. E. 544; Carlin v. Fraser, 105 Va. 216, 53 S. E. 145.

The rule is thus stated in Slaughter v. Smither, supra: "If the written contract purports to contain the whole agreement, and it is not apparent from the writing itself that something is left out to be supplied, parol evidence to vary or add to its terms is not admissible."

In the instant case, however, it is obvious from the letters themselves, read in connection with the plans to which they refer, that there were necessarily other provisions of the contract which do not appear on the face of the writings. The letter of July 3, 1906, which composes the body of the alleged written agreement, is of the most general character, and bears internal evidence of the fact that, to be intelligible, it must be read in the light of outside matters in the minds of the parties. The agreement to build "the steel structure," dissociated from previous negotiation as to the particular structure contemplated by the parties and to which it manifestly refers, contains no intimation of what was really in the minds of the contracting parties. "Structure" is a term of general signification, and, in the absence of explanatory words, conveys no definite idea of what is intended.

Nor is the situation materially aided by inspection of the plans referred to in the letter. They are drawn to no scale and contain no specifications, but are blueprints presenting merely in general outline tracings of the proposed device.

In fine, it would not be possible for one possessed of no information other than that supplied by the alleged written agreement to form an intelligent idea of the contemplated structure.

The rule of exclusion of parol evidence has no application where it is apparent from the writing itself that it does not embody the entire agreement. In such case, the writing being incomplete, it must be supplemented by other evidence, not to contradict or vary its terms, but to establish the real contract between the parties.

Besides, parol evidence was admissible under the second count of the declaration to prove the alleged false representations made by T. W. Godwin & Co. to induce the plaintiff to enter into the contract. Such evidence would be equally admissible, whether the contract were written or verbal. Grim v. Byrd, 32 Grat. 293, 300; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. 713, 5 Am. St. Rep. 285; Herron v. Dibrell, 87 Va. 289, 296, 12 S. E. 674; Wilson v. Carpenter, 91 Va. 183, 21 S. E. 243, 50 Am. St. Rep. 824; Grosh v.

Ivanhoe, etc., Co., 95 Va. 161, 27 S. E. 841; Wren v. Moncure, 95 Va. 369, 28 S. E. 588; Guarantee Co. v. National Bank, 95 Va. 480, 491, 28 S. E. 909.

It follows from the foregoing views that the case must be tried de novo along essentially different lines; and that fact renders it unnecessary to notice subordinate assignments of error upon questions which may not arise at the next trial.

So, also, with respect to the allegations of the third count of the declaration. If a proper case shall arise for the application of the doctrine of implied warranty of fitness of the machine for the purpose for which it was intended, the jury can be instructed upon that aspect of the case.

The defendant in error assigns as cross-error the action of the court in admitting the testimony of the witness East. It is insisted that, Godwin being dead, East was rendered incompetent to testify by the terms of the statute.

East was the agent of the plaintiff, and this court held in the case of Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 28 S. E. 594, that the agent of a corporation contracting for his principal is not rendered incompetent to testify by reason of the death of the other contracting party.

For these reasons, the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

HUNTER et al. v. HICKS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 124*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CONVEYED—FEE SIMPLE.

A husband deeded land and personal property to a trustee for the benefit of his wife, giving the wife power by the deed to sell the property and dispose of the proceeds as she might see fit with the co-operation of the trustee, who was required to execute such instruments as the wife should direct. If the wife should die before the husband, the grant of the property remaining was to cease, but she was to have power to dispose of one-half of it, the husband reserving the right if he died before his wife to dispose of one-half of the property then remaining by will. Held, that the wife took an absolute title to the property conveyed, the reservation to the husband being void for repugnancy to the first estate conveyed.

2. DEEDS (§ 142*)—ESTATE CONVEYED—RESERVATIONS—VALIDITY.

The reservation to the husband of one-half of the property remaining was void for uncertainty.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Robert I. Hunter and others against W. H. Hicks and others. A demurrer to the declaration was sustained, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

The declaration was as follows:

"Robert I. Hunter, Newtie E. Hunter and Louise E. Shanks complain of W. H. Hicks and the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company of Baltimore City, of a plea of trespass, for this, to wit, that on the 2d day of March, in the year 1871, one Isaac R. Hunter was seised and possessed of that certain tract, piece or parcel of land lying and being in the county of Norfolk, near the city of Norfolk, at the town of Huntersville, which was the place and residence where the said Isaac R. Hunter then resided, and bounded on the north by the lots formerly owned by Reynolds and Hinton, on the south by other land of the said Isaac R. Hunter and Mrs. Barnes' land and others, on the east by other land of the said Isaac R. Hunter, and on the west by Lambert's Point Road, containing by estimation five acres, and also of another tract of land, adjoining that above described, containing about 40 acres, also in the said town of Huntersville, and, being so seised and possessed of said two tracts of land, the said Isaac R. Hunter executed and delivered to one V. O. Cassell, trustee, a certain deed, in the following words and figures, to wit:

"This deed made this 2nd day of March Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy one, between Isaac R. Hunter of the first part, V. O. Cassell trustee of the second part and Martha Louisa Hunter wife of the said Isaac R. Hunter of the third part.

"Witnesseth that in consideration of the love and affection which the said Isaac R. Hunter hath and beareth for his wife the said Martha Louisa Hunter, and for and in consideration of the sum of five dollars, to the said Isaac R. Hunter in hand paid by the said V. O. Cassell trustee the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, he, the said I. R. Hunter doth grant unto the said V. O. Cassell trustee the following property with general warranty with its appurtenances to wit: viz.: that certain tract piece or parcel of land lying and being in the county of Norfolk near the city of Norfolk, at the town of Huntersville, and is the place and residence where the said I. R. Hunter now resides and bounded as follows: on the north by the lots formerly owned by Reynolds & Hinton, on the south by said Hunter's land and Mrs. Barnes' land and others, on the east by Hunter's land, and on the west by Lambert's Point Road, containing by estimation five acres. Also the balance of the land owned by the said Isaac R. Hunter in the town of Huntersville, consisting of about forty acres and adjoining the land hereinbefore described. Also the stock on the said lands consisting of four horses, and ten hogs. Also the following personal property, one rockaway, one cart & gear, farming utensils, household & kitchen furniture consisting of six beds, five bedsteads, three dozen chairs, four tables, one piano, four looking glasses, and a pot of crockery, three stoves, one side board, one bond for twenty five hundred dollars dated August 31st, 1869, payable in installments of one and two years, executed to said I. R. Hunter by H. J. Reynolds, and I. W. Hinton. Also a note for four hundred and fifty dollars executed by Wm. Taylor to said Isaac R. Hunter dated the 25th day of Jan., 1871, payable two years after date. Also a note for four hundred and fifty dollars executed by Wm. Taylor to said I. R. Hunter dated 26th day of Jan., 1871, payable three years after the date thereof. To have and to hold the said property hereinbefore described unto the said trustee upon trust, that he the said trustee shall permit the said Martha Louisa Hunter, to occupy possess and enjoy the said property, and the rents issues and profits thereof to take for and during the term of her natural life, for her support and family free and clear of and from all manner of charge and incumbrance of her said husband; it being the express intent and meaning of these presents that the said property is conveyed to the said trustee to hold exclusively and absolutely for the benefit of said Martha Louisa Hunter as though she was a femme sole, free and clear entirely of and from any marital rights whatever of her said husband, except as hereinafter provided for. But if at any future time it shall by the said Martha Louisa Hunter be thought proper for her interest to sell the said property in whole or in part for her benefit then and in that event it is agreed on the part of said grantor and trustee and the third party hereto that the said Martha Louisa Hunter shall have full power to sell and dispose of the property hereinbefore described and to execute proper deed or deeds of conveyance for the same, through and by said trustee, or other writing, transfer or delivery at any time in the same manner and make such disposition of the proceeds of the sale as she may think proper, and also through said trustee to collect the said notes, and deliver them to the makers or other proper person and dispose of their proceeds always however and in all cases with the co-operation and assent of the said V. O. Cassell trustee who on his part agrees to execute such instruments as may be needful in the premises as the said Martha Louisa Hunter may direct by her becoming a party to and signing said instrument. And the said Martha Louisa Hunter may also if she think proper with the proceeds as aforesaid purchase other property real or personal through and by her said trustee, and the deed made to said trustee for her sole benefit, and to be held upon the same terms as the other property herein mentioned. If the said Martha Louisa Hunter should depart this life leaving her said husband the grantor in this deed surviving then this grant as to the property then remaining is to cease and determine, but she shall have power and full authority is hereby given her by instrument in the nature of a last will and testament to dispose of one half of the property hereinbefore described or hereafter acquired as aforesaid then remaining but if the said Isaac R. Hunter should die first then and in that event he hereby expressly reserves to himself full power and authority to dispose of the other half of the property then remaining hereinbefore described or hereafter acquired by his last will and testament in such manner and to such persons as he shall or may think proper, by his said will. And it is further agreed between the parties aforesaid that V. O. Cassell the trustee as aforesaid, shall be responsible and liable only for such money or property as may come into his possession under the deed and not otherwise;—and in the same manner as above stated incumbrances may be created upon the said property such as are consistent with the true intent and purposes of this deed; that is to say money may be borrowed and deed of trust executed as aforesaid given to secure the same upon the land hereinbefore described. The said trustee is to have and receive two and one half per cent. upon the matters of this trust.

"There is a deed of trust now standing to H. M. Bowden trustee to secure Rebecca B. Tunis the payment of a bond for $2,100 executed by said I. R. Hunter. Now it is the intention of the grantor in this deed to liquidate the debt secured in said deed, and this deed is made subject to said deed.

 "Martha L. Hunter, [Seal.]
 "V. O. Cassell, Trustee. [Seal.]

"By this said deed the said Martha Louisa Hunter, the wife of the said Isaac R. Hunter, acquired title to the property mentioned in said deed in fee simple, and subsequently the said Martha Louisa Hunter departed this life intestate, leaving surviving her as her only heirs at law her four children, Emily L. Hunter, Armie N. Hunter, and the said Robert I. Hunter and Newtie E. Hunter, whereupon the said land descended to the said Emily L. Hunter, Armie N. Hunter, Robert I. Hunter, and Newtie E. Hunter, in fee simple, an undivided one-fourth interest to each. The said Emily L. Hunter, who subsequently intermarried with and survived one Joseph R. Spratley, by her last will and testament, duly admitted to probate, devised her undivided one-fourth interest in said land to the said Newtie E. Hunter, and the said Armie N. Hunter, who subsequently intermarried with one Joseph D. Gaskins, afterwards departed this life intestate, whereupon her undivided one-fourth interest in said land descended to her only child and heir at law, to wit, the said Louise E. Shanks, subject to the estate therein as tenant by the curtesy of the said Joseph D. Gaskins, which was by him, by his deed bearing date on the 15th day of August, 1904, released and conveyed to the said Louise E. Shanks under and by her then name of Louise E. Sobral, and by reason of the premises, that heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of January in the year 1907, the said plaintiffs were seised and possessed in fee simple absolute, the said Newtie E. Hunter as to an undivided one-half part or interest, the said Robert I. Hunter as to an undivided one-fourth part or interest, and the said Louise E. Shanks as to the remaining one-fourth part or interest, of a certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being on the western side of Amelia street, between Lee and North streets, in the village of Huntersville, in Tanner's Creek Magisterial District of the county of Norfolk, in the state of Virginia, known, numbered, and designed as lot numbered twenty-four (24) on the plat filed in the suit of I. R. Hunter versus J. D. Gaskins, lately depending in the corporation court of the city of Norfolk, marked 'Plan of a Part of Huntersville,' and also recorded in the clerk's office of the said county of Norfolk, in map book No. one (1), at page thirty (30), which said lot is bounded, with reference to said plat, as follows, to wit: Beginning on the western line of a street which is now called Amelia street, opposite the site of the late residence of the said Isaac R. Hunter, deceased, at a point distant in a southerly direction measured along the said western line of Amelia street, twenty-eight (28) feet from the intersection of the said western line of Amelia street with the southern line of North street; running thence, in a southerly direction, along the said western line of Amelia street, twenty-eight (28) feet; thence in a westerly direction, parallel with the said southern line of North street, ninety-nine (99) feet; thence in a northerly direction, parallel with the said western line of Amelia street, twenty-eight (28) feet; and thence, in an easterly direction, parallel with the said southern line of North street, ninety-nine (99) feet, to the point or place of beginning, which said lot, piece, or parcel of land is part of the same land that was conveyed by the deed of the said Isaac R. Hunter hereinbefore set out, and acquired by the said Robert I. Hunter, Newtie E. Hunter, and Louise E. Shanks as hereinbefore mentioned. And the said plaintiffs say that, they being so seised and possessed of the said lot of land, the said defendants W. H. Hicks and the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company of Baltimore City afterwards, to wit, on the 2d day of January, in the year 1907, entered into said premises and exercised acts of ownership thereon and claimed title thereto, and that they, the said defendants, W. H. Hicks and the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company of Baltimore City, unlawfully withhold from the said plaintiffs the possession thereof, to the damage of the said plaintiffs of five hundred dollars ($500). And therefore they bring their suit," etc.

The assignments of demurrer were as follows:

"(A) That as shown by said declaration, the plaintiffs claim title to the land therein set out and described under a certain deed in said declaration set out from Isaac R. Hunter to V. O. Cassell, trustee, which deed in a certain cause lately pending in this court, entitled Robert I. Hunter et al. v. Henry C. Cooper et al., wherein the said plaintiffs in this cause were plaintiffs and the defendants in this cause were defendants, was construed, and by a decree entered therein by this court on its chancery side the said plaintiffs were declared not entitled to the land set out and mentioned in the bill filed in said cause, of which the lot of land set out and mentioned in the said declaration filed in this cause is a part. The bill in said cause of Robert I. Hunter et al. v. Henry C. Cooper et al., the petition of the said the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company of Baltimore City, its answer and demurrer, the decree filing said demurrer and answer, and the final decree therein and herewith filed marked 'Exhibit No. 1.'

"(B) Because, as shown by the deed aforesaid, from Isaac R. Hunter to V. O. Cassell, trustee, set out in said plaintiff's declaration, it appears that it was the intention of the said Isaac R. Hunter to grant unto the said trustee for the benefit of Martha Louisa Hunter only a life interest in the land conveyed, with a power to sell by and with the co-operation and assent of the said V. O. Cassell trustee during her lifetime, and not to create a fee-simple estate in the said Martha Louisa Hunter, and that, by signing and sealing the said deed, Martha Louisa Hunter agreed to all the provisions thereof, and that, therefore, at the death of said Martha Louisa Hunter under the terms, limitations, and agreements contained in the said deed all interest of the said Martha Louisa Hunter in said land ceased and determined.

"(C) That, under the said deed aforesaid, set out in said declaration, from Isaac R. Hunter to V. O. Cassell, trustee, Martha Louisa Hunter, under whom the plaintiffs claim, took only a life estate in the lands set out in said deed, of which the lot claimed in this cause forms a part, which life estate upon the death of the said Martha Louisa Hunter ceased and determined.

"(D) That under the deed aforesaid set out in said declaration from Isaac R. Hunter to V. O. Cassell, trustee, the plaintiffs have no title to the land sought to be recovered in this action.

"(E) Because the said declaration does not show that the plaintiffs at the time of the filing of said declaration were entitled to recover the said lot of land set out in said declaration.

"(F) Because of the decision in the suit of Robert I. Hunter et al. v. Henry C. Cooper et al. the title to the lot of land sought to be recovered in this action is res adjudicata, and the said plaintiffs in that suit cannot recover in this action the lot of land sought to be recovered in that cause."

Leo Judson, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. McK. Woodhouse (Hugh C. Davis and Hugh W. Davis, of counsel), for defendants in error

KEITH, P. This is an action of ejectment brought by Robert I. Hunter and others against W. H. Hicks and others to recover a tract of land lying in the county of Norfolk.

There was a demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained by the circuit court, and judgment entered for the defendants, and that judgment is before us upon a writ of error.

The decision of the case involves a construction of a deed which is copied into the declaration, to which the defendants in the circuit court assigned six grounds of demurrer, designated as A, B, C, D, E, and F. Specifications "A" and "F" were overruled; B, C, D, and E were sustained, and the correctness of the judgment turns upon whether or not Martha Louisa Hunter took a fee simple or a life estate in the land conveyed to her by the deed from Isaac Hunter.

By the deed Martha Louisa Hunter is given full power to sell and dispose of the property covered by it, "and make such disposition of the proceeds of sale as she may think proper, and also through said trustee to collect the said notes, and deliver them to the makers or other proper person and dispose of their proceeds, always, however, and in all cases, with the co-operation and assent of the said V. O. Cassell, trustee, who on his part agrees to execute such instruments as may be needful in the premises as the said Martha Louisa Hunter may direct by her becoming a party to and signing said instrument. And the said Martha Louisa Hunter may also, if she think proper, with the proceeds as aforesaid purchase other property, real or personal, through and by her said trustee, and the deed made to said trustee for her sole benefit, and to be held upon the same terms as the other property herein mentioned. If the said Martha Louisa Hunter should depart this life leaving her said husband, the grantor in this deed, surviving, then this grant as to the property then remaining is to cease and determine, but she shall have power and full authority is hereby given her by instrument in the nature of a last will and testament to dispose of one-half of the property hereinbefore described or hereafter acquired as aforesaid then remaining; but if the said Isaac R. Hunter should die first then and in that event he hereby expressly reserves to himself full power and authority to dispose of the other half of the property then remaining, hereinbefore described or hereafter acquired, by his last will and testament."

We have then a case where the grantee, Mrs. Hunter, under the deed from her husband, took property which she was authorized to sell and to dispose of the proceeds as she might think proper, and of what might remain at her death she had the power to dispose of one-half by her last will and testament.

We are of opinion that the case is fully covered by the decisions of this court.

"The cases cited clearly establish that whenever it is the intention of the testator that the devisee shall have an unrestrained power of disposition over the property devised, whether such intention be expressed or necessarily implied, a limitation over to another is void, because it is inconsistent with, and repugnant to, the estate given to the first devisee, although the will shows that it was the testator's intention in respect to the property given to the first taker that 'what may remain of the same,' or 'whatever may remain at his death,' or 'so much thereof as may be in existence at his death,' or 'such part as he may not appropriate,' or 'what may be on hand at his death,' should go to another. Such intention must fall on account of its uncertainty, and the first taker acquires the absolute property." Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 430, 21 S. E. 810, and cases there cited. See, also, Honaker v. Duff, 101 Va. 675, 44 S. E. 900; Johnson v. Smith, 108 Va. 725, 62 S. E. 958; Rolley v. Rolley's Ex'r, 109 Va. —, 63 S. E. 988; Randall v. Harrison (decided at the present term) infra, and cases referred to in those opinions.

It follows that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed.

Reversed.

RANDALL et al. v. HARRISON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

WILLS (§ 616*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

A will gave testator's wife for life all his real and personal estate that should be left after paying his debts, with power, however, to use any and all of the principal as well as the interest of such remaining property, if necessary to supply her necessities, and provided that, if anything was left after the wife's death, it should go to certain others. Held that, subject to testator's debts, the wife took a fee-simple estate in the real estate and an absolute estate in the personal property.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cumberland County.

Bill by John P. Branch against Harriet H. Harrison, individually and as executrix of Randolph Harrison, Jane R. H. Randall, and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant Randall and another appeal. Affirmed.

Willis B. Smith and R. T. W. Duke, for appellants. W. H. Mann, Christian, Gordon & Christian, B. B. Woodson, and Wm. M. Smith, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. This appeal involves the construction of the following clause of the will of Randolph Harrison, deceased:

"I give and bequeath to my dear wife, Harriet H. Harrison, for and during her natural life, all my estate real and personal that may be left after paying my just debts. And as I know the unstable and fluctuating value of real estate in Virginia and the difficulty of selling landed property at anything like a fair valuation, and that there may be yet a further shrinkage, so that there may not be enough left from the proceeds after paying my debts and defraying all charges to give her, the said Harriet H. Harrison, a decent maintenance from the interest in such residue (if it should be necessary to sell all my property); and as I deeply regret having induced my wife to relinquish her right of dower to secure a debt of six thousand dollars ($6,000.00) due Messrs. Wyman and Byrd, I hereby empower her, my wife before named, to use any and all of the principal, as well as the interest of the amount that may be left as above stated after settling up my estate, but it is my wish and injunction, which I know will be faithfully carried out by my dear wife, that the principal of any amount left from my estate be drawn upon only to supply her own necessities. I hold that property should revert to the source whence it came; accordingly it is my desire that anything that may be left after the death of my wife should be divided amongst my brothers and sister J. N. Harrison, and the children of my brother B. H. Harrison, per stirpes."

The circuit court decreed that, subject to the debts of the testator, his widow took a fee-simple estate in the lands and an absolute estate in the personal property whereof he died seised and possessed.

The principle here involved has been so repeatedly decided by this court that we feel that further discussion of it can serve no good purpose. The case is ruled, and the decree of the circuit court sustained, by a long line of decisions, of which May v. Joynes, 20 Grat. 692, Farish v. Wayman, 91 Va. 430, 21 S. E. 810, Robertson v. Hardy's Adm'r, 23 S. E. 766, 2 Va. Dec. 275, Brown v. Strother, 102 Va. 145, 47 S. E. 236, Hawley v. Watkins, 109 Va. —, 63 S. E. 560, Rolley v. Rolley, 109 Va. —, 63 S. E. 988, and Hunter v. Hicks (decided at the present term) 64 S. E. 988, are illustrations.

The decree appealed from follows these precedents, and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

ATHENS MUT. INS. CO. v. EVANS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 328*)—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—TRANSFER OF TITLE.

Where, when a policy of fire insurance was issued upon a house, the title thereto was in the insured, and the policy contained a condition that, unless provided otherwise by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, it should become void "if any change, other than by the death of the insured," took place in the title of the subject of insurance, the subsequent conveyance by the insured of the title to another to secure the payment of a debt due him for the construction of the house, without the consent of the insurer, indorsed on or added to the policy, was such a violation of the inhibition against a change in the title as by the terms of the policy rendered it void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 800, 801; Dec. Dig. § 323.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 376*)—POLICY—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS.

Where the policy also provided that "no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have the power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached," the agent representing the company when the policy was issued had no power to bind the company by then giving a parol permission for the making of such security deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 952-955; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 397*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

In the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, the terms of a written contract cannot be varied by parol evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1756-1765; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 131*)—PAROL AGREEMENT.

As the law of this state requires that a contract for fire insurance shall be in writing, such a contract cannot be made partly in writing and partly in parol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 205; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 377*)—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—TRANSFER OF TITLE—ESTOPPEL.

Where a policy contained the above-mentioned provisions and the property insured was a house, which the insurance company, at the time the policy was issued, knew the insured was under a moral and legal obligation to convey to another to secure the payment of a debt contracted for its construction, the issuance of the policy with such knowledge did not estop the company, when an action was brought upon the policy to recover for a loss, from insisting that the policy was rendered void when such a conveyance of the insured property was made without the consent of the insurer thereto having been obtained and expressed as the policy required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 986; Dec. Dig. § 377.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Taliaferro County; J. N. Worley, Judge.

Action by O. L. Evans against the Athens Mutual Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Evans brought suit upon a fire insurance policy against the Athens Mutual Insurance Company. The substance of the petition was as follows: On December 4, 1906, one Quinn was the agent of the defendant company, and authorized in its behalf to make contracts of insurance, and to sign and issue policies of insurance for it. Upon that date he in behalf of the company approached the plaintiff, and sought to get him "to enter into a contract of insurance against fire upon" a described house of his. Quinn was told by plaintiff "that he had just had said house built by C. H. Golucke & Son * * * at a cost of some $750, and had not paid therefor, but still owed them, and was to pay them in monthly installments thereon, and that he had agreed with them that they should hold a deed to said premises to secure them till said debt was paid." To this "Quinn replied that that would not interfere with * * * petitioner's insuring said property, and that the same would protect both petitioner and said Goluckes, and thereupon petitioner agreed that the defendant should insure said house for said purposes and under said circumstances, with other property, for three years for a premium of $14, the insurance on said house to be $500." Thereupon Quinn, for defendant, issued to petitioner the policy of insurance upon said property, a copy of which was attached to the petition as an exhibit, and petitioner paid the premium therefor. The house had been built for petitioner by Golucke & Son under an agreement "that the price therefor should be secured to them by a deed to said premises, and said Golucke & Son had at the time of said insurance fully performed their part of said agreement, and were then entitled to have their security deed." On December 31, 1906, petitioner, in pursuance of his obligation so to do, "which had been fully made known to Quinn in the issuance of said policy as aforesaid, * * * did execute to said Golucke & Son a security deed upon said property to secure the balance of his said indebtedness, agreeing therein to keep said house insured in a sum not less than $500 so long as said debt remained unpaid." After the execution of this security deed, petitioner remained in possession of the premises in his own right until the destruction of the house by fire. The premises were worth much more than the amount of the debt due Golucke & Son. Petitioner had a valuable interest in the property, and the entire loss would fall upon him if the house was destroyed by fire while uninsured. Petitioner "is illiterate, unable to read, and unlearned in the law, and was unaware that his policy would be vitiated by a change in the title of the property insured, and was unaware that the policy given him was not adapted in its provisions to the protection against loss both of himself and said Golucke & Son, as promised by said Quinn, but expected and believed that it would protect both. There was "in equity no change or incumbrance * * * put upon the title to said property by the execution of said deed that was not upon it when said policy was issued, and any condition written in said policy, rendering the same void by reason of the execution of said deed, was fully waived by the defendant in issuing said policy under the circumstances stated." In October, 1907, without fault on the part of petitioner, the house was destroyed by fire, and at that time it was worth $800. Petitioner duly notified defendant of his loss, and offered to make the formal proofs thereof required by the policy; but defendant expressly waived the same, "and disclaimed any liability on the policy by reason of said deed to Golucke & Son, and for no other reason."

The policy sued on, as shown by the copy thereof attached to the petition, provided: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, * * * if any change, other than by death of the insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise." The concluding stipulation in the policy was as follows: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto; and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have the power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached." The defendant demurred generally and specially. The special demurrer attacked the petition in so far as it attempted to set up a parol agreement prior to the written contract, and not in accordance therewith, without alleging that anything was left out of the policy by fraud, accident, or mistake; and the allegation of a waiver, so far as the security deed was concerned, of that clause of the policy with reference to a change in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance, upon the ground that the policy expressly provided against such a waiver by the language before quoted. The demurrers were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

T. F. Mell, for plaintiff in error. Samuel H. Sibley, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The law to be applied to the facts alleged in the petition is well settled, although its application to these facts makes this a hard case for the defendant in error. When the insurance policy was issued, the legal title to the property insured was in Evans, and, according to a provision in the policy, there it had to remain during the period of time covered by the contract, in order for the policy to still continue in force, unless he died in the meantime, or by agreement of the insurance company, indorsed on or added to the policy, a change in the title was allowed. This is clear from the stipulation in the policy that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or added thereto, it should be void, "if any change, other than by the death of the insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard) whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise." After the issuance and acceptance of the policy, the title to the property insured was changed by the holder of the policy by his conveying the same to the Goluckes to secure an indebtedness which he owed them for its construction. Unless, therefore, the contentions of the defendant in error as to waiver or estoppel be sound, the execution and delivery of this security deed without the consent of the insurance company indorsed on or added to the policy violated the inhibition as to any change in the title of the property and rendered the contract of insurance void. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Asberry, 95 Ga. 792, 22 S. E. 717; Orient Ins. Co. v. Williamson, 98 Ga. 464, 25 S. E. 560.

2. As the effect of the above-mentioned provision of the policy was to prohibit any change in the title of the property, without the written consent of the insurer indorsed on or added to the policy, it would seem of itself sufficient to show that the agent of the company who acted for it when the policy was issued had no power to give a mere parol permission for a transfer of the title. But the policy in its concluding clause dealt directly with the question of waiver, as follows: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, * * * and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have the power to waive any provision or condition of this policy; except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached." It is clear that under this provision the agent of the insurance company could not have orally waived the condition rendering the policy void, if any change should be made in the title to the property, without the consent of the company expressed as the policy required, even if he had, as is not the case here, in express terms undertaken to do so. He had no power to talk away any provision or condition expressed in the policy. They were all beyond the reach of any oral declaration or representation which he might make. The rulings made in Morris v. Orient Ins. Co., 106 Ga. 472, 33 S. E. 430, and Lippman v. Aetna Ins. Co., 108 Ga. 391, 33 S. E. 897, 75 Am. St. Rep. 62, are directly in point here. In each of those cases the policy of insurance contained the same restriction upon the power of a representative of the insurance company to waive any provision or condition of the policy as that above quoted from the policy now under consideration, and in each it was provided that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed on or added to the policy, the same should be void, if the insured then had, or should thereafter procure, any other contract of insurance on the property covered in whole or in part by the policy. It was held in both cases that a mere oral permission to the insured by the agent who issued the policy to take out additional insurance given at the time of issuing the policy was not binding upon the company, and did not estop it from setting up as a defense to an action upon the policy that the insured, in violation of its terms, had taken out additional insurance.

3, 4. Counsel for the defendant in error admits that, under these decisions, Quinn, the agent of the company, could not have orally waived a future forfeiture, but contends that the policy does not set forth the true contract between the parties, and that, without reformation, the contract ought to be enforced, not according to its plain and unambiguous terms as written, but according to the intention of the parties at the time it was made, and that their intention then was that Evans, the insured, should have the right to execute the security deed in question. As we understand counsel, this contention is based upon the allegations of the petition as to the conversation which occurred between Evans and Quinn, the agent of the company, prior to the issuance of the policy. There is nothing in the petition which shows that there was any agreement by the company, or even by Quinn, its agent, that the provisions of the policy should be otherwise than as they are. It is merely alleged that Quinn was informed by Evans that he had the house built by C. H. Golucke & Son, at a cost of some $750, and still owed them therefor, and had agreed that they should hold a deed to the premises, to secure them, until this debt was paid; and that thereupon "Quinn replied that that would not interfere with [Evans] insuring the property, and that the same would protect both [him] and said Goluckes." This falls far short of an allegation that Evans and Quinn agreed that the policy should contain a provision authorizing Evans to convey the property to Golucke & Son for the purpose here indicated. From the petition it appears that Evans merely stated certain facts to Quinn, and he simply expressed his opinion that the existence of those facts would not interfere with Evans' insuring the property, and that, if he did, the policy would protect both himself and Golucke & Son. But, even if there were positive allegations in the petition that there was an oral agreement between these parties that Evans should have the right to change the status of the title of the property as he afterwards did, we have seen that the agent of the insurance company could not thus waive the condition as to the forfeiture of the policy upon a change of title not made in conformity to the requirements of the policy. Again, it is well settled that, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, none of which is alleged, all parol negotiations and agreements prior to or contemporaneous with the execution of a written contract are either merged therein or annulled thereby, and the writing alone must be considered as the contract between the parties.

There is, however, another firmly established rule, the existence of which is fatal to this contention of the defendant in error, and that is, that a contract which a statute requires to be in writing cannot exist partly in parol and partly in writing. The law of this state expressly requires a contract of fire insurance to be in writing, and such a contract is not valid unless it is in writing. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2022, 2089; Clark v. Brand, 62 Ga. 23; Thomas v. Funkhouser, 91 Ga. 478, 18 S. E. 812; Planters' Ass'n v. De Loach, 113 Ga. 802, 39 S. E. 466; Delaware Ins. Co. v. Penn. Fire Ins. Co., 126 Ga. 380, at page 389, 55 S. E. 330, 333. As was said by Mr. Justice Lumpkin in the case last cited: "Under our statute, it is contemplated that the whole contract of insurance shall be in writing." So, even if the agent had possessed unrestricted powers as to the making of the contract of insurance, and it had been alleged that by fraud, accident, or mistake an agreement that the insured might transfer the title of the property to Golucke & Son had been left out of the policy, the contract would have to be reformed before this agreement could become a part of the same. There is no effort whatever to reform or change in any particular the written contract, but the alleged right to recover is based upon the policy as it stands, and the effect of one of its stipulations as applied to the facts is sought to be obviated by the mere oral statement of the agent of the insurer as to what the legal effect of the policy would be relative to these facts.

5. It is further contended that the petition shows that the insurance company through its agent who represented it in the transaction with Evans knew that the house which was the subject-matter of insurance had been built by Golucke & Son for Evans upon credit under an agreement which provided that he was to make them a deed to the premises to secure the debt thus created, and that the contractors had fully performed their part of this contract and Evans was indebted to them for the erection of the house; and therefore that the policy was issued by the company with full knowledge on its part that Golucke & Son were entitled to receive this security deed from Evans, and that he was both morally and legally bound to execute and deliver the same to them. Hence it is sought to bring this case within the well-settled rule that, although a policy of insurance may contain a provision which declares it to be void if a specified condition exists when it is issued, yet if the agent of the insurance company who represented it in the transaction with the insured knew, at the time the contract was entered into, that such condition did then exist, the policy will, so far as this provision is concerned, be held to be valid and enforceable. The knowledge of the agent who acts for the insurer when the policy is issued of existing conditions which enter into the validity of the contract is the knowledge of his principal; and, if the policy is issued with knowledge of a fact or condition which by a stipulation in the contract would render it void, the insurer is held to have waived the existence of such fact or condition in its application to the provisions of the policy. Otherwise the insurer would knowingly issue and accept pay for a policy void in its very inception, thereby practicing a fraud upon the insured. Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Mutual Bldg. Ass'n, 98 Ga. 262, 25 S. E. 457; Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 123 Ga. 404, 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am. St. Rep. 92. In the present case, however, the policy was not under facts known to the insurer, according to its terms, void when it was issued. On the contrary, it was then perfectly valid; for, if the house had been without fault of the insured destroyed by fire in the interval of time between the issuance of the policy and the making of the security deed to Golucke & Son, the company would have been liable to the insured under its contract. It was the subsequent act of the insured which invalidated the policy. It matters not that this was an act which he was morally and legally bound to perform, and that the agent of the insurer knew this when the policy was issued. The company issued the policy with a promissory warranty on the part of the insured, implied by his acceptance of the same with the condition as to subsequent change of title therein, that the title should remain as it then was, unless changed with the consent of the company expressed by indorsement upon or addition to the policy. If it be granted that the company knew, through knowledge imparted to its agent, that sooner or later Evans was bound to make the security deed to the contractors who built the house for him, he, on the other hand, knew that, in order to execute this deed without thereby rendering the policy void, he must first obtain the written consent of the company expressed in the manner pointed out by the policy. If he had applied for this consent and it had been refused, he could have surrendered the policy and collected from the company the difference between the amount of the premium which he had paid on the customary short rate for the time during which the policy remained valid; for the policy provided for its cancellation "at any time at the request of the insured, or by the company giving five days' notice of such cancellation," and that if it should be canceled, "or become void or cease, the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portions [should] be returned on surrender of this policy or last renewal, this company retaining the customary short rate," unless it should be canceled by the company giving notice, in which event the company should retain only the pro rata premium.

Counsel further contends that "substantially and in the eye of equity there was no change in the title" when the security deed was made; that "the deed was but an evidence of a perfect equitable right to the title that Golucke had when the policy was issued; and that was recognized and waived by Quinn in issuing the policy." It is unsound to contend that because, under the facts alleged, the Goluckes, having fully performed their part of the contract with Evans, had the right to enforce specific performance of his agreement to convey the title of the property to them as security for the debt which he owed them, there was therefore no real substantial change in the title when this deed was made. There had to be specific performance by Evans, either voluntarily or at the behest of the law, before the title could vest in the Goluckes.

It follows that the court erred in overruling the demurrer.

LEE v. McCARTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1909.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The undisputed evidence required a finding for the defendant; and if there were any errors in some of the rulings of the court, or inaccuracies in the charge, they were not such as to necessitate a new trial.

2. SECONDARY EVIDENCE—FOUNDATION.

Sufficient foundation was laid, as to the loss of the deed under which defendant prescribed, to admit secondary evidence thereof.

3. REFUSAL TO ALLOW AMENDMENT OF PETITION—NEW TRIAL.

A refusal to allow an amendment to a petition and sustaining a demurrer thereto furnishes no ground for a motion for a new trial. Turner v. Barber, 131 Ga. 444, 62 S. E. 587; Hawkins v. Studdard, 132 Ga. —, 63 S. E. 852; Leathers v. Leathers, 132 Ga. —, 63 S. E. 1118.

COURSON v. PEARSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 616*)—DISMISSAL—GROUNDS.

As the "general grounds" of a motion for a new trial, complaining that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, without evidence to support it, etc., contain no recital of fact requiring certification by the trial judge, they need not be approved by him in order to be considered (Harris v. State, 120 Ga. 196, 47 S. E. 573); and therefore the lack of such approval furnishes no cause "to strike" the original motion for a new trial, or the amended and properly approved motion therefor, or to dismiss the writ of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 616.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 94*)—TRIAL (§ 205*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where there is no affirmative defense, or no plea in the nature of confession and avoidance, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, and he is not entitled to recover, unless, in the opinion of the jury, the preponderance of the evidence is in his favor. The charge excepted to was not in harmony with this principle, and, under the facts of the case, placed upon defendant an unauthorized burden, and was cause for a new trial.

FISH, C. J. 1. The ruling stated in the first headnotes needs no elaboration.

2. This was an action for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. The plaintiff's contention was that the defendant, by agreement, was substituted for plaintiff's original vendor, and was, under the terms of the agreement, bound to convey to plaintiff, upon his payment to defendant of the balance of the purchase price, all of which plaintiff alleged had been paid. Defendant denied such agreement, and contended that, at the instance of plaintiff, he purchased the land from plaintiff's vendor, upon plaintiff's agreement to rent the land from defendant at a stated rental, and that the amounts paid by plaintiff had been paid as rent, and not as purchase money. On the trial each party submitted evidence tending to support his contention. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The plaintiff in all civil cases is required to make out his case by the preponderance of the evidence. So that if you believe from the preponderance of the evidence that [plaintiff's] contention is made out prima facie, then he would have the right to recover in the case as made. I charge you, in addition to that, that if the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, and the defendant undertakes to set up a different contract from that, it becomes the duty of the defendant to set up his contention by a preponderance of the testimony, before he would be entitled to recover. * * * If you should conclude that he [plaintiff] has made out his contention by a preponderance of the testimony, that would be a prima facie case that would entitle him to recover. If defendant has undertaken to set up a different contention, you will apply the same rule to it, and say whether or not he has made it by preponderance of the testimony." These instructions put an unauthorized onus upon the defendant, and were calculated to mislead the jury to his prejudice, and were therefore cause for a new trial in his behalf. "The burden of proof generally lies upon the party asserting or affirming a fact, and to the existence of whose case or defense the proof of such fact is essential." Civ. Code 1895, § 5160. And where, as in this case, there is no affirmative defense, or no plea in the nature of confession and avoidance, the burden of proof lies upon the plaintiff; and, after all the evidence for both parties has been submitted, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover unless, in the opinion of the jury, the preponderance of the evidence is in his favor.

PIKE BROS. LUMBER CO. v. MITCHELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 249*)—FORECLOSURE—PARTIES—RELIEF IN EQUITY.

In order to foreclose a materialman's lien for material furnished a contractor to be used in improving the property of another, it is necessary that the materialman have judgment against the contractor in a previous action, or the contractor must be sued concurrently in the foreclosure proceedings with the owner of the property improved. If the contractor be adjudged a bankrupt, so that no judgment in personam can be had against him in an action at law, his immunity from liability to a personal judgment will not give the materialman a right to foreclose his lien in equity against the property improved.

Action by the Pike Bros. Lumber Company against E. D. Roberts and Mrs. M. B. B. Mitchell. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. T. Moon and Frank Harwell, for plaintiff in error. A. A. Thompson, F. M. Longley, and W. G. Post, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The petition of Pike Bros. Lumber Company, a corporation, against E. D. Roberts and Mrs. M. B. B. Mitchell, to foreclose a materialman's lien, was dismissed on demurrer. The material averments of the petition are: Roberts contracted to improve certain described real estate belonging to Mrs. Mitchell. The plaintiff furnished to the contractor, between May 30, and July 22, 1907, certain materials, of the value of $387.33, which were used by the contractor in making the improvements. On July 22, 1907, the plaintiff filed and caused to be recorded its lien, pursuant to Civ. Code 1895, § 2804. On August 6, 1907, Roberts on his own petition was adjudged a voluntary bankrupt. The prayer is for a decree fixing the amount due by the contractor to the plaintiff for the materials used in the improvements, and a judgment is rem for this amount against the real estate which was improved. No judgment in personam is prayed against the contractor.

The plaintiff in its petition admits that because Roberts had been adjudged a bankrupt it could not maintain an action at law against him and the real estate owner to enforce its statutory lien for materials furnished the contractor and used in improving the real estate of Mrs. Mitchell. It is for this reason it alleges it is entitled to relief in equity, which can be afforded by granting the prayer of the petition. The admission that the plaintiff could not recover at law is based on the well-settled rule that, before a materialman's lien for materials furnished to a contractor to improve the real estate of another can be foreclosed, there must be a judgment for the price of such materials in his favor against the contractor, or the contractor must be sued concurrently with the owner of the property improved in the foreclosure proceedings. Clayton v. Farrar Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 37, 45 S. E. 723. The reason of the rule is that the landowner should not be called on to pay a debt he did not contract, and for which his property is liable only by force of a statute, until the materialman has established by judgment, in a proceeding to which the contractor is a party, that the contractor owes to him the amount for which he is seeking to assert his lien. The landowner's liability to the materialman, who sells his contractor on the latter's responsibility, is not primary but collateral, and dependent wholly upon compliance with the statute which creates the liability. In the suit to enforce his lien the materialman may be defeated by proof that the debt has been discharged by payment. If it is a debt provable in bankruptcy, why may not his action be also defeated by showing that his debt has been discharged by bankruptcy? It is to be borne in mind that in this case it is not attempted to establish the lien against the bankrupt contractor's land, but against the land of one not in privity with him. If judgment should go against the owner of the land improved in the foreclosure proceeding, he would have his remedy over against the contractor, either by deducting the amount of the judgment from what is due the contractor, or, if the contractor had been fully paid, the landowner, on paying the judgment, would be subrogated to the rights of the materialman in enforcing reimbursement from the overpaid contractor. But if the contractor had been adjudged a bankrupt, and is liable to be discharged as such by the bankrupt court, and therefore not subject to suit, then the landowner would have no remedy over, if the materialman be allowed a judgment in rem against his property. Equity follows the analogy of the law. The materialman cannot foreclose his lien in an action at law against the landowner, because he cannot get a judgment in personam against the bankrupt contractor. Bowen v. Keller, 130 Ga. 31, 60 S. E. 174, 124 Am. St. Rep. 164. He should not be permitted to do so in equity, where the effect would be to deprive the landowner of his remedy over against the contractor, who, perchance, had been fully paid. The bankruptcy of the contractor occasions the loss, and it would be inequitable to shift the loss from the materialman to the landowner, simply because the materialman has lost his remedy at law by the contractor's bankruptcy. In connection, see Philip-Carey Co. v. Viaduct Place, 1 Ga. App. 707, 58 S. E. 274.

MALLETT & NUTT v. WATKINS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 57*)—CONSIDERATION.

Watkins signed and delivered to Mallett a writing as follows: "I agree to sell W. M. Mallett 25 bales of middling cotton at 7½ cents delivered at his warehouse during November and October, 1900. 4/2/1900. Jackson, Ga. B. F. Watkins." Such writing, not showing any consideration to support the promise of Watkins, did not, of itself, bind him to deliver the cotton, or make him liable in damages for a failure to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 345, 352, 353; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 250*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO PLEADINGS AND EVIDENCE.

A charge must be adjusted to the evidence; and there being no evidence of any promise on the part of Mallett to buy the cotton, other than a written promise delivered to Watkins, the court did not err in instructing the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover unless Mallett executed and delivered to Watkins such written promise, or in failing to charge what would be the effect of an oral promise on the part of Mallett to buy the cotton.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 584-586; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by Mallett & Nutt against B. F. Watkins. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Jno. R. L. Smith, for plaintiffs in error
W. E. Watkins, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiffs in error brought suit against the defendant in error for damages, alleging substantially as follows: The defendant executed and delivered to W. M. Mallett a contract of which the following is a copy: "I agree to sell W. M. Mallett 25 bales of middling cotton at 7½ cents delivered at his warehouse during November and October, 1900. 4/2/1900. Jackson, Ga. B. F. Watkins." The plaintiffs in error were transferees of this contract under a transfer dated October 2, 1903, made by the administrator of W. M. Mallett. The defendant refused to perform the contract, and the plaintiffs allege that the market price of cotton during the months of October and November was more than 7½ cents per pound, and the plaintiffs sued to recover the difference between such contract price and the market price. Upon the trial of the case a verdict was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted to the order of the court overruling their motion for a new trial.

1. The written promise by Watkins to sell Mallett the cotton, standing alone, is an executory contract and without a consideration. The writing is not signed by Mallett. It shows no promise by Mallett to buy the cotton, or other consideration to support the promise of Watkins to sell the cotton. Being an executory contract without a consideration, it is nudum pactum and without any binding force. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3656, 3657. In order to make an executory contract binding, there must be a consideration to support the same. Mutual promises constitute a good consideration for each other. Civ. Code, § 3661. In the absence of any promise by Mallett to take and pay for the cotton, or other consideration to support the promise of Watkins, to sell the cotton, or anything done by Mallett whereby he became bound to take and pay for the cotton, Watkins was not bound to sell the cotton, nor was Mallett bound to buy it. In this connection, see Simpson v. Sanders, 130 Ga. 265, 60 S. E. 541; Cooley v. Moss, 123 Ga. 707, 711, 51 S. E. 625; Glessner v. Longley, 125 Ga. 676, 54 S. E. 753; Swindell & Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 121 Ga. 714, 49 S. E. 673; Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998; Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 167, 46 S. E. 67; Harrison v. Wilson Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6, 45 S. E. 730. The fact that Mallett wrote the written promise, signed by Watkins, wherein the name of Mallett appeared, and the fact that the writing, after being signed by Watkins, was delivered to and accepted by Watkins, would not bind Mallett to buy the cotton, if tendered to him by Watkins.

2. One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, gentlemen, I charge you, as a matter of law, there can be no recovery on the contract as set out in this petition—on the contract alone; there being the want of mutuality in the contract. There being nothing in it imposing any obligation on Mr. Mallett to purchase or pay for this cotton, therefore under the law it is void, unless there was a written contract, made and signed at the same time by Mr. Mallett and delivered to Mr. Watkins, in which contract Mr. Mallett agreed to receive and purchase and pay for the cotton at the time of its delivery.'" There are other charges of the court similar to the one above quoted, of which the same complaint is made. The plaintiffs alleged that, at the time the writing above set forth was signed by the defendant, W. M. Mallett signed a writing wherein he promised to purchase and receive from the defendant the 25 bales of cotton and pay him therefor 7½ cents per pound whenever the defendant delivered the same to Mallett during the months of October and November, 1900. The plaintiffs complain that the court erred in charging that in order for the plaintiffs to recover, or introduce parol evidence of any such written promise by Mallett it must not only be shown that such written promise was made by Mallett, but it must be shown that it was delivered to Watkins. There was no evidence upon the trial of the case that Mallett signed and retained an agreement to buy the cotton. The only evidence of any written promise by Mallett was that of witnesses who said that, when Watkins signed the written promise herein above copied, Mallett signed and delivered to Watkins a written promise to buy the cotton at 7½ cents when delivered during October and November, 1900. There was no evidence of any other written promise of Mallett, and under the evidence the jury could not find that there was any written promise of Mallett to take the cotton, unless they found that Mallett had signed and delivered one to Watkins at the time Watkins signed and delivered the instrument for the breach of which suit is brought.

A charge must be adapted to the evidence and cover the issues made thereby and by the pleadings; and no error was committed in charging the jury that in order for the plaintiffs to recover, or introduce parol evidence of any such written promise by Mallett, it must not only be shown that such written promise was made by Mallett, but it must be shown that it was delivered to Watkins. As there was no evidence that Mallett made any promise to buy the cotton, except that he signed and delivered to Watkins a written promise to do so, whether a parol promise by Mallett to buy the cotton would have authorized a recovery in this case need not be considered. The question as to whether or not the court committed error in failing to charge the jury that a recovery could be had if there was a parol promise by Mallett to buy the cotton need not be considered, for the reason that the evidence would not have justified any such charge, there being no evidence of any promise by Mallett to buy the cotton, except a written promise signed and delivered to Watkins. No such written promise by Mallett was introduced in evidence, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether or not Mallett signed and delivered to Watkins such promise, and was such as to authorize the jury to find that no such written promise was signed and delivered. There was no evidence to authorize the jury to find that Mallett ever became bound to take and pay for the cotton, if it had been tendered to him under Watkins' written promise, except the evidence of a written promise by Mallett signed and delivered to Watkins; and the evidence being conflicting as to whether Mallett did or did not do this, the charge quoted, and similar charges, were not subject to any criticism made thereof. We do not think the entire charge was subject to the criticism made, nor do any of the excerpts therefrom, in view of the entire charge, involve such error as requires a new trial. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 450*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—COMPETENCY.

The plaintiff in error was convicted of the offense of adultery and fornication. He was a member of the church, and a committee composed of his fellow members was appointed to make an investigation of the accusation. On the trial of the accused a witness was allowed, over objection, to testify that he had heard two members of this church committee say "that from the investigation made by them they thought there was something in it." The testimony was not offered to show any contradictory statements. Held, that the testimony was wholly incompetent, inadmissible, and presumptively prejudicial. (a) It was hearsay. (b) As original testimony offered by the members of the committee, it would have been incompetent.

Good character is a substantive fact in defense, and may itself alone be sufficient to generate a reasonable doubt of guilt. When the evidence warrants it, trial courts may very properly state to the jury the weight that they would be authorized to give to proof of good character; but without an appropriate written request the failure to do so will not amount to reversible error.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 381*) — EVIDENCE OF GOOD CHARACTER—WEIGHT.

Action by J. W. Smith against J. V. Christian. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. McMillan & Erwin, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Under the consent of counsel appearing in the record in regard to the exceptions filed to the justice's answer, it appears that there was evidence before the jury that the note sued upon was executed upon the Sabbath day; that, although the note was dated on the following day, it was in fact signed and delivered to the plaintiff on Sunday; that the note was given for the purchase price of a mule and buggy, which the plaintiff carried to the house of the maker of the note on the same Sunday; that the maker of the note took possession of the mule and buggy that night, and the plaintiff exercised no further control over it. There was dispute as to these cardinal facts, but the jury was authorized to find as above set forth.

The maker of the note was a farmer, and the jury was authorized to find that the horse and buggy were bought by him to use in his business. The case is therefore controlled by Morgan v. Bailey, 59 Ga. 683. It is said there: "Where a farmer, a part of whose ordinary business was the purchase and cultivation of land, bought a tract of land on Saturday, and agreed to consummate the trade on the next day by signing the necessary papers, and did sign a note for the purchase money on that day (Sunday), held, that the contract was illegal, and, in a suit on the note, the courts will not assist in its collection." Action by Luther Painter against W. H. Prater. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Geo. G. Glenn and M. C. Tarver, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mann, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Painter sued Prater in trover for a horse. It appears that on the day before the suit was brought the plaintiff's uncle, who was his authorized agent, swapped the horse to one McGaha, taking another horse in exchange. When the trade had been consummated, an execution against the plaintiff's uncle (the agent) was levied upon the horse in dispute while in McGaha's possession, and the latter immediately demanded back from the uncle the other horse, claiming that he had represented to him in the trade that there were no liens or incumbrances against the horse and that the levy of the execution authorized him to rescind. The plaintiff's uncle explained to McGaha that, while he had traded the horse in his own name, it really belonged to the plaintiff, and that therefore the representation that it was free from incumbrances was in fact true, and not fraudulent; consequently he and the plaintiff declined to allow the swap to be rescinded. McGaha brought suit against the plaintiff's agent for the recovery of the other horse, and the action seems to have been pending at the time the present suit was tried.

We think it perfectly plain, from what has been stated above, that the plaintiff had no right to maintain this action. According to his own testimony, as well as that of his uncle, the latter had traded the horse by the authority of the former, and title to it had passed out of the plaintiff prior to the institution of the suit. Legal title in the plaintiff at the time of the institution of the suit is a sine qua non in an action of trover. Under the facts appearing in this record, McGaha might have maintained the action, but not the plaintiff.

So, irrespective of all other questions made in the record, the judgment must be reversed.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. F. Brannen, Judge.

D. C. Finch was convicted of selling liquor without a license, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. J. E. Anderson and A. M. Deal, for plaintiff in error. Fred T. Lanier, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of section 431 of the Penal Code of 1895, on an indictment found at the April term, 1908, of Bulloch superior court. This section makes it a penal offense to sell intoxicating liquors without a license, and the indictment charges that the defendant, on the 25th day of December, 1907, in said county, violated the statute by selling whisky and other intoxicating liquors to one Doll Williams. On the trial the evidence for the state showed that the defendant made one sale of one pint of whisky to Doll Williams on the 25th day of December, 1907, in Bulloch county. The defendant in his statement to the jury denied that he had sold whisky to Williams, or to any one else, on said date, or at any other time.

The act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 81) prohibits the sale of any intoxicating liquors in this state after January 1, 1908, and this act in effect repealed section 431 of the Penal Code, upon which this indictment was framed. The court, therefore, charged the jury as follows: "I charge you in this case that the jury has a right in the trial of this case to go back two years prior to the finding of this indictment, and find the time the sale was made, if they find the sale was made. * * * Now, I charge you that any time of the year 1908 is not included in that two years. You cut out the time from the 1st of January, 1908, until the finding of this indictment here, which is in April. So go back two years from the finding of the indictment to find the time, in case you find a sale was made." This charge is excepted to, on the ground of being misleading and incorrectly stating to the jury that they were authorized to go back two years from the date of the indictment, which was in effect telling them that they could include in their computation the time intervening between the 1st day of January, 1908, and the finding of the bill in April, 1908, while the law under which the indictment was framed had been repealed by the prohibition act.

We think the charge as a whole did not mislead the jury, but correctly instructed them, in reference to the statute of limitations, that they could go back from April, 1908, for two years, in their computation of the time in which the indictment could be found for the offense, and withdrew from the jury any consideration of the period intervening between the 1st of January, 1908, and April, 1908, the date of the finding of the indictment by the grand jury. But, in any event, the charge of the court on the statute of limitations was wholly immaterial. There was no evidence whatever of any sale of liquor to Doll Williams by the defendant, except the one sale on December 25, 1907; no evidence of any sale prior to this time; no evidence whatever of any sale subsequently to that date. So the jury could not have based their verdict on a sale made after the general prohibition law went into effect. The charge of the court on the statute of limitations, under the facts in this case, was wholly unnecessary, and, if it contained the error complained of, it would be immaterial and harmless. Harris v. State, 2 Ga. App. 410, 58 S. E. 669.

The only other assignment of error is an attack made on the judgment of the court in overruling one of the grounds of the motion for new trial which challenged the impartiality of one of the jurors; and this ground counsel for plaintiff in error expressly stated to this court he abandoned.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

William Justice was convicted of shooting at another, and brings error. Affirmed.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Bale, Sol. Gen., and C. H. Porter, for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant, William Justice, commonly known as "Coot" Justice, was indicted for assault with intent to murder, and convicted of the statutory offense of "shooting at another." According to the case made by the state he had been to a "candy pulling" over at Mr. Locklear's on a moonshiny night in October, 1907. Miss Holbrooks, the prosecutrix, was also there. So were her brother, Ira, and a young man named Davis. Justice left the candy pulling first. Miss Holbrooks, her brother, and Davis came along a little later. As they got across the creek, they heard a fuss behind them, and the young lady said, "Here comes Coot." As Ira and Davis looked around they recognized him. He ran down the creek in the direction Holbrooks and his sister had to go, and waited near Mr. Burk's barn. Here Miss Holbrooks saw him, and recognized him again, just as he was in the act of shooting. Just at this instant some one (Miss Holbrooks swore positively that it was the defendant) fired into the party with a repeating shotgun loaded with large bird shot. He fired several times in rapid succession. He put 40 or 50 shot into Miss Holbrooks' back, scattered all the way from her head to her heels. Her brother Ira received a similar load; and the Davis boy was not wholly slighted, for he, too, had some shot in his back. The next day Dr. Wicker picked the shot out of Miss Holbrooks' back, etc.; but he left a few in her. It further appears from the record that the young lady exhibited some of the shot to the jury. The defendant's testimony, if true, made out an alibi. Miss Holbrooks, among other things, testified as follows: "I heard the defendant, William Justice, say, 'I will kill every God damn Holbrooks by name.' When he said this he was in my father's house at home. He said this about a month before the shooting, I suppose."

The first ground of the amended motion for a new trial complains that "the court refused to allow the defendant to show by the witness Mollie Holbrooks that, on the same day that she testified that the defendant threatened to kill the whole Holbrooks family, her father was drunk that night, and that defendant, instead of trying to kill him, carried him out of Rome that night to keep him from being locked up." The exception just mentioned is the only one of the several assigned that smacks of error. The others belong to that class denominated by Justice Samuel Lumpkin in one of his opinions as "pintees." We are inclined to think that the trial judge might well have let in the proof of the defendant's generosity to the father of the prosecutrix, for the purpose of showing that the alleged threat was mere idle talk, of which he had repented, if, indeed, the threat was made before the transaction with the father occurred. See Crumley v. State, 5 Ga. App. 231, 62 S. E. 1005. However, so far as we are informed, the threat may have been made after the defendant brought the old man home that night, and in that event the previous transaction would have been wholly irrelevant. The burden being on the plaintiff in error to show error, we cannot grant him a new trial on this ground.

As one of the reasons why he should be granted a new trial, the plaintiff in error says that the verdict against him was a compromise; that he was either guilty of assault with intent to murder, or was not guilty of anything. We think that, if he is the man who took one of these automatic repeating shotguns (we shall not rule judicially that to have one of these barbarous, unsportsman-like guns is a badge of malice prepense, though we confess to some personal predilection toward classing them with things unfair) and fired a fusillade of shot into a young lady's back as she was returning from a candy pulling, he is fortunate in escaping the limit of the law for the higher offense. However, under the principle announced in Fallon's Case, 5 Ga. App. 659, 63 S. E. 806, the verdict may be sustained against the objection that it is a compromise.

Judgment affirmed.

LINDSAY v. WEST et al. (No. 1,548.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. TRESPASS (§ 76*)—CRIMINAL TRESPASS.

There is a misdemeanor in this state designated by Pen. Code 1895, § 219, as "trespass," and therefore a warrant alleging that the accused has committed that offense charges him with a crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 24*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—EVIDENCE.

The action of a magistrate in binding over the defendant on a criminal warrant is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of probable cause in a subsequent suit brought by the accused against the prosecutor for malicious prosecution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by R. A. Lindsay against A. S. West and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Seaborn & Barry Wright, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. This is an action of malicious prosecution. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant caused him to be arrested upon a warrant charging him with the offense of "trespass"; that the defendant acted maliciously and without probable cause; that the plaintiff was carried before a magistrate and bound over to the city court, but in that court the prosecution terminated by the solicitor general entering a nolle prosequi upon the accusation, which had been drawn upon the commitment and warrant. The court sustained a general demurrer, and the plaintiff excepts.

Two reasons are assigned by the defendant in error why the court properly sustained the demurrer: (1) Because the petition does not show that there was any prosecution, for that the warrant charged no crime, there being no such crime as "trespass"; and (2) because the action of the magistrate in binding the defendant over to the city court is conclusive evidence of probable cause.

1. There is such an offense in our law as "trespass." Our Pen. Code 1895, § 219, provides: "The following shall be deemed and held to be trespass and indictable, to wit"—and here follows an enumeration of acts.

2. The rule generally recognized by the American courts is that the binding over of the defendant by a magistrate is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of probable cause. Of course, in those states where the magistrate has the power to settle the issue as to the defendant's guilt, the trial before this officer would have the same effect as a trial before any other competent tribunal. In this state, however, the magistrate has no power in criminal matters, other than to make a mere preliminary inquiry. The question in all its phases is so fully and ably discussed in the case of Ross v. Hixon, 46 Kan. 550, 26 Pac. 955, 12 L. R. A. 760, 28 Am. St. Rep. 123, and in the note appearing at the foot of the case as reported in 28 Am. St. Rep. 123, that we deem it unnecessary to discuss the question further. See, also, Burdick on Torts, 254; Perkins v. Spaulding, 182 Mass. 218, 65 N. E. 72. The case last cited goes to the extent of holding that even the finding of a bill by the grand jury is not prima facie evidence of probable cause, but is a circumstance to be considered in determining the question.

The court erred in sustaining the general demurrer.

W. A. James, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Brooke, Sol. Gen., and J. E. Mozley, for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant was convicted of violating section 680, Pen. Code 1895, which provides that "any cropper who shall sell or otherwise dispose of any part of the crop grown by him, without the consent of the landlord, and before the landlord has received his part of the entire crop and payment in full for all advances made to the cropper in the year the crop was raised, to aid in making it, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The proof was that the defendant, a cropper of the prosecutor, had turned over to the landlord a part of the crop, and, while a dispute was pending as to whether any further sum was due, took one of the bales of cotton, which he had raised, and carried it from the premises in Cobb county across the line into Douglas county, where he then lived, and where he still holds the cotton. The judge charged the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that this defendant, Sam Scott, was the cropper of the prosecutor for the year charged in the bill of indictment, and raised a crop on his farm as charged, and then took and carried one bale of the cotton thus raised out of Cobb county, without the knowledge or consent of the prosecutor, William Hollerman, and before he had paid the prosecutor all he owed him for supplies or advances made him for that year, and also his part of the crop, he would be guilty. The carrying of the bale of cotton out of Cobb county would be such a sale or disposition of the cotton that the courts of this county would have jurisdiction of the crime if a crime was committed." This charge was given in connection with section 680, Pen. Code 1895.

We think that the instruction just quoted is erroneous. Certainly to take property from one county into another does not amount to a sale; but the contention of the state's counsel is that the transaction is covered by the words "otherwise dispose of" appearing in the statute and in the indictment against the defendant. Even when standing alone, the phrase "dispose of," when used in a criminal statute, is universally held by the courts to include only those transactions in which there has been a transfer by the defendant of either title or absolute possession of the property, or else some such disposition of it as would destroy it in whole or in part. "Dispose of" means "to alienate; to effectually transfer." United States v. Hacker (D. C.) 73 Fed. 292, 294. It covers "all such alienations of property as may be made in ways not otherwise covered in the statute; for example, such as pledges, pawns, gifts, bailments, and other transfers and alienations." Bullene v. Smith, 73 Mo. 151, 161. "To dispose of" in a popular sense as used in reference to property means to part with a right to or ownership of it; in other words, a change of property. If this does not take place, it would scarcely be said the property was disposed of." Reynolds v. State, 73 Ala. 3. See, also, Franklin v. State, 12 Md. 246, 248. It differs in meaning from the word "secrete." Pearre v. Hawkins, 62 Tex. 434, 437. When it is associated in the context with the word "sell," then under the principle contained in the legal expression "noscitur a sociis" its meaning takes on some limitation from the association. In re Carr, 16 R. I. 645, 19 Atl. 145, 27 Am. St. Rep. 773; Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 25 L. Ed. 855. See, also, Hawthurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 531, 533, 51 Pac. 846, 63 Am. St. Rep. 142. Where the expression is "sell or otherwise dispose of," the other disposition must be somewhat in the nature of a sale. It does not include a mere removal of the property. Roberson v. State, 8 Tex. App. 502, 503. In a statute prohibiting "the selling, giving away, or otherwise disposing of" certain property under certain conditions, the expression "otherwise dispose of," in the absence of any expression of a legislative intent otherwise, must be construed to apply only to such a disposition as a sale or gift. Roberson v. State, 100 Ala. 37, 14 South. 554. Our local case of Conley v. State, 85 Ga. 348, 11 S. E. 659, is somewhat in point, though probably distinguishable by reason of the fact that the words as they appear in the body of the statute are limited in meaning by the courts in order that the body of the law may conform to the title. We see no reason why to move property across a county line would be any more criminal than to move it across a public road, or from one place to another within the same county. It might be that for a cropper to move any part of the farm products across the state line would be to dispose of it, as that would be a material interference with the landlord's constructive possession, in that it would destroy his right to resort to those remedies which are provided by the laws of this state for the maintenance of his peculiar and superior rights in the property; but to move it from one county to another has no such effect.

Judgment reversed.

GEORGIA SOUTHERN & F. RY. CO. v. OLIVER. (No. 1,634.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 91*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit in a justice's court for the killing of live stock through the negligence of the employés of a railroad company in the operation of its trains, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should set out the particular acts of negligence. The strictness of pleading required in superior and city courts does not pertain to justice's courts. Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Barfield, 1 Ga. App. 203, 58 S. E. 236; Southern Railway Co. v. 2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The testimony in support of the plaintiff's recovery, while not wholly satisfactory, was nevertheless legally sufficient to authorize the judge of the superior court in his discretion to refuse to set aside the verdict of the jury in the justice court on the pure issue of fact involved.

"A sale on credit is a complete sale." Therefore a sale of whisky in this state since January 1, 1908, whether for cash or on credit, or whether subsequently paid for or not, constitutes a violation of law. Acts 1907, p. 81; Civ. 2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 219, 223*)—ILLEGAL SALE—IDENTITY OF PURCHASER.

It is not necessary, in an indictment for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, to name specifically the person to whom the sale was made; but, if the indictment does name such person, testimony that a sale was made to any other person would be irrelevant and inadmissible, unless the person to whom the liquor was sold was acting for the person named in the indictment as making the purchase, and that fact was known to the defendant when he made the sale. 1. SALES (§ 442*)—BREACH OF WARRANTY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

When there is a sale of goods with a warranty of quality and a delivery and acceptance by the buyer, if the goods prove not to correspond with the warranty the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the actual value of the goods when and where delivered.

2. REVIEW.

No error of law appears, and the verdict is fully supported by the evidence

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by J. R. Wooldridge against the Oxford Knitting Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. C. Armistead, for plaintiff in error. A. A. Murphy, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Wooldridge sued the Oxford Knitting Mills in a justice court on account to recover the contract price of a car load of steam coal. The defense relied upon was total failure of consideration, in that the coal was expressly warranted as a steam coal of first quality, when in fact it was not steam coal and could not be used for the purpose of generating steam. A judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and, on appeal to a jury in the superior court, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The evidence showed that the coal was warranted by the plaintiff as a first class quality of steam coal. There was conflict in the evidence as to a breach of this warranty, and the jury solved the conflict in favor of the plaintiff.

Only one error of law is complained of. In support of its plea the defendant offered to prove that it had lost $15 per day in wages paid to its hands while waiting for steam to be sufficiently generated by the use of the coal in question to operate the mill, and that this delay continued for four days; and also offered to prove the loss of $10 per day for four hours each day as lost interest on the money invested in the mill. The court excluded this testimony, and this ruling constitutes the error of law assigned. We think it clear that the court did right in excluding the testimony. Certainly the damages here attempted to be recovered by the defendant by way of recoupment could not be said to have been within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and only such damages would be recoverable. Civ. Code 1895, § 3799. Besides, the defendant accepted and used the coal. If it was in fact an inferior quality of coal, and there was a breach of the express warranty on this subject, it was entitled, on proper proof, to an abatement in the price of the coal, and this abatement would be determined by the difference in the agreed price of the coal and its actual value when used, as decreased by its defective quality. Atkins v. Cobb, 56 Ga. 86; Florence v. Pattillo, 105 Ga. 581, 32 S. E. 642; Clark & Co. v. Neufville, 46 Ga. 26. In this latter case it was held by the Supreme Court that, where there is a sale of goods with a warranty of quality and a delivery and acceptance by the buyer, and the goods prove not to correspond with the warranty, and there is no fraud by the seller, the measure of damages is the difference between the price paid and the value of the goods as they actually were at the time and place of sale and delivery. There was no proof offered as to the actual value of the coal. The defendant could have rejected the coal entirely as worthless, if such had been the fact, and refused to pay for it on that ground. Having received and used it, the defendant would only have been entitled to a reduction from the contract price to the actual value of the coal when used. There was no evidence offered by which the jury could determine the damages to the defendant arising from any partial failure of consideration. The verdict, under the law, was demanded.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County.

Action by W. A. McClintock against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company and W. E. McClintock against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant in each case, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dial & Todd, for appellants. S. J. Simpson and Simpson, Cooper & Babb, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. These two actions are separate and distinct, but by consent were tried together. The plaintiffs seek to recover damages for the loss of their property alleged to have been caused by fire communicated from a locomotive engine of the defendant, or originating within the limits of defendant's right of way. The fire is alleged to have occurred on the 21st of May, 1908. The plaintiff W. A. McClintock, claiming to be the owner of the house which was destroyed, seeks to recover as his damages the value of the same, while the other plaintiff, the occupant of the house at the time of the fire, sues to recover the loss of his household goods and other personal property. The jury rendered a verdict in each case in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The first exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is submitted, in not allowing the plaintiff W. A. McClintock to answer the following question: 'Do you know whether this house ever caught from a train before?' and in holding that it was irrelevant. His honor should have held that this question was competent, relevant, and material as bearing upon the issue of the cause of the fire, and as tending to prove the possibility and a consequent probability that some locomotive of the defendant caused the fire, and also as bearing upon the question of negligence, either in the operation, management, or construction of defendant's engines." This question arose as follows during the examination of a witness for the plaintiffs: "Q. Do you know whether this house ever caught from a train before? Mr. Babb: We object to what may have occurred before this. The Court: How is that relevant? Mr. Todd: In one of these cases under this section, evidence of previous fires from locomotive engines was received and was held competent. I don't recall the name of that case, but I think I can get it. I asked the witness if he knew of his own knowledge that this house had ever caught from passing locomotives previous to this time. The Court: I don't think that would be relevant." The ground upon which the testimony was held to be inadmissible was that it was irrelevant. It is a self-evident fact that it is within the range of possibility for sparks from an engine to set on fire a house near the track. We must assume that jurors are men of common sense, and conversant with the ordinary and well-known laws of nature. So that, even conceding that the testimony was admissible, it has not been made to appear that its rejection was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant, especially since the testimony shows that this fact was not the main issue in the controversy. In so far as the exception raises the question of the relevancy of the testimony upon the issue of negligence, it must be overruled for the additional reason that the allegations of negligence and willfulness were withdrawn, and the plaintiffs relied solely upon the statutory remedy provided in section 2135 of the Code of Laws of 1902. Furthermore, the question as to the relevancy of testimony lies in large measure within the discretion of the presiding judge, and his ruling is not the subject of appeal unless there has been an abuse of discretion, which does not appear in this case. This exception is overruled.

The second exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is submitted, in allowing the defendant, over the objection of the plaintiffs, to introduce in evidence by the witness C. H. Gasque the book known as train register. This was error because it was proving negatively what could not be proven positively, and because said book was a mere memorandum or record made and kept by the defendant, and its servants or agents, for its convenience and information solely, and was therefore not competent or relevant against these plaintiffs, and also because the absence of any entries of the arrival of trains arriving after the arrival of Verdery's train was not competent or relevant evidence to show that no trains in fact arrived; whereas, his honor should have so held, and should have excluded the book." The question arose as follows during the examination of a witness for the defendant: "Mr. Babb: We offer that book in evidence to show the time of the arrival and departure of trains on May 21st and 22d of 1906. Mr. Todd: We object. We think that book, so far as it shows any entries made by the witness, might be competent. The Court: Yes, sir. Mr. Babb, only those books are evidence, and they are only evidence when the entry in them is proven. This book is evidence of the entry where the witness who makes the entry testifies to it. Mr. Babb: We wish to introduce, then, the record for May 21, 1906, to show that no entry was made subsequent to this one, testified to by the witness. The Court: You want to show there is no entry there? Mr. Babb: No entry at all. The Court: Very well. You can show that. Mr. Babb: That is the purpose for which we wish to introduce it, to show there is no entry. Mr. Todd: We object to any further entry on that day made by any other person except this witness. The Court: I rule that out. Mr. Babb: All we want to show is that there was no other entries on that day after that one. The Court: Yes, sir." The plaintiff did not object to the introduction of the book in evidence to prove entries made by the witness himself; but the sole ground of his objection was that it was not admissible to prove other entries, and his honor, the presiding judge, so ruled. As it was not offered in evidence to prove entries made by others, this exception cannot be sustained.

The third exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is submitted, in refusing to allow the plaintiffs to examine the witness John H. Powers in reply as to the time trains passed Ora on the night of the fire. This was error because it denied to plaintiffs the right to bring out all the facts for the consideration of the jury, and such testimony as plaintiffs attempted to bring out was directly in reply to and contradictory of the testimony of several witnesses for defendant, and was therefore competent and important, and by being thus shut off plaintiffs' cases were prejudiced." The ruling of his honor, the circuit judge, in excluding the cumulative testimony, is sustained by the case of Weaver v. Whilden, 33 S. C. 190, 11 S. E. 686. This exception is also overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LAUGHLIN et al. v. SOUTHERN PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION et al.

LAUGHLIN v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 16, 1909.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—ACTS OF OSTENSIBLE AGENT—RATIFICATION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action against a public service corporation and a light and power company for injuries by contact with an electric wire, receipted bills, dated in the name of the light and power company as agent for the other defendant, signed by it as agent, were properly admitted to show that the public service corporation acquiesced in the statements contained in the receipts, and held itself out as the principal, when considered in connection with testimony that defendants used the same office and had the same officers and employes, as the only reasonable inference to be drawn from these facts is that the public service corporation had notice that it was being held out as principal, and the testimony was competent as a link in establishing ratification of the acts of its ostensible agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

An exception to the admission of testimony cannot be sustained on appeal, where similar testimony was introduced without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 145*)—TAKING CASE FROM JURY—PARTICULAR ISSUES.

The fact that on the issue of wantonness, willfulness, or negligence there was contradictory testimony on the part of defendants is not to be considered by the Supreme Court in determining whether the issue as to plaintiffs' right to punitive damages should be withdrawn from the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

4. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—CONTACT WITH WIRE — ACTION FOR INJURIES — QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for injuries by coming in contact with an electric wire, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the question of a reckless disregard of the rights of the public, warranting punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Charles G. Dantzler, Judge.

Actions by Maud Laughlin and another against the Southern Public Service Corporation and another, and by Lawrence Edward Laughlin, by guardian ad litem, against the same defendants. The actions were consolidated, and from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden, Rutledge & Hagood, and J. P. McNeill, for appellants. Shipp & Baker and Willcox & Willcox, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. On the 19th of August, 1907, the plaintiffs, Maud Laughlin and her son, Lawrence E. Laughlin, were both burned by coming in contact with an electric wire, which had fallen from a pole near the intersection of two streets in the city of Florence. The wires were those through which ran the electric current which furnished light to the city. Subsequently these actions were brought by Mrs. Laughlin and her husband in one case, and Lawrence E. Laughlin by his guardian ad litem in the other case, against the Southern Public Service Corporation and Florence Light & Power Company, to recover damages for the injuries so sustained. The allegations in each case which are material to the points involved in this appeal are as follows: "That at the times hereinafter mentioned the defendants owned and operated, in the city of Florence, county of Florence, and state of South Carolina, an electric plant, and were engaged in the business of furnishing and supplying electric lights and an electric power to the city of Florence, and to divers persons residing in said city, and the plaintiffs allege, on information and belief, that the defendant Florence Light & Power Company owned the said electric plant at said times, and was operating and maintaining the same for the use and benefit of its codefendant, the Southern Public Service Corporation, as its agent, and under its control." The allegations of negligence are against the defendants jointly. The answers of the defendants were general denials. By consent the actions were consolidated and tried together, resulting in a verdict for the mother in the sum of $17,000, and for the son in the sum of $8,000.

The defendant appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in admitting in evidence, against the objections of the defendant's attorneys, upon the examination of the witness George W. Laughlin, the receipt for electric light bill, $1.80, dated August 15, 1907; the error assigned being that receipt was irrelevant upon the issue as to whether the Florence Light & Power Company owned the electric plant, and was operating it for the benefit of its codefendant, the Southern Public Service Corporation." The record shows that the plaintiffs introduced in evidence seven receipted bills, headed "To Florence Light and Power Company, Agent for the Southern Public Service Corporation Dr.," and signed: "Received payment. Florence Light & Power Company, Agent by ———." These receipted bills bore date April 1, 1907, August 1, 1907, August 15, 1907, November 2, 1907, December 2, 1907, January 2, 1908, and January 23, 1908. Even conceding that the said testimony was not competent on the question of agency, it was nevertheless admissible for the purpose of showing that the Southern Public Service Corporation acquiesced in the statements contained in the receipts, and held itself out to the world as the principal, when considered in connection with the testimony, to the effect that the two companies used the same office, and had the same officers and employes. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from these facts is that the Southern Public Service Corporation had notice of the fact that it was being held out to the world as the principal. The testimony was therefore competent as a link in establishing ratification of the acts of its ostensible agent. Another reason why this exception cannot be sustained is that similar testimony was introduced without objection.

The second exception is disposed of by what was said in considering the first.

The third exception assigns error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit, but it must also be overruled, as we have already ruled that there was competent evidence tending to establish the allegations of the complaint as to ownership.

The fifth exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendants (as per the second request) as follows: 'The jury is instructed that there is no evidence in these cases showing wantonness, willfulness, or recklessness, and they cannot therefore find verdicts for punitive damages'—the error assigned being that, there being no evidence of any more than ordinary negligence, the question of punitive damages should have been, by granting this request, withdrawn from the jury." There is testimony to the effect that this wire fell in a thoroughfare of the city of Florence; that the wire at the time of the accident was old, and the insulation broken and hanging in ribbons; that the wire was permitted to lie across the limb for a long time; that it is dangerous for a live wire to be permitted to remain in contact with a limb; that the condition of the wire was frequently reported to those in charge of the company, but they took no step to remedy it; that W. L. Black, the superintendent of the plant, was notified, on the Saturday before the accident, of the condition of this wire, but he "did not regard it serious," and consequently did not attend to it; that it was the duty of the company to make these repairs; that two weeks before this accident the officers of the company had been commanded by the chairman of the street committee to take all wires out of the trees; and that in stringing the wire it should have been put on an insulator where it passed through a tree. There was contradictory testimony on the part of the defendants, but such fact is not to be considered by this court in determining whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiffs were entitled to punitive damages. The testimony to which we have made reference certainly tended to show a reckless disregard of the rights of the public, and this exception is overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BROWN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINER CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 16, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

No presumption of negligence arises on the part of a carrier from the fact that a passenger has been injured while on the carrier's train; but, in order to raise such presumption, it must appear that the injury resulted from some agency or instrumentality of the carrier, some act or omission of its servants, or some defect in the instrumentalities of transportation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1261, 1262, 1283-1294; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 235*) — INSTRUCTIONS — ADMISSIONS—WEIGHT.

An instruction that alleged admissions of plaintiff were receivable only to discredit his testimony, and not as affirmative proof of material facts in the case, was erroneous; defendant being entitled to have plaintiff's admissions as to the manner in which he was injured considered as evidence that he was not hurt as alleged in the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 546; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction that the jury should consider plaintiff's admissions only to discredit his testimony, and not as affirmative proof of material facts in issue, was erroneous, as violating Const. art. 5, § 26, prohibiting charges as to matters of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

Appeal from Richland County Court; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by John W. Brown against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

De Pass & De Pass, for appellant. Barron, Moore & Barron and R. B. Herbert, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The complaint alleges that: "While plaintiff was in the act of alighting from said train, with one foot on the last step of the car, and the other thrust forward in the act of stepping to the ground, the said train, by reason of the negligent and careless management thereof on the part of the employes of the defendant in charge of same, was caused to give a sudden and violent jerk and lurch forward, hurling and throwing the plaintiff from the steps of said car to the ground, under and beneath said car, and against the cross-ties and rails of said defendant's roadway, whereby plaintiff's left knee struck violently against the step of said car and the cross-ties of said roadbed of defendant, and so bruised and mangled same that in consequence thereof his left leg had to be removed just above the knee." The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and set up the defense of contributory negligence, which was withdrawn at the trial. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, and the defendant appealed.

The first assignment of error is, because his honor the presiding judge charged the jury that "when a passenger is hurt, the presumption of law is that it is through the negligence of the railroad company, but the presumption may be done away with by proof." The rule is thus stated in Anderson v. Railroad, 77 S. C. 434, 58 S. E. 149, 122 Am. St. Rep. 591: "The third exception complains of error in charging: 'That the obligation of a common carrier for safe transportation is one arising from contract imposing duties growing out of the relation between the parties involving trust and confidence, requiring extraordinary care; and, whenever a passenger is injured on a train, without fault on his part, while being transported by a carrier, a presumption arises from this fact alone that there was negligence in the management of the road, which presumption the carrier is bound to rebut, or it will be liable in damages without further proof'—the error being that no presumption of negligence can arise from the mere injury of a passenger, unless it is shown that the injury was caused by some instrumentality in the charge of, or under the control of, the carrier, and that some notice of the threatened violence or impending danger must be brought home to the carrier before negligence can be imputed. This exception is well taken. According to the rule in this state there is no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier from the bare fact that a passenger has been injured while on the carrier's train, but that such presumption does arise on proof of such injury as the result of some agency or instrumentality of the carrier, some act of omission or commission of the servants of the carrier, or some defect in the instrumentalities of transportation." The testimony was contradictory as to the manner in which the plaintiff was injured. He introduced evidence tending to show that he was injured as alleged in his complaint, while the defendant's testimony tended to show that he suffered injury by jumping from the car before it reached the station, and while it was in motion. The charge gave the plaintiff the benefit of a fact to which he was not entitled, and which was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

The second exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that 'alleged admissions of the plaintiff are receivable in evidence only as discrediting his testimony, and not as affirmative proof of material facts in issue, such as would excuse the defendant of the presumption of negligence raised by inference of law where a passenger is shown to be injured on its railroad'—the error being that: (a) The judge could not take from the jury the right to say whether plaintiff's admissions to third parties were evidence that he was not hurt in the manner alleged in the complaint; (b) it was a charge on the facts in telling the jury that such admissions were not such proof as would remove a presumption of negligence." The rule is thus stated in 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1048: "The logical basis, therefore, of the use of admissions is twofold: In the first place, all admissions furnished, as against the party, the same discrediting inference as that which may be made against a witness in consequence of a prior self-contradiction; * * * in the next place, those admissions which happen to state a fact that was at the time against the parties' interest have an additional testimonial value, independent of the contradiction, and similar to that which justifies the hearsay exception for statements of facts against interest, this element adding to their probative value, but not being essential to their admissibility. This double evidential utility explains the proposition, sometimes judicially sanctioned, that an admission is equivalent to affirmative testimony for the party offering it. Such a theory is partly correct, partly incorrect. It certainly cannot be true of admissions in general. Their effect, like that of a witness' self-contradictions, is merely destructive." In the case of Zemp v. Railroad, 9 Rich. Law, 84, 64 Am. Dec. 763, where the facts were similar to those in the case under consideration, the court used this language: "The first ground attributes error to the presiding judge, in that he did not charge the jury, if they believed the testimony as to the plaintiff's declarations, they should find for the defendant. The judge very properly presented the plaintiff's declarations as part of the case. If they were believed, they were to be put into the scales with the other proof, and given their appropriate weight." The declarations of the plaintiff contained the statement of a fact which at the time was against his interest, and they should have been put into the scales with the other testimony, and given their appropriate weight by the jury. This disposes of subdivision "a" of said exception. Having reached this conclusion, it clearly appears that there was error in stating to the jury what force and effect should be given to the declarations of the plaintiff, as the charge was violative of article 5, § 28, of the Constitution, prohibiting judges from charging juries in respect to matters of fact.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

BARKSDALE v. CHARLESTON & W.
C. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 25, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—IRRELEVANT TESTIMONY.

An exception to the admission of testimony cannot be sustained, where it does not appear prejudicial to the complaining party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

2. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—REMEDY THEREFOR.

The remedy for a public nuisance is by indictment, unless the person instituting civil proceedings therefor can show special or peculiar damages, differing in kind from those to which all others in common with him are exposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 164-169; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—AFFECTING NAVIGATION—INJURY TO ADJOINING LANDOWNER—RIGHT TO SUE THEREFOR.

An injury to land on a navigable stream, caused by a public nuisance, affecting the rights of navigation, differs in degree and kind from the injury done to the public, and hence the owner is entitled to sue therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

No error can be predicated on a portion of a charge which, considered in connection with the entire charge, is free from error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW OF EXCEPTION NOT ARGUED ON APPEAL.

An exception not argued on appeal will not be considered.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Injunction by W. D. Barksdale against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Simpson and Simpson, Cooper & Babb, for appellant. Cannon & Blackman, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for an injunction and to recover damages, alleged to have been caused by the operation of a coal chute, in the city of Laurens, S. C., on the ground that it is a nuisance. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,000, but an injunction was not granted, as the plaintiff announced that the verdict would be accepted as including both past and future damages, and that he would not ask for an injunction. The defendant appealed, upon exceptions which will be set out in the report of the case.

First exception: Subdivision "a" of this exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that, even conceding the testimony was irrelevant, it has not been made to appear that it was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. And it is only necessary to refer to the complaint to show that subdivision "b" must be overruled.

Second, sixth, and seventh exceptions: These exceptions assign error, on the part of his honor the presiding judge, in refusing to grant a nonsuit, in his charge to the jury, and in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the undisputed testimony showed that the plaintiff had not sustained injury special or peculiar to himself, or differing in kind and degree from that suffered by others in the same neighborhood. The following authorities sustain the proposition that the remedy for a public nuisance is by indictment, unless the person instituting proceedings, on the civil side of the court, can show special or peculiar damages, differing in kind from those to which all others in common with him are exposed. Carey v. Brooks, 1 Hill, 365; State v. Rankin, 8 S. C. 438, 16 Am. Rep. 737; Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 39; Steamboat Co. v. R. R. Co., 30 S. C. 539, 9 S. E. 650, 4 L. R. A. 209, 14 Am. St. Rep. 923; Steamboat Co. v. R. R. Co., 46 S. C. 327, 24 S. E. 337, 33 L. R. A. 541, 57 Am. St. Rep. 688; Baltzger v. Railroad, 54 S. C. 242, 32 S. E. 358, 71 Am. St. Rep. 789; McMeekin v. Power Co., 80 S. C. 512, 61 S. E. 1020. In the case of Jones v. Railroad, 67 S. C. 181, 45 S. E. 188, the owner of land on a navigable stream brought an action against the railroad company for causing damages to his land by obstructing the flow of freshet waters through the negligent construction of the piers for its bridge. In delivering the opinion of the court Mr. Justice Woods used this language: "The right which the plaintiff says the defendant invaded was not the right of navigation, or any other right which he held in common with the public, but the right to the unimpaired use of his land on the banks of the river. The fact that the stream was navigable does not affect this question. Blood v. R. R. Co., 2 Gray (Mass.) 137, 61 Am. Dec. 444. The injury alleged is different in degree and kind from any done to the public, and therefore does not fall within the reason of Steamboat Co. v. R. R. Co., 30 S. C. 539, 9 S. E. 650, 4 L. R. A. 209, 14 Am. St. Rep. 923, and other like cases." The fact that they arose out of the obstruction of a navigable stream which constitutes a public nuisance (Drews v. Burton & Co., 76 S. C. 362, 57 S. E. 176) did not prevent a recovery. We quote from said case to show that the injury alleged in the complaint was special and peculiar, differing in degree and kind from those to which all others in common with him were exposed. And as there was testimony tending to sustain the allegations of the complaint, these exceptions must be overruled.

Third exception: The first subdivision has been disposed of by what has already been said. The second subdivision cannot be sustained, as it presents an immaterial question.

Fourth exception: When that portion of the charge set out in the exception is considered in connection with the entire charge, it will be seen that it is free from error.

Fifth exception: This exception was not argued by the appellant's attorneys, and therefore will not be considered.

Eighth exception: We do not deem it necessary to cite authority to show that this court cannot consider whether a verdict is excessive when there is any evidence to support it.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

DAVIS v. ATLANTA & C. AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 17, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE.

That a train failed to stop at a flag station to which a passenger had paid his fare, resulting in his injury, is evidence of the carrier's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1283; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—NEGLIGENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

A presumption of negligence of a carrier arises from the fact that a passenger was injured while on its train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1283; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Whether the proximate cause of an injury to a passenger was the negligent failure of the carrier to stop its train at a flag station to which the passenger had paid fare held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—CARE REQUIRED OF PASSENGERS.

It is not contributory negligence per se for a passenger to go on the platform of a train to alight, having reasons to believe that the train is about to stop at his station.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1376; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—CARE REQUIRED OF PASSENGERS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a passenger, injured by being thrown from the platform while there intending to alight at his station, was guilty of contributory negligence, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Lula H. Davis, administratrix of John W. Davis, deceased, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Casey, for appellant. Morgan & Mauldin, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, Lula H. Davis, as administratrix, brought this action against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company for the alleged killing of her husband, John W. Davis. There was evidence tending to prove: That on 22d September, 1905, Davis was a passenger on defendant's train between Easley and Beverly, having paid his fare to the latter place, which is a flag station; that, on drawing near to Beverly, the train blew the usual stop signal and slowed down; that deceased went to the back platform and down on the steps in order to alight; that, instead of stopping, the train's speed was quickened; and that thereupon deceased attempted either to re-enter the coach or to pass to the other side of the platform, when a sudden jerk of the cars threw him off, and he sustained a fatal injury.

On the trial of the cause motions for a nonsuit and for a new trial were overruled by the presiding judge. The five grounds urged in favor of these motions present two questions for the consideration of this court: (1) Was there any evidence of negligence of defendant which was a proximate cause of the injury? (2) Did the evidence admit of no other inference than that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence?

The fact that the train failed to stop at the station to which testimony tended to show the deceased had paid his fare was evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier (Cooper v. Railway, 58 S. C. 91, 34 S. E. 16), and added to this is the presumption that the injury to plaintiff as a passenger was due to the carrier's negligence (Cooper v. Railway, 61 S. C. 345, 39 S. E. 543; Steele v. Railway, 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756; Zemp v. Railway, 9 Rich. Law, 89, 64 Am. Dec. 763). On this evidence of carrier's negligence, the question of proximate cause was properly submitted to the jury. Doolittle v. Railway, 62 S. C. 130, 40 S. E. 133.

The rule is established in this state by the case of Zemp v. Railway Co., supra, that it is not contributory negligence per se for a passenger to go on the platform of a train for the purpose of alighting, having reason to believe that the train is about to stop at his station. It follows from the evidence above stated that the issue of contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(88 S. C. 49)

HICKSON LUMBER CO. v. STALLINGS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 16, 1909.)

TRIAL (§ 11*) — DOCKETS — TRANSFER FROM LAW TO EQUITY DOCKET.

Where, in a suit on a timber contract, plaintiff demanded judgment for $2,000 damages; that the contract be abrogated; that defendant vacate and surrender to plaintiff a mill site, and be enjoined from cutting or interfering with plaintiff's timber and lands described in the complaint, and from sawing and manufacturing timber of others at plaintiff's mill, or from further using the mill, and for such other and further relief as the court might deem proper—the case was properly transferred to the equity docket, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 274, providing for the trial of issues of law by the court, and issues of fact for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, by a jury, unless a jury is waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by the Hickson Lumber Company against Sylvester Stallings. From an order transferring the cause to the equity docket, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spears & Dennis and E. O. Woods, for appellant. R. T. Caston, Edward McIver, and George E. Dargan, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The appeal herein is from an order of his honor, the circuit judge, transferring the case from calendar 1 to calendar 2. The reason assigned to him was that the issues raised by the pleadings, other than the question of damages, should be tried by the court, and that they should be determined before the trial of the question of damages. The practical question presented by the exceptions is whether the appellant was entitled to a trial by jury upon all the issues raised by the pleadings, on the ground that such issues were legal.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the question under consideration, are as follows: "That on about the 31st day of January, 1906, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, whereby the plaintiff undertook and agreed to furnish to the defendant a large body of timber described in the contract, at least 5,000,000 feet, in the county and state aforesaid, to be cut by him for, and on the orders of, plaintiff, at a price and in a manner stated in said contract, and to furnish a site for defendant's mill, together with the right of way for tramroads from the mill to said timber, and the defendant therein contracted to install at once on said site a complete first-class sawmill outfit, of a sufficient capacity to give a daily output of 10,000 feet one-inch board, to put in a dry kiln capable of drying 10,000 feet of boards per day, and with said plant to cut and manufacture said timber on and according to the orders of plaintiff, and further contracted not to interfere with the plaintiff in buying other timber accessible to said site, and which could be cut at such location. That although more than a year has passed since the execution of the said contract, and though plaintiff has repeatedly urged defendant to comply with his contract by cutting the lumber which he was to furnish to plaintiff, he has utterly failed and refused to cut and furnish to plaintiff any lumber whatsoever, except one car load about the 15th or 16th of November last, and two additional car loads soon thereafter, in all not more than 25,571 feet, less than three days' output of the capacity of the said mill. The defendant has utterly failed to comply with his said contract, but has been, and still is, as plaintiff is informed and believes, using the mill site and location provided by plaintiff for the purpose of cutting and manufacturing lumber for other parties, and on his own account. That on or about the 10th day of December, 1906, plaintiff, having become convinced of the incapacity of the defendant, and his inability to carry out his contract, and to furnish the lumber as ordered, gave him notice that the contract was no longer binding on it, and notified him to vacate the premises of the plaintiff, and not to molest or further interfere with the timber thereon. That notwithstanding his utter failure to cut said timber as provided by said contract, defendant refuses to vacate said premises, and threatens and declares his purpose to cut said timber in such quantities, and at such times, as he may be able to get the work done, and does not even now undertake or promise to cut the amount, or furnish same on orders provided in said contract. That the defendant continues to occupy the mill site of plaintiff against its protest, and is cutting and manufacturing the timber of adjacent landowners, which plaintiff proposed under said contract to purchase and furnish to defendant, and continues to cut in very small quantities the timber of plaintiff, and asserts his right to prevent plaintiff from cutting its timber itself, or having same cut by other parties, or of selling same, any one of which it could do easily, if it was not for the interference of defendant and his molestation of the same, and the assertion of his own alleged rights as above stated." The relief demanded is as follows: "(1) For the sum of $2,000 damages; (2) that the said contract be abrogated and declared null and void; (3) that the defendant vacate and surrender to the plaintiff the said mill site; and (4) that the defendant be enjoined and restrained from cutting, or in any way interfering with, the timber and lands of the plaintiff, described in the complaint, and from sawing and manufacturing timber of other parties at said mill site of plaintiff, and from further using said mill site for sawing and manufacturing lumber, and from interfering with and molesting plaintiff or its agents or assigns in the cutting and using of its said timber." The answer of the defendant denies certain allegations of the complaint, and explains others, but does not set up any specific defense. The relief demanded by the defendant is as follows: "(1) For the sum of $5,000 damages against the plaintiff; (2) that the order of injunction heretofore issued be vacated, and the defendant be allowed to continue operating under the contract, and that plaintiff be compelled to carry out said contract; (3) that the mill site be declared to belong to the defendant under the agreement, if said contract be terminated; (4) that the complaint in this action be dismissed, with costs; (5) and for such other and further relief as the court may deem meet and proper."

Section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 provides that "an issue of law must be tried by the court, as also cases in chancery, unless they be referred. * * * An issue of fact for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, must be tried by a jury unless a jury trial be waived. * * *" In Ex parte Landrum, 69 S. C. 136, 48 S. E. 47, the court uses this language: "In an action at common law the only judgments that could be rendered were: (1) For the recovery of specific real property; (2) for the recovery of specific personal property; (3) for money. In the case under consideration the respondents not only seek to recover judgment for the amount of their fees, but likewise to have determined out of what fund they are to be paid. This renders it necessary to invoke the aid of the court in the exercise of its chancery powers." See, also, Pratt v. Timmerman, 69 S. C. 186, 48 S. E. 255. Not only do the allegations of the complaint show that the plaintiff is entitled to legal relief, but they are appropriate to an action seeking equitable relief by way of rescission of contract, and for injunction against an alleged continuous breach of contract. It cannot therefore be successfully contended that the only issue of fact raised by the pleadings was either for the recovery of specific real or personal property, or for money.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the circuit court be affirmed.

(83 S. C. 46)

TOWN OF UNION v. HAMPTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 16, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 643*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE — PUNISHMENT — STATUTES—"IN HIS DISCRETION."

Acts 1897, p. 499, § 2 (Civ. Code 1902, § 2004), provides that, whenever the mayor shall find a party charged before him guilty of violating a town ordinance, he may impose "in his discretion" a fine or imprisonment, in the alternative, not to exceed the limits prescribed for such violation by the ordinances of the town, and such imprisonment may be accompanied with the additional requirement of hard labor. Held, that the words "in his discretion" referred to the extent of the punishments, and not to the question whether the mayor could impose a single, instead of an alternative, sentence, and that the mayor was therefore bound to impose an alternative sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 643*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—PUNISHMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 5, § 33, providing that circuit courts and all inferior courts shall have power in their discretion to impose sentence of labor on highways on persons by them sentenced to imprisonment, was merely intended to provide for an additional punishment, and did not interfere with the procedure in the municipal courts, nor abrogate the duty of a mayor to impose an alternative sentence, as required by Acts 1897, p. 499, § 2.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 643*)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE — PUNISHMENT — STATUTES.

The Union City Charter provided that the mayor should be vested with all the power of trial justices or other inferior courts in the state, and Cr. Code 1902, § 12, declares that magistrates shall have jurisdiction to impose fines or forfeitures, not exceeding $100, or imprisonment in the jail or workhouse, not exceeding 30 days, and may impose any sentence within those limits, singly or in the alternative. Acts 1897, p. 498, § 1, provides that the mayor shall have all the powers and authority of magistrates in criminal cases within the corporate limits of their respective cities and towns, and section 2 requires the imposition of alternative punishments. Held that, in conferring on mayors the power of magistrates, the Legislature did not intend to nullify section 2 of the act of 1897, and did not relieve the mayor, in a prosecution for violating a town ordinance, of the obligation to impose an alternative sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

Appeal from Union County Court; J. O. Klugh, Judge.

Cordoza H. Hampton was convicted of keeping a bawdy house, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Townsend & Townsend, for appellant. J. Ashby Sawyer, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The defendant was tried by a jury in the mayor's court, under the charge of keeping a bawdy house, in violation of the ordinance of the town of Union. The jury found him guilty, and he was sentenced to 30 days on the chain gang. On appeal to the circuit court, the sentence was affirmed except in one particular—the number of days was changed from 30 to 20, so as to conform to the provisions of the charter of said town. The defendant has appealed again, upon numerous exceptions, all of which were abandoned except those raising the question whether his honor, the presiding judge, erred in imposing a single, instead of an alternative, sentence of a fine.

Section 2, p. 499, of the Acts of 1897, entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of, and to settle the procedure in municipal courts of the cities and towns of this state" (incorporated in volume 1 of the Code of Laws as section 2004) is as follows: "Whenever said mayor, intendant, or mayor pro tempore, shall find the party charged before him, guilty of violating an ordinance of said town, he shall have power to impose, in his discretion, a fine or imprisonment in the alternative, not to exceed the limits prescribed for such violation, by the ordinances of said city or town, and such imprisonment may be accompanied, with the additional requirement, of hard labor on the streets of said city or town, under such regulations, as by ordinances may be established." The respondent's attorney contends that the words "in his discretion" and "in the alternative" are inconsistent, and that the words "in the alternative" should be stricken out. In the first place, this section relates to the punishment of those charged with a violation of the town ordinances, and therefore must be strictly construed, so that, if there is such an inconsistency between said words that both expressions cannot stand, the words "in his discretion" should be eliminated; but our construction is that the words "in his discretion" have reference to the extent of the respective punishments, and not to the question whether he had the right to impose a single, instead of an alternative, sentence.

Again the respondent's attorney argues that the foregoing provisions of the act of 1897 are in conflict with section 33, art 5, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "Circuit courts and all courts inferior thereto, and municipal courts, shall have the power, in their discretion, to impose sentence of labor upon highways, streets and other public works, upon persons by them sentenced to imprisonment." In the case of State v. Williams, 40 S. C. 373, 19 S. E. 5, it was held that a statute, which authorized the trial justice to sentence a convict to hard labor on the streets, during the term of his imprisonment, added an additional punishment, and was therefore unconstitutional and void. It was to meet this view of the law that the foregoing section was incorporated in the Constitution. That section was not intended to interfere with the procedure in municipal courts, but simply to provide for an additional punishment, which could not be inflicted without such a provision. The respondent's attorney likewise relies upon certain provisions in the charter of said town, among which is that which declares that the intendant (now mayor) shall "be vested with all the powers of trial justices or other inferior courts in this state, within the limits of the said town"; and upon section 12 of the Criminal Code of 1902, which is as follows: "They [magistrates] shall have jurisdiction of all offenses which may be subject to the penalties of either fine or forfeiture, not exceeding one hundred dollars, or imprisonment in the jail or workhouse, not exceeding thirty days, and may impose any sentence within those limits, singly or in the alternative." Section 1, p. 498, of the Acts of 1897 (incorporated in the Code of Laws as section 2003), provides that: "The intendants or mayors of the cities and towns of this state, that have been heretofore chartered, or that may be hereafter chartered, by special act of the General Assembly, or under general laws, shall have all the powers and authority of magistrates in criminal cases, within the corporate limits, and police jurisdiction, of their respective cities and towns." The act of 1897 contains the usual repealing clause. It cannot be successfully contended that, in conferring upon intendants and mayors the powers of magistrates, the Legislature intended to nullify the provisions of section 2 of the act of 1897.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court, for the sole purpose of an alternative sentence.

CARRISON et al. v. KERSHAW COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 18, 1909.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 178*)—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO VOTERS—STATUTES.

The proviso to Act Feb. 23, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 298), § 3, empowering the commissioners of a county to issue bonds of the county, that, if they decide to issue them, they shall have power and authority to submit the question of issuing them to the voters of the county, does not require such submission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 178*)—INCREASE OF INDEBTEDNESS—SUBMISSION TO VOTERS.

In the absence of a provision of the Constitution prohibiting the increase of indebtedness of, or creation of a bonded indebtedness by, a county without submission of the question to the voters, as required in case of the state or a city or town, the Legislature can authorize it, as it did by Act Feb. 23, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 298), § 3.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

Petition by H. G. Carrison and others for injunction against Kershaw County and others. Dismissed.

Lawrence T. Mills, for petitioners. T. J. Kirkland, for respondents.

JONES, C. J. The petitioners, taxpayers of Kershaw county, have applied in the original jurisdiction of this court for an injunction to restrain the respondents, county commissioners of Kershaw county, from issuing coupon bonds of said county to the amount of $40,000 under an act of the Legislature approved February 23, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 298). The question presented by the petition and return is whether the county commissioners have authority to issue said bonds without submitting the question of such issuance to an election.

The title of the act is as follows: "An act to authorize the county commissioners of Kershaw to construct a bridge across the Wateree river, to provide funds therefor and to issue the obligation of said county for such purpose, and to create a sinking fund for the retirement or payment of such obligation." The third section of the act relevant to the issue provides as follows: "Sec. 3. That in order to raise funds requisite for the construction of such bridge and the other purposes appertaining thereto aforesaid, the said county commissioners are also hereby authorized and empowered to borrow money upon the promissory notes of Kershaw county, or to issue and sell the coupon bonds of said county to an aggregate amount not exceeding forty thousand ($40,000) dollars. Any such notes or bonds shall be in denomination not exceeding one thousand ($1,000) dollars each; to bear interest from date thereof at a rate not exceeding six (6) per cent., and to run for a period not exceeding twenty-five (25) years, interest to be payable annually or semiannually. Any such notes or bonds and coupons shall be signed by the county supervisor for Kershaw county: Provided, that the signature of the supervisor to coupons may be lithographed or engraved in fac simile: Provided, that in the event the said county board of commissioners shall decide to issue coupon or registered bonds, they shall have full power and authority to submit the question of issuing said bonds to the qualified voters of the county, said election to be governed by the provisions of law now applicable to such election: Provided, further, that such bonds when issued shall be exempt from taxation."

It will be seen that the first part of the section expressly empowers the county commissioners to issue the coupon bonds of the county to the amount of $40,000. It is contended, however, that the second proviso above compels the county commissioners, in the event they decide to issue such bonds, to submit the question to the voters. We do not so construe this section. While the county commissioners are empowered to submit the question of issuing the bonds to the voters, they are not compelled to do so. The statute contemplated that the county commissioners might deem it proper to submit such question to the voters, and in such case it was necessary to confer upon them the requisite authority to that end. The proviso is therefore not meaningless and is consistent with the full authority of the commissioners to issue the bonds as conferred in the first clause of the section.

The power of the Legislature to confer such authority upon the county commissioners is clear. While article 10, § 11 of the Constitution forbids an increase of the public debt of the state without submitting the question to the qualified electors, and while article 8, § 7, forbids any city or town from creating a bonded debt without submitting the question to the qualified electors of the city or town, we find no such restriction on the power of the Legislature with respect to the issuance of bonds by a county. In the absence of such restriction, the power of the Legislature is plenary.

The petition is therefore dismissed.

WHITE et al. v. BAILEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. April 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 177*)—RESCISSION—NONPERFORMANCE BY GRANTEE.

Neither the reservation of a lien for maintenance and support in a deed of conveyance, made in consideration of a covenant to support and maintain the grantor, nor the insertion therein of a clause, giving him a right to re-enter and use and occupy the land during his life, in case of nonperformance of the covenant, extinguishes, cuts off, or prevents right of rescission in the grantor, in the event of failure of the grantee to perform the covenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 549, 549½; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 90*)—CONSTRUCTION—PURPOSE.

A deed should be so construed as to give effect to all of its parts and harmonize them, but functions and purposes, not expressed nor necessarily implied, should not be added after a reasonable and important function for every clause, which the parties may have had in contemplation, has been already perceived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 234-248; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 90*)—CONSTRUCTION—IMPLIED EFFECT OR PURPOSE.

Generally a provision, effect, or purpose is not read into an instrument as having been implied, unless necessity therefor is found in terms used, or purposes expressed, therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 234-248; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 100*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT—EXTRINSIC CIRCUMSTANCES.

The purpose and object of the parties to a deed or other contract, as shown by the instrument itself, read as a whole, at the time of its execution, in the light of the subject-matter, the situation of the parties, and the circumstances surrounding them, constitute the safest and best guide to their intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

5. EQUITY (§ 72*)—LACHES—PREJUDICE FROM DELAY.

Mere delay, for a long period of time, in asserting a cause of action, cognizable in equity only, working no injury or prejudice to the defendant in any way, bars relief only on the presumption of abandonment, which may be overthrown by proof of conduct showing the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 207-226; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 149*)— POWER TO SET ASIDE DEED.

The executor of the will of a deceased person may prosecute a suit to set aside, for failure of consideration, a deed conveying away land he is authorized by the will to sell.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

Brannon, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lewis County.

Bill by A. P. White, executor of the will of William J. Bailey, deceased, and another, against Bland Bailey and others. Decree for complainants, and Bland Bailey appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Brannon and A. B. & R. F. Fleming, for appellant. Linn & Bland and John Bassel, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Bland Bailey complains of a decree of the circuit court of Lewis county canceling and setting aside a deed by which his father, William J. Bailey, had conveyed to him a tract of 208 acres of land, upon a bill filed for the purpose by the executor of the will of said William J. Bailey and Broadus College, a beneficiary of a trust created by said will. The deed so set aside conveyed the land to the appellant, July 12, 1889, in consideration of $1 and a covenant, on the part of the grantee, "to remove to and occupy, use, and cultivate in a proper manner said tract of land, for the exclusive use and benefit of said Bland Bailey and is to support and maintain at his exclusive costs and charge, the said William J. Bailey, and his said wife during their joint lives, and the life of the survivor of them in sickness and in health, in a comfortable and careful manner in all respects, and on said land in the dwelling house of the said William J. Bailey, thereon, during the time to be occupied by the said William J. Bailey and wife with the said Bland Bailey and family." A lien for support and maintenance was expressly retained, and the following clause of re-entry inserted: "The right is reserved to said William J. Bailey to re-enter said land, and use and occupy the same during his life." The grantee, with his family, immediately moved into the dwelling house with the grantor and remained there about nine months, when, becoming dissatisfied, he went away and never returned, leaving the grantor in possession. About two years after the execution of the deed, June 18, 1891, William J. Bailey, having no other land, and assuming he had become re-invested, by the breach of the covenant to maintain and support him, with the title, legal or equitable, to the land so conveyed, or a right to acquire the same, executed another deed, purporting to convey to certain trustees for Broadus College, a corporation, an undivided half of the tract, and a will by which, after giving numerous legacies, he directed the executors therein named, Marcellus White and Perry (A. P.) White, to sell the residue of that and any other he might afterwards acquire and pay the legacies. Among the legacies there was one of $800 to Marcellus White and another of $400 to Perry White, given by the fourteenth and fifteenth items, respectively, subject to certain conditions, not material here. On the same day he executed a codicil, directing the payment of $3,000 out of his estate to Broadus College, in the event the deed executed to the trustees for its benefit should fail to pass title to the land, and gave this legacy precedence over all others except the two above mentioned. By another codicil, made the same day, he reduced Marcellus White's legacy to $600. He retained the control and management of the land until his death, some time in the year 1903. The bill seeks instruction and guidance of the court respecting the duties of the executor in the premises and a settlement of the estate.

Unless principles well settled, generally recognized, and often declared by this court are rendered inapplicable by the peculiar terms of the deed and the time and circumstances of the institution of the suit, the decree is manifestly right. This is frankly admitted. The principal contentions in the brief of counsel for the appellant are: (1) The provisions of the deed, reserving security for performance of the covenant and prescribing a remedy for breach thereof, precluded resort to any other; (2) relief is barred by laches. The others are merely argumentative, collateral, and subsidiary in character.

The main reliance for reversal is the re-entry clause. As, by the deed, the grantor conveyed the fee-simple title and then reserved a lien for support and a right to re-enter upon the land and "use and occupy the same during his life," it is said he was limited to these two methods of relief, since the parties contemplated possibility of failure and undertook to provide for it. In other words, it is contended that, by adding the words, "and use and occupy the same during his life," he limited the purpose of his re-entry and the scope and extent of his relief, in respect to title, to the recovery of a life estate. This view seems to rest upon the assumption of the existence of an ambiguity, calling for the application of a rule of construction requiring the terms of an ambiguous deed to be taken most strongly against the grantor. Resort is not had to this rule, unless ambiguity or uncertainty remain after all others have been vainly appealed to in an effort to ascertain the meaning of the instrument. 2 Kent, Comm. 556; 13 Cyc. 609; Chitty, Con. p. 137; Ham. Con. § 413. Nor will uncertainty or a doubt be unnecessarily introduced or raised. It must appear from the terms. When the terms are plain, and a reasonable function for all clauses or provisions, contained in the instrument, is clearly discernible, and no necessary friction, repugnancy, or inconsistency will result, and nothing in the purposes or objects contemplated require any further effect to be given to any clause, the instrument should have effect according to the plain meaning of the terms used. All authority opposes construction, or the reading in of matter not expressed, when it is not rendered necessary in some way or for some reason. United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, 2 L. Ed. 304; Jackson v. Lewis, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 475; Turnpike Co. v. People, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 161; Morgan v. Railroad Co., 96 U. S. 716, 24 L. Ed. 743. These cases involved the interpretation of statutes, but the same rule applies in the interpretation of contracts. Chitty, Con. 6, 113; Hammon, Con. pp. 811-813, § 412; Devlin, Deeds, § 836.

What function could the re-entry clause have been intended to perform? Its object was to enable the grantor to regain possession in case of necessity. That it was not intended as a full, complete, and exclusive remedy, in case of failure, is made apparent by the retention of a lien reaching beyond the supposed life estate to the fee. Many contingencies might arise. The grantee might die, leaving only a widow and children, wholly incapable of managing the farm so as to sustain themselves and to render the support stipulated for, or he might become an invalid, in consequence of which failure could occur under peculiar circumstances and from unavoidable causes, such as might make it desirable to forego the equitable right of rescission, provided the grantor could take control himself or substitute some person capable of perfecting the object both parties had in view. A general re-entry clause would have made it necessary, under such conditions, to wholly terminate the estate of the grantee or allow it to exist to the great disadvantage and embarrassment of the grantor. No right of re-entry at all would have made it still worse, as possession could not then have been rightfully regained, until after a decree of rescission, perhaps delayed by protracted litigation. The clause of re-entry may also have been intended to supplement the lien for support, since any attempt to enforce that might have met with resistance, causing delay. Thus it appears to be wholly unnecessary to say this clause was intended to cut off the equitable right of rescission, in case of nonperformance of the covenant, in order to find an important function for it to perform. Moreover, there is no express waiver of the right of rescission, nor, indeed, any reference to that right by any word used in the deed. It does not deal with that subject at all. It relates solely to the right of possession, as a means of realizing support and maintenance from the land, treating it as that of the grantee, in case the grantor should desire to do so. It creates a right under the contract, not a right against it, widely different in nature. With what does this clause, so read, conflict? Plainly not with any express words of the deed. It is inconsistent with nothing except a mere unnecessary, and therefore fanciful, implication, or rather theory as to intent, not a necessary implication, for the clause may perform important and highly beneficial functions, other than that of relinquishing right of rescission for adequate cause. If no purpose could be assigned to it other than that of barring right of rescission, an implication might be said to arise from necessity; presumption against intention to insert useless clauses being recognized and entertained by the courts.

One of the best and most potent indices of the intention of the parties to a deed or other contract is the purpose disclosed by it, considered as a whole in connection with its subject-matter and the situation and circumstances of the parties. The grantor, seised of a good farm, conceived the idea or purpose of conveying it in fee, in consideration of support and maintenance for himself and his wife. The grantee was a nephew, not a member of his immediate family. There are no words in the deed importing a gift. Tested by its terms, it conveys the land for a valuable consideration and nothing else. The consideration was entire, going to the whole estate conveyed. It is not to be presumed he intended the grantee to have either the fee-simple title or the remainder in fee, without rendering the consideration stipulated for. The construction contended for would have made the deed operate a gift pure and simple as to all except a life estate, and the grantee need never have performed his covenant. Thus he would have obtained by far the most valuable part of the estate without rendering anything for it. This conflicts with the purpose disclosed by the terms of the deed. It purports a sale of the entire subject, not a gift as to any of it. It bound the grantee to remove to and occupy, use, and cultivate the land and support and maintain the grantor and his wife on it in a comfortable and careful manner. Under this construction he need not have done so. He could have compelled the grantor to earn his own living on the land as he had previously done, looking only to him for damages for breach of the covenant, and relying upon the right to sell what had been his own land as security. If unable to earn his living and compelled to sell the land, he might then have been under the necessity of selling his own roof from over his head. Plainly no such results were ever contemplated by either party.

It is difficult to perceive any distinction between the effect of this clause and that of the clause reserving a lien for support and maintenance, upon the right of rescission. If one is exclusive of that right, why is not the other? The reservation of the lien contemplates possible failure of the grantee to render the support stipulated for, constituting the consideration. It affords a means of relief or remedy on the happening of such a contingency. Its incorporation in the deed shows that it was foreseen by the parties. What more can be said of any other clause, giving a right to re-enter and hold the land during the lifetime of the grantor? We have two decisions, setting aside deeds, conveying land in consideration of a covenant for support, and containing clauses of forfeiture for failure of performance. Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 46 W. Va. 428, 83 S. E. 266, and Fluharty v. Fluharty, 54 W. Va. 407, 46 S. E. 199. Equity never enforces a forfeiture, and did not do so in those cases. It rescinded the contracts, set them aside wholly, for failure of consideration. The argument used here would have denied equity jurisdiction there and remitted the plaintiffs to actions at law for recovery of the possession under the forfeiture clauses. Those cases are express authority for the position that the insertion of a forfeiture clause does not preclude right of rescission on the theory of substitution, prescription of an exclusive remedy, or otherwise. These decisions say, in effect, that a mere surmise or conjecture as to intent will not be read into a deed. Necessity in some sense is a prerequisite. It is the ground upon which every implication arises.

The doctrine of laches cannot be invoked. The appellant was not in any sense prejudiced by the delay, and the intent of the grantor not to abandon his right of rescission is placed beyond possibility of doubt. He retained possession until the time of his death. Two years after the deed was made, he endeavored to dispose of the property to other parties by deed and will. Mere delay for a long period of time, standing alone, does no more than raise a presumption of intent to abandon the cause of action, if it be one of exclusive equity jurisdiction. Depue v. Miller (decided at the present term) 64 S. E. 740; Hale v. Hale, 62 W. Va. 609, 59 S. E. 1056, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221; Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469; Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594; Kerr on Fraud & Mistake, 305; Pickering v. Stamford, 2 Ves. Jr. 593; Railway Co. v. Gregg, 101 Va. 308, 43 S. E. 570; Bell v. Wood, 94 Va. 677, 27 S. E. 504. Even long periods of delay do not bar, if the intent to abandon is negated by conduct of the party showing the contrary. Berry v. Weldeman, 40 W. Va. 36, 20 S. E. 817, 52 Am. St. Rep. 866; Jameson v. Rixey, 94 Va. 342, 26 S. E. 861, 64 Am. St. Rep. 726; Roberts v. King, 10 Grat. (Va.) 184.

The only other question deemed worthy of consideration is whether any person other than the grantor can prosecute this right of rescission. If the plaintiff were a mere assignee of the cause of action, his right to sue would be gravely doubtful; but he is the representative of the estate to which it belongs and sues as such. Hence there is no shadow of maintenance and champerty, forbidding entry to courts of equity in so many cases, reported in the books. Nor is the cause of action one that dies with the person. Fluharty v. Fluharty, cited; Booth v. Fuller, 35 App. Div. 117, 54 N. Y. Supp. 670; Kent v. Davis, 89 Ga. 151, 15 S. E. 457; Hensley v. Hensley (Ky.) 30 S. W. 613.

Seeing no error in the decree, we affirm it, with costs and damages.

Affirmed.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). I am decidedly averse to the decision in this case. I go upon the letter of the deed, the contract between the parties. The deed is an absolute grant of the fee. Its consideration, its vital purpose on the grantor's part, was support of himself and wife. To secure this he chose his own remedies in case of the grantee's default to give such support. He chose two remedies, one a lien, the other a right to re-enter and hold for his life; in other words, reserved a life estate on the contingency of failure to support. His only object being support, he did not reserve right to re-enter absolutely and hold the fee, but only for his life, for that was all he asked. He did not desire to take back the fee, but only a life estate. He desired, in case of default, to choose one or the other remedy. He might not want the land, but money for support, and therefore he reserved a lien, which would hold the land liable in a court of equity for money support. On the other hand, he might prefer to hold the use of the land for life, and therefore he reserved a life estate. These remedies were regarded efficient, and as far as he went. He took no note of the fee after his death. Now, the decree takes back, not a life estate, but the fee. For what purpose? To support the grantor and wife? Not at all. They are dead. The grantors only reserved support. It cannot be rendered now, unless we can give bread to the dead. That was the grantor's sole purpose. It cannot be accomplished. The fee goes, not for Bailey's support, but to others. Were it not that the parties fixed their own remedies, I would not hold the opinion which I do hold. Bailey did not sue to enforce the lien. He did not sue to cancel in life. This court gives a remedy taking back the fee; whereas, the grantor stipulated that he could take back only a life estate. That would be sufficient for support, as he considered. I repeat that grantor Bailey inserted a clause of forfeiture for an estate for his life only, and the court gives him a clause of forfeiture forever. He reserved a life estate only, and he could not vest in Broadbush College a fee by a later deed. In Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, was a deed in consideration of support, and the court held that equity would cancel it for default, giving as its reason that there was no clause of re-entry, indicating that, where there is such clause, that is the remedy, and that must govern.

As I have stated, the deed passed to Bland Bailey an absolute fee. There was left in William J. Bailey nothing but the right to re-enter to execute the condition. Failure to support was a condition of forfeiture. Could a grantee of Bailey take the right to enforce this forfeiture? In Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 22 L. Ed. 551, an act of Congress enacted that certain lands unsold after 10 years should revert to the government if the railroad should not be then completed. The court said that such provision was "no more than a provision that the grant should be void if a condition subsequent be not performed. In Sheppard's Touchstone it is said: 'If the words in the close or conclusion of a condition be thus, that the land shall return to the enfeoffor, etc., or that he shall take it again and turn it to his own profit, or that the land shall revert, or that the feoffor shall reciper the land, these are, either of them, good words in a condition to give a re-entry—as good as the word "re-enter"—and by these words the estate will be made conditional.' * * * And it is settled law that no one can take advantage of the nonperformance of a condition subsequent annexed to an estate in fee, but the grantor or his heirs, or the successors of the grantor, if the grant proceed from an artificial person; and, if they do not see fit to assert their rights to enforce a forfeiture on that ground, the title remains unimpaired in the grantee. The authorities on this point, with hardly an exception, are all one way from the Year Books down." We find in Tiedeman on Real Property, § 207, this: "Conditions are reserved only to the grantor and his heirs. They cannot be reserved for the benefit of third persons. As a general rule therefore only the grantor and his heirs have a right to enter upon condition broken, and they lose their right if they should convey away the reversion in them. The right of entry is not an estate, not even a possibility of reverter; it is simply a chose in action. And although it has been held that an express condition can be devised with the reversion, and the devisee and his heirs enter for the breach, yet such a condition cannot be aliened or assigned, and does not pass with a grant of the reversion." Hopper v. Cummings, 45 Me. 359, holds: "At common law none but the grantor, his heirs and legal representatives, can take advantage of a breach of condition subsequent. When a condition is annexed to a particular estate, and afterwards by another deed the reversion is granted by the maker of the condition, the condition is gone." In Nicoll v. Railroad, 12 N. Y. 121, it is held that "right of entry is not a reversion or an estate in land, and it will not pass by assignment or by a conveyance of the premises held subject to the condition. Accordingly, where the grantor of premises on condition subsequent afterwards conveyed the same to a third person, and there was subsequently a breach, held, that the latter could not divest the title of the grantee on condition." In Southard v. Railroad Co., 28 N. J. Law, 21, we find it held that a contingent estate or a right for a condition broken was not devisable at common law, and the condition of a deed could only be taken advantage of by a party to it or privies in right and representation, as the heirs of natural persons or the successors of artificial persons. The opinion says: "It is a rule of the common law that none may take advantage of a condition in deed but parties and privies in right and representation, as the heirs of natural persons and the successors of politic persons; and that neither privies nor assignees in law, as lords by escheat, nor in deeds, as grantees of reversions, nor privies in estate, as he to whom the remainder is limited, shall take benefit of entry or re-entry by force of a condition. Shep. Touch. 149; Co. Lit. 214a; Lit. § 347; Doct. & Student, 161, c. 20; Perkins, § 830; 4 Kent, 127; 2 Crulise, Dig. c. 2, § 49." In Avelain v. Ward, 1 Vesey, Sr., 422, it is held that: "If there is a devise to a stranger, not the heir at law, upon a condition subsequent, the devisee cannot take advantage of the breach, for the benefit thereof is not devisable, but must go in privy to the heir at law of the grantor, who must enter for the breach, not the devisee." 2 Washburn on Real Property, § 954, says: "But of conditions in deed no one but he who creates the estate or his heirs, as for instance the heirs of the deviser, or, in case of a devise of the contingent right, such devisee or his heirs, can take advantage by entering and defeating the estate. It is a right which cannot be aliened or assigned or passed by a grant of the reversion at common law." As to the right of the devisee to enforce a condition, the bulk of the common law is against it, and Tiedeman, R. Prop., in note to section 207, p. 279, says that that rule is local in Massachusetts. Why not? A grantee in a deed cannot enforce the condition, and a devisee takes, not by descent, but by purchase, and is a purchaser just as a grantee unless he is heir, and then he takes, not by devise, but by descent. Therefore the Broadus College trustees could not enforce that condition, nor could Bailey's executors, for the will gave the executors a naked power, not coupled with title or interest, as the will only gave them power to sell, invested them with no estate. Having no right to enforce this condition, strangers to it, the trustees and executors, cannot rescind in equity. Bailey did not grant the trustees' right to sue for rescission, nor did his will grant it to his executors.

Some days after writing the above, I concluded to make further examination, and I have made it, with the result that I am more decided in my dissent than I was then, and I will supplement the above with some other authorities. I would recall to mind that William J. Bailey's deed to Bland Bailey passed from William J. Bailey a fee, every vestige or morsel of title, and vested the same in Bland Bailey forever, unless William J. Bailey had revested himself with title, and that could be done only by re-entry, or the enforcement of the lien and purchase of the land by William J. Bailey. No suit to enforce the lien was brought. No re-entry was made. Therefore William J. Bailey had no estate in him when he made the deed to the trustees of Broadus College or when he made his will. The books teem with the doctrine that, where title has passed with condition subsequent defeating the estate for its breach by re-entry, there must be re-entry to re-vest the estate in the grantor. In 1854 the case of Nicoll v. Railroad, 12 N. Y. 121, was fully considered, and it was held that: "A mere failure to perform such a condition does not divest the title. There must be an entry, or what is equivalent thereto by the statute, by the grantor or his heirs, for a breach of the condition to forfeit the estate. This right of entry is not a reversion or an estate in land, and it will not pass by assignment or by a conveyance of the premises held subject to the condition." In 1896 the New York court had this subject again under full consideration in Uppington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 45 N. E. 359, 37 L. R. A. 794, and it reiterated this doctrine. It was there said that no action could be maintained by the assignee to recover the land whether the breach was before or after the assignment, and no one but the grantor or his heirs could take advantage of the forfeiture. That re-entry is required to re-vest, I add the following authorities: Bowen v. Bowen, 18 Conn. 535; Board v. Trustees, 63 Ill. 204; Tallman v. Snow, 35 Me. 342; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 97 Mass. 188, 93 Am. Dec. 75; Morris v. Hoyt, 11 Mich. 9; Adams v. Lindell, 72 Mo. 198; Rollins v. Riley, 44 N. H. 9; Vall v. Railroad Co., 106 N. Y. 233, 12 N. E. 607, 60 Am. Rep. 449; Phelps v. Chesson, 34 N. C. 194; Kibler v. Luther, 18 S. C. 606. Ohio Iron Co. v. Auburn Iron Co., 64 Minn. 404, 67 N. W. 221, holds that: "The right of re-entry cannot exist as an independent condition, but only as an incident to an estate or interest for the protection of which it is reserved. The right of re-entry is not an estate or interest in land, nor does it imply the reservation of a reversion, and when enforced the grantor is in through the breach of the condition, and not by reverter." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 693, 24 L. Ed. 1101, citing a host of authorities, held that breach of a condition subsequent, not followed by limitation over to a third person, does not ipso facto work forfeiture. It only vests in the grantor or his heirs a right of action which cannot be transferred to a stranger, which they cannot without actual entry enforce by suit for the land. We find in 5 Ballard on Real Property, note to section 270, that right of re-entry for breach of condition subsequent "is a mere right in action, not an interest in land; that it is not assignable nor grantable; that it descends to the grantor's heirs, but does not pass by a conveyance."

It may be suggested that these principles of common law everywhere held have been changed by section 5, c. 71, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 3024), providing that: "Any interest in or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will." That statute cannot apply, because it requires some estate or actual interest for the foundation of a claim to come under that statute. It was suggested to the New York court in Nicoll v. Railroad, 12 N. Y. 121, and Uppington v. Corrigan, 151 N. Y. 143, 45 N. E. 359, 37 L. R. A. 794, that its statutes of wills read "every estate and interest in real property descendible to heirs may be devised," and another statute said that "expectant estates are descendible, devisable and alienable in the same manner as estates in possession"; but the court said that these statutes did not change the common-law rule in this matter. The court said that the words "expectant estates" "include every present right and interest, either vested or contingent, which may by possibility vest at a future day, yet they do not include the mere possibility of a reverter, which the grantor has after he has conveyed in fee on condition subsequent. He has no present right or interest whatever, and no more control over it than a son has in the estate of his father who is living." The court denied in those two cases that these New York statutes, though very broad, applied to such a case as this. If this statute could be held to change this organic principle of estates, held through the centuries, why did not that most reliable and eminent Virginia author, Prof. Minor, realize it when he laid down in 2 Minor's Institutes, 229, the following statement of the law: "The mere occurrence of the event which constitutes the condition does not at common law, of itself, defeat the estate, supposing it to be a freehold, because, as a freehold can at common law only be created by the notoriety of livery of seisin, there is needed a corresponding notoriety in order to determine it. This corresponding notoriety is the re-entry of the grantor, or his heirs, supposing the grant to be a private one." Our statute (Code 1899, c. 93, § 1 [Code 1906, § 3394]), giving the grantee of any land let to lease or the reversion the same right against the lessee by action for entry upon any covenant or promise of the lease, has no application. That is between landlord and tenant. There is no lease here. There is no reversion. Nor does section 16 have anything to do with this case. It recognizes, as common law, the rule above stated requiring actual re-entry, and changes that by dispensing with re-entry, but only by an action of ejectment. It gives no chancery jurisdiction.

But do the principles laid down show that a suit in equity for cancellation of the deed from Bailey to Bailey cannot be maintained? They do, because they show that William J. Bailey had no estate or present interest in the land. It had all gone out of him, and he could not therefore pass any interest or estate to the trustees of Broadbudd College or to his executors. Section 16, c. 93 (Code 1906, § 3409), will not help them to maintain ejectment, because to do so they must have "the right of re-entry," and we have seen that that is not conveyable or assignable, and the trustees and executors did not have a right of re-entry so as to maintain ejectment under section 16. This section does not give, create, right or title. It only gives ejectment to one who already has right on which to enter. It would give Bailey action, without entry, but not his grantees. William J. Bailey did not confer upon them by word or otherwise right to sue for cancellation. Now I ask how can a suit for cancellation, or any other legal proceeding, rest upon nothing, no title, no right? How can the plaintiffs maintain any suit whatever, having no right recognized in law? How can a suit stand upon a nonentity?

I have above discussed the case on the theory that the grantor Bailey made no entry under the forfeiture clause, but that theory does not likely apply. He made what in law is re-entry. He was on the land when grantee Bailey left it. The latter yielded the possession to grantor Bailey. It was matter of agreement between them. The grantee Bailey agreed to and thus waived formal re-entry. The grantor Bailey remained in possession, and assumed authority over the land, leased it, had it cropped. Even if grantee Bailey had not consented, grantor Bailey being in sole possession when grantee Bailey quit possession, this in law was the equivalent of formal re-entry. Being in possession already, he could not enter upon himself. We cited authority in Guffey v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 56, 11 S. E. 754, 8 L. R. A. 759, 26 Am. St. Rep. 901, for the proposition that "No man can enter upon himself." 2 Washburn on Real Prop. 957, says: "If the grantor is himself in possession when the breach happens, the estate reverts in him at once without any formal act on his part, and he will be presumed, after the breach, to hold for the purpose of enforcing the forfeiture, unless he waive the breach." Therefore we must treat William J. Bailey as having himself re-entered for breach of condition, and thus reinvested himself with an estate. But what estate was he invested with by such entry? With a life estate by the letter of the deed, not with a fee. Having exercised this right of re-entry, he used the remedy given by the deed. He did this himself, and he could not have that remedy and also rescission in equity. Having himself used this remedy, that was the extent of his remedy under the letter of the deed, and he could not convey any other remedy, by rescission or otherwise, to Broadbudd College or others. The only estate he had by such entry was a life estate, and he could confer no greater. "The right to re-enter * * * means the recovery of possession in one way only." Michaels v. Fishel, 169 N. Y. 881, 62 N. E. 425. There it is said that, when parties have used the word "re-enter," it is presumed they used it in the common-law sense. Note 7, 24 A. & E. E. L. 216. It was held in that case that the statute remedy by summary proceedings could not be resorted to. I here repeat that under the cases of Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, and Guffey v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 11 S. E. 754, 8 L. R. A. 759, 26 Am. St. Rep. 901, where a deed has a clause of re-entry, that is the remedy, and there is not the superadded remedy of rescission, especially where the re-entry is by deed only for a life estate. The decision gives a fee; whereas, re-entry by the letter of the deed gives only a life estate.

Thus whether we say that Bailey did not re-enter, or did re-enter, we reach the same conclusion; that is, that the plaintiffs have no right to maintain their suit.

STATE v. VERTO et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 4, 1909. On Rehearing, June 10, 1909.)

1. RAPE (§ 40*)—GENERAL REPUTATION—EVIDENCE.

Upon a trial for rape, a defendant is allowed to prove that the general reputation of the prosecutrix, before the act, was bad as to chastity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 834*)—INSTRUCTION.

A prisoner on trial has right to have given an instruction presenting to the jury specifically his theory or claim of defense, under the evidence, in his own language, if in law the instruction is sound.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2014; Dec. Dig. § 834.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Marion County.

Mike Verto and Sam Bruzzino were indicted for crime, and Verto and Bruzzino were convicted, and Verto brings error. Reversed.

Harry Shaw, for plaintiff in error. Wm. G. Conley, for the State.

BRANNON, J. In the circuit court of Marion county, Mike Verto, Paul Oliverio,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes and Sam Bruzzino were indicted for rape upon Zana Mike. Oliverio escaped, and Ver-to and Bruzzino were convicted by a jury and sentenced to the penitentiary for 12 years.
64 S.E.—65

On the trial the court refused the defendants' instruction No. 4 that if the jury believed from all the evidence that the defendants did not touch or interfere with the person of Zana Mike, when the rape was alleged to have been committed, but went to the place for the purpose of inducing Paul Oliverio to leave her alone and go to his home, then the defendants were guilty of no offense. There was evidence going to show that Oliverio was raping the woman, and that the defendants went to the spot to make him desist, and did not assault the woman or aid and abet. Whether this evidence was credible or not we do not say; but it was in the case. Why this instruction was objected to or refused, no member of this court can see. While I think the instruction ought to have been given, I would hesitate to reverse on it alone, because I think any jury would acquit if its supposed facts were proven, without any instruction, and also because instructions given by the court told the jury that to convict they must find beyond reasonable doubt that the prisoners committed the act by force and against the will of Zana Mike, or aided and abetted the act. The defendants' claim was that only Oliverio ravished the woman, and that they, seeing him assault the woman, went to her relief, and they had a right to have this claim put before the jury in a direct, distinct instruction, in their own language, as a definite legal proposition.

The defense sought to show by a witness, Guarascio that the general reputation of Zana Mike as to chastity and virtue was bad. Whilst the witness did not show knowledge of general reputation, but said he heard the boarders talk about her, when the question was put, "What is this woman's reputation in that respect, good or bad?" the court said, "The court will exclude that question, because not a material inquiry in this kind of a case." Why not? It is settled that, in prosecutions for rape, the unchastity of the prosecutrix may be shown. 10 Encyc. of Evl. 602; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 870; Elliott on Evl. § 3101. Another witness, Guzzo, was asked as to her reputation as to chastity and the court allowed him to answer that it was bad, saying that it was admitted for the purpose of showing the probability of consent. This remark, which was correct, was inconsistent with the remark above quoted. Which ruling of the court would the jury follow? Was the matter not thus left in uncertainty? What would the jury think as to the opinion of the court as to the effect of such character evidence? The remark above quoted, that evidence of reputation was not pertinent in such a case, would weaken the effect of the evidence of Guzzo that was admitted. After Guzzo was allowed to say that he was acquainted with the reputation of the prosecutrix, and that it was bad, he was asked whether he had heard her reputation was bad before the alleged rape, and the court would not allow the question to be answered. We understand the law to be that it is allowable to prove such reputation only before the act, not after it. The defense sought to prove bad repute before the alleged rape so as to bring it within the law. 4 Elliott on Evl. § 3101.

I see no objection to instruction No. 5, telling the jury that, even if Oliverio did rape Zana Mike, they must find the defendants not guilty, unless the jury should believe beyond all reasonable doubt that defendants also had sexual intercourse with her, or aided and assisted Oliverio in having such connection with her. I do not know that I would reverse for refusal of this instruction, in view of instructions given practically covering the same ground. It may want the words "or were present for that purpose," as its close, though presence for such purpose would be aiding and abetting, and I hardly think these words essential. The contention of the defense was that Oliverio did the act, and they were present only to make him desist, and they did not touch her. I cannot see why they were not entitled to an instruction directed to the distinct point that, though Oliverio did the act, they would not be guilty unless they had intercourse, or were present aiding and abetting Oliverio. The instructions given did not cover just this point specifically, but only generally. A party has a right to an instruction in his own language.

We do not think there is error in refusing a view. It is a matter in the discretion of the court, and we see no such necessity for a view. Gunn v. Railroad Co., 36 W. Va. 165, 14 S. E. 465, 32 Am. St. Rep. 842.

It will be understood that this court intimates no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendants. That is for the jury and court upon another trial. We see no error in other respects than those specified.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial granted.

On Rehearing.

Since writing the above opinion and its adoption by the court, my attention has been called to that feature of it holding it error to reject evidence of the woman's reputation prior to the crime charged. I refer to the evidence of Guzzo. A fuller statement as to his evidence is this, which I make to fairly present the ruling of the circuit court. Guzzo was asked whether he was acquainted with the woman's reputation "for chastity and virtue at the time of the trouble on the 1st day of March and before," and, having answered that he was, he was then asked ed whether it was good or bad. The state objected. The court said: "This portion of the testimony can only go for the purpose of showing whether or not she consented." The answer was that the witness had heard it was bad. Next followed the question whether such reputation was bad "before this trouble on the 1st day of March." The court refused to allow the question to be answered. Now, it is suggested that the first answer covered the time before the trouble, and it was useless to allow the witness to repeat by answering the pointed question whether he was acquainted with the woman's reputation before the trouble; but the trouble is that the answer to the first question covered the time at and before the trouble, and the refusal to allow the second question to be answered would logically induce the jury to think that reputation before the trouble was not admissible, whereas, it was only admissible to prove the reputation before the trouble. I repeat that, under these circumstances, the jury might infer that the opinion of the court was that reputation prior to the trouble was not admissible or to be considered by the jury. If we cannot say that the jury might so infer, still would it not leave it a matter of uncertainty as to the ruling of the court upon the admissibility of evidence of reputation before the trouble? Under the evidence which I have not detailed, that was a proper matter for the consideration of the jury, and we can say either that evidence of reputation before the crime alleged was rejected, or its competency left in doubt before the jury.

MCGRAW OIL & GAS CO. et al. v. KENNEDY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 27, 1909. Rehearing Denied
June 12, 1909.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*)—LEASES—FORFEITURE.

A lease for oil and gas is for five years, "and as long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced by the party of the second part." The lessor cannot forfeit it because he thinks the gas not in paying quantity; the lessee claiming that it is, and willing to pay the sum stipulated for the well. It is for the lessee to say whether the gas is in paying quantity, acting in good faith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*) — LEASES — FORFEITURE—FAILURE TO MARKET GAS.

When a producing gas well is developed, but its product not marketed, that fact does not authorize the lessor to forfeit the lease; the lessee being willing to pay the agreed sum for a gas well.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*) — LEASES — FORFEITURE—FAILURE TO DRILL ADDITIONAL WELLS.

An oil and gas lease cannot be canceled in equity only for failure to drill additional wells.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

4. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*) — LEASES — ESTATES CREATED.

Under the lease in this case, a well producing gas is drilled, and the lessee elects to consider it in paying quantity. An estate has thus vested in him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Taylor County.

The McGraw Oil & Gas Company filed a bill against R. W. Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company, and thereafter Kennedy and the ice company filed a bill against the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, the South Penn Oil Company, and another. The cases were heard together and from the decree the Crystal Ice Company, Kennedy, and the South Penn Oil Company appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Davis & Davis, A. B. Fleming, Chas. Powell, Kemble White, and B. F. Bailey, for appellants. Dent & Dent, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Hugh Evans, on September 20, 1899, leased a tract of 523 acres of land in Taylor county to U. S. Dittman and J. C. Gawthrop for production of oil and gas. The lease provided that Evans have free of charge gas for use in his residence; the lease to continue for the term of five years "and so long thereafter as oil or gas, or either of them, is produced therefrom by the party of the second part, heirs, executors, administrators or assigns." The lease deed provided that the lessee deliver into pipe line to the credit of Evans one eighth of oil produced and pay $200 yearly for "each gas well the product from which is marketed and used off the premises." The lease provided that the lessees drill a well within twelve months or pay thereafter $132 quarterly until one should be drilled. No well having been drilled within 12 months, the sum of $132 was paid Evans, extending the lease to December 20, 1900. Before the 20th of December the Southern Oil Company, under some agreement with Dittman and Gawthrop, drilled a well and produced gas in December, 1900. The casing was drawn from the well, and the well prepared for use by the insertion of a wall-packer and 1,400 feet of tubing, and a cap at the top, with a gate through which the gas could be removed. This was done to save all gas. Tests of the gas produced in the well were made at various times; the tests varying in quantity from 331,700 to 1,140,500 cubic feet. No gas from the well was marketed; but it was closed so as to save the gas from waste. The Southern Oil Company sold its interest in the well to the South Penn Oil Company, and then Dittman and Gawthrop assigned the lease to the South Penn Oil Company. Later the South Penn Company assigned the estate in the gas to the Hope Natural Gas Company, reserving the estate in the oil. Later the Hope Natural Gas Company assigned the gas right to R. W. Kennedy to hold in trust for the Crystal Ice Company, a corporation engaged in manufacturing ice in the city of Grafton. The well was bought to give fuel to this and other plants, and a franchise from Taylor county and Grafton to lay pipes from the well to the plant was obtained by the ice company. This was under the authority of the directors of the ice company, and the purchase money was paid out of its treasury. The well was in "wild cat territory." There was no pipe line near it. When the well was drilled, Evans, the lessor, piped gas from it to his residence, and has ever since used the gas for his domestic purposes. He received $132 for failure to drill the first year, and after the well was drilled he received seven payments of $200 each, the annual payments stipulated for each gas well. He was tendered the $200 for the year ending December 20, 1907, but refused to receive it. On March 20, 1907, Evans leased the same tract to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company. The latter company had full notice of the first lease, when it leased, and notice was served on it by Kennedy of his claim of title, and warning the McGraw Oil & Gas Company and John T. McGraw not to go on the premises, and warning them that, if they should produce oil or gas on the land, Kennedy would claim for the same. Notwithstanding this notice, the McGraw Company entered and drilled a well producing gas. The McGraw Company brought a chancery suit against Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company to declare the lease made by Evans to Dittman and Gawthrop forfeited and cancel it as a cloud upon its title under the second lease. Later Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company brought a chancery suit against the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, the South Penn Company, and Evans, setting up the first lease, that from Evans to Dittman and Gawthrop, claiming under it title paramount to that conferred by the second lease, that from Evans to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, and to cancel the latter lease as a cloud upon the title conferred by the first lease, and to make the McGraw Company responsible for gas taken from the premises. The South Penn Company filed in the case of the Crystal Ice Company an answer, containing also cross-bill matter against the McGraw Company, Evans, and others, seeking to have declared void as to the first lease the lease from Evans to the McGraw Company. The cases were heard together, and a decree was pronounced, sustaining a demurrer to the cross-bill of the South Penn Company, and dismissing the bill filed by Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company, and canceling the right of Kennedy and the Crystal Ice Company, and enjoining them from asserting any right against the McGraw Company and from doing anything to interfere with or prevent the McGraw Company from developing and using the land for gas. The Crystal Ice Company, Kennedy, and the South Penn Oil Company appeal.

It cannot be said that the first lease is forfeited by any express forfeiture clause found in it. The theory of the McGraw Company is that such a lease confers no vested estate in oil or gas in the earth, but at most confers only a right to search for oil and gas, and that only when oil or gas shall be found in paying quantity and marketed does any estate vest in the lessee, and that no estate ever vested under the first lease, because the gas found was not in paying quantity. This lease does not limit its term by requiring that oil or gas shall be found in paying quantity, as leases usually do. It says that the lease shall endure "five years from this date and as long thereafter as oil and gas, or either of them, is produced therefrom by the party of the second part." So this lease contains nothing in terms allowing the lessor to end it because oil or gas is not found in paying quantity; and, if there were such provision, I should regard it as made in the interest of the lessee to protect him from payment of the annual sum for a gas well, if insufficient in quantity, and not as intended to give the lessor right to terminate the lease against the lessee's will, he treating the quantity as sufficient and electing to pay. What right has Evans to say that no estate vested by reason of insufficiency of gas, when the lease makes no such provision, and the lessee chooses to regard it as sufficient and pay as if it were? And again it has been held, even when such a clause is in the lease, that it is with the lessee to say whether the product is in paying quantity. Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co., 53 W. Va. 501, 44 S. E. 433, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027; Thornton, Petroleum & Gas, § 119. So held in Summerville v. Apollo Gas Co., 207 Pa. 334, 56 Atl. 876, and by Judge Goff in Kellar v. Craig, 126 Fed. 630, 61 C. C. A. 366; Young v. Oil Co., 194 Pa. 243, 45 Atl. 121, is notable for this construction of such a clause. It says that the operator has election to say whether it will pay. It is useless to argue that a lease does not vest right to oil and gas in place, and therefore no right vests of any character, if the quantity is too small to pay. No one says that the lease carries title to these minerals, even after a paying well has revealed them; but an estate, a right of value then vests, that is, right to retain possession of the land for operation and to go on to sever the minerals from the land and convert them into personalty. When this well was found, the lessee had right, if he chose, to keep possession and pay the annual rental. He had a vested right. Evans was only entitled to the rental. Title vested. He gets the same pay as if the well produced a larger quantity. There is really no evidence that it was not a paying well. The cross-bill alleges that it was, and this is to be taken as true on demurrer. Evans for seven years so treated it, for he received seven annuals of $200, knowing that the gas was not being marketed, knowing the status of the well. Though the gas was not marketed, the well was being used to comply with the lessee's covenant to furnish Evans gas for his use. The law is that "the right to declare a forfeiture must be distinctly reserved, proof of the happening of the event, on which the right is to be exercised must be clear, and the party entitled to do so must exercise his right promptly." Thompson v. Christie, 138 Pa. 230, 20 Atl. 934, 11 L. E. A. 236. Will equity allow Evans to wait and wait, drawing large sums of money yearly, and then at the eleventh hour suddenly forfeit? Is he not estopped? Such acceptance of money by Evans, knowing all the facts, is forcible against him as an estoppel in a court of equity. Hukill v. Myers, 36 W. Va. 639, 15 S. E. 151. As to the suit by the McGraw Company, it is virtually, really, a suit in equity to enforce a forfeiture. Equity will not take affirmative, active steps to enforce a forfeiture. Pheasant v. Hanna, 63 W. Va. 613, 60 S. E. 618, where the subject is discussed by Judge Poffenbarger. So held in Pyle v. Henderson, 64 W. Va. —, 63 S. E. 762. That clause in the lease by which the lessees were to pay $200 yearly for each gas well "the product from which is marketed and used off the premises" was designed to protect the lessee from demand unless he marketed the gas. It is not a stipulation to market or give up. That is for the lessee's protection, and that has been waived and royalty paid. Moreover, there is evidence going to show that the gas was, in fact, in paying quantity.

Title having vested, the lease contains no clause that forfeits it. It is argued not definitely, but virtually, that failure to drill other wells forfeits. We have frequently held that, where there is no express provision requiring additional wells, but only an implied one, this will not forfeit. Core v. Petroleum Co., 52 W. Va. 276, 43 S. E. 128; Kellar v. Craig, 126 Fed. 630, 61 C. C. A. 366. I have never been reconciled to the doctrine that for failure to drill additional wells the lessor must sue at law for damages, and equity will not cancel unless for draining from nearby territory, and thus exhaust oil in the leasehold involved. I have asked: How many actions must the landlord bring? How can damages be measured? How can we see into the depth of the earth? But it has been so held. The reason is that equity will not, as a rule, enforce a forfeiture of an estate. It will not especially insert such a clause when the parties have not inserted it, especially when they did insert forfeiture for failure to drill or pay commutation, but did not insert forfeiture for failure to drill additional wells. As to duty to drill additional wells for gas, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has held, practically, that it does not exist in gas as in case of oil, because of the difference. A small oil well can be used; a gas well of slight pressure will not enter the gas line. McKnight v. Manufacturers' Gas Co., 146 Pa. 185, 23 Atl. 164, 28 Am. St. Rep. 790. That was for both oil and gas, but development seemed to show the section to be gas territory, as in this case; but we express no opinion as to this. We only say there can be no forfeiture for mere failure to drill more wells.

It is argued that failure to market the gas forfeits the lease. So it was claimed in Summerville v. Apollo Gas Co., 207 Pa. 334, 56 Atl. 876, as to a lease for two years "and as much longer as oil and gas are found in paying quantities," and the court said that the lessor had no right to forfeit at the end of two years because during that time no oil or gas had been marketed. "It may be that for some time the lessee was not able to find a purchaser for the gas, but that was not the affair of the lessors. They were not interested in the proceeds of the sale of the gas. Their rights under the agreement extended only to the receipt of a stipulated annual rental for each well, and the free use of gas for domestic purposes. Beyond this the question of whether or not the quantity of gas was profitable was for the decision of the lessee. It may be that the final disposition of the product of the well was such as to amply remunerate it for the delay in finding a market." There is no evidence that the well was not in paying volume.

It is claimed that the well and lease have been abandoned. As said in Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co., 53 W. Va. 506, 44 S. E. 434, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027: "The loss of property by abandonment is not easily shown nor readily held by the courts." "To constitute abandonment by the lessee of a lease for oil, there must be both an intention to abandon, and actual relinquishment of the leased premises." Sult v. Hochstetter, 63 W. Va. 317, 61 S. E. 307, says the tenant must quit and the landlord take possession to work abandonment. Abandonment is not only not established, but plainly negated, in this case. The lessees paid, and Evans received, for seven years the rental money for the well. The lessees tendered for the year 1907. The leasehold was assessed with taxes to Kennedy. The lessee put in the well 1,500 feet of tubing, wall-packer, and casing head. The lease was at different times conveyed from one to another as an existing lease. The Grafton Ice Company in December, 1904, paid $1,000 for the lease, and made preparation to pipe the gas from the well to Grafton to its ice manufactory. They have cared for the well, blown and tested it, and never been out of possession; nor has Evans ever tried to expel that company from his premises.

He says he never hindered it from going on the premises to attend to the well, and that "they always had that right."

Therefore we reverse the decree, and dismiss the bill filed by the McGraw Company, and we decree that the lease in the record specified dated the 20th day of March, 1907, from Hugh Evans and wife to the McGraw Oil & Gas Company, be canceled, annulled, and set aside as to the rights of the Crystal Ice Company, Robert M. Kennedy, the South Penn Oil Company, and all other parties having rights derived under and by virtue of the lease in the record specified, dated the 20th day of September, 1899, made by Hugh Evans and wife to U. S. Ditman and J. C. Gawthrop; and this cause is remanded to the circuit court of Taylor county for further proceedings.

EDWARDS MFG. CO. v. CARR et ux.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 11, 1909. Rehearing Denied
June 12, 1909.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 277*)—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE.

The statute, enabling a married woman to carry on business in her own name, freeing her separate property from the control of the husband and liability for his debts, and making her earnings separate estate, does not destroy the presumption, in favor of the husband's creditors, that his conveyance of property to her was voluntary, nor relieve her from the burden of clearly proving payment of a fair and adequate price therefor, with money procured from some one other than her husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 814; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 265*)—ADMISSIONS—WEIGHT.
Though an admission, accompanied by explanatory or exculpatory matter, cannot be introduced as evidence without the explanation, if objected to, the weight to which each is entitled, after introduction, is a matter wholly within the determination of the court or jury trying the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1041; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 299*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Expenditure of money by a husband in improving his wife's property having been admitted, in a suit by his creditors to charge her property with his debts to the extent of such expenditure, the mere uncorroborated oral testimony of the husband and wife is not sufficient to establish repayment of the money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 888; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 64*) — INTENT—EXISTING CREDITORS.

As to creditors existing at the date thereof, a gift of property or money is void, no matter what the actual intent of the parties may have been. The statute makes proof of lack of a consideration valuable in law conclusive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 69*) — INTENT—SUBSEQUENT CREDITORS.

In order to set aside a voluntary conveyance, a subsequent creditor must prove actual fraudulent intent; and, though there may have been existing creditors, at the time of the conveyance, who could have set it aside without such proof, and the grantor was never afterwards free from debt, though the prior or existing debts were afterwards paid, such subsequent creditor cannot be subrogated to the rights of the prior creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 178; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Bill by the Edwards Manufacturing Company against T. M. Carr and Sarah A. Carr. Decree for complainant, and Sarah A. Carr appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Simms & Enslow, C. W. Campbell, and Holt & Duncan, for appellant. Wallace & Fitzpatrick and W. K. Cowden, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. Deeming the evidence, adduced for the purpose, sufficient to prove that T. M. Carr, a debtor, had expended $1,500 of his own money on improvements, made on a certain lot owned by his wife, Mrs. Sarah A. Carr, in fraud of the rights of his creditors, the circuit court of Cabell county pronounced a decree charging said property, in favor of the creditors, to the extent of $1,950, the principal sum so invested and interest thereon, and Mrs. Carr has appealed.

The evidence covers a considerable period of time and a great many transactions, varying widely in respect to the extent or degree of their bearing on the question at issue. The Carrs were married in 1884, and came to Huntington in 1887, bringing with them about $1,000 in money, and soon afterwards bought a lot on Fourth avenue, taking the title in Mrs. Carr's name. On this they built a house, partly with lumber and materials they had accumulated before coming to Huntington, and partly with materials purchased as the work progressed; and in this house they resided practically all the time, until they moved into their present residence on Sixth avenue, the property in question, about July, 1901. The husband, a carpenter by trade, carried on no business of his own until about the year 1896, when he engaged in manufacturing, merchandising, and contracting, successively, and wound up insolvent about the time the new house was completed, but not very heavily indebted. His debts are estimated at about $2,000. The wife is said to be worth from $12,000 to $15,000, consisting principally of real estate. Before marriage she taught school and clerked in a store. After marriage she received all of her husband's earnings until 1896. For three or four years she kept green-houses, producing flowers for sale, and claims to have made considerable money in that way. While living in the Fourth avenue house she kept two or three boarders, and, after the completion of the new one, a large 16-room house, she kept several, and derived from the rooms rents ranging from $50 to $70 per month. Soon after the house on Sixth avenue was built, she sold the Fourth avenue house for $3,000. In January, 1902, she purchased from R. S. Prindle another piece of property, paying $800 cash, and assuming a trust lien on it for $800. In February, 1903, she purchased another from T. W. Peyton, for which she paid $573.12, and assumed a debt of $691.88, constituting a lien thereon. The property on which the residence is was bought of Rufus Switzer November 27, 1890, for $1,200, of which $500 was paid in cash, and the house afterward built on it at a cost of about $6,000. Mrs. Carr claims to have had large amounts of the materials used in it purchased and stored on her Fourth avenue lot before she began building. Both she and her husband admit that the former paid about $1,500 for labor and materials that went into the construction of the house, but both emphatically testify that all this money was repaid, and more than repaid. They both say he got $1,200 out of the proceeds of the sale of Mrs. Carr's Fourth avenue lot, besides $150 she gave him with which to pay a debt to one Roberts, and $225 with which to buy out the business of one Palmer, but this stands on their testimony, uncorroborated or strengthened by any written evidence or memoranda. That Carr was engaged in business from 1896 until some time in 1902 is admitted, and in that period it is likely he carried some indebtedness, but the only indebtedness proven in the cause is subsequent in date to the building of the house, and none is shown to have been incurred or existed between 1884 and 1896, a period during which he says he gave all his earnings to his wife, as he could lawfully have done, if he owed nothing, and intended no fraud upon subsequent creditors.

The principal contentions of counsel for the appellant consist of these four propositions: (1) The statute, making a married woman's earnings her separate property, has changed the rule respecting the burden of proof or presumption against the wife in cases of this kind; (2) the admission of the husband's contribution is nullified by the accompanying claim of repayment; (3) the evidence proves ample financial ability on the part of the wife to obtain all the property she has without any aid of her husband, except that rendered by him prior to 1896, and that the money contributed by him to the cost of the building was repaid; (4) there is no proof that Mrs. Carr had any knowledge of her husband's indebtedness, or any fraudulent intent on his part in contributing to the cost of the building. That the burden of proof has not been changed, nor the presumption against the wife in cases of this kind destroyed, by the married woman's statute, enabling her to carry on business in her own name and making her earnings her separate property, has been expressly decided in Miller v. Gillispie, 54 W. Va. 450. See opinion on rehearing (page 463, 46 S. E. 451, 456). Besides, these old rules have been steadily and undeviatingly adhered to and enforced ever since the passage of the married woman's statute. The rule saying an admission, accompanied by an explanation or discharge, must be taken as a whole, does not relate to the probative force of evidence. It is a rule governing and controlling the question of admissibility. Such a statement must go to the jury as a whole, and it is error to allow the admission to go in, and exclude the explanatory or exculpatory part. The party against whom it is introduced has an absolute right to have the entire statement considered, and is protected against the introduction of only the prejudicial part of it. But, after it has been introduced, it is with the jury or court to say how much weight shall be given to each of the parts, and naturally the admission has greater weight than the explanation, because it is a statement against interest, while the explanation is self-serving. However, if the court or jury believe the entire statement to be true, it will find accordingly.

In view of the finding of the trial court, it is hardly necessary to discuss the tendency and weight of the evidence in respect to anything except the alleged repayment of the money contributed by the husband to the cost of the building. The decree does not proceed upon the assumption of finding of fraud in the purchase of any of the lots. It charges the Sixth avenue property to the extent of the husband's contribution to the cost thereof, and no further. We think the evidence of repayment fails to measure up to the requirement of the rules of evidence in cases of this class. The admission casts upon the wife the burden of full and clear proof of repayment. Nothing is offered except the uncorroborated statements of herself and her husband. No documentary evidence of any kind is produced. No note, memorandum, or other paper evidencing indebtedness of herself to her husband for these advancements is shown, nor any check, draft, bank book, or other paper showing repayment is disclosed. It is said she gave her husband certificates of deposit amounting to $1,200, received by her as part of the proceeds of her Fourth avenue property, but these certificates are not produced, nor were any of the bank officers called upon to testify to their assignment to the husband. It is highly probable that she had such certificates, for it appears that she sold her Fourth avenue property for $3,000, $500 of which was represented by a lien assumed by the purchaser, but she had previously invested a large amount of money in the new house and lot, exclusive of the contribution of her husband, far exceeding the entire value of the Fourth avenue property. This investment, it seems to us, represents all the money she could possibly have had from sources other than her husband. Besides, her rapid accumulation of property is coincident in point of time with the financial reverses and misfortunes of her husband. These circumstances call upon her for clear, strict, and full proof of the fact of repayment, and the rule is that, as against creditors, the mere verbal testimony of husband and wife as to money transactions between them will not avail. Zinn v. Law, 32 W. Va. 447, 9 S. E. 871; Bank v. Atkinson, 32 W. Va. 203, 9 S. E. 175; McGinnis v. Curry, 13 W. Va. 29; Horne v. Huffman, 52 W. Va. 40 43 S. E. 132.

But this conclusion does not sustain the decree. The money so advanced, and not deemed to have been repaid, was a voluntary settlement on the wife. It would be void as against creditors existing at the time thereof, but it cannot be impeached on that ground alone by a subsequent creditor; Code 1899, c. 74, § 2 (Code 1906, § 3100) saying: "Every transfer or charge which is not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law, shall be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted at the time it was made; but shall not upon that account merely be void as to creditors whose debts shall have been contracted, or as to purchasers who shall have purchased, after it was made." There is not a word of direct evidence to the effect that Mrs. Carr knew of any indebtedness on the part of the husband at the time she allowed this contribution to be made to the cost of her building. In her testimony she says she knew nothing about her husband's business affairs, and also that she "knew nothing of Mr. Carr's debts." The bill does not specifically allege knowledge, on her part, of the existence of her husband's debts at the time she bought the Sixth avenue property, or at the time she built the house on it. It charges generally that she knew of the insolvency of her husband and his purpose to defraud his creditors, his insolvency and inability to pay his debts, at the time of the purchase of the property, and the continuance of indebtedness then existing, his placing the property purchased in the name of Sarah A. Carr for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, the lack of any consideration moving from her, and knowledge on her part of the fact that her husband was putting property in her name for the purpose of avoiding payment of his debts and preventing his creditors then in existence, and any future creditors that he might have, from subjecting the same to the payment of his debts. To these allegations Mrs. Carr, after detailing facts and circumstances relating to her marriage, earnings, purchases and sales of property, and business transactions with her husband and others, put in the following general denials: "She expressly denies all allegations in regard to any of said purchases. She denies that, at the time the said Carr originally gave her the money which she invested in the Fourth avenue property, which she sold, there were any creditors who could object to the said gift. She denies that any of the existing debts are continuances of the debts existing in 1899. She denies each, every, and all allegations of the plaintiff's bill, and amended and supplemental bill which seeks to impute her with fraud." Being unexcepted to, this general denial is good. She also avers her belief in the correctness of the facts set out in her husband's answer, in which he denied that his wife had any knowledge of any attempt to defraud his creditors "not then existing, by purchasing property in her name, which fraud never did exist," and says "the debts against him, and the judgments to recover against him, are not claims against his wife," nor are "his debts continuances of any debts which he owed before the time his wife became the owner of said real estate."

None of the debts involved in this suit seem to have been contracted earlier than the year 1902. That of the Edwards Manufacturing Company, the plaintiff in the bill, was contracted in November, 1902, long after the completion of the house in question. There is no presumption of fraudulent intent. That is a fact which cannot be assumed. It must be proven. The presumption, imposing such a great burden upon the wife when property stands in her name, is not that of fraudulent intent, but that of payment of the purchase money by the husband. If she fails to discharge that burden by showing payment by her with money derived from other sources, and the debts are pre-existing ones, the conveyance is set aside as a voluntary one, or as having been made without consideration. In such case no proof of fraudulent intent is necessary; but, if the creditor be a subsequent one, the fact that the conveyance or the money expended upon the wife's property was a gift does not make a complete case for relief. Fraudulent intent must be established in addition thereto. That the conveyance or expenditure of money on the property was without consideration is a circumstance to be considered, in pursuing the inquiry, as to whether such intent existed, but that alone does not justify the inference of fraud.

That Mrs. Carr has rapidly accumulated property, while her husband sustained losses, and finally became insolvent, is a circumstance calling for a close scrutiny into their financial transactions, but it is wholly insufficient to prove fraud in favor of subsequent creditors. That she has extensive and valuable property, amounting in value to three or four times that of the property owned by her in 1899, and owes only about $800 on it, argues that she received assistance from her husband. She does not deny that she did to the extent of $1,500. Her husband, according to his testimony, sustained some losses before the house was completed, and some afterwards. Notwithstanding this, all of the indebtedness existing at the time of the donation made to his wife has been paid. He continued in business, contracting new debts and paying old ones. This argues intent on his part to continue in business, not to withdraw what property he had from the reach of his creditors and quit, and tends to repel the charge of fraud. Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 289, 15 S. E. 74; Bank v. Patton, 1 Rob. (Va.) 536. There was no conveyance of property to his wife on the faith of which the present creditors may have extended credit. This view of the case seems to bring it clearly within the principles declared in Greer v. O'Brien, 36 W. Va. 277, 15 S. E. 74, and McCue v. McCue, 41 W. Va. 151, 23 S. E. 689. In both of these cases, as well as others therein reviewed, it was held that the attacking subsequent creditor must prove some additional circumstance, connected with the fact of the donation and the indebtedness of the husband, in order to charge the wife's property. This doctrine dates back as far as Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87, and Hunter's Ex'r v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321. Greer v. O'Brien expressly and distinctly decides that the old law of subrogation of subsequent creditors to the rights of prior creditors, in respect to voluntary conveyances, has been cut up by the roots and destroyed by section 2, c. 74, of the Code of 1899.

Only two circumstances, relied upon as proving actual fraudulent intent, are deemed worthy of notice. C. F. Millender testifies that, some 10 years before the Sixth avenue property was bought, and, at the time of the purchase of the Fourth avenue property, Carr told him he had made the latter purchase in his wife's name because something hung over him at Ripley, Ohio, whence they had come; but there was no specification of this something, nor any indication as to what it was. The admission long antedated the matters involved here. Carr swears he owed no debts in Ripley and it is not shown that he did. Besides, this admission related to property not in controversy here, and no longer owned by Mrs. Carr. We think it is entirely too remote and indefinite to have any bearing on the present issue. At the time of the erection of the Sixth avenue residence, Carr was conducting a mercantile business, called a paper store, in which he handled wall paper and building materials. R. C. Rankin, a brother of Mrs. Carr, worked about the store and in that business. Two horses and a wagon were also used in connection with it. Carr swears Rankin was simply employed by him, and had no interest in the store, and also that Rankin was the owner of the horses, and that they were likewise hired by him (Carr). Rankin owned two adjacent half lots, the equivalent of one lot, in the city of Huntington, and by a deed, dated February 22, 1902, and reciting a consideration of $2,500, he conveyed this real estate, and all his right, title, and interest in the two horses, wagon, and stock of goods, wares, and merchandise in Carr's store, to Mrs. Carr. She says she paid nothing for any of this property, and never took possession of, or used, any, of the stock of goods, which she says consisted of some wall paper and tools, worth probably $15 or $20, but did take the horses and sell them. Her explanation as to the real estate is that her brother, a single man, engaged and expecting to marry, had bought the real estate, and commenced the erection of a house on it, in anticipation of marriage; that, the lady whom he expected to marry having become an invalid, he conveyed the property to his sister, Mrs. Carr, with the understanding that she should complete the house and keep it, unless the lady should recover; and that, after the conveyance she (Mrs. Carr) borrowed $500, and completed the building, and, after the marriage of her brother, reconveyed the property to his wife, and he paid off the debt made for the improvement of it. If the horses and wagon and other property described in the deed and used in Carr's business could be regarded as partnership property, and Mrs. Carr as having taken it with knowledge of its character and her husband's indebtedness at the time, it might prove participation on her part in the fraud of her husband against his creditors in respect to that property. This might justify the inference of fraud in the expenditure of money on her property. Such an inference as to intent respecting one piece of property may arise from proof of fraud respecting another conveyed at or about the same time from one of the parties to another. Colston v. Miller, 55 W. Va. 500, 47 S. E. 268. But there is no proof that it was partnership property, or her husband's property. Nothing points in this direction, except the deed executed by Rankin, purporting to convey his right, title, and interest in it, and the circumstances, already detailed, relating to Rankin's connection with Carr's business. It would only appear by way of slight inference, contradicted by positive evidence. Besides, this transaction occurred about seven months after the completion of the building. It is remote in both time and connection. Having carefully examined and analyzed all the evidence, we are of the opinion that it wholly fails to establish the charge of fraud against Mrs. Carr.

For the reasons stated, the decree will be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

NORFOLK & P. TRACTION CO. v. FOREST'S ADM'X.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. STREET RAILROADS (§ 111*) — INJURY TO TRAVELER—SPEED ORDINANCE—PLEADING.

Where, in an action for injuries to a traveler in a collision with a street car at a crossing, the negligence charged was that defendant ran its car at a rate of speed dangerous to persons traveling along and on the highway at the place of the accident, and violation of a speed ordinance was not relied on as a ground of negligence, the ordinance was admissible to prove negligence, though not pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 32*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE.

Courts do not take judicial notice of municipal ordinances, which must be established by evidence; but, when proven, they stand on the same footing as statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. § 32;* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2959.]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 94*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS — SPEED ORDINANCES — VIOLATION.

Violation of a city speed ordinance by a street railway company at the time the traveler was injured in a collision with the car is evidence of negligence, though the ordinance imposes a penalty for its violation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS — EXCESSIVE SPEED — SIGNALS — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a traveler in a collision with a street car, plaintiff's evidence showed that the excessive speed of the car and motorman's failure to give proper signals of its approach to the crossing, one or both, were the proximate cause of the accident, an instruction that intestate could assume that defendant's servants operating the car would give the proper signals and not run at an excessive rate of speed over the crossing, and that he had the right to drive his wagon across or even along the track in full view of the approaching car if, under all the circumstances, it was consistent with ordinary prudence to do so, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 258-269; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to intestate, in collision with a car at a street railroad crossing, an instruction that if, under the surrounding circumstances, it would have been reasonably apparent that with ordinary care, and if defendant's servants had used ordinary care in driving the car, intestate could have driven across the tracks without collision, then he was not negligent, and if defendant's servants did not use ordinary care in operating the car in one or more of the particulars alleged, and as a direct and proximate result thereof intestate was injured, the jury should find for plaintiff, was not objectionable as ignoring the subject of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 258-269; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

6. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS — CROSSING ACCIDENTS — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a traveler at a street railroad crossing, the court charged that if, at the time intestate was injured, there was in force in the city an ordinance making it unlawful to operate a trolley car over a street crossing without first reducing the speed to not more than three miles an hour, and requiring the ringing of the gong continuously after passing a point 50 feet from the crossing, intestate, when approaching the crossing, was entitled to assume that defendant's servants would obey the ordinance, and, if it would have been reasonably apparent to an ordinarily prudent person that he could have crossed the track without danger of a collision, he was not guilty of negligence in attempting to do so. Held, that such instruction was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

7. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS — INSTRUCTIONS — LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

In an action for injuries to intestate, in a collision with a street car at a street railroad crossing, an instruction that if, after defendant's servants in charge of the car knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the danger to which intestate was exposed in crossing the track in front of the car, they could have avoided the accident by exercising ordinary care, but failed to do so, and intestate was injured as alleged, they should find for plaintiff, whether intestate was negligent at the time or not, correctly submitted the doctrine of last clear chance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

8. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*) — INJURY TO TRAVELERS — LAST CLEAR CHANCE — EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries in a collision with a street car at a street railroad crossing, plaintiff's evidence showed that when the car was 150 feet away intestate was actually driving across the track, but, notwithstanding this, he was struck and injured, the court properly submitted plaintiff's right to recover under the last clear chance doctrine.

9. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*) — INJURIES — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the jury were properly instructed as to intestate's duty to exercise reasonable care for his own safety, the court did not err in refusing to ingraft an exception precluding recovery in case intestate was guilty of negligence on an instruction submitting plaintiff's right to recover under the last clear chance doctrine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

10. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—INJURY TO TRAVELERS — CROSSING — ACTION — INSTRUCTIONS.

A requested charge that plaintiff could not recover for injuries to intestate in a street car collision at a crossing, if intestate could have known, by the exercise of ordinary care, "that there was even a small chance" that the car would not stop in time to avoid a collision, was properly refused; intestate being only required to exercise ordinary care to avoid the accident under the existing circumstances.

11. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*) — INJURY TO TRAVELER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where intestate was injured in a collision with a street car at a crossing, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether he started to check his horses before crossing the track, and the motorman testified that both he and deceased checked at the same time, the court properly refused to charge as a matter of law that, if the motorman saw deceased pull up and stop his horses, he could assume deceased would not drive in front of him.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by E. B. Forrest's administratrix against the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. W. Anderson, J. R. Tucker, and W. H. Venable, for plaintiff in error. Jeffries, Wolcott & Wolcott, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by E. B. Forrest to recover of the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained as a result of the negligence of the defendant company in the operation of one of its street cars on Botetourt street in the city of Norfolk. The plaintiff was driving a loaded ice wagon along Pembroke avenue, and at the intersection of that avenue with Botetourt street there was a collision between the street car and the ice wagon, whereby the plaintiff was thrown to the ground sustaining the injuries complained of.

During the pendency of this suit, the plaintiff died from the injuries he had received, and the suit was revived by his administratrix and prosecuted in her name to a final judgment against the defendant company for $8,000.

Whether or not, upon the trial of the case, there was any error in the rulings of the circuit court to the prejudice of the defendant company, is the subject of the present inquiry.

The first assignment of error is to the action of the court in admitting as evidence a certain ordinance of the city of Norfolk, regulating the speed of cars at street crossings, and prescribing the manner of running and controlling the same at such points. That the violation of a statute or municipal ordinance is admissible as evidence of negligence is not denied, but it is contended that for such an ordinance to be invoked "as a ground of negligence" it must not only be proven, but must be pleaded, which was not done in this case.

It may be conceded that if the ordinance be the basis of the action, and its violation constitute the negligence relied on for a recovery, it should be pleaded; but the contention here made ignores the distinction between a case in which the violation of the ordinance is the "ground of negligence" relied on, and one like that at bar, where the ordinance is introduced as tending, along with other evidence, to prove the negligence which is alleged in the declaration.

The first count of the declaration alleges that the defendant negligently ran its car "at a rate of speed dangerous to persons traveling along and upon the highway at that place." This constitutes negligence, and any fact which tends to prove such allegation should go to the jury, who are to say whether or not the negligence alleged has been proved.

Persons, when traveling upon and using the streets and street crossings of a city, have a right to rely upon the observance by those operating cars of an ordinance limiting the rate of speed at crossings, and in doing so to govern their actions accordingly. The violation of an ordinance, thus relied on, is admissible, without being pleaded, along with other facts and circumstances of the case, as tending to establish the allegation that the defendant "carelessly, negligently, and recklessly, ran the said car at a rate of speed dangerous to persons traveling along and upon the highway at that place."

Courts do not take judicial notice of municipal ordinances as they do of statutes, and evidence must be offered to prove them; but, when proven, they stand upon the same footing as statutes. Norfolk Ry. & L. Co. v. Corletto, 100 Va. 355, 41 S. E. 740.

In the case cited, at page 359 of 100 Va., and page 741 of 41 S. E., it is said: "Statutes regulating the speed of railroad trains at certain places, being regulations clearly intended for the protection of travelers, it is well settled that any violation of them is competent evidence of negligence in an action brought by a traveler on the highway, even though the statute simply imposes a penalty for its violation." See A. & D. R. Co. v. Reiger, 95 Va. 418, 28 S. E. 590, and Southern Ry. Co. v. Stockdon, 106 Va. 695, 56 S. E. 713.

In the case of Faber v. St. Paul M. & M. Co., 29 Minn. 465, 467, 13 N. W. 902, where the introduction of a similar ordinance was objected to because not pleaded, it is said: "The objection cannot be sustained. The fact that the rate of speed at which the train was run was prohibited by the municipal law was competent evidence going to prove negligence; * * * and being evidence of the fact pleaded, it might be proved, although the existence of the ordinance had not been alleged in the complaint."

In Brasington v. South Bound R. Co., 62

S. C. 667, 40 S. E. 667, 89 Am. St. Rep. 905, the Supreme Court of South Carolina says: "This is not an action to enforce the performance of any duty imposed by an ordinance of the city of Charleston, or to enforce the payment of any tax or penalty imposed by such ordinance; but the cause of action here is the negligence of the defendant company resulting in the death of the intestate, and the ordinances of the city are only referred to as showing such negligence."

In 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7868, the author says: "Where the evidence tends to show that a particular act was prohibited by ordinance, and that such violation contributed to the injury, then the ordinance is quite properly admitted on the question of negligence, though not pleaded; but the rule is otherwise where the action is founded on a violation of the ordinance, and here it is necessary to plead the ordinance." See, also, Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136, 140; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Rassmussen, 25 Neb. 810, 41 N. W. 779, 13 Am. St. Rep. 527.

In the case at bar the ordinance is not relied on as the ground of the plaintiff's right to recover. Its violation merely contributes to the proof of the fact alleged in the declaration that the defendant was running its car at a reckless and dangerous rate of speed. This being so, there is no more reason why the ordinance should be pleaded than that any other fact or circumstance adduced to establish the alleged negligence should be pleaded.

The second assignment of error is to the action of the court in giving instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, asked for by the plaintiff.

Instruction No. 1 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that in running upon the public highway where the plaintiff's intestate, E. B. Forrest, was injured, the rights of the company's cars were not superior to those of any other vehicle, but simply equal, and said Forrest had the right to drive either across or along the track just as freely as upon any other part of the street, so long as he did not obstruct the cars or negligently expose himself to danger. He had the right to assume that the servants of the defendant operating said car would give the proper signals and not run at an excessive rate of speed at that crossing, and he had the right to drive his wagon across or even along the track in full view of the approaching car if, under all the circumstances, it was consistent with ordinary prudence to do so. And if the jury believe from the evidence that, under all the circumstances by which said Forrest was then surrounded, it would have been reasonably apparent to an ordinarily prudent person that, if the defendant's servants should use ordinary care in running and controlling said car, he could drive across the track without danger of a collision, then said Forrest was not guilty of negligence in driving across said tracks; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that, under such circumstances, the said servants of the defendant did not use ordinary care in operating said car in one or more of the particulars alleged in the declaration, and that as a direct and proximate result thereof the said Forrest was injured as therein alleged, they should find for the plaintiff."

The first paragraph of this instruction is conceded to be correct. The second paragraph is admittedly a sound proposition of law, but the position is taken that it is inapplicable to the facts.

This contention is not tenable. There is a conflict in the testimony with respect to the facts relied on as the basis of this instruction. The evidence of the plaintiff tends to show that the excessive speed of the car and the failure to give proper signals of its approach to the crossing were, one or both together, the proximate cause of the accident. The plaintiff's intestate, in determining the prudence of his course, had a right to rely upon the assumption that the law would be obeyed, both in respect to the speed of the car at the crossing and the sounding of the gong as it approached. If the failure to sound the gong induced the belief that the car would stop or slacken its speed, and thereby led the deceased to enter a place made dangerous by a failure to slacken such speed, in obedience to the ordinance, then the failure to do these things was the proximate cause of the accident. These two paragraphs of the instruction are directed not so much to the defendant's negligence in failing to reduce its speed and sound its gong, as to the question of Forrest's contributory negligence. They practically tell the jury that the rights of both parties upon the street were equal, and that the deceased had a right to drive upon the tracks, provided he did not obstruct the cars or negligently expose himself to danger. Richmond Traction Co. v. Clarke, 101 Va. 382, 388, 43 S. E. 618.

The two succeeding paragraphs told the jury what they could consider in determining whether or not the deceased did negligently expose himself to danger. That if, under all the circumstances by which the deceased was surrounded, an ordinarily prudent man would have acted as he did, then he was not negligent; that if the defendant was negligent in operating the car, and as a direct and proximate result of such negligence the deceased was injured as alleged in the declaration, the company was liable.

The criticism that this instruction ignores the subject of the contributory negligence of the deceased and should have pointed out clearly that view of the case to the jury is not well taken. The jury are clearly told that, in going upon the track, the deceased, in order to be free from blame, could not negligently expose himself to danger, but must be governed by the degree of caution that would be exercised by a reasonably prudent man under like circumstances. Besides, in other instructions the subject of contributory negligence of the deceased is so fully covered that when the instructions are read together it is apparent that the jury could not have been misled to the prejudice of the defendant.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 2 was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the ordinance of the city of Norfolk introduced in evidence is a regulation intended for the protection of travelers, and any violation of it, if proven, is competent evidence of negligence in this suit, to be considered along with all the other evidence in the case in determining whether the defendant was guilty of negligence as charged in the declaration which caused the plaintiff's injury as therein alleged."

The objection to this instruction has been disposed of by what has been already said touching the admissibility of the ordinance as evidence.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 3 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that, at the time of the accident by which the plaintiff's intestate, E. B. Forrest, was injured as shown by the evidence, there was in force an ordinance of the city of Norfolk which provided that: 'It shall not be lawful for any person, or corporation, to operate or run any electric or trolley car or other vehicle propelled by electricity over or through any street crossing in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, without first reducing the rate of speed of said cars to not more than three miles per hour. And there shall be fixed to such cars a gong or other bell which shall be sounded continuously before reaching such crossing, and beginning at a distance of fifty feet from such crossing'—then the said E. B. Forrest, in approaching and crossing the defendant's track, had the right to assume that the servants of the defendant in charge of its car which was then approaching would obey the requirements of said ordinance in the running and operating said car. And if the jury believe from the evidence that, under all the circumstances by which said Forrest was surrounded, it would have been reasonably apparent to an ordinarily prudent person that he could cross the track without danger of a collision, he was not guilty of negligence in attempting to do so."

No valid objection has been made to this instruction, and it is so clearly free from objection that comment is unnecessary.

Plaintiff's instruction No. 4 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that after the servants of the defendant in charge of its car knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the danger to which the plaintiff's intestate was exposed in crossing the track in front of the car, they could have avoided the accident by the exercise of ordinary care, but failed to do so, and that the plaintiff was injured thereby, as alleged in the declaration, they must find for the plaintiff, whether the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the track at that time or not."

This is a correct statement of the doctrine of the last clear chance, and there was ample evidence to justify such an instruction. The plaintiff's evidence tends to show that when the car was 150 feet away the deceased was actually driving across the track.

It is contended that this instruction should have concluded with the words: "Unless you also believe from the evidence that after the danger of collision became, or by the use of ordinary care could have been, known to the plaintiff's intestate, he could have avoided the accident and failed to do so."

This instruction was dealing with the duty of the defendant after it knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the danger to which the plaintiff's intestate was exposed in crossing the track in front of the car. The view of the case which it is insisted should have been embodied in this instruction was not ignored, but was fully and clearly given to the jury by instructions C and E, asked for by the defendant.

Defendant's instruction No. C:

"The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that the car of the defendant was coming south on Botetourt street approaching Pembroke avenue, and that the plaintiff's intestate was driving westwardly on Pembroke avenue, approaching Botetourt street just before the accident, and that the plaintiff's intestate as he approached and entered Botetourt street saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the car of the defendant approaching, and could have avoided this accident, either by stopping his team or turning to the right or left, but elected to take the chance of crossing the track on which the car was approaching at a time when he saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, that there was danger of a collision in so doing, your verdict must be for the defendant."

Defendant's instruction No. E:

"The court instructs the jury that, even though you may believe from the evidence that the motorman failed to ring his bell as he approached the crossing, and that he was running at an excessive rate of speed, and that he failed to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances to avoid the accident, after he saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, that there was danger of a collision with the wagon, you still cannot find a verdict for the plaintiff, if you believe from the evidence that Forrest attempted to drive across the track in front of the approaching car, after he knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the car would not stop in time to avoid a collision with the wagon."

These two instructions fully inform the jury as to the duty resting upon the plaintiff to exercise reasonable care for his own safety and abundantly emphasize the point sought to be ingrafted upon the plaintiff's instruction No. 4. There was no more reason that the defendant's view of this phase of the case should be ingrafted upon the plaintiff's instruction, than that the plaintiff's view should be embodied in each of the two instructions given, on the same subject, for the defendant. The jury were fully informed upon the doctrine of the last clear chance, in its application to both the plaintiff and defendant, and could not have been misled, to the prejudice of the defendant, by the instructions as given. Roanoke Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Young, 108 Va. 783, 62 S. E. 961.

The third assignment of error was to the action of the court in refusing to give instructions E, G, H, and I, asked for by the defendant.

We have already referred to instruction E and quoted it in full as given by the court. The latter part of the instruction, as asked, read as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that Forrest attempted to drive across the track in front of the approaching car, after he knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that there was even a small chance that the car would not stop in time to avoid a collision with the wagon."

The complaint is that, before giving the instruction, the court struck out the words "that there was even a small chance." These words were properly eliminated from the instruction. They were certainly misleading, if they did not in effect take from the jury the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The law does not require a person to know that he is absolutely safe before taking a given course of action. Newport News v. Bradford, 99 Va. 117, 37 S. E. 807. He is only required to exercise ordinary care to avoid accident—such care as a reasonably prudent person would exercise under like circumstances. The court could not hold as a matter of law that to take a "small chance" of collision constituted contributory negligence. It was for the jury to say whether or not the risk taken was, under the circumstances, such as a person of ordinary care would or would not have assumed. It was not necessarily contributory negligence for the deceased to drive across the track in the face of "a small chance of collision." His action depends upon what reasonably prudent persons, similarly situated, would have done. Whether or not a reasonably prudent person would have pursued the course that was taken by deceased was a question for the jury to determine under the evidence.

Instruction H contained the objectionable language we have considered in connection with instruction E, and was therefore properly refused.

It was not error to refuse instruction G. It told the jury, as a matter of law, that, if the motorman saw the deceased start to pull up and stop his horses, he had a right to presume that deceased would not attempt to drive across the track in front of him. The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the deceased started to check his horses, and there are other circumstances bearing upon the question besides the mere checking of the horses. According to the motorman, both he and the deceased checked up at the same time. If this be so, then the deceased might have been misled into the belief that the motorman was stopping to let him pass. It was for the jury to determine the weight to be attached to the inferences that could reasonably be drawn from the conduct of the parties. The court properly held that the impressions likely to be made upon the motorman by the conduct of the deceased was not a matter of law for its determination, but a question to be considered by the jury in the light of all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence.

There was no error in the refusal of the court to give instruction I asked for by the defendant. The subject-matter of that instruction had been fully covered by two other instructions—No. 5 given for the plaintiff, and instruction F given for the defendant.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the instructions were as favorable to the defendant as it had a right to ask, that the case was fairly submitted to the jury, and that the verdict is sustained by the evidence.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.
Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fluvanna County.

Action by W. I. Steele against the J. N. H. Cornell & Company and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Perkins & Perkins and J. B. Moon, for appellants. Harmon & Walsh and Montague & Montague, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This action was brought by W. I. Steele to recover of J. N. H. Cornell & Co., a foreign corporation, and J. H. Fine, a balance of $7,511.06, alleged to be due Steele from the defendants upon certain work which Steele subcontracted with Cornell & Co., general contractors with the Virginia Air Line Railway Co., to do on the Virginia Air Line Railway, to be constructed by the general contractor from Lindsay, on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway in Albemarle county, to a point on James river, about 20 miles distant; the plaintiff, Steele, undertaking by his subcontract the construction of four miles of this road within a stated period and according to specifications as to the execution of the work. That Steele performed his part of this contract truly and faithfully seems not to have been questioned, and the controversy arises out of the classification of the material taken out and removed by him, made by Cornell & Co.'s chief engineer in charge of the work.

The contract, which was in evidence at the trial of this cause, shows the price of the excavation of the several kinds of material to be taken out and removed by Steele, viz., earth, loose rock, and solid rock, gives the definition of these several classes of material, and provides for monthly payments as the work progressed and for a final estimate on the completion and acceptance of the work; and the contract also provides that the decision of the chief engineer of the general contractor on all questions arising under the contract should be final as between the parties.

J. H. Fine, who made the estimates on Steele's work, was the chief engineer of the general contractor, and also its vice-president, and as Steele progressed with his work he received monthly payments upon the estimates made by Fine, but, as we shall see later, protested all along that these estimates were incorrect. On the completion of Steele's contract in January, 1908, Fine made a final estimate showing that the general contractor, Cornell & Co., owed Steel $1,775.73, to which Steele objected, alleging that this estimate was based upon an erroneous classification of material excavated and removed, and thereupon Cornell & Co. had the estimate reconsidered and the work re-examined, but insisted that the action of its chief engineer was correct and would not be corrected, and so informed Steele. Whereupon Steele selected one James Dickey, a competent engineer and an expert, to go over the work and make an estimate of it according to the provisions of the contract, and Dickey's estimate varied materially from that of Fine; the chief difference arising from the classification of material, the difference in the total quantity of material moved, or yardage, caused by certain measurements adopted by Dickey and not allowed by Fine, being comparatively slight. Omitting the items of these estimates as to which Dickey and Fine agreed, the latter's final estimate allowed Steele for 42,113.1 cubic yards of earth, $9,896.58; 10,174.8 cubic yards of loose rock, $3,856.42; and 586.9 cubic yards of solid rock, $396.23—total $14,155.13. While in Dickey's estimate these several items appear as follows: 30,011.1 cubic yards of earth, $7,052.60; 15,559.5 cubic yards of loose rock, $5,912.61; and 10,017.8 cubic yards of solid rock, $7,012.46—total $19,977.67. The disclosures made by these estimates caused Steele to realize that, despite his rigid economy and efficient work, he would sustain a loss of over $3,500 if Fine's estimate of his work was to be adhered to, and thereupon he brought this suit for $7,511.06, the amount of the difference between the final estimate made by Fine and that made by Dickey.

At the trial of the cause, it was submitted to the jury upon four instructions given by the court, to which neither party made objection, and the jury rendered its verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at $3,600, and upon the verdict the court entered the judgment to which this writ of error was awarded.

The instructions of the trial court, in sum and substance, rightly told the jury that notwithstanding the provision in the contract between the parties that the final estimate of the chief engineer of the general contractor, Cornell & Co., was to be final and conclusive on both parties, if they believed from the evidence Chief Engineer Fine made such error of judgment or mistake in the estimates and classification of the work made by him as amounted to a mistake so gross as necessarily to imply bad faith and amount to a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiff, they should find for the plaintiff, even though they believed that said engineer had no intention to commit a fraud or to act in bad faith; and further told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the estimates or classifications by the company's engineer were not binding on the plaintiff because of gross error or mistake, amounting to a fraud, then they should make such classification of the material removed as they deemed proper, under the evidence and according to the provisions of the contract, and assess the plaintiff's damages according to that classification at the prices specified in the contract, subject to proper credits.

The contract between the parties is explicit as to the classification of the material that was to be removed and the prices to be paid therefor, solid rock being recognized as the most expensive material, and therefore a higher price for its removal was fixed than for the removal of earth or loose rock. It will therefore be seen that the subject of classification of the work done by defendant in error was the crucial point in the case for the determination of the jury, and we deem it only necessary to refer briefly to the evidence to show that it was sufficient to warrant the jury in regarding the estimate made by Fine so grossly erroneous as to amount to a fraud upon the rights of defendant in error.

The material classified as solid rock by defendant in error and Dickey, and disallowed by Fine, is clearly and unmistakably proven to be the same material of the same nature and character of rock as that allowed defendant in error and classified by Fine as solid rock to the extent of 569 cubic yards. In other words, the evidence shows that the rock, classified as solid rock by defendant in error and by Dickey, was of the identical kind, character, and formation as the 569 yards of solid rock allowed by the estimates made by Fine, and that the arbitrary rejection by him of over 9,000 cubic yards of this solid rock removed by defendant in error, and classifying the same with other material far less expensive to remove, was an error of judgment or mistake so gross as to amount to a fraud upon defendant in error's rights; and, if the jury believed in the truth and correctness of this evidence, it was of itself sufficient to sustain its finding in his favor. Mills & Fairfax v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 90 Va. 523, 19 S. E. 171; Id., 91 Va. 613, 22 S. E. 556.

In the report of that case last mentioned, the syllabus, in part, is as follows: "Whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover the higher or the lower of the two prices fixed by the contract for different classes of work, or whether he had waived or abandoned his right to recover the higher price, were questions of fact which were properly left to the determination of the jury, under instructions which correctly propounded the law, and gave them great latitude in the range of their inquiry."

The defendant in error in this case, testifying in his own behalf, stated that he all along protested that the classification of the material removed by him, made by Chief Engineer Fine in his monthly estimates, was grossly erroneous, and this statement is not disproved; but plaintiffs in error rely upon the contention, in support of which numerous authorities are cited, that fraud must be established by clear and satisfactory proof. The authorities cited sustain the proposition stated, but are not at all in conflict with the law as expounded in the instructions given in this case with the approval of plaintiffs in error, nor with the decided cases applicable to the facts submitted to the jury for determination.

In Mills & Fairfax v. N. & W. Ry. Co., supra, it was expressly stated that to avoid the engineer's estimate and classification in a case like this, which is so grossly erroneous as to imply fraud, it is not necessary to impute or prove moral wrong to the engineer. All that is necessary in such a case is that the evidence be sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the estimates and classifications of the engineer are so grossly erroneous as to amount to a fraud upon the rights of the injured party.

In the case of Kistler v. Ind. & St. L. R. Co., 88 Ind. 460, the contract between a railroad company and one who undertook to do certain work in its construction fixed the prices of the various kinds of work to be done, and provided that the engineer of the road should make estimates of the work from time to time upon which payment should be made and a final estimate which should be also paid, and that all disputes as to the meaning and execution of the contract should be referred to the engineer, and his decision should be final. Held, that where the engineer had failed to estimate the work, or by neglect or by mistake underestimated it, suit could be maintained for the recovery of the correct amount. In that case the court emphasizes that, to entitle the contractor to recover the correct amount due him for work done, it was not necessary to allege and prove that the engineer making the estimates acted corruptly or fraudulently.

In a later case decided by the same court (Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Donnegan, 111 Ind. 179, 12 N. E. 153), it was held: "A stipulation in a contract between a railroad company and a contractor that the estimate made by the former's engineer as to the quality, character, and the value of the work performed by the contractor shall be final against the latter, 'without further recourse or appeal,' cannot deprive him of the right to resort to the courts for the recovery of what may be due him, notwithstanding the estimates."

In that case it was considered that the estimates of the engineers were so grossly erroneous as to amount to a fraud upon the contractor, although moral turpitude was neither charged nor attempted to be proved; in other words, where the mistake is so gross as to amount to a fraud upon the rights of the contractor, he is not precluded from bringing his action to recover the correct amount due him, notwithstanding the provisions of the contract or the fact that he had received and receipted for payments on estimates made during the progress of the work and before the final estimate. See, also, Edwards v. Hartshorn, 72 Kan. 19, 82 Pac. 520, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1055, where almost the precise facts were involved as in this case.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court complained of, and it is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

COMMISSION OF FISHERIES et al. v. HAMPTON ROADS OYSTER PACKERS' & PLANTERS' ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER BEDS—SURVEY—EFFECT—STATUTES.

Const. 1902, § 175 (Code 1904, p. cclxiv), provides that the natural oyster beds shall be held subject to such regulations as the Assembly may prescribe, and that such beds may be determined by survey or otherwise. Acts 1891-92, p. 816, c. 511, provides for a survey of such beds, requires the plats to be filed in the clerk's office in each county where the beds are found, and declares that the survey and report, when filed, shall be conclusive evidence of the boundaries of the natural oyster beds, subject to the oyster laws of the state. By act March 2, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 605, c. 559; Code 1904, § 2130a), the prior law was amended so that the report and survey should constitute conclusive evidence that there were no natural oyster beds in the waters of the county wherein the report and survey were filed other than those embraced therein. Held that, where the survey was relocated and the lines as re-established showed that complainant's oyster ground was within the survey, it was conclusive evidence that such was the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER GROUND—ASSIGNMENT—ACTS OF INSPECTOR.

Acts of the state oyster inspector in assigning oyster ground, as authorized by Code 1904, § 2137, are ministerial, though he is required to determine the existence of facts which makes it necessary for him to act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. FISH (§ 7*)—NATURAL OYSTER BEDS—ESTABLISHMENT.

The boundaries of natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals are conclusively established by the Baylor survey, and report made to the fish commissioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER GROUNDS—SURVEY—STATUTES—AMENDMENT.

The probative force and effect to be given to a survey of natural oyster ground, as authorized by Acts 1891-92, p. 816, c. 511, as amended by Act March 2, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 605, c. 559 [Code 1904, § 2130a]), and the report filed pursuant thereto is not changed or impaired by Acts 1899-1900, p. 307, c. 280, as amended (Code 2082b), authorizing the board of fisheries to re-establish the line, or lines, of the original survey, when in the judgment of the board it becomes necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER GROUND—LEASES—STATUTES.

Code 1904, § 2137a, providing that when the rents for oyster ground are paid annually in advance the state will guarantee the absolute right to the renter to continue to occupy the same for 20 years, applies only to leases of ground authorized by statute to be leased to planters, and does not estop the state to require the surrender of oyster ground within the Baylor survey, though illegally leased by an oyster inspector without authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

6. FISH (§ 7*)—OYSTER GROUND—LEASES.

Under the express provisions of Code 1887, §§ 1338, 2153, 2341 (Code 1904, pp. 750, 1090, 1157), a lease of a natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal by the state, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 251*)—"DUE PROCESS OF LAW."

"Due process of law" requires that a person shall have reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard before an impartial tribunal, before any binding decree or order can be made affecting his rights to liberty or property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 732; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2227-2256; vol. 8, p. 7644.]

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 278*)—PROPAGATION—FISHERIES—PROCEEDINGS—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Code 1887, § 2153, as amended by Act Feb. 25, 1892 (Acts 1891-92, p. 599, c. 363), being Code 1904, p. 1090, providing that no person shall stake or use for oyster planting any natural oyster bed, nor continue to occupy the same, and conferring power on the oyster inspector to remove all the stakes, etc., if, after notice, the occupants refuse to remove the same, and providing, not only for reasonable notice, but an opportunity to be heard before the board of fisheries, and making its decision conclusive of all controversies with respect to the same, provides due process of law, so that an order of such commission, requiring the surrender of certain natural oyster beds, was not objectionable, as depriving the complainant of its property without due process of law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nansemond County.

Suit by the Hampton Roads Oyster Packers' & Planters' Association against the Commission of Fisheries and others. From a decree perpetuating an injunction in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

The Attorney General and W. W. Old & Son, for appellants. Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This appeal brings under review the decree of the circuit court of Nansemond county, perpetuating an injunction theretofore awarded on a bill filed by appellee against the board of fisheries of Virginia and each member thereof, and one Reps Williamson, oyster inspector of Nansemond county, restraining the appellants, each of them, and their agents, etc., from requiring appellee to remove the stakes which mark the boundary of certain oyster planting ground situated in the Nansemond river in Nansemond county, occupied and claimed by appellee by virtue of successive assignments from one T. R. Gaskins and others, to whom the disputed ground was assigned in 1894 and 1895 by the then oyster inspector of Nansemond county, the original assignments having been made under the act of the Legislature approved March 5, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 840, c. 743) the area of the disputed ground being 182.29 acres.

There is no controversy here as to the history of appellee's claim to the grounds in dispute, the crucial question with respect to the title asserted by it being whether or not those under whom it claims ever acquired title to this ground for oyster planting purposes; it being claimed by appellants that this ground is within the lines known as the "Baylor Survey," and therefore under the law could not have been assigned to any one for oyster propagation or other purpose. In other words, the questions presented on this appeal are: (1) Is the disputed ground within the Baylor survey? (2) If so, has the appellee, notwithstanding this fact, the right, as it contends, to hold the ground under its contract with the state? and (3) has any due process of law been provided, through which these questions may be heard and determined?

The learned judge of the circuit court gave the following reasons for the decree complained of:

"(1) That the evidence does not show that the land of the Hampton Roads Oyster Packers' & Planters' Association is within the lines of the public oyster grounds of the state, commonly known as the Baylor survey.

"(2) That the act of the General Assembly of Virginia, approved February 21, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 512, c. 474), which appears as section 2139a of the Code of Virginia of 1904, under which petitioners sought to require the removal of the stakes of the association from said grounds, and to permit oyster tongmen to enter the same as public oyster grounds, is unconstitutional and void, in that it fails to provide any notice to be given to the planter or lessee of the property of any procedure under which his rights could be adjudicated, and fails to make provision for any adjudication of his rights after notice, and that the said act, if enforced, will have the effect of depriving the said association of its property without due process of law."

The following facts appear with respect to the proceedings had before the Board of Fisheries of Virginia and the Commission of Fisheries (appellant), the latter being the successor to the former, which proceedings culminated in the order of the appellant, enjoined by the circuit court of Nansemond county in this cause, to wit:

On June 20, 1904, more than 10 citizens of the county of Nansemond, in accordance with section 2082b of the Code, made an application in writing to the Board of Fisheries to have the lines of the Baylor survey re-established and permanently marked in the Nineteenth district of Nansemond county, and gave bond and security as provided by said section.

On the same date an order was entered by the Board of Fisheries appointing Fred E. Rudiger to make the survey, and on January 18, 1905, the order of June 20, 1904, was so amended as to substitute A. B. Edmonds, of Newport News, a civil engineer, in the place of Rudiger, Rudiger having been unable to make the survey, owing to previous engagements, and Edmonds was ordered to proceed as soon as possible to make it.

On or before July 19, 1905, Edmonds filed his report, and on that date an order was entered by the Board of Fisheries, after a hearing, on the report and survey of Edmonds, relocating and re-establishing the lines of the Baylor survey in the Nineteenth district of Nansemond county, approving the report and survey; and, after reciting that the plat showed certain encroachments on the public grounds by various parties, a resolution was adopted by the board as follows:

"Therefore, be it further resolved, that all parties appearing by said plat to have encroached upon the public grounds, be notified to appear before this board at its next meeting, and show cause why said encroachments should not forthwith be declared public grounds, and their stakes upon the same be at once removed; to wit: * * * Hampton Roads Oyster Planting & Packing Company, 176 acres * * *"; the Hampton Roads Oyster Packing & Planting Company mentioned being the Hampton Roads Oyster Packers' & Planters' Association, appellee here.

There was a hearing on the survey and report of Edmonds, on August 18, 1905, all of the parties having been notified, and argument by counsel for appellee heard, whereupon the board decided it had jurisdiction in the matter, and the cause was continued to a subsequent meeting of the board to be held at Norfolk, Va., Wednesday, the 6th day of September, 1905, and all the defendants in the cause being present in person, or through their attorneys, waived the requirements of public notice of the proceedings.

On September 19, 1905 (the meeting of the board having been held on September 6th, and continued to this date) the board after a hearing (appellee being represented by one or more of its officers and by counsel) decided that the survey filed by Edmonds on the 19th day of July, 1905, showed a much larger acreage than the plat held by appellee, showing the original assignment for 216 acres of ground; and, there being a contention between appellee and Edmonds as to the correctness of the survey of the grounds by Edmonds, the board directed that the matter be recommitted to Edmonds, with instructions that he go upon the grounds as staked off and claimed by appellee, together with such surveyor as it should select, and that the said surveyors should retrace the work of Edmonds as to it being correct, or otherwise, and, further, should survey and plat the entire number of acres of ground held by appellee under the original assignment, reproducing said original plat, and, further, to make survey of the entire holdings of the grounds of appellee, showing the entire number of acres held, and the number of acres held within the Baylor survey, and make report of same to the board at its meeting to be held in Norfolk on October 18, 1905.

At the meeting of the board held on October 18, 1905, a hearing was had (appellee being represented by its officers, and by counsel) on the report of Edmonds on the part of the Board of Fisheries, and B. P. Baker, the county surveyor of Nansemond county, on the part of appellee, as to the correctness of the survey of Edmonds filed on July 19, 1905, which survey showed an encroachment by appellee of 176 acres. The survey and report of said surveyors showed that holdings of appellee within the Baylor survey aggregated 182.29 acres, and the board decided that the appellee was not holding the said grounds by its own default, but by virtue of authority vested in it by the former holders thereof. After hearing evidence and argument by counsel the board further decided that appellee had, from time to time since acquiring assignment, planted oysters and shells thereon, but had not acquired vested rights in the 182.29 acres of public grounds in question; that appellee was entitled to a reasonable time within which to remove its planted oysters and shells therefrom, as provided by statute approved February 21, 1900, and ordered that the assignment of 182.29 acres of ground, shown to be within the Baylor survey, be revoked and annulled; that appellee should have until the 30th day of April, 1907, in which to remove its planted oysters from the grounds as shown by a diagram laid before the board, aggregating ——— acres; that appellee should have until the 31st day of March, 1908, in which to remove its oysters and shells from the remainder of said 182.29 acres of ground, aggregating ——— acres, as shown by said diagram, upon which shells were planted, said removal of planted oysters and shells to be made under the terms and conditions as provided by statute, and thereafter appellee should be required to remove all stakes and obstructions from said grounds, and the same was declared to be within the Baylor survey and public oyster grounds, and to be used as such after said dates, and the board further directed the report and plat to be filed and recorded in the Nansemond county clerk's office, together with the decision as to said grounds, all of which were duly filed and recorded.

On March 30, 1906, appellee by its attorneys appeared before the board and asked for additional time in which to remove its planted oysters and shells from said grounds as regulated and fixed by the order of the 18th day of October, 1905, and the board, owing to the absence of parties and conflicting interests, declined to render any decision.

Appellee, by its officer, or officers, and by counsel, again appeared before the board on March 21, 1907, and petitioned that the time to remove the oysters be extended from April 30, 1907, to April 30, 1908, every effort "having been made by it to remove the same without being able to do so," and that matter was continued until the next meeting of the board.

On July 24, 1907, statements and arguments were made before appellant, the Commission of Fisheries, and the matter argued at length, both sides appearing by counsel, and the board recommended and ordered that the 182.29 acres of public oyster grounds encroached on by appellee, on which it had planted oysters, and as to which the former Board of Fisheries allowed until the 30th day of April, 1907, within which to remove said oysters, be opened to the public on September 15, 1907, and the stakes of appellee defining the same be removed, and placed on the true lines of the oyster grounds which it was entitled to hold.

Thereupon appellee, on or about September 14, 1907, filed its bill in this cause, and upon the filing of this bill an injunction was awarded in pursuance of the prayer thereof enjoining appellants from removing the stakes which mark the boundary of the ground in the bill mentioned, and from taking from appellee the possession thereof, and enjoining and restraining them from taking oysters, or causing same to be taken therefrom, and from in any way interfering with or molesting appellee in its possession, occupancy, use, or enjoyment thereof.

On November 1, 1907, appellants filed their demurrer, and also their answer, in the nature of a cross-bill, and on November 4, 1907, appellee filed its demurrer and answer to the cross-bill and an amended and supplemental bill, and afterwards appellants filed their answer to the amended and supplemental bill, and other proceedings were had, so that, on the hearing of the cause upon the pleadings and the depositions of witnesses on behalf of the respective parties, the decree under review was rendered.

Before reviewing the statutes bearing upon the issues involved, it should be noted that "The Board on the Chesapeake and its Tributaries" was, under the statute, succeeded by the "Board of Fisheries," and the latter by appellant, the "Commission of Fisheries."

By constitutional provision (section 2, art. 10, of former Constitution, and section 175 of the present [Code 1904, p. cclxiv]) and numerous acts of the General Assembly the state has jealously sought to guard and protect the natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals in the bays, rivers, etc., of the commonwealth, so that they may be held "in trust for the benefit of the people of this state, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the General Assembly may prescribe, but the General Assembly may, from time to time, define and determine such natural beds, rocks or shoals, by surveys or otherwise."

Deeming it necessary to define and determine the natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals so held by the state, on February 29, 1892 (Acts 1891-92, p. 816, c. 511), the General Assembly passed the act entitled "An act to protect the oyster industry of the commonwealth," and under that act the survey known as the "Baylor Survey" was made. The act, after providing that the Board on the Chesapeake and its Tributaries should, as soon as possible, cause to be made a true and accurate survey of the natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals of the commonwealth; how the survey was to be made, the maps and charts to be prepared, returned, and filed along with a report of the survey in the clerk's office of each and every county in which there was found natural oyster beds, rocks, or shoals; what the report should be, accompanied by true and accurate notes in writing of the survey, setting forth a description of the lines, with courses and distances, and a description of such landmarks as might be necessary to enable the oyster inspector to find and ascertain the boundary lines and limits of the natural oyster rocks, beds, and shoals, etc.; that said report should be completed and transmitted to the Board on the Chesapeake and its Tributaries within three months after the completion of the survey, and the board should cause the same to be published in pamphlet form, and transmit copies thereof to the clerk of the county court of the counties where the charts had been filed, or directed to be filed, as in the act thereinbefore provided for, the said report to be filed by the clerks of the several counties;—further provided: "Said survey and report, when so filed, shall be, and construed to be, in all the courts of this commonwealth, as conclusive evidence of the boundaries and limits of the natural oyster beds, rocks and shoals lying within the waters of the counties wherein such survey and report are filed; provided, if any natural oyster rock, bed or shoal is left out in these surveys, they shall not be used for planting grounds, but shall be subject to the general oyster laws of the state."

The act just referred to was, on March 2, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 605, c. 559), amended; the amendment, which took effect from its passage, appearing in the Code of 1904 as section 2130a, and so far as pertinent to the issues in this case is as follows: "And the said survey and report, when so filed, shall be, and construed to be, in all of the courts of the commonwealth, as conclusive evidence of the boundaries and limits of all the natural oyster beds, rocks and shoals, lying within the waters of the counties wherein said survey and report are filed; and shall be construed to mean in all of the said courts that there are no natural oyster beds, rocks, or shoals lying within the waters of the counties wherein such report and survey are filed other than those embraced in the survey authorized by this act; provided that the said survey and report shall not be so construed in any pending trial or proceeding in any court upon any assignment made prior to the twenty-fifth day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-two."

Section 2137 of the Code of 1887 relates to assignment of oyster planting grounds and the duties and powers of oyster inspectors, and this section was amended on February 25, 1892 (Acts 1891-92, p. 596, c. 363), and sets out more fully by whom, and the steps, to be taken, and the procedure to be had, in order to obtain a lease of any part of the residue of the beds of the bays, rivers, and creeks of the state in excess of what was reserved for the riparian owner, other than the natural beds or rocks, the duties of the oyster inspector to whom application may be made for a lease of oyster planting grounds, the number of acres which might be assigned to any one applicant, etc.; and that section was again amended on March 5, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 842, c. 743), but that amendment was inconsequential. Under section 2137 of the Code, supra, the oyster inspector himself had to locate and assign the oyster planting grounds, while under the amendments, supra, which were in force from their passage, the applicant himself has to give to the inspector certain information, so as to enable him to survey and assign the ground applied for, and the inspector has to make the assignment, provided he ascertains it not to be natural oyster rock, bed, or shoal; i. e., that the ground applied for is not, nor any part thereof, within the lines of the Baylor survey. Under this statute so amended the assignments were made to Gaskins and others, through whom appellee claims the grounds here in question; and that they were made subsequent to the date the act and its amendment took effect is not, and could not be, controverted.

That the acts of the inspector in making these assignments were purely ministerial, and none the less so because he had to determine the existence of facts which made it necessary for him to act, is settled by the decision of this court in Lewis v. Christian, 101 Va. 135, 43 S. E. 331.

That case also recognizes that under the existing statutes the limits and boundaries of the natural oyster rocks, beds, and shoals in every county in the state are conclusively established by the survey, and report made by the fish commissioners—i. e., the Baylor survey—and the report, etc., returned and filed therewith, the only question which the oyster inspector is required to determine in reference to these matters being whether a particular oyster rock is natural oyster rock according to said survey and report; and if so, and stakes have been placed on the natural oyster rock or beds, it becomes his imperative duty to have them removed.

What may be the effect of the assignment of oyster grounds within the lines of the Baylor survey, whether done purposely or by mistake, is a subject more properly to be discussed in another branch of this case.

As appears in the statement above of the proceedings had before appellant, Commission of Fisheries, and its predecessors in office, A. B. Edmonds, a competent surveyor, acting on the part of the Board of Fisheries, and B. P. Baker, the county surveyor of Nansemond county, on the part of appellee, agreed that the survey previously made by Edmonds was correct, and that this survey showed an encroachment by appellee upon the grounds within the limits of the Baylor survey, re-established and permanently marked in the Nineteenth district of Nansemond county, to the extent of 182.29 acres, the acreage which is here the subject of controversy.

What the evidence was to substantiate the assignments to Gaskins on October 8, 1894, and to one Lilliston on the 8th of May, 1895, through whom appellee claims, does not appear in the record, so that whether the fact, as reported by Edmonds and the county surveyor of Nansemond county, that appellee has within its grounds, as staked off, 182.29 acres of natural oyster rock, which is really within the Baylor survey, is due to an intentional ultra vires act, or to a mistake on the part of the oyster inspector in making the assignments to Gaskins and Lilliston, or to the moving out of the stakes marking the boundaries of the acreage within the limits of those assignments, so as to take in the disputed grounds, is not by any means made clear by the evidence before us; and perhaps this is immaterial.

It is also to be noted that in the foregoing statement it appears that appellee, at least seemingly, acquiesced in the establishment of the lines of the Nineteenth district of Nansemond county by Surveyor Edmonds, concurred in by the county surveyor of Nansemond county, the latter of appellee's own selection, and accepted the terms of the Board of Fisheries as to the time within which the planted oysters on the disputed grounds should be removed, and did not present its bill in this cause until the day before the time allowed by the board for the removal of planted shells and oysters from the disputed ground was to expire, viz., September 15, 1907; the time originally allowed by the order of the board, made October 18, 1905, having been, at the solicitation of appellee, from time to time extended, so that it was to expire on September 15, 1907, nearly two years after the original order was made, and the bill was only then filed by reason of the board's refusal to grant further time.

We deem it wholly unnecessary to consider the question, extensively argued upon the briefs of counsel, whether or not appellee should be estopped by its acts to deny appellants' right and authority to require the planted oysters and shells upon the disputed grounds to be removed, and the stakes marking the grounds moved to their proper location. In our view of the case the right and duty of appellants to have these oysters and shells removed, and the marks of the true line of the Baylor survey re-established, became fixed and determined by the re-establishment by Edmonds and Baker of the limits and boundaries of the Nineteenth district of Nansemond county, as fixed by the Baylor survey.

As we have seen, the statute in its original form made the survey and the report made pursuant to the statute conclusive in all the courts of the commonwealth that the grounds included therein are natural oyster rocks, beds, or shoals, and could not be leased to any one for oyster planting purposes; and, by the amendment to the statute of March 2, 1894, supra, "said survey and report," when so filed, "shall be construed to mean in all the said courts that there are no natural oyster rocks, beds or shoals lying within the waters of the counties wherein such report and survey are filed, other than those embraced in the survey authorized by this act." It was plainly the intent and purpose of the Legislature to make the survey and report of the limits and boundaries of the natural oyster rocks, beds, and shoals, authorized to be made conclusive evidence, in all the courts of the commonwealth, upon two propositions: First, that the grounds within the boundaries and limits of the report and survey are natural oyster beds, rocks, or shoals; and, second, that there are no natural oyster beds, rocks, or shoals lying within the waters of the counties wherein such report and survey are filed other than those embraced within the report and survey.

The probative force and effect given to a survey and report made and filed pursuant to the statute as amended, supra, authorizing and requiring the making and filing of the Baylor survey, is in no degree changed or impaired by Acts 1899-1900, p. 307, c. 280, as amended and now section 2082b, supra, and which authorized the Board of Fisheries to re-establish the line, or lines, of the Baylor survey, when in the judgment of the board it became necessary. The latter act is in aid of the former, and clearly but an amendment thereto, and became an integral part thereof. Therefore a survey and report, duly made and filed pursuant to the statute as amended, re-establishing a line, or lines, of the original Baylor survey, is entitled to the same probative force and effect in the courts of the commonwealth as is given by statute to the Baylor survey as originally made. If this were not so, section 2082b of the Code would serve to defeat the very purpose of the Legislature to locate, determine, and define conclusively the boundaries and limits of the natural oyster rocks, beds, and shoals within the waters of the commonwealth, and throw open a flood gate of litigation with respect to such boundaries and limits whenever it might be found necessary to re-establish a line, or lines, of the Baylor survey, caused by the removal or displacement, from one cause or another, of the stakes, buoys, or other marks used originally in marking and locating such line or lines.

The wisdom of the Legislature in giving to a survey and report of the oyster beds, rocks, and shoals in the waters of the commonwealth the probative force and effect that it did is demonstrated by the wide range this litigation and the evidence relied on in support of appellee's contentions have taken. There would be no end to litigation concerning the limits of the Baylor survey if the appellant the Commission of Fisheries could be called on to litigate in the courts the correctness of every survey re-establishing a line, or lines, of the Baylor survey, and that question to be determined upon a mere preponderance of the evidence that might be adduced. It was plainly the purpose of the Legislature to put an end to such litigation by establishing a final arbiter of all questions as to the location of a line, or lines, of the Baylor survey, and to relieve the officers of the state in charge of the oyster industry from litigation in the courts concerning the same.

Conceding, however, for the sake of argument, that the survey and report made by Edmonds October 18, 1905, and verified and approved by Baker, who was selected by appellee to act on its behalf, is not to be treated as conclusively showing that the 182.29 acres of disputed ground is within the limits of the Baylor survey, we are nevertheless of opinion that the evidence in the case establishes the correctness of Edmonds' survey and report.

Appellee's immediate assignor of the grounds which include the disputed acreage was J. D. Armstrong, and when Armstrong made this assignment on July 1, 1908, there was no survey, the lines being given by Armstrong, or the men he had there, and this is admitted by the officers and employes of the appellee testifying in this case. When the holdings of Armstrong of 216 acres were assigned to him and Lilliston on September 1, 1895, a survey was made by P. St. J. Wilson, deputy surveyor of Nansemond county, which survey included the grounds assigned to Gaskins October 8, 1894, and to Lilliston May 8, 1895, and the testimony of Wilson clearly shows that the whole of the acreage of that survey was outside of the Baylor lines of public ground No. 1, Nineteenth district of Nansemond county. Wilson says that the southern line of public ground No. 1, viz., the line from corner No. 1 to corner No. 4, coincided with the northern line of the property surveyed by him at that time for Armstrong and Lilliston, now claimed by appellee, that he made a survey of the southern line of public ground No. 1, and located by instruments the two corners thereof, viz., corner No. 1 and corner No. 4, according to a pamphlet, entitled "Nansemond County Oyster Records, Distances, Bearings," etc., and a plat, entitled "James River Chart No. 4; Public Oyster Grounds, State of Va., 1892, surveyed under the direction of J. B. Baylor, Asst. U. S. Coast & Geodetic Survey" (Baylor's notes), filed with the deposition of Edmonds, and verified by the witness Smith, as being copies of the survey and report filed in Nansemond county clerk's office June 23, 1894, pursuant to the act of February 29, 1892, as amended March 2, 1894, and that he (Wilson) then located the 216 acres outside of the lines of public ground No. 1.

Wilson is not only shown to be a surveyor of much experience, but we are unable to find any evidence in the record to refute or contradict his evidence in this respect; nor is there evidence to show that the stakes were at that time located correctly and in accordance with the survey of Wilson; he having no recollection of this fact.

Baker, who had been county surveyor of Nansemond county from 1872 to January 1, 1908, testifies that on January 23, 1900, by virtue of some court order, either of the Nansemond county court or of the Board of Fisheries, he made a survey of the Baylor line of public ground No. 1, from corner 1 to corner 4; that he and Wilson ran that line in order that the tongers could know their line, and Armstrong's people their lines; that he planted about 20 buoys on the line; that Armstrong claimed in establishing these lines that they ran across two beds of his planted oysters, and consequently he claimed beyond, he owning the property at the time of this survey of which he and Lilliston had been in possession since 1895. So that, if the stakes were correctly located on September 21, 1895, it is to be noted that their location, according to Baker's testimony, had either been changed, or if ever correctly located, were certainly not prior to January 23, 1900.

Baker was asked: "Did you find the lines and stakes there on the property owned by Mr. Armstrong within the Baylor survey? A. He did not have any stakes. We were to establish that line. Q. Did you find that the property claimed by Mr. Armstrong was in the lines of the Baylor survey, or not? A. No. Q. In other words, you say Mr. Armstrong had no stakes? A. We did not see any stakes. Mr. Armstrong was along, and we did not see any stakes. Q. Can you say by looking at this plat [an exhibit with the pleadings] the property was the same as claimed by Mr. Armstrong at that time? A. I can't say. Q. In other words, you said you surveyed public ground from No. 1 to No. 4? A. Yes. Q. Did you see any stakes there? A. There were some stakes, but I don't know anything about them. There were stakes all around, every which way, but there was nothing to designate any lines of Armstrong; and if there were, nothing was said to us. We went there under order of the court to establish the lines, and we did so."

Wilson, who made the survey of September 21, 1895 (mentioned above), further testifies that upon request he was present at the survey of January 23, 1900; that at that time, as well as he could remember, the line (meaning doubtless the line from corner No. 1 to corner No. 4) was relocated; that the stakes of the property claimed by Armstrong were within the lines of public ground No. 1; and that he could not recall whether they were moved back into their original places on that day.

From this evidence one of two things must be true: Either that the stakes were, at the time of the survey of January 23, 1900, correctly placed along the Baylor line from corner No. 1 to corner No. 4, and afterwards moved within the lines of public ground No. 1, or the plat filed by Edmonds on October 18, 1905, showing the encroachment of 182.29 acres, must be incorrect.

The only testimony that the stakes were, at the time of the survey of January 23, 1900, correctly placed along the Baylor line from corner No. 1 to corner No. 4, is that of Williamson, who states that at the time they (doubtless meaning Baker, Wilson, and himself) put Armstrong on the line, but he is corroborated by neither Baker nor Wilson in this statement. Baker's statement is that they placed about 20 buoys on the line, and Wilson had no recollection of this.

By concession of the general manager of appellee the survey and location of appellee's ground by Edmonds and Baker is correct, except as to the line from corner No. 1 to corner No. 4. That this disputed line was run and rechecked by Edmonds and Baker is testified to by both, and a very strong and significant corroboration of their testimony is to be found in the fact that appellee, upon the report of that survey, applied to the Board of Fisheries and obtained time within which to remove its planted oysters and shells within the limits of the Baylor survey; that it applied for and received, as a matter of grace, an extension of the time, and never assailed the correctness of the Edmonds-Baker survey and report in court until a further extension of time was denied by the board, and nearly two years after that plat and report had been finally acted upon by the board.

We might review the oral testimony further, but to do so would serve no purpose other than to show another demonstration of the wisdom of the legislative intention to make the Baylor survey and report, and the survey and report of a surveyor duly appointed to re-establish a line, or lines, of the Baylor survey, conclusive evidence in all the courts of the commonwealth that the grounds within the limits of such survey and report are natural oyster rocks, beds, or shoals, and that there are no natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals lying within the waters of the counties wherein such report and survey are filed other than those embraced in the survey.

The view that the Baylor survey and the Edmonds-Baker survey re-establishing the lines of public ground No. 1 in Nineteenth district, Nansemond county, as surveyed and located by the Baylor survey and report, are conclusive, and could not be challenged by subsequent proceedings in court, is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gardner v. Bonestell, 180 U. S. 362, 21 Sup. Ct. 399, 45 L. Ed. 574, where it was held: "It is a well-settled rule of law that power to make and correct surveys of public lands belongs exclusively to the political department of the government, and that the action of that department within the scope of its authority is unassailable in the courts, except by a direct proceeding. The determination by the Land Department, in a case within its jurisdiction, of questions of fact depending on conflicting testimony, is conclusive, and cannot be challenged by a subsequent proceeding in the courts."

And in a still later case (Bates & Guild Co. v. Payne, 194 U. S. 103, 24 Sup. Ct. 595, 48 L. Ed. 894) the same court held that, where the decision of questions of fact is committed by Congress to the judgment and discretion of the head of a department, his decision thereon is conclusive; and, even upon mixed questions of law and fact, or of law alone, his action will carry with it a strong presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review it, although they have the power, and will occasionally exercise the right, of so doing. In the course of the opinion it is said: "It has long been the settled practice of this court in land cases to treat the findings of the Land Department upon questions of fact as conclusive, although such proceedings involve, to a certain extent, the exercise of judicial power. As was said in Burfenning v. Chicago, St. Paul, etc., R. R., 163 U. S. 821, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, 41 L. Ed. 175: "Whether, for instance, a certain tract is swamp land or not, saline land or not, mineral land or not, presents a question of fact not resting on record, dependent on oral testimony; and it cannot be doubted that the decision of the Land Department, one way or the other, in reference to these questions is conclusive and not open to litigation in the courts, except in those cases of fraud, etc., which permit any determination to be re-examined"—citing with approval Gardner v. Bonestell, supra.

The second contention of appellee (i. e., if it be determined that the preponderance of evidence shows that the 182.29 acres of disputed grounds are within the lines of the Baylor survey as re-established by the Edmonds-Baker survey) that, notwithstanding such location of the grounds in dispute, appellee is entitled to the use of the property, rests solely upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel, whereby the state is estopped to claim appellee's ground under the facts of this case, or else upon the erroneous theory that appellee, having acquired a lease of these grounds from the state and paid the rent therefor, has an irrevocable right to the use of the grounds for the statutory period of 20 years.

This contention leaves wholly out of view the fact that, if it be public oyster grounds, neither appellee nor its assignors ever could have acquired, by contract of lease or otherwise, the right to use these grounds for any purpose, but they are by law held in trust for the use and benefit of all the citizens of the state.

It is very true that section 2137a of the statute, now chapter 97 of the Code of 1904, relating to the protection of the oyster industry of the commonwealth, contains this clause: "When the above amounts [rents for grounds leased for oyster planting purposes] are paid, then so long as the rent is paid annually in advance the state will guarantee the absolute right to the renter to continue to use and occupy the same for the period of twenty years thereunder acquired"—but clearly the protection of that provision of the statute only applies where the lease was made of oyster planting grounds authorized by the statutes to be leased to planters, and not where the acts of the oyster inspector in making a lease were ultra vires. If that were not so—i. e., if the lessee or renter, notwithstanding the acts of the inspector in making the lease, were ultra vires, be entitled, under section 2137a, supra, to hold the leased ground—why should the Legislature, as a matter of grace, have authorized the officers of the state charged with the supervision and control of the oyster grounds and the oyster industry of the commonwealth, in their discretion, to allow a reasonable time within which a renter could remove his planted oysters or shells from grounds found to have been erroneously leased to him, either by mistake or otherwise? Natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals cannot be leased at all, or title thereto acquired, or private use thereof made, and the constitutional provision supra, as well as the statutes, steadfastly guard against interference with the citizens of the state in their right to take oysters therefrom, subject only to the regulations of the statutes as to season, etc.

That this has been the policy of the state, steadfastly adhered to, we need only refer to the following statutes in force when the leases under which appellee claims were made, and when it took an assignment of those leases: Section 1333 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 750), provides that no grant shall be issued by the register of the land office to pass any estate or interest of the commonwealth in any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal, whether the bed, rock, or shoal ebb bare or not.

Section 2153 of the Code of 1887, as amended February 25, 1892 (Acts 1891-92, p. 599, c. 363), being Code 1904, p. 1090, provides that no person shall stake in, or use for the purpose of planting oysters or shells, or for depositing oysters while making up a cargo for market, any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal, or any part thereof, nor shall continue to occupy the same, if occupied and staked off, with power to the oyster inspector to remove all stakes, etc., if, after notice, the person refuses to remove same.

And section 2341 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 1157), provides that grants by the register of the land office of any estate or interest in any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal, whether the same ebbed bare or not, should be absolutely void.

The remaining assignment of error, which presents the question whether or not the order of the Board of Fisheries, directing the stakes of appellee to be removed from the grounds within the lines of the Baylor survey as re-established by the Edmonds-Baker survey and report and the statute under which the order was made, is the taking of appellee's property without due process of law is upon reason and authority so obviously against the contention of appellee that an extended discussion of the question is unnecessary.

It is very true that "due process of law" requires that a person shall have reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard, before an impartial tribunal, before any binding decree or order can be made affecting his rights to liberty or property; but this constitutional safeguard cannot avail appellee upon the uncontradicted facts as to the proceedings before the Board of Fisheries and the Commission of Fisheries touching this controversy. The proceedings were had before the Board of Fisheries and its successor in office, a department of the state government to whose judgment and discretion the Legislature has committed the supervision and control of the natural oyster beds, rocks, and shoals within the waters of the commonwealth, as well as the oyster industry of the commonwealth, and made the decision of that tribunal conclusive of all controversies with respect to the same. The proceedings in this case before that tribunal were in strict accordance with the requirements of the statute, and not only did appellee have reasonable notice thereof, but every reasonable opportunity to be heard, and was heard, from time to time before the order it now complains of was made by the board. It would be difficult to find a case in which the required "due process of law" has been more fully met and complied with.

In the case of Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 23 Sup. Ct. 390, 47 L. Ed. 563, in point here, the following is quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice Matthews in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232, reviewing at length the authorities and discussing the elements of due process of law: "It follows that any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age or custom, or merely devised in the discretion of the legislative power in the furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these privileges of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law." See, also, Murray v. Hoboken L. Co., 18 How. 272, 15 L. Ed. 372; Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552.

The principles announced in Violett v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 23 S. E. 909, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825, have no application here. In that case the title of the owner of the property proposed to be taken for a public use without compensation was not questioned; while here no property of appellee to which it has title, or could have acquired title to, or interest in, is taken, or proposed to be taken.

In Richardson v. United States (C. C.) 100 Fed. 714, the plaintiffs sued the United States for compensation for certain lands taken for public purposes by the United States in dredging out the channel of a river, under the act of Congress, in which the plaintiffs claimed the right to about 40 acres of bottom, assigned to them under the laws of Virginia for oyster planting purposes. It appeared that the assignment of these grounds was not made in conformity with statutory authority; and the opinion of the court, after a review of the Virginia statute, and declaring that an assignment of oyster planting grounds not authorized by the statute will not even serve to confer upon the assignee color of title, but is void, says: "Can the petitioners, in the face of this statute so in evidence, come into this court and put the United States in their place, and ask just compensation for lands held, used, and occupied by them unlawfully?"

In Silliman v. F. O. & Ch. R. R., 27 Grat. 119, the following is quoted with approval:

"In every instance (Mr. Justice Miller said in delivering the opinion, in which a majority of the court concurred, in the Floyd Acceptances Case, 7 Wall. 680, 19 L. Ed. 169) a person making a contract with the government, through its officers and agents, must look to the statutes under authority of which the agent as officer proposes to act, and see for himself that his contract comes within the terms of the law. The same rule would apply, a fortiori, to persons making contracts with the agents or officers of bodies corporate."

An oyster inspector is but an agent of the state to perform the duties delegated to him by statute, and all persons dealing with him must exercise care as to the extent of his authority and powers, and they are presumed to know the statutes under which he is called upon to act. This is but the general doctrine applying to all agencies, and the authorities are uniform that all acts of an agent outside of the scope of his authority are ultra vires and void. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L., p. 981, and note, page 988, and note; State v. Chilton, 49 W. Va. 453, 39 S. E. 612; N. Y., etc., Co. v. Harrison (C. C.) 16 Fed. 688; Story's Agency (9th Ed.) § 307a; Mechem's Pub. Off. 512; Mayor, etc., v. Eschbach, 18 Md. 276; Delafield v. State 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 192.

The powers and duties of all governmental officers are "limited and defined" by law, by statute where one exists, as in this case, and the law is the sole criterion of authority; and no custom can enlarge or vitiate it. Floyd Acceptances Cases, 7 Wall. 666, 19 L. Ed. 169; Davis v. Gordon, 87 Va. 564, 13 S. E. 35.

In Stainback v. Read & Co., 11 Grat. 286, 62 Am. Dec. 648, the court said: "It is equally well settled that a party dealing with an agent acting under a written authority must take notice of the extent and limits of that authority. He is to be regarded as dealing with the power before him, and he must at his peril observe that the act done by the agent is legally identical with the act authorized by the power."

The principle applies as well where the agency is that of a public officer, clothed with defined and limited powers and prescribed duties to be found in existing laws, as where the agency is created by writing signed by an individual firm or corporation. See, also, Mayor of Baltimore, etc., v. Reynolds, 20 Md. 1, 83 Am. Dec. 535.

We are of opinion that upon every branch of this case the decree complained of is erroneous, and has to be reversed and annulled; and this court will enter the decree the circuit court should have entered, dissolving the injunction awarded appellee and perpetuated, and dismissing appellee's bill

DONITHAN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 17, 1909.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 216*)—UNLAWFUL SALE—CIDER—INDICTMENT—"ARDENT SPIRITS."

Under Acts 1908, p. 275, c. 189, § 1, declaring that all mixtures, preparations, and liquids which will produce intoxication shall be deemed "ardent spirits," within the meaning of the act, an indictment charging the sale of spirituous and malt liquors, whisky, brandy, wine, ale, beer, or mixtures thereof is insufficient to sustain a conviction, on proof of sale of cider which would produce intoxication, since while all spirituous liquors are intoxicating, and all intoxicating liquors are ardent by force of the statute, not all ardent liquors are not spirituous liquors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 230-233; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 491.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.

One Donithan was convicted of unlawful sale of liquors, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. C. Gilmer and J. L. Wysor, for appellant. William A. Anderson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. Donithan was indicted in the circuit court of Pulaski county for the unlawful sale by retail of "spirituous and malt liquors, whisky, brandy, wine, ale, beer, or mixtures thereof." Upon the trial the evidence failed to prove the sale of any of the articles specifically mentioned in the indictment, but evidence was admitted of the sale of cider which produced intoxication, and upon this proof the jury rendered a verdict against the defendant, and fixed his fine at $50, upon which judgment was entered.

During the progress of the trial the defendant excepted to the ruling of the court allowing the witness to testify as to the sale of intoxicating cider, upon the ground that no such offense was charged in the indictment, and this ruling presents the only question which need be here considered.

The sale of cider cannot be brought within the terms of the indictment, unless cider is to be considered a spirituous liquor, as it certainly is not a malt liquor, whisky, brandy, wine, ale, beer, or any mixture thereof.

Section 1 of the act of assembly approved March 12, 1908 (Acts Assem. 1908, p. 275, c. 189), declares, that "all mixtures, preparations and liquids which will produce intoxication shall be deemed ardent spirits, within the meaning of this act."

If, therefore, the term "ardent spirits" had been used in the indictment, there would have been room to contend (though we do not here decide) that the charge would have been supported by the proof of sale of any mixture, preparation, or liquid which would produce intoxication. But while all spirituous liquors are intoxicating, and all intoxicating liquors are by force of the statute ardent spirits, it is certain that all ardent spirits are not spirituous liquors. Malt liquors, for instance, are intoxicating, but cannot be classified as spirituous. 17 A. & E. Enc. L. 208; State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 53 Am. Rep. 79; Commonwealth v. Livermore, 4 Gray (Mass.) 20; Feldham v. Morrison, 1 Ill. App. 460.

We are of opinion that the indictment does not warrant proof of the sale of cider.

It follows that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the cause remanded, for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with this opinion.

Reversed.

JORDAN & DAVIS et al. v. ANNEX CORPORATION et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 30*)—LIABILITY OF PROMOTER.

A promoter of a corporation is accountable to it as if the relation of principal and agent or of trustee and beneficiary had actually existed; and he is precluded from taking a secret advantage of other stockholders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 98*)—EFFECT OF FRAUD—REMEDIES.

Where a person has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract, he may elect to rescind the same if he can restore what he has received, and sue for the consideration he has paid, or, if he has not paid anything, repudiate the contract, and rely, when sued, on the fraud as a defense, or he may elect to retain what he has received, and bring an action for damages sustained by the deceit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 80*)—STOCK SUBSCRIPTION—EFFECT OF FRAUD BY PROMOTER.

Where the parties cannot be placed in statu quo, a subscription for corporate stock cannot be rescinded for the fraud of the promoter in secretly taking the profit to himself in form of rent of property leased to the corporation, but the remedy of the stockholder is a recovery by the corporation of such profit from the promoter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 565*)—INSOLVENCY—RIGHTS OF FRAUDULENT PROMOTER.

Though the promoter through fraud secretly received a profit to which he was not entitled, on a recovery of such profit by the corporation, he is entitled as a creditor for money actually advanced to share in all the corporate assets.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Jordan & Davis and others against the Annex Corporation and others.

From the decree rendered, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. Randolph Hicks, for plaintiffs in error. Loyall, Taylor & White and H. H. Rumble, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. Prior to March 14, 1907, W. G. Davis and R. E. Jordan, partners trading as Jordan & Davis, Garrett Smith, and Benjamin Lowenberg obtained a charter of incorporation under the name of the Annex Corporation, for the purpose of conducting a hotel business. The firm of Jordan & Davis, Smith, and Lowenberg each subscribed for $5,000 of its capital stock, which was fully paid up. Subsequently each of the said shareholders made advances for the purpose of carrying on the business.

On the 14th of March, 1907, the Annex Corporation entered into an agreement with the Pine Beach Hotel Corporation, by which it leased from the latter a certain parcel of land upon which it agreed to erect a hotel building of the dimensions named in the lease, and to have it ready for use not later than June 1st of that year, and to operate it in the manner provided therein to the end of the Jamestown Exposition, scheduled to close November 30, 1907. It was further provided, among other things, that the lessee was to pay the lessor as rent $5,000 and 10 per cent. of the gross receipts from all sources from the operation of the hotel, was to remove the building within 30 days from the expiration of the lease, and, in the event of nonpayment of the rent or any other breach of the agreement during the lease on the part of the lessee, the lessor had the right to cancel the lease and take possession of the building and all the assets of the lessee thereon, and to operate the same upon certain conditions.

The building provided for was erected and the business conducted until September of that year by the lessee corporation, when Jordan & Davis and Smith instituted this suit.

Briefly stated, and as far as is material to the questions involved in this appeal, in addition to what has already been stated, the complainants (appellants here) allege in their bill that B. Lowenberg, before the creation of the Annex Corporation, represented to them that he had an option from the Pine Beach Hotel Corporation to erect and operate a hotel upon lands adjoining it upon the terms and conditions above stated; that he proposed to organize a corporation to be known as the "Annex Corporation" with a minimum capital of $30,000, of which $15,000 was to be preferred and paid for in cash; that he requested the appellants each to subscribe for $5,000 of the preferred stock, and stated that he would subscribe for the other $5,000; that they inquired of him whether or not there were any promoter's fees or secret profits coming to him, and upon his replying there were not, and that he and they would become stockholders upon the same terms, they, relying on those representations, subscribed for $5,000 each of the said preferred stock, applied for and obtained the charter under the name of the "Annex Corporation," in which the appellants Jordan and Smith, respectively, were named as president and vice president, and said Lowenberg as secretary and treasurer, and all were named as directors, that, after the organization of the company, it made the agreement hereinbefore referred to with the Pine Beach Hotel Corporation, erected and equipped the hotel as required by the lease, and opened the same, expecting large profits to accrue from its operation by reason of the fact that the Jamestown Exposition would be in progress during the term of the lease, but that up to the time of filing their bill their expectations had not been realized and the hotel had been operated at a loss. It was further alleged in the bill that they had just discovered that the $5,000 which the lease provided to be paid to the lessor was a fiction, and that the real agreement between Lowenberg and the Pine Beach Hotel Corporation was that Lowenberg and the Lowenberg Corporation of which he was a stockholder should receive that sum as a promoter's fee, and that it was put in the lease as rent by collusion between the lessor and Lowenberg and the Lowenberg Corporation; that of the said $5,000, $2,500 was paid in cash, and a note for $2,500 made by the lessee to the lessor, and immediately both were turned over by it to the Lowenberg Corporation, which was a large stockholder in the lessor corporation; that, in addition to the amounts due the appellants on account of the fraudulent representations made, the Annex Corporation was indebted in the sum of about $12,000, and that its only asset was the hotel operated by it which was worth nothing more than what the lumber in it would sell for; that the Annex Corporation had been unable to pay the 10 per cent. of its gross income to the lessor as provided for by the lease; that, if the lessor for the failure to pay the rent should take possession and operate the hotel as it had a right to do under the terms of the lease, it would result in loss to all concerned, and this fact was recognized by the lessor, since it was threatening to have the Annex Corporation placed in the hands of a receiver.

The Pine Beach Hotel Corporation, the Annex Corporation, the Lowenberg Corporation, and Benjamin Lowenberg were made parties defendant to the bill.

The prayer of the bill was that the appellants' subscriptions to the stock of the Annex Corporation be annulled; that it be adjudged insolvent and dissolved, and a receiver appointed to distribute its assets to those entitled thereto; that the defendants be required to return to it the said $5,000 unlawfully obtained from it as rent, and apply the same to the liquidation of the claim of appellants; and that so much of their claims as is not thus paid the defendants be required to pay, and for general relief.

The trial court refused to annul the subscriptions of appellants to the stock of the Annex Corporation, holding them to be valid and binding, required B. Lowenberg and the Lowenberg Corporation to pay to the receivers who had been appointed in the cause the sum of $2,500 with interest, and directed the $2,500 note given for the residue of the alleged rent to be surrendered and canceled, and directed the moneys advanced by the said stockholders in excess of their subscriptions to be paid pro rata out of the proceeds of the assets of the Annex Corporation. From that decree this appeal was taken by Jordan & Davis and Garrett Smith.

The first error assigned is to the action of the court in refusing to annul or rescind the contracts of subscription made by the appellants to the stock of the Annex Corporation.

Although a promoter is not strictly an agent of or a trustee for a company before its creation, the principles of law of principal and agent and of trustee and beneficiary have been extended to meet such cases, and a promoter of such a company is accountable to it as if the relation of principal and agent or of trustee and cestui que trust had actually existed. His acts are carefully scrutinized, and he is precluded from taking a secret advantage of other stockholders. See Sydney, etc., Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, 33 Ch. Div. 85; Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U. S. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. 811, 44 L. Ed. 423; Va. Land Co. v. Haupt, 90 Va. 533, 537, 19 S. E. 168, 44 Am. St. Rep. 939; Central Land Co. v. Obenchain, 92 Va. 130, 143, 22 S. E. 876; and note to Telegraph, etc., v. Loetscher, 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. pp. 669, 670.

Where a party has been induced to enter into a contract by fraud, he has in general, as was said in the case of Wilson v. Hundley, 96 Va. 96, 100, 30 S. E. 492, 70 Am. St. Rep. 837, the choice of two remedies. He may elect to rescind the contract, if he can restore what he has received in the same state or condition in which he received it, and sue for and recover back the consideration he has paid or given; or, if he has not paid anything, repudiate the contract and rely when sued upon fraud as a complete defense, or he may elect to retain what he has received under the contract, and bring an action to recover damages for the injury he has sustained by the deceit.

For the fraud of B. Lowenberg which the evidence clearly establishes either the Annex Corporation or the appellants had a cause of action. But under the facts of the case there could be no rescission of the agreement to lease or of the appellants' contracts of subscription because of the changed condition of affairs. When this suit was brought, two-thirds of the time during which the lease was to run had expired, the money paid in by the stockholders had been spent, and the corporation was insolvent. The parties could not be placed in statu quo. The only relief, therefore, that can be had in this case is the recovery of the promoter's fees or profits made by B. Lowenberg or the Lowenberg Corporation. This relief the trial court gave.

It is insisted by the appellees upon cross-assignment of error that in no event were the profits or fees of the promoter more than one half of the $5,000, because, as is claimed, the Lowenberg Corporation was really entitled to one half of the $5,000 as rent, and that only the other half, which was ostensibly due the Pine Beach Hotel Corporation, was the promoter's fee or profit.

The trial court was of opinion that the whole sum of $5,000 agreed to be paid as rent was promoter's profits, and, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, we cannot say that it erred in so holding.

The remaining assignment of error is to the action of the trial court in permitting B. Lowenberg and Pine Beach Hotel Corporation to participate as creditors in the restored promoter's profits.

While the corporation is entitled to recover from the promoter the amount of profits which he has made out of the secret agreement, we know of no rule of law or of equity which deprives him as a creditor of the corporation for money actually advanced by him in carrying on its business from sharing in its assets along with its other creditors.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the decree appealed from, and that it should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SAVAGE v. CAUTHORN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 569*) — RECORD — STATEMENT OF FACTS—SIGNING.

Where an order overruling a motion to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial, bill of exceptions, and statement of facts as set out in the record were all of the same date, and clearly made up and signed by the judge at the same time in open court, and certified by the clerk, the fact that the judge signed his name at the end of the bill of exceptions, and also at the end of the statement of facts which immediately followed, when his signature only at the end of the statement of facts would have been sufficient, would not exclude from the record the statement of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 569.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 62*)—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Plaintiff took an option signed by the owner of land and her husband for the purchase of land. The owner and husband conveyed it to plaintiff by deed with general warranty of title, and plaintiff reconveyed to a trustee to secure payment of purchase-money notes. There was at the time a trust deed of prior date on record, of which plaintiff had actual and constructive notice, executed by the owner and husband. At the time of plaintiff's purchase there was an alleged promise of the owner's husband and the trustee under plaintiff's trust deed that plaintiff's first two payments should be used in paying the debt secured by the prior trust deed. This was not done, and plaintiff refused to make subsequent payments. The trustee sold the land under the trust deed to the former owner for the amount of plaintiff's unpaid purchase-money notes. Subsequently plaintiff was dispossessed by ejectment proceedings. Held, that plaintiff could not recover the amount paid on the land against the husband of the owner and the trustee for breach of the promises to apply her payments to satisfaction of the former trust deed, there being no consideration therefor alleged or proved, the wife being the sole owner of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 94*)—MERGER OF CONTRACT IN DEED.

Fact that both the owner and her husband signed the option taken by plaintiff to purchase the land would not aid the cause of action for breach of the husband's promise, as the dealings between the parties culminated in the deed to plaintiff and her deed to secure deferred payments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 266; Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

4. COVENANTS (§ 102*)—WARRANTY—BREACH.
The covenants in plaintiff's deed of general warranty of title would not avail her, as she was not evicted by a paramount title.

Error to Circuit Court, Mathews County.

Action by Mary Jane Savage against L. E. Cauthorn and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. N. Stubbs, for plaintiff in error. J. Boyd Sears and C. B. Garnett, for defendants in error.

CARDWELL, J. At the threshold of this case we are asked to consider whether or not the facts proven on the trial in the circuit court have been properly incorporated into the record before us.

The action is trespass on the case in assumption, and upon issue joined in the circuit court both parties agreed to waive the intervention of a jury and to submit the case, both as to the law and the facts to the court for decision, and the court rendered its judgment for the defendants. Whereupon the plaintiff moved the court to set aside its judgment and award a new trial, which motion was overruled, and to this ruling plaintiff excepted; and here follows the judgment of the court and the only bill of exceptions taken and made a part of the record:

"And now at this day, to wit, at a circuit court continued and held for the county of Mathews at the courthouse thereof, on Thursday, the 21st day of May, 1908, it being the same day and year as that first herein mentioned, the following order was entered:

"Mary J. Savage v. L. E. Cauthorn and Others.

"The court having maturely considered the motion made by the plaintiff on the 21st day of November, 1907, to set aside the judgment entered against her on the 19th day of November, 1907, and grant her a new trial, doth overrule said motion.

"Memorandum.—To the opinion of the court in refusing to set aside the said judgment and grant the plaintiff a new trial the plaintiff, by her attorney, tendered the following bill of exception and the facts proven during the trial of said case, which she prayed might be received, signed and sealed by the court and made a part of the record, which is accordingly done.

"Exceptions Filed by Plaintiff.

"Mary Jane Savage v. G. T. Cauthorn, L. E. Cauthorn, and E. M. Maxwell.

"Be it remembered that after both plaintiff and defendants had waived a jury and consented for the court to hear the case, and after all the evidence had been heard and argument of counsel, the court entered the following judgment: 'It is considered by the court that the plaintiff take nothing by her declaration, but for her false clamor be in mercy, etc., and that the defendants go thereof without day and recover against the plaintiff their costs by them about their defense in this behalf expended.' The plaintiff then moved the court to set aside the said judgment and grant her a new trial, as being contrary to the law and the evidence. After argument, the court refused to set aside the judgment and grant the plaintiff a new trial. To the opinion of the court refusing to grant a new trial, the plaintiff excepts and tenders this her bill of exception, which she prays may be signed, sealed and enrolled and made a part of the record in this case, which is accordingly done.

"Given under my hand and seal this 21st day of May, 1908. Claggett B. Jones. [Seal.]"

Immediately following the foregoing we find this statement: "Here follows all the facts proven on the trial of this case." Then is inserted the statement of facts, containing deeds and acknowledgments, etc., and at the end thereof is found: "Given under my hand and seal this 21st day of May, 1908. [Signed] Claggett B. Jones. [Seal.]"

Now, if the presiding judge had withheld his signature, and only affixed it at the end of the statement of the facts proved at the trial, which immediately follows the judgment of the court on the motion for a new trial, and the bill of exceptions to that ruling, it would hardly have been questioned that the statement of the facts proved, as well as the judgment and the exception thereto, would have become a part of the record. The judgment, the bill of exceptions, and the statement of the facts proved are all of the same date, and unmistakably were made up and signed by the judge at the same time, in open court, and certified by the clerk.

The case of U. S. Mineral Co. v. Camden & Driscoll, 106 Va. 663, 56 S. E. 561, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1028, so much relied on by the defendants, is distinguishable from this case. In the first case, as the opinion states, the statement purporting to be the evidence could not be identified as a part of the record, as there was nothing to show how and when it got among the papers of the case. There the statement of the evidence was without date, and there was nothing whatever about it to show when or how it was made up or got into the record; while in this case the judgment of the court, the exception to the refusal of a new trial, and the statement of the facts proved are all embodied in the record on the same date, and had the signature of the presiding judge been affixed only at the end of the record thus made, it could not have been questioned that the facts proved, as well as the exception to the court's ruling on the motion for a new trial, would have been incorporated into and become a part of the record, properly to be considered upon this writ of error.

The case is simply this: The presiding judge signed the bill of exception taken to the ruling on the motion for a new trial, and identified the facts proved immediately following the statement of the exception in two places, when his signature as affixed at the end of the bill and statement of the facts would have been sufficient; and it would be an extremely technical ruling to hold that the signing by the judge of the bill of exceptions and statement of the facts, made up at one and the same time, in two places instead of at the end of the record thus made, excludes from the record the statement of the facts proved and certified. There is not the slightest difficulty in determining "how and when this statement got among the papers in this case," and there is no authority to which we have been cited or have found for our refusing to consider it as a part of the record.

Upon its merits the case is as follows: On the 1st day of July, 1905, L. E. Cauthorn and her husband, G. T. Cauthorn, in consideration of the sum of $1,500, $650 paid in cash and the balance secured, conveyed with general warranty of title to Mary Jane Savage, plaintiff in error, two certain parcels of land, aggregating about 16 acres, situated in Mathews county; and upon the same day plaintiff in error reconveyed the land to one E. M. Maxwell, in trust, to secure the payment of the two notes of $450, each executed by plaintiff in error to Mrs. L. E. Cauthorn for unpaid purchase money, and payable respectively at 6 and 12 months from their date, with interest. At the time of the execution and recordation of these deeds, there was of record in the clerk's office of Mathews county a deed of trust of prior date, and of which plaintiff in error had actual as well as constructive notice, executed by defendants in error, L. E. Cauthorn and her husband, conveying the same parcels of land to one Sands Smith, in trust to secure two bonds of L. E. and G. T. Cauthorn, executed to and held by Levin H. Miller, in the sum of $500 each, with interest.

It is alleged that when plaintiff in error on July 1, 1905, paid the $450 on her purchase of the 16 acres of land, the Cauthorns and Maxwell, trustee, promised that this money and the $200 paid by plaintiff in error on November 14, 1904, should be used in paying off the debt secured on the land by the said deed to Sands Smith, trustee, but this was not done, and, when plaintiff in error's note for $450 given for the first deferred payment on the land she had bought of the Cauthorns fell due, she declined to pay it on the ground that the debt secured by the deed to Sands Smith, trustee, had not been paid.

In February, 1906, plaintiff in error went to the house of G. T. Cauthorn, and then and there it is alleged the latter agreed that he would return to the former the $650 she had paid and take back the land conveyed to her July 1, 1905; but this was not done, and on July 1, 1906, Maxwell, trustee, advertised the land for sale under the trust deed given by plaintiff in error, and sold the same to defendant in error, L. E. Cauthorn, on August 3, 1906, and made her a deed therefor, the purchase price of the land at this sale being the amount of the two purchase-money notes given by plaintiff in error due and to become due as about stated.

After the deed from Maxwell, trustee, conveying the land to defendant in error L. E. Cauthorn had been executed, the latter instituted against plaintiff in error an action of ejectment in the circuit court of Mathews county, and a judgment was rendered in that action against plaintiff in error, and she was ejected from the premises.

It further appears that before the sale made by Maxwell, trustee, to L. E. Cauthorn, Maxwell told plaintiff in error that there was only due on the deed to Sands Smith, trustee, a little more than $190, and this amount could be paid out of the last payment to become due from plaintiff in error, and she would be protected; but as it seems she declined to agree to this, and the sale by Maxwell, trustee, of the land followed.

In this action, brought in December, 1906, plaintiff in error sought to recover of defendants in error, L. E. Cauthorn and G. T. Cauthorn, and Maxwell, trustee, the $650 paid on her purchase of the 16 acres of land, and damages for "much trouble and cost and damages in moving away," which she estimated at not less than $150. The declaration rests the right of recovery solely upon a breach of the promises made by G. T. Cauthorn and Maxwell, trustee, to apply the $200 and the $450 paid by plaintiff in error on the purchase from L. E. Cauthorn to the discharge of the debt secured by the deed to Sands Smith, trustee; and, besides the failure to show the alleged breach, plainly the action could not be maintained against G. T. Cauthorn or Maxwell, trustee, for the want of a consideration for the promise claimed to have been broken, as L. E. Cauthorn was the sole owner of the land sold and conveyed to plaintiff in error.

Moreover, upon the facts of the case, there was no time prior to the sale, by Maxwell, trustee, when plaintiff in error could not have protected herself against the loss she is in this action seeking to recover, as there was only due on the Miller debt, secured by the deed to Sands Smith, trustee, a balance of about $190, and the purchase money due and to become due from her amounted to a much larger sum; so that she might have upon a bill in equity enjoined a sale by Maxwell, trustee, until the Miller debt was paid, or so much of what she owed on her purchase of the land set apart for that purpose. But instead of this course, she permitted the land to be sold, and unfortunately for her it only brought enough to pay the balance of the purchase money unquestionably due to Mrs. L. E. Cauthorn. In fact, plaintiff in error might have paid the $190 due on the Miller debt, and required the amount to be credited on her unpaid purchase money, a right that a court of equity would have had jurisdiction to enforce.

The fact that both L. E. Cauthorn and her husband signed the option taken by the plaintiff in error to purchase the land avails the latter nothing, as the dealings between the parties culminated in the deed of conveyance to plaintiff in error and her deed to secure the deferred payments of the purchase money for the land. Nor could the covenants in her deed avail her as she has not been evicted by a paramount title. Nor could the alleged promises of G. T. Cauthorn and Maxwell, trustee, avail plaintiff in error, since no consideration for these promises is either alleged or proved.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court complained of is right, and it is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

SLINGLUFF v. COLLINS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 335*)—RETURN—NECESSITY OF SIGNATURE.

Under Code 1904, § 900, providing that an officer to whom process is directed shall make return thereon and subscribe his name to such return, and section 3577, providing that any return by an officer on an execution showing that the same has not been satisfied shall be a sufficient return, an unsigned return to an execution, reciting that no property could be found to levy on, is not a nullity, in view of other sections of the Code, showing that the signature to a return was not considered part of the return.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 338*)—RETURN—SIGNATURE—AMENDMENT.

Where such return was made by an officer legally qualified to make the return, it is proper to allow him to amend it by adding his signature thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1020; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 338*)—RETURN—SIGNATURE—AMENDMENT—LAPSE OF TIME.

The fact that 17 years elapsed before motion was made to amend the return by adding the officer's signature thereto will not affect the right to amend, where the debtor was notoriously insolvent, and the rights of third parties have not intervened.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1018; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

4. EXECUTION (§ 333*)—RETURN—WHEN MADE.

Where a firm is notoriously insolvent, and remains so, it is not incumbent on an officer levying an execution thereon and making a return of no property found to hold the execution to the return day to see that the firm may have property in which execution could be levied.

Error to Circuit Court, Madison County.

Action by Horace Slingluff against G. T. Collins. From an order quashing an execution, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hiram M. Smith, for plaintiff in error. L. O. Wendenburg and Stuart Bowe, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The facts agreed in this case are: That in the year 1889 the firm of Slingluff, Disney & Co. obtained in the circuit court of Madison county a judgment against the firm of Collins & Yager for the sum of $611.56, with interest from the 1st day of May, 1889, till paid, and costs in the sum of $16.06. That in September, 1889, an execution was issued on this judgment, returnable to the first December rules, 1889, and was placed in the hands of T. N. Berry, deputy sheriff of Madison county. That the debtor firm was at the time notoriously insolvent. That Berry, the deputy sheriff, made on this execution the following indorsement, "No effects known to me this 8th day of November, 1889," but did not sign the indorsement. That the execution with the unsigned indorsement was returned to the clerk's office on or before the return day thereof, and the unsigned indorsement was entered by the clerk in his execution book, and no other execution was issued on the judgment within 17 years after the return day of such execution. That on the 1st day of January, 1908, a third execution was issued on this judgment, directed to the sheriff of Henrico county, and returnable to the first March rules, 1908. That, prior to the issuing of this last-mentioned execution, Horace Slingluff, the plaintiff in error, had become the successor to the firm of Slingluff, Disney & Co., and the sole owner of all its assets, and G. T. Collins had become the sole surviving partner of the debtor firm, his two partners, W. A. Collins and W. C. Yager, having died, the former in 1900, and the latter in 1896; and that T. N. Berry, the deputy sheriff who made the unsigned indorsement on the first execution, is still living.

The record shows that after the execution of January, 1908, was issued and levied upon property of the surviving judgment debtor in the county of Henrico, notice of a motion to quash the execution was served on the plaintiff in error, upon the ground that no return having been made upon the original execution, and no other execution having been issued within 10 years, the same was not enforceable under section 3577 of the Code of 1904. Thereupon the plaintiff in error served the defendant in error with notice of a motion for leave to amend the return upon the original execution by having the deputy sheriff sign the return he had indorsed thereon.

These two motions were heard together, and the circuit court refused to allow the sheriff to amend the return on the original execution by signing the same, and quashed the execution issued in January, 1908. To this judgment the present writ of error was awarded.

It is contended on behalf of the defendant in error that the indorsement by the sheriff on the execution in question is invalid without his signature affixed thereto, and cannot be made valid by now affixing his signature to such return; the position taken being that inasmuch as section 900 of the Code of 1904 provides that the officer to whom the process is directed "shall make true return thereon of the day and manner of executing the same, and subscribe his name to such return," the present is not a proper case for amendment, and that the absence of the sheriff's signature makes the return a mere nullity. In other words, that a return not signed by the officer is no return at all.

"A return on a writ or process is the short official statement of the officer indorsed thereon of what he has done in obedience to the mandate of the writ, or why he has done nothing." Rowe v. Hardy, 97 Va. 674, 676, 34 S. E. 625, 75 Am. St. Rep. 811.

The signature is not a part of the return proper. Its function is merely to authenticate the return. That the signature was not regarded by the Legislature as an integral part of the return is plain from an examination of the statutes. Section 900 of the Code of 1904, contains two provisions: (1) Of what the return shall be; and (2) that the officer shall subscribe his name to such return. Section 901 provides for failure to make return and for a failure to subscribe the return. Other sections of the Code show that the signature of the officer to the return was not intended as part of the return, but merely as an authentication of the memorandum as a true return by the proper officer. Section 3577 of the Code of 1904, expressly provides that: "Any return by an officer on an execution showing that the same has not been satisfied shall be a sufficient return within the meaning of this section."

The courts pursue a liberal policy in allowing amendments whenever they can see that it will be in the furtherance of justice.

In Shenandoah R. Co. v. Ashby's Trustees, 86 Va. 232, 9 S. E. 1003, 19 Am. St. Rep. 898, this court stated that the amendment should not be allowed unless the court could see that it would be in the furtherance of justice, and added: "In a proper case, however, leave to amend, so as to make the return speak the truth, ought to be, and usually is, liberally granted, and, when the amendment is made, the same effect is to be given the return, as amended, as though it had at first been put in its present form."

In Hamilton v. McConkey's Adm'r, 83 Va. 533, 2 S. E. 724, the point was made that a defective or insufficient return was no return; but this court held otherwise, saying: "Whether this return is true or false, sufficient or insufficient, is not a question which can arise under the statute. Section 3577. The statute does not prescribe concerning a true or sufficient return, but concerning a return of an officer. The law provides ample and speedy methods by which all irregularities of an officer may be corrected, ample machinery by which any injury the officer may do by a false or insufficient return may be speedily redressed."

The indorsement upon the execution in the present case measures up to the statutory requisites of a return, for it is not questioned that it was made by an officer clothed with authority and acting in the discharge of his duty. Being a return, the amendment, by adding the omitted signature of the sheriff, must be allowed so as to make it speak the truth authoritatively.

Freeman on Executions, vol. 3, p. 2044, citing a number of authorities in support of the text, says: "A return may be amended by affixing to it the signature of the officer, and thus making valid that which before had no appearance of official authenticity."

Again, at page 2135, this author says: "Where the truth of a return is not questioned, and no good reason to the contrary is shown, the officer should be allowed to amend by signing it."

In the case of Excelsior Mfg. Co. v. Boyle, 48 Kan. 202, 28 Pac. 408, it is held that the failure of the sheriff to sign his return on an execution was amendable error which could be corrected by allowing him to affix his signature thereto.

It is further insisted that, because there was no property subject to the execution when it came into the hands of the officer, it does not follow that the debtor will continue to have none until the return day.

The execution in this case was returnable to the first December rules, 1889. The return of the sheriff is: "No effects known to me this 8th day of November, 1889." The position is that the officer was without power or authority to return the execution until the return day had arrived; that in the interval between the date of the indorsement on the execution and the return day the debt might have been collected.

One of the agreed facts in this case is that, at the time this execution was put into the hands of the sheriff of Madison county, the debtors therein were notoriously insolvent. Under such circumstances it cannot be assumed, without evidence, that the sheriff was derelict in returning the execution, "no effects known to me," before the return day.

In 3 Freeman on Executions, p. 2019, it is said: "There is no good reason why the sheriff should delay returning the writ, when it is apparent that nothing can be found out of which to satisfy it. It is rather his duty, by promptly returning the facts, to open the way for supplemental proceedings, and aid the purpose for which the execution was put into his hands."

It is true that a long time has elapsed since the return of the original execution in 1889, and the motion to amend the return by affixing the signature of the sheriff thereto in 1908; but there is no specific limitation of time within which the power to amend may be exercised. After a considerable lapse of time, however, such power should be exercised with caution, and in no case is it to be exercised unless the court can see that it will be in furtherance of justice.

In the case at bar, the agreed facts show that, at the time the original execution was returned, the defendants therein were notoriously insolvent. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the judgment has been paid—indeed, no effort is made to show that it has been satisfied—nor is there anything to indicate that there has ever been a moment that it could have been enforced until the present effort was inaugurated. It is manifest from the record that the judgment has lain dormant for the reason that there was no opportunity to enforce it. The rights of third parties, have not intervened or attached in the meantime, and it does not appear that any injustice can result to any one from permitting the plaintiff in the judgment to compel its satisfaction by the surviving judgment debtor. On the contrary, such a course would seem to be in furtherance of justice.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be reversed and set aside; and, this court proceeding to enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered, it is ordered that T. N. Berry, deputy sheriff for Madison county, be allowed nunc pro tunc to amend his return on the original execution in question, by affixing his signature in his official capacity to such return. And it is further ordered that the motion of the defendant, G. T. Collins, to quash the execution issued January 1, 1908, be, and the same is hereby, overruled.

Reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Suit by Perdle Orr for herself and next friend of R. S. Orr against S. M. Saffell and another. From a decree for complainants, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Orr and Irvine & Morison, for appellant. Pennington Bros. and Duncan & Sewell, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. The pleadings and facts in this case necessary to be stated are as follows: On the 7th day of April, 1883, David M. Orr and Rebecca Orr, his wife, were joint owners of a certain tract of land situated in Lee county, Va., each owning an undivided moiety; and on that day, for a valuable consideration, they conveyed this land as a whole to R. S. Orr, their son, the deed being acknowledged by the grantors and certified as to Rebecca Orr, the wife, by two justices of the peace, as was then required by law, and the deed duly admitted to record.

David M. Orr and R. S. Orr having departed this life, the first in 1883, and the latter in 1888, leaving a widow, Lizzie Orr, and one child, an infant (Perdle Orr), at the November rules, 1888, Rebecca Orr filed her bill in the circuit court of Lee county against E. W. Pennington, administrator of the estate of R. S. Orr, deceased, Lizzie Orr, and Perdle Orr, the object of which was to have set aside and annulled the deed of April 7, 1883, upon several grounds, among them that she (Rebecca Orr) had not acknowledged the deed as the law required.

The bill was answered by Pennington, administrator, Lizzie Orr, and a guardian ad litem duly appointed on behalf of the infant, Perdle Orr; the answer of Lizzie Orr denying the allegations of the bill, and alleging the validity of the certificate of acknowledgment in question.

Upon the hearing of this cause, a decree was entered September 12, 1889, holding that the acknowledgment to the deed of Rebecca Orr was defective, setting aside the deed, and appointing a commissioner to report on the questions of rents, profits, etc.

On April 2, 1890, a supplemental bill was filed, which set forth that since the last decree another child, to wit, R. S. Orr, had been born to Lizzie Orr, and this posthumous child was made a party defendant. On the same day an answer was filed by the guardian ad litem for this infant, and the administrator and the widow of R. S. Orr, deceased, filed their respective answers to the supplemental bill. Another decree was thereupon entered on that day, reaffirming the principles of the cause as they had been settled by the prior decree of September 12, 1889. A suspension of this last decree was asked for the purpose of appealing the case to this court, but the appeal was never prosecuted.

The result of the decrees mentioned was that Rebecca Orr recovered her half of the original tract of land which was made the subject of litigation, and, having had partition thereof made in the aforesaid cause, sold and conveyed the land she thus acquired to her son-in-law, S. H. Wells; but the deed thereto was not executed and delivered until February 27, 1892, and Wells, by deed dated December 28, 1897, conveyed the same land to S. M. and A. B. Saffell, his wife. The grantees took possession of the land at or about the date of that deed, and have remained in possession thereof.

On December 19, 1897, Perdle Orr, having a few months before attained her majority, for herself, and as next friend of her brother, R. S. Orr, filed their bill of review against Saffell and wife, in which was set up the aforesaid chancery cause of Rebecca Orr v. Pennington, Administrator, etc., and the action taken in that cause, the sales and conveyances from Rebecca Orr to S. H. Wells, and from him to Saffell and wife, the decree of September 12, 1889, and the certificate of the justices of the peace attached to the deed of April 7, 1883, and alleged that the said decree was erroneous on its face, because the certificate of the acknowledgment of Rebecca Orr to that deed was a valid certificate; no other invalidity in the decree being alleged. The prayer was that the bill of review be allowed in the original cause above mentioned, that the said decree be reversed and set aside, and that the land be returned to the plaintiff.

At the March rules, 1908, Perdle Orr, for herself and her next friend, R. S. Orr, filed an amended bill of review, which repeats the allegations of the first bill, and, in addition to the matters in said first bill, sets out the decree of April 2, 1890, and alleges error in it, as well as in the decree of September 12, 1889; the additional error alleged in the supplemental bill of review being a matter that need not be here stated. This amended and supplemental bill of review was answered by the defendants thereto, Clamanda Wells, Mary W. Wells, William A. Orr, and S. M. Saffell and wife, in all of which answers it was insisted that there was no error in the decrees complained of apparent upon the face of the record, and other matters set out not material to the question here presented.

Upon these pleadings a decree was entered on the 14th day of May, 1908, annulling and setting aside the decrees of September 12, 1889, and April 2, 1890, in so far as they affected the title of the plaintiffs, Perdrie and R. S. Orr, to the land in controversy, and appointing a commissioner to take an account of the rents, profits, and permanent improvements; and from that decree this appeal was taken.

The question presented is whether the certificate of acknowledgment by Rebecca Orr to the deed of April 7, 1883, was valid or invalid; and this court is of opinion that this question is ruled by its decision in the case of Gell v. Gell, 101 Va. 773, 45 S. E. 325.

A comparison of the certificates of acknowledgment will disclose that they are substantially the same.

In the Gell Case, the certificate was as follows: "We do further certify that Rebecca Gell, wife of Henry Gell, whose name is likewise signed to the writing hereto annexed bearing date as aforesaid, also personally appeared before us in our said county, and having the writing aforesaid fully explained to her, and being examined by us privily and apart from her said husband, she, the said Rebecca Gell, declared that she had willingly executed the same and does not wish to retract it."

The following is the certificate in the Orr case: "We, John B. Pennington and W. R. Yearly, two justices of the peace in and for the said county and state aforesaid, do certify that Rebecca Orr, wife of David M. Orr, whose names are signed to the foregoing deed, bearing date on the 7th day of April, 1883, personally appeared before us in our county, and being examined by us privily and apart from her said husband, and having said deed read and fully explained to her, acknowledged that she had willingly executed the same and does not wish to retract it."

The only difference in the two certificates are: First, the Gell certificate has the requisite of explaining the deed stated before the requisite of privy examination; and, second, in the certificate the word "declared" is used, instead of the word "acknowledged," whereas, it is vice versa in the Rebecca Orr case.

But counsel for appellants say that, if the court adheres to its ruling in Gell v. Gell, they should prevail on this appeal for the reasons that appellants acquired their right to the land after the decisions of this court in the cases of Hockman v. McClanahan, 87 Va. 33, 12 S. E. 230, and Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth, 90 Va. 737, 19 S. E. 878, that they are innocent purchasers for value without notice, and that, as those cases established a rule of property, neither the immediate grantee of Rebecca Orr nor his grantees, Saffell and wife, can be disturbed in their rights by reason of the decision of this court in Gell v. Gell, supra.

This contention is wholly without merit, for the reason that the court in Gell v. Gell expressly held that the two cases relied on by appellants did not constitute a rule of property, and that the decision in the later case was in line with the weight of authority prior to Hockman v. McClanahan and Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth. The court sees no reason whatever for receding from either of those views. In the first place, the case of Hockman v. McClanahan held the certificate of the married woman's acknowledgment insufficient because the requisite "acknowledged the deed to be her act" appeared in the certificate before the privy examination; and in Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth the certificate failed to show that the married woman acknowledged the deed to be her act, and also that she had willingly executed the same. So that it will be seen that in each case the certificate was held invalid upon different grounds, and as a matter of fact both decisions recognized, as did the decision in Gell v. Gell, and many others that precede it, that all that was required in the certificate was a substantial compliance with the statute. Therefore the court, in its last decision (Gell v. Gell), was unquestionably right in holding that the cases of Hockman v. McClanahan, and Clinch River Veneer Co. v. Kurth, did not establish a rule of property, and that the rule of construction established by this court prior to the decisions in those cases was in accordance with the view the court took in Gell v. Gell.

We have taken occasion again to examine the "prior decisions" referred to in the last-named case, and have found that they uniformly adhere to the rule that a substantial compliance with the statute as to taking and certifying a married woman's acknowledgment, as the law then stood, was all that was required; and, in the cases in which the certificate of a married woman's acknowledgment was held invalid, it was for the reason that there had not been a substantial compliance with the statute.

"The effect of overruling a decision and refusing to abide by the precedent there laid down is retroactive and makes the law at the time of the overruled decision as it is declared to be in the last decision." 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 179.

There is a second reason why the contention of appellants, Saffell and wife, that they are protected in their right to hold the land in question by reason of the doctrine of stare decisis and the fact that they are innocent purchasers from S. H. Wells, who purchased of Rebecca Orr after the decision in Hockman v. McClanahan, cannot be sustained. We have seen that the doctrine of stare decisis is unavailing to these appellants, and their claim of being innocent purchasers for value without notice is equally as unavailing. They stand on no better footing than did S. H. Wells, under whom they claim, and Wells could occupy no higher ground than Rebecca Orr, his grantor. Had he, as was his duty, looked to the chain of title to the land which Rebecca Orr proposed to convey to him, he would have found the cause of Rebecca Orr v. Pennington, Administrator, etc., open and in effect a pending cause in the circuit court of Lee county as to the infant defendants Perdie and R. S. Orr, in which they had, under the existing statute—now section 3424 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 1817)—until six months after they attained the age of 21 years to show cause against the decrees entered therein prejudicial to them.

It is an established rule in Virginia that, where a party purchases an estate which is subject to the right of another, and that right is shown by the chain of title papers, the purchaser is charged with notice of all that the title paper or papers to which they refer may disclose upon complete examination. Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 105; Burwell's Adm'r's v. Fauber, 21 Grat. 446; Va. Iron, etc., Co. v. Roberts, 103 Va. 679, 49 S. E. 984, and authorities there cited. Also, Blanton v. Rose, 70 Ark. 415, 68 S. W. 674, where the court, considering a statute similar to section 3424 of our Code, supra, said: "A purchaser of land from one whose title depends on a decree taken against a minor is bound with notice of his right to show cause against the decree. This statute is notice to all the world in cases where it applies, and there can be no such thing as an innocent purchaser in such cases."

Not only was S. H. Wells bound by notice of the rights of appellees, but appellants claiming under him are so bound. That Saffell and wife had actual notice of appellants' rights when they purchased the land in question from Wells is conclusively shown by the fact appearing in this record that they took from Wells a bond of indemnity against loss or damage should the infant parties interested (appellees), when they arrived at the age of 21 years, assert their right to the land they (Saffell and wife) purchased of Wells, or any part thereof, and also binding Wells to pay all costs of a suit by said infants for that purpose.

There are other questions raised and argued on this appeal; but, in the view we have taken of the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider them.

For the foregoing reasons, the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NEW YORK, P. & N. R. CO. v. WILSON'S ADM'R.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 10, 1909. On Rehearing, June 24, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 507*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

How far a red lantern used as a railroad danger signal could be observed on a foggy morning is not a matter of expert knowledge requiring expert testimony, being a matter resting on common experience.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 507.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 483*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MATTERS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

In an action for a railroad fireman's death by the collision of his train with a freight train which was standing still because plaintiff's train crew did not observe a red light signal sent back by the freight train crew, a witness who was on the freight train the morning of the accident, and saw the fog and the signal lanterns, could testify how far such lantern could be observed under the circumstances; that being a matter depending upon common experience.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 483.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT—ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY.

In an action for a railroad fireman's death by the collision of his train with a freight train ahead caused by the crew on decedent's train not observing the red lamp signals sent back by the freight train, any error in admitting testimony by one who was on the train at the time of the accident as to how far the red lantern could be seen through the fog was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 539½*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—OPERATION OF RAILROADS.

One who had been a railroad brakeman and engineer for a number of years was qualified to testify as to what the usual railroad danger signals were and their meaning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 539½.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY—FACTS OTHERWISE PROVED.

Even if a witness was not qualified to testify as to what were the usual danger signals used in the operation of a railroad, the admission of his testimony was not reversible where such facts were proved without objection by another witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff must show that his intestate was injured by his employer's negligence in order to recover therefor; that he was injured being of itself insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—MASTER'S DUTY—CARE REQUIRED—OPERATION OF TRAINS.

Where a freight train which was running ahead of intestate's train stopped because of an accident, it was the company's duty to use reasonable care to give proper warning of the danger to intestate's train, but its duty was performed when proper signals were given, even though they were not observed by the employees on intestate's train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 236*)—INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff could not recover for intestate's death by collision with a freight train, which was running ahead of his train, if the failure to observe the danger signals given by the employes of the freight train was due to intestate's failure to keep a proper lookout, as he was required to do.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—INJURIES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for intestate's death in a collision of his engine with a freight train which had stopped ahead of it, because of the failure to observe danger signals sent back by the freight train, a requested instruction that, if intestate did not use ordinary care by keeping a proper lookout for danger signals, he contributed to his death, and could not recover, though defendant was also negligent, correctly stated the law, and it was erroneous and misleading to qualify it by adding, "provided such lookout would have prevented the accident"; the qualification having already been sufficiently covered by other instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a freight train which was running ahead of intestate's train stopped and sent back a flagman to signal intestate's train, if, under the circumstances the only proper signal was a fusee, the flagman was negligent in not supplying himself with them before leaving the caboose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—MASTER'S DUTY—CARE REQUIRED.

It is a railroad company's duty to exercise reasonable care for the safety of its employes, but it need not exercise more than ordinary care under the circumstances, however hazardous the employment may be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES AND THEORIES OF CASE.

In an action for intestate's death by the collision of his engine with a freight train ahead of it, because intestate's crew did not see the red lantern sent back by the freight train, where plaintiff claimed that a lantern signal was not adequate under the circumstances, but that a fusee signal should have been used, but there was evidence to support defendant's theory that a red lantern signal was sufficient, a requested instruction embodying its theory should have been given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Northampton County.

Action by Wilson's administrator against the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Plaintiff requested the court to give the following instructions, which were given over objection.

"(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Nelson, the flagman of train No. 1, went back a sufficient distance to have warned Parker, the engineer on train No. 49, by the use of torpedoes or fusees, in time for Parker to have stopped his engine and prevented the collision, and that the said Nelson could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have carried with him and used said torpedoes or fusees, but that he either did not carry them with him, or, if he did, did not use them, and, if he had done so, Parker would have stopped his engine in time to prevent the collision, and that his not doing so was a lack of ordinary care on his part, and was the proximate cause of the collision, then they will find for the plaintiff. The court further instructs you that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover, although they may believe that Parker was guilty of negligence contributing to the accident, if Wilson was not so guilty, and the brakeman was guilty as aforesaid.

"(2) The words 'ordinary care' as used in these instructions means such care as a man of ordinary prudence would have used under similar circumstances in view of the dangers incident to the service, but what could have been ordinary care under some circumstances might be negligence under other circumstances, and it is for the jury to decide from all the evidence whether ordinary care was used in this case.

"(3) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in estimating the damages, the jury should find the sum with reference:

"First. To the pecuniary loss of his mother and sisters, at a sum equal to the probable earnings of the deceased, considering his age, business capacity, experience, habits, energy, and perseverance during his lifetime.

"Second. They may consider the loss of his care, attention, and society to his mother and sisters.

"Third. They may add such sums as they may deem fair and just by way of solace and comfort to his mother and sisters for the sorrow, sufferings, and mental anguish occasioned by his death. The plaintiff in his declaration claims $10,000 in damages, and the jury are authorized to award such sum as the evidence justifies, if any, not exceeding the sum so claimed by the plaintiff."

And thereupon the defendant, by counsel, asked the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"(A) The court instructs the jury that, in an action against a railroad company to recover damages for an injury negligently inflicted on a servant of the company, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish the negligence of the defendant by affirmative evidence, which must show more than a mere probability of a negligent act. The evidence of negligence must not be left wholly to conjecture, and, in determining whether or not an act or omission of the master was negligent, it must be borne in mind that the master (railroad company) is not compelled to foresee and provide against that which reasonable and prudent men would not expect to happen.

"(B) If the jury believe from the evidence that Daniel J. Parker, the engineer on train No. 49, was notified at Hallwood Station, a station of the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company, about 25 miles north of the place of the collision, between trains No. 49 and No. 1, at or about the hour of — o'clock a. m., on the 10th day of April, 1906, the day of the collision between said trains, both being south bound on the same track, a single track, by William D. Nelson, a flagman on train No. 1, to look out for his train No. 1, that it was running ahead of train 49, with a driving hot box, and that fireman, George R. Wilson, of train 49, the plaintiff's intestate, was present and within the hearing of William D. Nelson when said Nelson gave this notice to the said Daniel J. Parker (the said engineer), and that train 1 left Hallwood Station only about five minutes ahead of train 49, and that the weather was very thick and foggy, and that train 49 ran behind train 1, at a speed of about 30 to 40 miles an hour, and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate (George R. Wilson) fireman as aforesaid on train 49 did not keep a faithful and proper lookout with D. J. Parker, the engineer of train 49, for danger signals and obstructions on the said railroad track, in so far as he could in the discharge of his duty as fireman, then the said George R. Wilson, the plaintiff's intestate, was guilty of having participated in the negligence of said D. J. Parker, the engineer, should they believe Parker was in fact negligent, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action:

"(C) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate did not use ordinary care by keeping a faithful and proper lookout for danger signals on the right of way and track, then he contributed to his death, and is precluded from recovering in this action, although the defendant (company) may be chargeable with negligence also.

"(D) If the jury believe from the evidence that the death of the plaintiff's intestate (George R. Wilson) was caused by circumstances which show it was an accident pure and simple, which could not have been anticipated by any reasonable foresight on the part of the company, they must find for the defendant company.

"(E) The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of the railroad company to exercise reasonable care for the safety of its employes, but it is not bound to provide the latest inventions or the most newly discovered appliances. It is not bound to use more than ordinary care, no matter how hazardous the business may be in which the employe is engaged.

"(F) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that brakeman Nelson stopped train 49 at Hallwood the morning of the collision with his red lantern alone, without difficulty, during a fog, that when freight train No. 1 parted just before reaching Exmore the fog was no denser than it was at Hallwood when he flagged No. 49 with his lantern alone, he was not guilty of negligence in going immediately back and attempting to again flag No. 49 with his red lantern, provided the same was swung and used as a danger signal should have been swung or used.

"(G) The court instructs the jury that flagman Nelson was in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care in attempting to signal train 49 to stop with a red lantern alone immediately preceding the collision, if he had stopped the same train at Hallwood a short time before with the same lantern, provided the weather conditions, such as fog and light, were practically the same at both places at the time the red lantern was used to stop the train, provided the same was swung and used as a danger signal should have been swung or used."

To the granting of which instructions, the plaintiff, by counsel, objected, and thereupon the court granted instructions A, B, D, and E, as prayed for, but refused to grant instructions C, F, and G, as prayed for, but gave instruction C modified as follows:

"(C, as given) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate did not use ordinary care by keeping a faithful and proper lookout for danger signals on the right of way and track, in so far as he could in the proper discharge of his duties as fireman, then he contributed to his death and is precluded from recovering in this action, although the defendant (company) may be chargeable with negligence also, provided they believe from the evidence such a lookout would have prevented the accident."

And refused to grant instructions F, and G, to which action of the court in granting the instructions prayed for by the plaintiff, and in refusing to grant instruction C, as prayed for, and in giving the same as modified, and in refusing to give instructions F and G, as prayed for, defendant excepted.

Thos. H. Willcox and E. H. Spady, for plaintiff in error. G. S. Kendall, J. E. Heath, and R. G. Houston, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Passenger train No. 49 of the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company ran into the rear of a freight train on that road, the collision resulting in the death of Wilson, the fireman upon the engine of the passenger train, and this suit was brought by his administrator to recover damages. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. During the progress of the trial certain exceptions were taken to rulings of the court, which are now before us for review upon a writ of error.

The evidence tends to prove that on the 10th of April, 1906, a freight train consisting of an engine and 20 cars was moving south upon the roadway of plaintiff in error. Near Hallwood Station the engineer discovered that his engine had a hot box, and his flagman was at once dispatched to notify passenger train No. 49 of the fact. The flagman had instructions to flag the train, to stop it, and to inform the engineer upon that train of what had occurred upon the freight train. The flagman went back a sufficient distance, and, using a red lantern as a signal, flagged passenger train No. 49, brought it to a stop, and delivered his message. The proof is that at the time there was quite a heavy fog; but, notwithstanding that fact, the signal with the red lantern was observed and obeyed by the engineman upon passenger train No. 49. Both trains on this single track were moving southward in the direction of Cape Charles, the terminus of the road, and it appears from the evidence that the train dispatcher at Cape Charles notified the engineman on passenger train No. 49 of the trouble with respect to the hot box upon the freight train, and the telegram giving this information was found upon the person of Parker, the engineman, after his death, he also having been killed by the collision which subsequently occurred.

After leaving Hallwood, and as it approached Exmore, a station 29 miles distant, a coupling on the freight train gave way and the train parted. It was speedily halted, and the flagman, who was in the caboose, was at once sent to the rear to give warning of the situation. His testimony is that, when he left his train and got upon the ground, he could hear No. 49 approaching. He ran as rapidly as he could back along the railroad for a distance of 8 telegraph poles, or 480 yards, waving his red lantern across the track, and continued to wave it until the passenger train had approached so nearly that he was compelled to stand aside to escape being run over. The engineer did not acknowledge his signal or diminish the speed of the train, but rushed by, with the result that his engine collided with the rear of the freight train, and both the engineman and his fireman were killed.

There is evidence tending to prove that both trains had been inspected that morning; that their couplings and appliances were such as complied with the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission and with the rules in the United States for standard couplings; and that, so far as was disclosed by recent and careful inspection, all of these appliances were in good order.

The rules of the company prescribe that flags of the proper color must be used by day, and lamps of the proper color by night, or whenever from fog or other cause the day signals cannot be clearly seen; that red signifies danger, and is a signal to stop; that an explosive cap or torpedo placed on the top of the rail is a signal to be used in addition to the regular signals; that the explosion of one torpedo is a signal to stop, the explosion of two torpedoes not more than 200 feet apart is a signal to reduce speed, and look out for a danger signal; that a fusee is an extra danger signal, to be lighted and placed on the track at night in cases of accident or emergency; that a train finding a fusee burning upon the track must stop, and not proceed until it has burned out; that a lamp swung across the track is the signal to stop. And rule 78 provides that "all signals must be used strictly in accordance with the rules, and trainmen must keep a constant lookout for signals." Rule 99 provides that "when a train stops or is delayed, under circumstances in which it may be overtaken by a following train, the flagman must go back immediately with danger signals a sufficient distance to insure full protection. When recalled, he may return to his train, first placing two torpedoes on the rail when the conditions require it."

When the flagman went back on this occasion, he had with him a red lantern, as already stated, and torpedoes, but no fusees. The evidence is that the passenger train was running at between 30 and 40 miles an hour. At 35 miles an hour the train would have covered the 480 yards between the point at which the flagman made his signal and the rear of the freight train in 28 seconds.

The first assignments of error are to the rulings of the court in admitting certain testimony over the objection of plaintiff in error as set forth in bills of exceptions Nos. 1 and 2.

A witness, C. H. Ames, was introduced on behalf of the defendant, and testified as follows:

"Q. Did you get off the train when the accident occurred? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was it foggy there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was it just as foggy as it was at Keller? A. It was later and lighter.

"Q. The same conditions prevailed there as at Keller? A. The day was lighter.

"Q. Was the fog as heavy? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was it possible with the conditions that prevailed at the place where the accident occurred to see any kind of light very far?"

To which question defendant, by counsel, objected; but the court overruled the objection, and allowed the witness to answer the question.

"A. Do you want me to specify some distance?

"Q. We want you to specify how far you could see a light."

He was then asked: "Will you please state at what distance you think it possible to have seen the lanterns used ordinarily by the railroad company, if you know what they are, as signal lights?"

"A. I should not think you could see it very far—the length of the car."

To which ruling of the court in allowing the questions to be asked and answered in the connection in which they were asked the plaintiff in error excepted.

The bill of exceptions assigns no reason why the answer should have been excluded. Its object was to get from the witness an opinion as to how far under the conditions which existed the signal given by a red lantern could have been observed on the occasion in question. This is not a matter of expert knowledge. It is a matter of opinion, it is true, resting on common experience, the value of which must be determined by the jury, which has the witness before it and can form some idea of the weight to be attached to his evidence. In this case the witness was upon the train on the morning of the accident. He saw the fog and the lanterns, and was able to give some idea of the distance at which the light of the red lantern in use by railroads on such occasions could be seen.

We think, therefore, that the question and answer were proper; but, even if they were not, we should be indisposed to attach to them such importance as to make them the ground of reversing the judgment.

The second bill of exceptions is to the testimony of James Driscoll. The questions which he was asked were as follows:

"Q. From your knowledge and experience as a railroad man, do you feel qualified to speak as to the running of trains and the use of signals? A. Yes; I think so.

"Q. I would ask you what are the danger signals ordinarily used by railroad companies? A. Red flag by day and red lamps by night, and also they use torpedo and fusee. The torpedo can be used in the daytime and also at night, and the fusee especially goes at night.

"Q. What is a torpedo? A. It is something about the size of a silver dollar, and has two straps to it about two inches long of soft metal. I don't know what the metal is made of. In case of danger, this is a special danger signal used. This torpedo is placed on the rail. One means to stop still, and for the engine not to go any further. It explodes in a terrible way, and that means to stop there. Two placed one rail length apart is a signal to proceed on, and to look out, danger ahead.

"Q. How long does it take to fix or apply a torpedo to the rail? A. You can almost place it as quick as the hand can be used. The metal is very soft, and the rail has the over projection, and you slip it on as quick as that.

"Q. What is a fusee? A. It is a piece about that long, and it has an explosive to the end of it, and it has a piece of steel about that long. They are kept where you can put your hand on it, and you can strike it so, and you can throw it so (indicating), and it burns 10 or 15 minutes. It burns a large red light. The smoke goes up, and is a danger signal, and that means stop, and not move until that burns out. That is another extra danger signal used by railroad men.

"Q. Did I understand you to state how high a fusee burns? A. It burns tremendous high, and the smoke casts a large red light. I could not tell just how many feet it would show in the elements from the ground up; but it is a tremendous big light."

To this examination plaintiff in error excepted, and assigns the ruling of the court upon it as error.

It appears that Driscoll had been in the railroad business for a number of years as brakeman and engineer, and was therefore qualified to speak and to give his opinion upon the subjects with reference to which he testified. But, even if this were not so, the same facts were proved, without objection, by another witness, and we are of opinion that this assignment of error is not well taken.

When the evidence was concluded, the defendant in error asked for certain instructions, all of which were given; and, while they were excepted to in the trial court, there is no assignment of error with respect to them.

Plaintiff in error also asked for certain instructions, marked "A," "B," "C," "D," "E," "F," and "G." The court gave A, B, D, and E, refused to give instruction C as asked for, but gave it with an amendment, and wholly rejected instructions F and G.

Instruction C, as asked for, told the jury that, if they believed "from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate did not use ordinary care by keeping a faithful and proper lookout for danger signals on the right of way and track, then he contributed to his death, and is precluded from recovering in this action, although the defendant company may be chargeable with negligence also." The court added to it these words: "Provided they believe from the evidence such a lookout would have prevented the accident."

The fact that his intestate was injured does not entitle defendant in error to recover. He must show that the injury was the result of negligence upon the part of the railroad company. The duty of the railroad company was to use reasonable care to give proper warnings of the danger which threatened the train upon which plaintiff's intestate was an employe. If that was done, then it had discharged its duty, and, if for any cause the signal was not observed, that was no fault of the railroad company. If the failure to observe the signal was due to inattention upon the part of plaintiff's intestate—to his failure to keep "a faithful and proper lookout," as it was his duty to do—of course, there could be no recovery. But suppose the railroad company discharged its duty, could it be made answerable to the plaintiff, although his intestate, without any dereliction of duty upon his part, failed to see, or was unable to see, a proper and sufficient signal of danger?

We think that instruction C, as asked, correctly stated the law; that the proposition contained in the qualification attached to it had already been sufficiently covered by other instructions; and that attaching it to instruction C tended to mislead the jury, and was erroneous.

This brings us to consider instructions F and G. It appears from the evidence and from the instructions asked and given at the instance of defendant in error that the conflicting theories of plaintiff and defendant in the court below were as follows: The theory of plaintiff, defendant in error here, was that under the circumstances as they existed immediately before and at the time of the collision, when the flagman went back up the track to stop passenger train No. 49, it was his duty to take with him not only the red lantern, but torpedoes and fuses, to go back as far as he safely could under the circumstances, and attach a torpedo and a fusee to the track in the proper manner. This theory of the case is presented in instruction No. 1. The theory of the defendant, plaintiff in error here, is that the danger signal provided by the rules and in customary use on such occasions is the red lantern at night; that the proper use of the torpedo and fusee is to put them upon the track as a warning to a following train when the flagman has been recalled by a signal from his own train, and this is the theory presented by instructions F and G.

It will be recalled that the testimony of the flagman tends to prove that he went as rapidly as possible to the rear, and as far as he could go with safety; that he waved his red lantern as a signal, as he had done a very short time before at Hallwood Station; that the conditions at Hallwood and at Exmore were substantially the same; that he met the on-coming passenger train at a distance of 480 yards from the rear of the freight train; that it was running at a rate of 35 miles an hour; and that he had no time to put down a torpedo or a fusee. And when it is recalled that a train going at that rate of speed would cover the distance of 480 yards in 28 seconds, and that, if he had stopped a sufficient length of time before meeting the passenger train to have attached the torpedo or fusee to the track, it would have resulted in his giving a signal at a distance short of 480 yards from the rear of the freight train by so much space as would have been covered by the passenger train while he was placing the torpedo or fusee, we cannot say that the flagman confronted with these difficulties which he had to meet within the brief period of 28 seconds judged unwisely in confining himself to giving the signal with the red lantern. As a matter of fact, he did not have the fusee with him, but that we presume does not affect the situation; for, if that was under the circumstances the only proper signal to have been given, then he was not in the exercise of reasonable and proper care in not supplying himself with them.

As the court told the jury in instruction E, it was the duty of plaintiff in error to exercise reasonable care for the safety of its employes; but it was not bound to use more than ordinary care no matter how hazardous the business in which the employe was engaged. There being evidence, then, tending to show that, under all the circumstances a signal with a red lantern would have satisfied the obligation of plaintiff in error, the instructions in question should have been given.

In Richmond Traction Company v. Martin's Adm'r, 102 Va. 209, 45 S. E. 886, Judge Whittle says that: "Where two theories of a case are presented by the evidence, upon one of which the jury has been sufficiently instructed, it is error to refuse an instruction based upon the other theory of the case which, if sustained, would require a different verdict, or to add to such an instruction a qualification which would withdraw from the jury the consideration of the last-mentioned theory."

And in Richmond Passenger, etc., Co. v. Gordon, 102 Va. 498, 46 S. E. 772, Judge Buchanan says: "Where there is evidence tending to prove that the injury sued for was caused by the concurrent and co-operative negligence of both plaintiff and defendant, and also evidence tending to prove that the defendant's negligence alone was the proximate cause of the injury, each party has the right to have his view or theory of the case presented to the jury by proper instructions for that purpose." See, also, Phillips on Instructions to Juries, § 101, and cases there cited.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

Reversed.

Upon Petition to Rehear.

This case is before us upon a petition to rehear the judgment entered at a former day of the present term reversing the judgment of the circuit court and directing a new trial.

The petition points out an error of fact in the opinion which is the basis of the estimate made by the court as to the time in which the passenger train which the flagman was sent back to signal, running at the rate of 35 miles an hour, would cover the distance between the point at which the signal was given and the freight train, which by the breaking of a coupling had parted and been brought to a standstill. The opinion, as filed, after stating that immediately upon the accident to the freight train the flagman had been hurried to the rear to notify an approaching passenger train, and had goat a run for the distance of eight telegraph poles, goes on to refer to that distance thus covered by the flagman as 480 feet, and repeats the error whenever thereafter in the opinion the distance between the freight train and the point reached by the flagman is mentioned.

Telegraph poles it is a matter of common knowledge are 60 yards apart, and it is agreed in the case that such is the fact. The true distance, therefore, was 480 yards, or 1,440 feet, and the time required for the passenger train to cover that distance was about 28 seconds, instead of 9½ seconds as stated in the opinion.

We admit the error, and thank counsel for giving us the opportunity to correct it.

The fact that Nelson, the flagman, went back 480 yards, instead of 480 feet, does not place the defendant in error in any better or stronger position, and, after giving the several points made in the petition a careful consideration, we are still of opinion that the conclusion heretofore announced was right, and the rehearing asked for is denied.

Refused.

WAY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where several articles of household furniture, included in a single shipment and covered by one bill of lading, which mentioned them in detail, were delivered in good order to the first of a connecting line of common carriers, for transportation over the entire line, and where the last of the connecting carriers delivered some of the articles to the consignee, but not all of them, in a suit by the consignee against the final carrier, based on its common-law liability, upon proof of such facts and of the value of the articles lost, he made out a prima facie case, and shifted the onus to the defendant to show that it did not receive the lost articles, or otherwise was not liable for the loss; and it was error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 835; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 177*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LOSS OF GOODS—RIGHT TO RECOVER.

If in such a case the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for articles of clothing claimed to have been packed in a washstand and dresser which formed a part of the shipment and were lost, this would not authorize the direction by the court of a verdict for the defendant, denying any right to recover for the lost furniture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

Atkinson, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Walter G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by W. R. Way against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Way brought suit against the Southern Railway Company for the loss of certain personal property. The evidence for the plaintiff showed the following facts: Through an agent he caused certain household furniture and personal chattels to be shipped from Watertown, N. Y., to Savannah, Ga., consigned to himself. The initial carrier was the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company. The final carrier in the line of transportation was the defendant. The first-mentioned company issued a bill of lading acknowledging the receipt of the goods, of which an itemized statement was given, consisting of two bed ends, two bed rails, one washstand, one dresser, and other named articles. The weight was given, in bulk, as 1,625 pounds. The plaintiff was named as the consignee, and the place of destination as Savannah, Ga. It stated that the initial carrier had received the property in apparent good order, "consigned and destined as indicated below, which said company agrees to carry to said destination if on its road, otherwise to deliver to another carrier on the route to said destination." One of the conditions printed on the back of the bill of lading was that no carrier should be liable for loss or damage not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route. At Savannah some of the articles included in the shipment were delivered to the consignee, but others were not. On application by the plaintiff to the delivery clerk of the defendant at Savannah, the latter told him that the goods had been lost in transit, that they would probably turn up, and, if not, that the plaintiff should file his claim with the defendant. The plaintiff then saw the claim clerk, who said he would investigate the matter. The lost goods were never received by the plaintiff. Evidence was introduced as to their value, and that the articles shipped were in good condition when delivered to the first carrier. Among the articles for the loss of which suit was brought was certain wearing apparel, which the plaintiff claimed was packed in the dresser and washstand which were lost. The defendant introduced its agent as a witness, who testified that as between household goods, such as furniture, and such goods as clothes, the higher freight rate was on clothing, and that "freight from Watertown, N. Y., is subject to the southern classification." It also introduced a decision reported in 51 N. Y. 168, 10 Am. Rep. 575 (Belger v. Dinsmore) on the subject of limiting the common-law liability of a carrier, and the valuation of the property shipped, by stipulations in a receipt given by the carrier for the freight. Upon the close of the evidence, the presiding judge directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

Saussey & Saussey, for plaintiff in error.
Osborne & Lawrence, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The controlling question is whether the plaintiff made out such a case as required its submission to the jury, or whether the presiding judge was authorized to direct a verdict. The plaintiff showed a shipment of household goods consisting of various articles mentioned, covered by a single bill of lading, and of which the weight was stated in bulk. They were received at Watertown, N. Y., by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, in good order. The shipment was to be carried to Savannah, Ga., and delivered to the plaintiff. Some time later at Savannah the Southern Railway Company, the last carrier in the line, delivered a portion of the articles included in the shipment to him. The defendant's delivery clerk informed the plaintiff that the goods which were not delivered had been lost in transit, that they would probably "turn up," and that, if they did not do so, the plaintiff should file a claim with the defendant company. The plaintiff never received the lost goods. This suit was not brought on an express contract or based on Civ. Code 1895, § 2298, but upon the common-law liability of the defendant as a common carrier.

1. It is well established that, where personal property is delivered in good order to the first of a connecting line of common carriers for transportation, and the last connecting carrier delivers it to the consignee in a damaged condition, such final carrier may be held liable in an action for the damage, without other proof that such damage was occasioned by his fault, unless he can show that he received the property in the condition in which he delivered it, or that the damage was caused by the act of God or the public enemy. In reference to some kinds of property also it has been held that proof that the damage arose from inherent qualities, and without negligence on the part of the carrier, might furnish a defense. In such a suit against the final carrier, it is not incumbent on the plaintiff, as a part of his case, to show by direct evidence that the property was delivered to the final carrier in good order; but the burden is on the defendant to show that it was not responsible for the damaged condition at the time of delivery. Forrester v. Georgia Railroad Co., 92 Ga. 699, 19 S. E. 811; Bell v. Western & Atlantic R. Co., 125 Ga. 510, 513, 54 S. E. 582. In the decisions of various courts three different reasons have been assigned for this ruling: (1) The presumption of continuity of condition once shown, by virtue of which, upon proof of delivery in good order to the first carrier, the property would be presumed or inferred to continue in the same condition until the contrary was shown. This has been applied even to such articles as cabbages and melons, as will appear from the cases above cited. (2) That a carrier is not obliged to receive goods in such a damaged condition as to be unfit for shipment, or, if it must receive property from a preceding carrier in a damaged condition, it does not have to receive them as in good order, but may receive them specially as in bad order; and that, if it does receive and deliver them, in the absence of any proof that they were not received as in good order, it may be presumed that they were so received. Breed v. Mitchell, 48 Ga. 536; Paramore v. Western R. Co., 53 Ga. 383, 386. (3) That, when the shipper resigns his property into the custody of the initial carrier, it becomes practically impossible for him to watch it at all points during the progress of transportation over the connecting lines, or to know just where the damage was done, or in the custody of which carrier the property was at the time, that the condition in which each carrier received it lies peculiarly within such carrier's knowledge, and not that of the shipper, and the proof of such facts is peculiarly in the power of the carrier, and therefore, when the last carrier delivers the property in a damaged condition, and is called on to answer for having done so, the burden is on such carrier to show that it was not responsible for the damage.

Sometimes one of these grounds has been advanced as a basis of a decision, sometimes more than one. They often merge into each other. Thus the statement, in the second ground, that the burden is on the carrier because he might protect himself by expressly receiving the goods as not in good order, involves also the third proposition that it is peculiarly within his knowledge as to whether he did in fact receive the goods as in good order, or as in bad order. In Smith v. New York Central R. Co., 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 225, it was said broadly that: "The owner of goods, suing a common carrier to recover damages for an injury happening to the goods through negligence, must give evidence sufficient to show that the goods were in good condition when they came to the possession of the defendant, as a part of the evidence that they have been injured while in his custody." But, in deciding what would be sufficient evidence for that purpose, it was held that: "Where property is delivered to a railroad company, to be transported by that and another company over their respective roads to its place of destination, it is enough for the owner, in an action against the company delivering the property to recover damages for negligence, to show that he delivered the property to the first company in good order; and the burden is then cast upon the company delivering the goods thus injured of proving that they were not injured while in its possession, or that they came to its possession thus injured." In the opinion Johnson, J., said: "The general rule is that things once proved to have existed in a particular state are to be presumed to have continued in that state until the contrary is established by evidence, either direct or presumptive. * * * Unless this rule is to be applied to goods delivered, to be transported over several connecting railroads, there would be no safety to the owner. It would often be impossible for him to prove at what point or in the hands of which company the injury happened. * * * The general rule undoubtedly is that the burden of proof is always upon the party who asserts the existence of any fact which infers legal responsibility; but the exception is equally well established that in every case the onus probandi lies on the party who is interested to support his case by a particular fact, which lies more particularly within his knowledge, or of which he must be supposed to be cognizant."

Counsel for the defendant in error did not controvert the rule that proof of delivery of property in good order to the initial carrier for shipment, and of delivery of it by the final carrier in a damaged condition, will suffice to shift the burden of proof to the defendant, when the last carrier is sued; but they deny that this rule is applicable to a case like the present one, where separate articles were included in the shipment and only some of them were delivered by the final carrier. The authorities have not drawn any distinction as to this rule, between damage and partial loss, and the reasons on which the ruling as to delivery of property by the final carrier in a damaged condition rest, taken as a whole, warrant a like ruling as to partial loss of a shipment. In Susong v. Florida Central, etc., R. Co., 115 Ga. 361, 41 S. E. 566, suit was brought against the final carrier of a car load of stock, and the evidence showed that on delivery one horse was missing, and one was injured. The case as to both was treated as resting on the same basis; but the jury found for the defendant, and it was held that there was sufficient evidence to show that the loss and damage did not occur on the line of the last railroad company, and that it was not liable therefor. In the opinion Mr. Justice Cobb said: "The defendant company having received the car load of horses from the Southern Railway Company at Columbia without exception, there was a presumption that they were received as in good order, and so long as this presumption prevailed the onus was upon the defendant to account for the horse which was missing when the car arrived at Savannah, and to explain the injuries to the horse which was then in a damaged condition."

And so other authorities treat damage and partial loss before delivery as governed by like principles. In 3 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1348, it is said: "But a connecting carrier, who has completed the transportation and delivered the goods to the consignee in a damaged condition or deficient in quantity, will be held liable in an action for the damage or deficiency, without proof that it was occasioned by his fault, unless he can show that he received them in the condition in which he has delivered them. * * * And the presumption which applies to the last of a line of connecting carriers, that the goods were delivered to it in the same condition as they were delivered to the first carrier, applies also to any intermediate carrier in whose possession the goods have been found in a damaged condition." In Savannah, Fla. & Western Ry. Co. v. Harris, 26 Fla. 148, 7 South. 544, 23 Am. St. Rep. 551, it was held that where goods are transported by connecting carriers, and some of them are lost or injured, and the last carrier is sued therefor, it will be held liable, in the absence of proof that the loss or injury occurred on some preceding line, on the presumption that the goods were delivered to it in the same condition in which they were delivered to the first carrier. In the opinion of Maxwell, J., a number of authorities on the subject were cited and discussed. He said: "The reason of the rule of evidence is founded upon the better means the connecting carriers have to ascertain where the loss occurred." In that case the shipment was of a car load of household goods and building material, some of which were lost and others damaged. The railroad sued was not in fact the final carrier, but was the last railroad company, which delivered the shipment to a boat line for transportation to the destination. In Laughlin v. Chicago & Northwestern Ry. Co., 28 Wis. 204, 9 Am. Rep. 493, a considerable quantity of cloth was shipped in three boxes, and transported by successive carriers. When delivered it was found that four pieces of cloth were missing. In a suit brought against the last carrier, it was held that the presumption was that the loss occurred through the fault of the defendant, and the burden of exculpating itself was shifted to it. In the opinion Dixon, C. J., said: "If the plaintiffs knew or could prove in whose custody the boxes were when the clothes were taken, there would be no hardship, perhaps, in requiring them to sue that company; but the plaintiffs do not know, nor is it possible for them to ascertain, this, and, unless aided by presumption, they are without remedy, which is a positive and certain injustice. * * * The clothes may have been taken while the boxes were in its custody. It is not certain that they were not, and therefore not certain that injustice has been done the defendant. On the other hand, the wrong and injustice done the plaintiffs, if they are dismissed without remedy, are certain. They are no matter of doubt or speculation. If there were no redress in such case, it could no longer be the boast of our law that there is no wrong without its remedy, and the strict liability of common carriers, whenever two or more are associated in the transportation or connected in the line of route, would be at an end." In Gwyn Harper Mfg. Co. v. Carolina Central Railroad, 128 N. C. 280, 38 S. E. 894, 83 Am. St. Rep. 675, a large amount of flour was shipped under one bill of lading, and all of it was delivered except 20 bags, which were lost. In the opinion Douglas, J., said: "This court has repeatedly held that, 'among connecting lines of common carriers, that one in whose hands goods are found damaged is presumed to have caused the damage, and the burden is upon it to rebut the presumption.' * * * We think that the same rule holds good where only a part of the shipment is lost, because that is the nature of the damage to the shipment, and the carrier in whose hands the remainder is found is fully as able to protect itself as it would be in the case of breakage or other damage. Whether this rule would apply where no part of the shipment is found in anybody's hands may be a different question." In Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Broome, 3 Ga. App. 644, 60 S. E. 355, the suit was for shortages in several shipments of coal. It was shown that the plaintiff delivered the cars of coal to the initial carrier, that the final carrier received the cars, collected the freight, and effectuated delivery to the consignee, but that when delivered there was a shortage in the amount of the coal. The same principle was applied. See, also, Southern Express Co. v. Hess, 53 Ala. 19; Adams Express Co. v. Walker, 119 Ky. 121, 83 S. W. 106, 67 L. R. A. 412; Elmore v. Naugatuck R. Co., 23 Conn. 482, 63 Am. Dec. 143.

The case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Allison, 115 Ga. 635, 42 S. E. 15, does not conflict with the ruling now made. There suit was brought against the railway company for the loss of two bales of cotton alleged to have been delivered to it. The evidence showed that the plaintiff had a lot of cotton in his yard about 100 yards from the defendant's depot, and it was sought to prove that 45 bales had been delivered to the defendant for transportation. All were transported and delivered except two bales, but the evidence failed to show that they were ever placed in the custody of the carrier at all. It was not a case of successive common carriers, but a failure to prove any shipment of the two bales. Nor does this ruling conflict with that in Cohen & Hargrove v. Rome R. Co., 45 Ga. 293. In that case suit was brought for the nondelivery of certain goods which were alleged to have been shipped from New York to Rome, Ga. There was no proof that the defendant ever had or undertook to carry the goods on account of which suit was brought, and the proof was very strong that they never came into the possession of that company or upon its road. The jury found for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and this judgment was affirmed.

On behalf of the defendant in error it was urged that the cases, if any, where partial loss could be analogized to damage should be confined to those in which goods were shipped in a car load lot, or in a single box, bundle, or package, or the like, and in which the receipt of the car or of the box, bundle, or package might carry some inference of the receipt of that which was in it when in the hands of the initial carrier; and that the rule has no application in this case, where the bed, washstand, dresser, and other articles were mentioned specifically in the bill of lading, and were not shown to have been fastened together or included in a single car load, or even forwarded together. It was urged that delivery of some of the articles by the final carrier raised no presumption or inference that it received the other articles which were not delivered, and that, if it never received them, it was not liable for their loss. The authorities cited above do not make any distinction as to whether or not the shipment was included in a single car or box, nor do they refer to that as a controlling factor in the decisions made. In the Laughlin Case, a considerable quantity of cloth was shipped in three separate boxes, though apparently in one shipment. In the case of Gwyn Harper Mfg. Co., it was only stated in the opinion that the action was to recover for the loss of 20 bags of flour forming part of a shipment. If the goods were included in a single car or box, it might add greater force to the presumption and make it more difficult to be overcome; but the nonexistence of that fact would not destroy the rule as to property included in one shipment as one lot or aggregate, under one bill of lading. Here the articles of personalty were included in a single shipment, a single bill of lading was issued for them, and their weight in bulk was marked upon it, emphasizing the fact that the shipment was treated as an entirety. The freight charges were apparently upon the whole, not upon separate articles. In pursuance of this shipment the defendant, as the final connecting carrier, undertook to act, and did deal with and handle at least a part of the property which was to be transported. It was shown to have been in touch with the shipment, at least with a part of it, and the shipment was single, though composed of details. Whether the last carrier received only a part of such shipment was peculiarly within its knowledge. It was almost impossible for the shipper to prove just where the loss occurred. The sound reasoning on which the rule above announced rests is sufficient to cover the facts of the case, and to shift to the defendant the burden of showing that it did not receive the other articles which formed part of the shipment, or that it was not responsible for their loss. The rule against founding a presumption of fact on a presumption of fact is not relevant. It is a question of what proof will make a prima facie case against a common carrier. Whether this is done by direct proof alone or with the aid of a presumption, if a sufficient case of loss by a common carrier is shown—sufficient, if not rebutted—the law then declares the liability of the carrier and the defenses open to it.

2. It was contended that the suit was not only for certain household goods, such as a dresser and a washstand, but also for certain articles of wearing apparel, which were claimed to have been packed in those pieces of furniture, but which were not mentioned in the bill of lading, and that this was a fraud which would prevent any recovery. If it should be conceded that certain articles were packed in the dresser and washstand, and that for them no recovery could be had, proof of this fact alone would not authorize the presiding judge, as matter of law, to direct a verdict for the defendant altogether. On this subject, see Charleston & Savannah Ry. Co. v. Moore, 80 Ga. 522, 5 S. E. 769.

What has been said shows that the judge erred in directing a verdict, and renders it unnecessary to discuss the question of practice as to the grant of a nonsuit or the direction of a verdict if the plaintiff's evidence failed to make out a prima facie case, or as to the effect of the New York decision introduced in evidence.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., who dissents.

ATKINSON, J. (dissenting). In a suit for a breach of contract, the burden is upon the plaintiff to establish both the contract and the breach. If a common carrier undertakes to carry goods over its line, it does so under a contract, express or implied, faithfully to perform the service undertaken. If no express contract is made, the mere fact of receiving goods to be carried will be a circumstance from which a contract will be implied. As will be seen from the cases cited by the majority, it has been held that, if the last carrier of a line of connecting carriers delivers goods to the consignee in a damaged condition, the burden of proof will be upon such carrier if it would avoid liability for the injury. So, too, where goods are shipped in bulk, and the car or crate in which they were contained is delivered by the last carrier with some of the goods missing, the burden of proof will be upon such carrier. Such rulings must rest upon the theory that the fact that the last carrier was found in possession of the goods in a damaged condition, or that it was found in possession of the car or crate in which the goods in bulk ought to be, was in each instance a circumstance sufficient to show an undertaking by that carrier to carry the particular goods which were damaged or lost, and consequently connect the carrier with the contract of shipment, or at least to show an implied contract by such carrier to transport the goods. But the reasons suggested do not apply to a shipment of the character involved in the present case, where the goods were not found in possession of the last carrier, and where the goods were not shipped in bulk. The loss of the goods sued for may have occurred before any of them reached the defendant. They were separate articles, and not a part of a common bulk. Proof of mere loss is consistent with a loss either before or after the goods went into the hands of the defendant. So long as this consistency exists, the burden will remain upon the plaintiff in order to charge the defendant. Otherwise the presumption will be that the defendant did its duty by delivering such of the goods as actually came into its custody consigned to the plaintiff. As applied to the facts of this case, the argument of inconvenience to the shipper in making proof of loss is not sufficient reason upon which to presume the existence of a contractual relation between the plaintiff and defendant. With respect to the goods sued for, the evidence furnishes no basis for a contract, express or implied, upon the part of the defendant to carry them; and, as the plaintiff's case must rest upon the establishment of the liability arising under contract, there was nothing upon which a verdict for the plaintiff could have been founded.

RORIE v. RORIE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1909.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 181*)—WRIT OF ERROR—PREMATURE.

Where a suit was brought for a total divorce, and on the first trial the presiding judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant could bring such ruling to this court for a review by direct bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 147*)—TRIAL—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

If the judge of the superior court can in any case direct the jury to find a verdict for a total divorce, it is erroneous to do so where the ground on which the suit is predicated is desertion of the husband by his wife, and the defendant pleads and introduces testimony tending to show that a separation was rendered necessary by reason of cruel conduct on the part of the husband.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Divorce by J. E. Rorie against F. A. Rorie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. E. Rorie brought suit against his wife, seeking a total divorce on the ground of desertion. She pleaded to the jurisdiction, and also filed an answer in which she admitted that they were living separate and apart, but alleged that the plaintiff had been guilty of repeated acts of cruelty which affected her health, and rendered it impossible for her to live with him. She admitted that he had asked her to return to his house, but alleged that this was not done in good faith, but only for the purpose of covering up his cruelty. On the trial the plaintiff testified that his wife had continued to live in the house with him until 1898, when she left, and thereafter remained in a state of desertion from him; that the birth of her first child caused injury to her, and for the last two or three years during which she remained in his house she was in bed almost constantly, "pretending to be sick"; and that from 1894 to the time when she left his house she declined to cohabit with him as his wife, though she was able "to walk straight and go where she pleased." He said: "I do not think that she was too sick to have been as a wife to me." He further stated that he had placed his wife under the care of a physician, and had afterwards caused a surgical operation to be performed upon her, and then carried her home, "hoping that she would treat me better than she had in the past, but she became worse instead of better, until she finally left me when we lived at Atlanta Heights in 1898"; that he had at all times been willing to take her back, and had invited her to return, but she had refused to do so; and that he had spoken to her probably 20 times, but she had never spoken to him once. The defendant testified that within two weeks after they were married her husband began to quarrel with and abuse her, and continued to do so from that time until she left him; that she was only a little more than 15 years of age when she married, while he was between 35 and 36; that at the time of the birth of their first child she received injuries from which she had never entirely recovered, and which grew worse until an operation was performed in 1898; that her husband was jealous of her without cause, abused her, and accused her of being too free with other men, though he did not allege actual immorality; that on more than one occasion he used physical violence upon her, shaking his fist at her, threatening her with a whip, pulling her ears, throwing her to the floor, and dragging her; and that he stated that he wished she would leave and return to her people. A doctor who had treated her testified that she suffered from anæmia, neurasthenia, hysteria, and laceration of the perineum. He stated that he knew of no unhappiness between her and her husband; that he had examined her some time before he testified; that she had not entirely recovered from the nervous symptoms; and that her then present condition was such that she should have a servant with her all the time. The plaintiff denied all the charges of cruel treatment which his wife made against him. On the close of the evidence the presiding judge overruled the plea to the jurisdiction, and directed a verdict for a total divorce in favor of the plaintiff, which was entered accordingly. The defendant excepted.

E. S. Griffith, for plaintiff in error. Jas. Beall and Walter Mathews, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. It was urged on behalf of the defendant in error that the case was prematurely brought to this court, as the verdict directed was a first verdict for a total divorce, and it required two concurrent verdicts at different terms for the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony. It was therefore contended that the case was still pending in the trial court, and could not be brought to this court under Civ. Code 1895, § 5528, which declares that: "No cause shall be carried to the Supreme Court upon any bill of exceptions, so long as the same is pending in the court below, unless the decision or judgment complained of, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the cause, or final as to some material party thereto." The procedure by which a total divorce may be obtained and the bonds of matrimony dissolved differs materially in several respects from ordinary cases at law. The underlying reason for some of these differences is no doubt to be found in the fact that marriage, while termed a civil contract, is very unlike ordinary contracts, which may be made, modified, or abrogated at the will of the parties in interest. In the contract of marriage, and in the preservation and protection of the family relation, and of the offspring, the public, as well as the parties, is concerned. As instances of the recognition of this difference, Civ. Code 1895, § 2431, declares that: "No court in this state shall grant divorce of any character to any person who has not been a bona fide resident of the state twelve months before the filing of the application for divorce." In no other suit is it required that the plaintiff shall reside in the state for a specified length of time. A respondent may recriminate and ask a divorce in his or her favor. Civ. Code 1895, § 2433. If one verdict is found in favor of the respondent, the libellant cannot dismiss his or her suit without the consent of the opposite party. Section 2434. In the dissolution of the marriage contract alimony may be awarded. Section 2435. After the separation of the parties and before final verdict, the power of transfer of his property by the husband is limited. Section 2436. These citations are sufficient to show a marked difference between proceedings to obtain a total divorce and ordinary actions to enforce or rescind contracts, or to recover damages for torts.

The Constitution (article 6, § 15, par. 1; Civ. Code 1895, § 5367) declares that: "No total divorce shall be granted, except on the concurrent verdicts of two juries at different terms of the court." A divorce from bed and board may be granted on the verdict of one jury. Civ. Code 1895, § 2425. Before the bonds of matrimony are dissolved, there must be two distinct and separate trials, in each of which a verdict shall be rendered in favor of a total divorce. If the first verdict should be in favor of the defendant, no further proceeding could be had by the plaintiff towards obtaining another verdict. Where the basis of the suit is cruel treatment or habitual intoxication, the jury in their discretion may grant either a total or partial divorce. Section 2427. In some respects, a proceeding to obtain a total divorce is like two suits, consolidated into one, the verdict in the first of which is necessary before proceeding to obtain one in the second. The second verdict declares the rights and disabilities of the parties. Section 2445. It has been held that, after the rendition of two verdicts in favor of a total divorce, it is not indispensable that a judgment declaring the divorce granted should be entered up in order for the marriage to be legally dissolved. Burns v. Lewis, 88 Ga. 592, 13 S. E. 123 (2). This was under the Constitution of 1868, but the provision on this subject there made was similar to that in the present Constitution. Civ. Code 1895, § 2441, provides that "new trials may be granted from verdicts on applications for divorce, as in other cases." This applies to either verdict. If a motion for a new trial after the rendition of the first verdict for a total divorce is overruled, it has been held to be a proper subject of exception to this court. Gholston v. Gholston, 31 Ga. 625. If so, there would seem to be no sound reason why a direction of a verdict by the presiding judge cannot be brought up by bill of exceptions without the formality of moving for a new trial. The first verdict is not a mere interlocutory ruling entering into or leading up to the second trial, and as to which a bill of exceptions pendente lite should be filed. If unreversed, it stands as final, though its effect is not to grant a total divorce until the second verdict is rendered. The two trials are conducted as distinctly as if they were based on two separate suits. It would be folly, if the court erred in the admission of evidence or in a charge to the jury on the first trial, to file exceptions pendente lite, and await the second trial. Even though the jury should fail to grant a total divorce on the second hearing, there would stand on the record unreversed a verdict of one jury declaring that the defendant had been guilty of the misconduct on which the suit was predicated; and, if he could not by a motion for a new trial or exceptions set aside that verdict, though erroneous, he would have no remedy against being branded by this unreversed declaration of the jury, whatever might be the second verdict. Such is not the law. Each trial is so far distinct that quod hoc it may be treated as a termination of the case within the meaning of the statute, so as to allow a motion for a new trial to be made and exception taken to the judgment thereon, or direct exception taken to the direction of a verdict.

2. Was the presiding judge right in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for a total divorce? We think not. In addition to what has been said above in regard to the peculiar nature of actions for divorce, and the interest of the public therein, it is declared by Civ. Code 1895, § 2440, that "no verdict or judgment by default shall ever be taken in a suit for divorce, but the allegations in the petition must be established by evidence before the juries." Section 2430 declares that the confessions of a party to acts of adultery or cruel treatment must be received with great caution, and, if unsupported by corroborating circumstances, and made with a view to be evidence in the cause, shall not be sufficient for the granting of a divorce. Section 2429 provides that, if the adultery, desertion, cruel treatment, or intoxication complained of shall have been occasioned by collusion with the intention of causing a divorce, or if the party complaining was consenting thereto, or if both parties have been guilty of like conduct, or if there has been voluntary condonation and cohabitation subsequently, and with notice of the acts, no divorce shall be granted; "and in all cases the party sued may plead in defense the conduct of the party suing, and the jury may, on examination of the whole case, refuse a divorce." In divorce cases which are proceedings ex parte the duty is expressly placed upon the judge to see that the grounds are legal, and sustained by proof, or to appoint the Solicitor General, or some other attorney of the court, to discharge that duty for him. Section 2455. He should not allow a divorce to be granted by mere consent or default or collusion, or where no ground therefor is made out. It may be gravely doubted if it would not be erroneous for him to direct a verdict granting a total divorce in any case. At least it was so in this case. The wife pleaded and testified that her husband had been guilty of a long series of cruel acts, and had even told her on several occasions that he wished she would leave and go to her people, as she was no longer of any service to him, and that he caused the separation by his own conduct. There was evidence indicating that the defendant by reason of an injury resulting from childbirth was afflicted with hysteria. But the jury saw her and heard her evidence, as well as that in conflict with it, and they could determine whether her statements were accurate or were the result, in whole or in part, of her unfortunate condition. The judge should not have laid hold of the situation, determined these facts for them, and directed a verdict.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ATLANTA, B. & A. R. CO. v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1909.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 239*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—APPEAL—CONSIDERATION OF ASSESSOR'S AWARD.

Upon the trial of an appeal from the award of assessors in proceedings for the condemnation of private property, the verdict of the jury should be in favor of the owner for the value of the property and the amount of damages, if any; and the court will in rendering judgment upon such a verdict reduce the amount found by the jury by the amount paid under the award if the award is for a less amount than the verdict, but, if the verdict is for a less amount than the award, the judgment shall be against the owner for the excess of the amount of the award over that of the verdict.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1005*)—REVIEW—VERDICT APPROVED BY TRIAL COURT.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Talbot County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company against T. F. Smith. From the award of the assessors, Smith appealed to the superior court, and, from the judgment of that court, the railroad company brings error. Affirmed.

J. J. Bull and A. J. Perryman, for plaintiff in error. Persons & McGehee, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiff in error instituted proceedings to condemn a right of way through the lands of defendant in error. The amount condemned was a strip of land containing 17.16 acres, and extending a mile and a half through the lands of the owner of the property sought to be condemned. The evidence as to the actual value of the land per acre varied from $3 to $20. The assessors made their award for the amount of $175. The owner entered an appeal. Upon the trial of the issue arising upon the appeal in the superior court, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the owner for $500. To the judgment of the court below overruling the motion for a new trial made to set aside the verdict, the railway company excepted. The motion for a new trial in addition to the general grounds contains exceptions to the following portions of the charge: (1) "Now, gentlemen, under these instructions, it becomes necessary for you to find a verdict in favor of Mrs. Smith at least for a fair, reasonable, adequate, and just compensation for her land." Error is assigned upon this charge, because "the proceeding was under a condemnation proceeding, and the assessors had made an award of certain sum to the defendant as being the value of the land, which said award had been paid, and the court should have charged that this award should have been considered and deducted, provided the jury found that she was entitled to more damages than the award."

(2) "In any event, as I have charged you in this case, your verdict will be for the appellant, Mrs. Smith, and the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the appellant' so many dollars—whatever amount you have ascertained to be her damages under the rules which I have given you—'We, the jury, find for the appellant' so many dollars, with costs of suit." Error is assigned upon this charge, because "it was a direction to the jury to find a verdict, and no qualifications to the jury that, if under the evidence the appellant had been paid the full value of the land under the condemnation proceeding, then she would not be entitled to recover, or that the sum she had been paid should be deducted from the verdict the jury might find."

1. Civ. Code 1895, § 4678, makes the following provision for appeal and the issue to be submitted to the jury upon the appeal: "In case either party, or the representative of either party, is dissatisfied, he or they have the right, within ten days from the time the award is filed, to enter in writing an appeal from the award to the superior court of the county where the award is filed; and at the term succeeding the filing of the appeal, it shall be the duty of the judge to cause an issue to be made and tried by a jury as to the value of the property taken or the amount of damage done, with the same right to move for a new trial and file a bill of exceptions as in other cases at common law." Section 4680 declares: "The tender, payment, or acceptance of the amount shall not prevent either party from prosecuting the appeal. If the amount so awarded by the assessors is less than that found by the final judgment, the company shall be bound to pay the sum so finally adjudged, in order to retain the property; and if it be less than that awarded by the assessors, the owner shall be bound to refund any excess paid to or received by him, and a judgment for such excess shall be rendered against him, to be collected by levy as in other cases." Construing these two sections together, the evident scheme of the legislative provisions is that the trial upon appeal is a de novo investigation, in which the jury are to determine the value of the land taken and the amount of damages, if any. In any event, where land is condemned, the owner, of course, is entitled to the actual value of the property taken, and is entitled to a verdict at least for that amount; and this was the evident meaning of the instructions of the court excepted to. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insists, however, that the amount of the award rendered by the assessors should have been considered by the jury; and that it should have been deducted from the amount of the damages, provided the jury found that the owner was entitled to more damages than the award. The court properly withheld from the jury the consideration of the amount of the assessors' award. There was no reason why the finding of another tribunal upon the facts of the case should have been before the jury. The question submitted to them for solution was to be determined by them independently of the antecedent action of the assessors. The jury had to ascertain under the evidence submitted to them the value of the land and the amount of the damages. The finding of the assessors could not have been evidence for their consideration. In cases like this the amount of the award, which is entered on the minutes of the court, is to be deducted in entering up the judgment from the amount found by the jury if the verdict is for a greater amount than the award; and, should the verdict be for a less amount than the award, then judgment should be rendered in favor of the condemnor against the owner. And the court below, in accordance with the law, when the judgment was entered, preserved the rights of the plaintiff in error by deducting from the amount which the jury had found in favor of the owner the sum which the plaintiff in error had already paid under the award of the assessors.

2. There was evidence to support the finding of the jury; and that finding, having received the sanction of the trial judge, will not be disturbed here.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SPRINGFIELD FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. v. PRICE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—FIRE POLICY—OWNERSHIP OF GROUND—ESTOPPEL.

Where a policy of fire insurance contained a stipulation that it should be void if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, but at the time the application for insurance was made the company, through its agent, knew that the applicant did not own the land on which the building sought to be insured was situated, the company, in defending an action on the policy, will be estopped from setting up the noncompliance of the insured with this condition of the policy.

2. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—FIRE POLICY—NOTICE TO COMPANY—KNOWLEDGE OF CLERK.

An agent of an insurance company fully authorized to make out and issue policies of insurance has power to employ clerks in the ordinary business of the agency; and, if such clerk solicits insurance, and a policy of insurance is duly issued, knowledge of facts material to the risk acquired by the clerk in the solicitation and prior to the issuance of the policy is notice to the insurance company.

3. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—FIRE POLICY—FAILURE TO READ—EFFECT.

Reformation is not necessary to avoid the defeat of a policy of insurance on account of any matter in existence at the time of the issuance of the policy, with which the company is charged with knowledge. So, where the duly authorized agent of an insurance company failed to note on the policy containing the stipulation specified in the first headnote that the building which was the subject of insurance was on leased land, the failure of the insured to read his policy, and to observe the company's omission in this respect, is not such laches as will defeat his recovery on the policy by destroying the estoppel of the defendant to dispute the validity of the contract of insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 968; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 377*)—FIRE POLICY—OWNERSHIP OF GROUND—ESTOPPEL.

Where a tenant rents land from year to year under a verbal contract with his landlord that, in consideration of the payment of an annual rental, the tenant may occupy the premises and erect thereon a building which is to be the property of the tenant and removable by him, and where such tenant erects a building and in his application for insurance notifies the authorized agent of the insurance company that the building is on "leased ground," such information is sufficient to put the insurance company on notice of the character of his interest in the building, and effectual to estop the insurance company from setting up as a defense the stipulation in the policy that the contract of insurance was to be invalid if the building which was the subject of insurance was not on ground owned by the insured in fee simple.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by L. S. Price against the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Adams & Adams, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Richards and Saussy & Saussy, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a suit by L. S. Price against the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company to recover damages sustained by reason of the destruction of two certain buildings described in a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to the plaintiff. The petition contained an equitable feature, in that it sought to reform the policy in case the court should hold that the pleaded facts required reformation of the contract as essential to recovery. The defendant demurred generally and specially, the plaintiff amended to meet the special demurrers, and the court overruled the general demurrer. The case resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The court refused a new trial, and the exceptions are to the overruling of the demurrer and the refusal of a new trial.

1. The policy sued on contains a clause that, "if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple," the "entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto," shall be void. The petition sets out that the ground on which the buildings were situated was not owned by the insured, but that at and before the date of the issuance of the policy a duly authorized agent of the company was informed by the insurer that the buildings upon which insurance was sought were upon leased ground, and the agent of the insurance company was instructed to so note upon the policy, which by accident or mistake he failed to do. The policy also contained the further stipulation that "no officer or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and, as to such provisions and conditions, no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached." The insurance company defends its refusal to pay the amount of damage done the property insured because the buildings were upon ground not owned by the insured. In Johnson v. Aetna Insurance Co., 123 Ga. 404, 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am. St. Rep. 92, it was held that: "Where a policy of fire insurance contained a stipulation that it should be void 'if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple,' but at the time the application for insurance was made the company, through its agent, knew that the applicant did not own the land on which the building sought to be insured was situated, it will not be heard in defense to an action on the policy to set up the noncompliance of the plaintiff with this condition of the contract." Restrictions inserted in the contract upon the power of the agent to waive any condition, unless done in a particular manner, do not apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract, where it appears that the agent has delivered it, and received the premiums, with full knowledge of the actual situation. Wood v. American Fire Ins. Co., 149 N. Y. 382, 44 N. E. 80, 52 Am. St. Rep. 733; Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Mutual Bldg. Ass'n, 98 Ga. 262, 25 S. E. 457; Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., supra; 3 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 2351. From these authorities the conclusion follows that, if notice was given by the insurer to an authorized agent of the company that the buildings insured were upon leased ground prior to the issuance of the policy, the company could not avoid the policy if the proof showed that the buildings were upon leased premises, even if that fact was not noted on the policy.

2. The defendant, however, contends that the person whom the plaintiff notified at the time of the issuance of the policy that his buildings were located on leased ground was not its agent, but was a mere clerk or employé in the office of the company's agent, and that such clerk was not its agent for any purpose. On the trial it was developed that the defendant appointed George S. Haines as its agent, "with full power to receive proposals for insurance against loss or damage by fire in Savannah and vicinity, to receive moneys and countersign, issue, renew, and consent to the transfer of policies of insurance signed by the president and secretary of the said Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company, subject to the rules and regulations and to such instructions as may from time to time be given by the company." Haines did an insurance business in Savannah, rented and paid for his own offices, and employed and paid his clerks and other help without any participation by the company. He employed N. L. Bedford and J. A. Sullivan in the conduct of his insurance business. Bedford wrote up the forms of policies on the typewriter, filled in the descriptions, etc., and Haines would sign them. Bedford solicited insurance and delivered policies. In December, 1901, he solicited the plaintiff to insure with the defendant the buildings covered by the policy sued on, as plaintiff had his stock and some other buildings insured with defendant. Prior to that time, the plaintiff had had them insured with A. G. Guarard & Sons, and the policy with that agency had noted on it that the buildings were on leased ground. When Bedford solicited this insurance, the plaintiff informed him that the buildings were on leased ground, and requested him to note that fact on the policy, as the Guarard agency had done. Bedford requested that he be furnished with the old policy to write the new one from, which was done. When the policy was delivered by Bedford, the plaintiff asked him if it was all right, and, on being assured it was, placed it in his safe. Later the plaintiff permitted one Andeppa to remodel one of the three buildings covered by the original policy, and insure it for himself, and at that time telephoned the office of Haines to send out a man, and Sullivan came. The plaintiff testifies that he explained his rights and those of Andeppa to Sullivan, and on March 20, 1902, the old policy was canceled, and a new one issued, covering the two remaining buildings of the plaintiff, insured in the canceled policy. At the expiration of the year, on March 20, 1903, a renewal policy was brought to the plaintiff by Bedford. When this policy was delivered, the plaintiff did not look at it, but placed it in his safe, and never had occasion to examine it until after the fire, when the adjuster told the plaintiff that his policy did not have it noted thereon that the buildings were on leased premises. Bedford testified that the written part of the policy was in his handwriting. At the time it was written and delivered, he wrote policies, and did any work about the office that was necessary in the office of Haines. When an application was made for a policy, he would write it up and present it to Mr. Haines for his signature, and he would sign it. Applications for insurance were sometimes in writing, but usually oral or over the telephone. After a policy was signed, he would deliver it. He inspected risks about town, and reported to Haines, when Haines could decide whether he would effect the insurance or not. Soliciting insurance was a part of his business, and he was not paid extra for such work. He was aware that these buildings were on leased ground, but does not remember whether this fact was communicated to him when the first policy was written or not. On some occasions Haines would sign up blank policies and leave them with Bedford to be filled in and delivered. It was also in evidence that it is customary for local agents in Savannah to employ clerks to get information in regard to the condition of property and examine risks. Dependent upon the information received through clerks, they issue the policy. Haines had authority to have insured these buildings on leased ground, but would not have done so without communicating with the company. Bedford did not inform him that these buildings were on leased ground.

It is well settled that an agent who is supplied by the insurer with blank policies properly signed by the company, and who is authorized to fill up, countersign, and deliver policies to applicants for insurance, is a general agent of the insurance company in the matter of soliciting and accepting risks. Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 20 N. E. 77, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121; May on Ins. § 126; 1 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 347; Jesse French Piano Co. v. Cardwell, 114 Ga. 340, 40 S. E. 292. So that the practical question is whether knowledge of facts material to the risk acquired by the soliciting agent in the employment of such general agent of a fire insurance company prior to the issuance of the policy, and while acting as such soliciting agent, is notice to the insurance company. Our Code declares that "whatever one may do himself may be done by an agent, except such personal trusts in which special confidence is placed on the skill, discretion, or judgment of the person called in to act; so an agent may not delegate his authority to another, unless specially empowered to do so." Civ. Code 1895, § 2999. The inhibition against an agent delegating his power as contained in this Code section is only declaratory of the common law, and is but another form of expression for the maxim, "Delegata potestas non potest delegari." A principal may expressly authorize his agent to appoint a subagent, and under some circumstances authority to appoint a subagent between whom and the principal a privity of contract will exist may be implied. Instances of an agent's implied authority to appoint a subagent may be found in cases where from the conduct of the parties to the original contract of agency, or from the nature of the particular business which is the subject of the agency, or where substitution is authorized by general custom or usage, or where substitution is authorized by necessity, it may reasonably be presumed that the parties to the original contract of agency contemplated that such authority should exist. 1 Clark & Skyles on Agency, § 345. The power of an insurance agent, authorized to contract for risks, receive and collect premiums, and deliver policies, to confer authority on his clerk or assistant to exercise the same powers, so as to create a privity between the clerk and the insurance company, has been frequently before the courts of last resort of this country. The consensus of judicial opinion is to the effect that the knowledge of facts material to the risk by a clerk of the agent sent by him to solicit insurance and take applications binds the company as much as if the agent, the clerk's master, knew it. Electric Life Ins. Co. v. Fahrenkrug, 68 Ill. 463; Krumm v. Jefferson Fire Ins. Co., 40 Ohio St. 225; Arff v. Insurance Co., 125 N. Y. 57, 25 N. E. 1073, 10 L. R. A. 609, 21 Am. St. Rep. 721; Carpenter Co. v. Insurance Co., 135 N. Y. 298, 31 N. E. 1015; Bergeron v. Pamlico Ins. Co., 111 N. C. 45, 15 S. E. 883; German Ins. Co. v. Everett, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 514, 46 S. W. 95; Graham v. Am. Fire Ins. Co., 48 S. C. 195, 26 S. E. 323, 59 Am. St. Rep. 707; Goode v. Ga. Home Ins. Co., 92 Va. 392, 23 S. E. 744, 30 L. R. A. 842, 53 Am. St. Rep. 817; Davis v. King, 66 Conn. 465, 34 Atl. 107, 50 Am. St. Rep. 104; Duluth Nat. Bank v. Knoxville Fire Ins. Co., 85 Tenn. 76, 1 S. W. 689, 4 Am. St. Rep. 744; International Trust Co. v. Norwich Ins. Co., 71 Fed. 81, 17 C. C. A. 608; 1 Clement on Ins. 425, Rule 26; 19 Cyc. 812. The reason for the rule has been thus stated by the Supreme Court of Alabama: "The maxim, 'Delegatus non potest delegari,' does not apply in such case, though the service inherently is of a personal character, because authority to delegate delegated powers is found by implication from the extent and general nature of the business in the original authorization to the general agent." Insurance Co. v. Thornton, 130 Ala. 222, 30 South. 614, 55 L. R. A. 547, 89 Am. St. Rep. 30. In the case of Bodine v. Exchange Fire Ins. Co., 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 586, the court said: "We know according to the ordinary course of business that insurance agents frequently have clerks to assist them, and that they could not transact their business if obliged to attend to all the details in person; and these clerks can bind their principals in any of the business which they are authorized to transact." The Supreme Court of Michigan said: "Courts will recognize the ordinary course of business. It must be well known that these local agents do their business to a very large extent through clerks, who solicit insurance, make out applications and policies, and generally attend to the business of their employers. In such cases their acts are as binding as though done by the agents themselves." Steele v. German Ins. Co., 93 Mich. 81, 53 N. W. 514, 18 L. R. A. 85. And Mr. Cooley in the third volume of his Briefs on Insurance, p. 2527, summarizes the law on this point as follows: "The business of an insurance agent is generally of such nature and extent that it requires the employment of subagents and clerks if it is to be taken care of properly. Such subagents or clerks may be regarded as agents of the company by an insured dealing with them. Hence it follows that notice given a subagent or clerk of matters vitiating a policy will be imputable to the company, the same as though communicated to the regularly appointed agent." This author states in the same connection that: "A contrary rule prevails in some courts, where the position is taken that a subagent or clerk will not be regarded as the agent of the company unless he is in the employ of the company"—citing Morris v. Orient Ins. Co., 106 Ga. 472, 33 S. E. 430, as sustaining this exception. We do not think that a careful examination of the Morris Case justifies Mr. Cooley's classification. In that case Morris sought to escape the effect of a clause avoiding his policy if additional insurance was taken by showing that he had written Cobb, the company's agent, at the time of taking out this additional insurance, and in reply thereto a letter was received from a clerk of Mr. Cobb, acknowledging receipt of the communication, the writer saying: "Mr. Cobb isn't at home, but I will inform him as soon as he comes." It was said in the opinion that: "No attempt was made to show that the writer of the letter last above referred to was in any sense the agent or representative of the insurance company of which Mr. Cobb was the agent. On the contrary, we gather from the meager testimony brought out in this regard that this person was merely a clerk in the service of the agent, not in the employ of his principal in any capacity." In the Morris Case, as in the case of Lippman v. Aetna Ins. Co., 108 Ga. 391, 33 S. E. 897, 75 Am. St. Rep. 62, the waiver sought to be set up was of a condition subsequent to the issuance of the policy, and not of a condition precedent to its issue. The rule stated in reference to waivers of conditions precedent will not generally apply where the waiver relied on is one that has been taken subsequently to the delivery and acceptance of a policy, as the insured is then presumed to have knowledge of the restrictions, and will be bound thereby. 3 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 2513; Johnson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 123 Ga. 406, 407, 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am.

St. Rep. 92. Further, it did not appear in the Morris Case that the clerk had any authority whatever in reference to the insurance business of Mr. Cobb, or that he was even employed in such business, or performed any duties connected therewith. It does not appear that he had anything whatever to do with the soliciting, preparing, or delivering of policies, or even that his duties related to insurance in any way. Nor is there any other case in our reports which forbids us from adopting the rule as laid down by the current of authority, and so well supported on principle. We hold that a general agent, having authority to make and issue policies for an insurance company has power to employ clerks to discharge the ordinary business of the agency; and, where a policy of insurance is duly issued, knowledge of facts material to the risk acquired by such clerk while soliciting the insurance, and prior to the issuance of the policy, is notice to the insurance company.

3. By demurrer, plea, and in several grounds of the amended motion for new trial the defendant seeks to set up as a defense the alleged laches of plaintiff, who, with knowledge that it should be noted on his policy that his houses were on leased ground, received the several policies of insurance without such notation, and kept them in his possession through a period of many months, without reading his policy to see if it was so prepared. We do not think that such laches furnishes any ground of defense. In the first place, if plaintiff informed Bedford that his buildings were on leased premises when the application for insurance was made, it was not necessary that that fact should be noted on his policy in order to make it valid. That the plaintiff thought it necessary even after notice does not change its legal effect, nor make it necessary when in law it was not. In the second place, if the laches of the insured in failing to read his policy would in any event release the insurance company from liability to the insured where the insurer had notice of the broken condition at the time the policy was taken, it must do so in every case; for the real laches, if any, occurs in the first instance in receiving a policy without reading it, and in failing to note its conditions. It is a well-known fact of ordinary experience that papers such as insurance policies, deeds, etc., which are usually kept in one's "strong box," are seldom inspected except upon delivery, after which they are filed away not to be disturbed till some future happening again calls for them. It is true that the plaintiff's petition contains an alternative prayer for reformation by having the omitted clause inserted in the policy; but from the charge of the court, and the form of the verdict, the case was submitted to the jury to determine the defendant's liability independently of the prayer for reformation. Reformation is not needed to avoid the defeat of a policy on account of any matter in existence at the time of the issuance of the policy with which the company is charged with knowledge. 1 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 855. Even if reformation were proper in the present case, it was not necessary, as the plaintiff could have relied upon the estoppel in pais, without invoking affirmative equitable relief. And, granting that the plaintiff's laches might defeat his right to affirmative equitable relief, this would not deprive him of the right to recover what he might be entitled to on the policy in his suit at law. Trust Co. v. Scottish Ins. Co., 119 Ga. 672, 46 S. E. 855.

4. It is insisted that, under the facts of the present case, the ground on which the insured buildings stood was not "leased premises," and, for that reason, plaintiff's information to Bedford was not true, and therefore was not notice to the company which would waive the condition in the policy. It is also contended that under the terms of the contract under which this ground was occupied the buildings became a part of the realty, and were not, in fact, the property of the plaintiff, and that he had no insurable interest therein. It appears from the evidence that the land on which these buildings were situated belonged to the estate of Mary Jane Roberts. The representative of that estate testified that the buildings belonged to plaintiff so far as this estate was concerned. The taxes on these improvements were not paid by the estate. Originally he had rented it as a vacant lot to W. A. Price for a term of years. He does not remember whether under a written lease or not. This was in 1893. Under that contract, Price had the right to place any improvements on it he saw fit, and remove them at any time he saw fit. In 1902 the rent was raised. At that time he assured plaintiff he had no claim to any of the improvements. Price has the same lease he has had since 1893, and he is now trying to arrange to give him a lease for seven years. Witness is prepared, as soon as he can arrange the lease, to give Price a written lease, and it will be stated that the estate makes no claim for the improvements. At the expiration of any rental season the understanding was that Price had the right to remove his improvements and the estate made no claim to them whatever. Since 1902 it had been rented by the year at $700 per year. He was under the impression that the original lease was in writing. The plaintiff testified that his father had in 1893 rented the place, but the original lease was destroyed. He has seen the lease. Plaintiff was connected with his father in business and afterwards bought his father out, and in buying him out he secured the improvements. He does not remember whether the first lease was for five or ten

BARTON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 26, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 244*)—BLOW-POST LAW—CROSSING HIGHWAY.

The blow-post law, as embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2222, has no application where the track of the railroad company crosses the public highway upon a bridge or trestle above the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 360*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSINGS—FRIGHTENING ANIMALS.

A railroad company, whose road passes over a highway by a bridge, is not liable to a traveler in the highway for an injury caused by the fright of his team, occasioned by the running of a train in the usual and customary manner, and without unnecessary or unusual noises, although the approach of the train to the overhead bridge was not signaled, and the topography of the country was such that accidents of a similar character are peculiarly liable to happen.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by D. C. Barton against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiff brings error, and defendant files cross-bill complaining of overruling of demurrer. Reversed on cross-bill of exceptions. Main bill of exceptions dismissed.

Barton brought his action for damages for personal injuries against the Southern Railway Company. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and pendent lite exceptions duly certified and filed. After the plaintiff had presented his evidence and closed, the court sustained a motion for nonsuit. The plaintiff's bill of exceptions complains of this ruling, and the defendant's cross-bill complains of the overruling of its demurrer. The substantial averments of the petition are as follows: The defendant's line of railway crossed the Rome and Summerville public road at a point in the city of Rome about a mile from the courthouse, upon a trestle about 12 or 15 feet above the bed of the public road. The public road at this point is in a depression between two hills, and the railroad approaches the trestle from both directions around a curve at the base of these hills, so that it is shut off from the view of one going along the public road in a direction away from Rome until he has arrived at the trestle; and for this reason it is impossible for one approaching the trestle from the direction of Rome to see, and difficult to hear, the approach of a train coming in either direction to this crossing. This public road was a frequented highway, where people traveling with vehicles and teams were almost constantly passing throughout the day, and years. The writings transferring his father's interest are also destroyed. In 1902 he went to the representative of the estate, and requested a long lease. The representative told him to go ahead and put any improvements he pleased on the place, and that, as long as his rent was paid, he could continue as his tenant. On several occasions, it was stated the improvements were to be plaintiff's. On the strength of this agreement, in 1902 the plaintiff remodeled and enlarged the buildings. The price per year was agreed on at that time, and it was distinctly agreed that the plaintiff could remove his buildings any time he saw fit. The contention of the defendant is that this agreement did not satisfy the statute of frauds, and that for this reason the plaintiff had no title to the buildings. Even if it was necessary for the contract to be in writing in order to satisfy the statute, here the plaintiff had executed his part of the agreement, and the owner of the land could not have pleaded the statute as against his right to remove his improvements, if he chose. We think when the insurance company was notified through its agent that the buildings insured were on leased ground, and issued the policy, it was put on sufficient notice to have caused it to make a full inquiry into the title of the property. But, aside from this, we think, under the facts in this case, the buildings were on leased premises. Property may be leased in parol for one year. Civ. Code 1895, § 3117. Nor do we think that the contention that the buildings were not the property of plaintiff is sound. He was at least a tenant from year to year, and there was no necessity for such a contract to be in writing. Nor was it necessary that the agreement that he could remove the buildings at any time he chose should be in writing. It was a part of the yearly contract of rental, which is expressly excepted from the statute of frauds in this respect. Civ. Code 1895, § 3117. There is no pretense that the plaintiff did not have an insurable interest in the buildings, but the contention is that information to the insurance company that the buildings were upon "leased ground" was insufficient to apprise the company of the nature of the plaintiff's interest, and ineffectual as an estoppel against the company from availing itself of the stipulation in the policy that the contract of insurance was to be void if the ground on which the buildings were erected was not owned by the insured in fee simple.

What has been said above covers the various assignments of error on the part of the defendant. We are therefore of opinion that the court did not err in any of the rulings complained of.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

frequently during the night. The running of a train over this trestle was at all times calculated to excite, frighten, and cause to run away ordinary roadworthy teams, and especially those that were nervous or easily frightened, when such teams were passing under this trestle, and in this way the running of a train over this trestle brought peril to every person driving a team under or near this trestle. All these facts and conditions were well known to the defendant, its servants and agents operating its trains.

About 5 o'clock in the afternoon of August 13, 1907, plaintiff was approaching this trestle as he was leaving Rome for his home, driving two mules to an empty lumber wagon. As he approached this trestle, he listened to ascertain if any train might be approaching from either direction, and hearing none, drove forward under the trestle; and just as he was passing under the trestle a train of the defendant came around the hill from the direction of Gadsden, passed over the trestle, and immediately over him and his team, at a high rate of speed, and by its terrifying appearance, rapid motion, and tremendous noise, it greatly excited and terrified the team which he was driving, which, becoming wild from fright, ran away and injured petitioner in spite of his efforts to control them. The servants in charge of defendant's train failed to blow the whistle or otherwise warn the plaintiff, or to check the train, at a point 400 yards from the crossing, or at any point nearer than 400 yards, as required by statute. Under the facts and conditions stated, the defendant owed all persons traveling this road, when one of its trains was approaching the crossing, the duty of warning them of such approach, in the exercise of ordinary care; but, disregarding this duty, the defendant entirely failed to warn plaintiff of the approach of its train, but ran its train at a high rate of speed, which itself naturally tended to frighten, and did frighten, plaintiff's team. After alleging that plaintiff was without fault, his injuries are minutely described, and the amount of damages alleged.

C. E. Davis and W. M. Henry, for plaintiff in error. Maddox, McCamy & Shumate and Geo. A. H. Harris & Son, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. 1. The first ground of negligence alleged is the failure on the part of the servants of defendant in charge of the train to observe the blow-post law, as embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 2222. In the case of McElroy v. Georgia, C. & N. Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 257, 25 S. E. 439, it was held that this section of the Code has no application "where the track of the railroad company crossed the public highway upon a bridge or trestle above the latter." This ruling was by a divided court, and the plaintiff asks us to review and overrule the ruling there made.

We are satisfied that the decision of the majority in that case was correct, and adhere to the ruling made by them.

2. But it is also alleged and contended that, independently of the statutory duty imposed by Civ. Code 1895, § 2222, the obvious danger to the constantly passing public along this much traveled highway, of passing trains frightening horses, and the circumstances of the situation which prevented the public from observing the approach of a train unless heralded by whistle or other signal, raised a duty upon the railroad company, in the exercise of ordinary care, to warn the public, by proper signals, of the approach of a train to this place of constant and obvious danger. The negligence charged against the railroad company is, not that the train was run at an unusual rate of speed, or operated in such a manner as to produce unusual or unnecessary noises, or that the railroad company was negligent in constructing its track. The defendant's negligence is alleged to consist in running its train, without signal or other precaution, over a trestle which spanned a much traveled highway, and which from the configuration of the ground prevents a traveler driving a team on such highway, on approaching the passageway under the trestle, from seeing or hearing the train as he nears the span over the highway. There can be no doubt that the passing of a railroad above or beneath a highway, instead of at a grade crossing, reduces the chances of injury to travelers along the highway by the running of the train. Such crossings are to be encouraged in order to secure the safety of travel against the perils of a grade crossing. The difference between these two kinds of crossings is so radical that it does not stand to reason that the law will hold a railroad company to the same exactness of responsibility in each case. At grade crossings the traveler on the highway and the railroad company enjoy a common privilege on the highway itself, and each must use such privilege with due regard to the safety and rights of the other. This obligation requires the railroad company, in approaching a grade crossing, even in the absence of a positive statute to that effect, to exercise proper precautions to prevent injury to a traveler on the crossing, or who is about to cross, or who has just crossed. Where a railroad track crosses a trestle or bridge, it does not share with the traveler in the highway below the common use of the latter. We can see no difference between the basal elements of liability of a railroad company incurred by its train frightening horses of travelers on highways parallel to its track, and in passing across an overhead bridge. A railroad company has the right to make all the noises incident to the movement and working of its engines and cars, and to give the usual and proper signals of danger, and will not be liable for injuries occasioned by horses driven upon a parallel highway taking fright at such noises, if it exercises such right in a lawful and reasonable manner. However, a railroad company is under the duty to so operate its cars as not unnecessarily to interfere with the rights of individuals traveling upon the highway, or to endanger such travel by unnecessary noises tending to frighten horses. Ga. R. Co. v. Carr, 73 Ga. 557.

The plaintiff attempts from the pleaded facts to raise a duty on the railroad company to warn a highway traveler of the approach of a train to the trestle over the highway, arising out of the special environments of the situation. In other words, it is insisted that the railroad company is running its train at a proper speed without unnecessary noises over a track, against the proper construction of which nothing is averred, and its liability for frightening the plaintiff's horses is based solely on a failure to signal the approach of the train to the crossing. The railroad company is under no duty to warn travelers on a parallel highway that it intends to use its track (Ga. R. Co. v. Carr, supra), and for the same reason it is under no duty to give notice to travelers using a highway over which its track is constructed that it intends to use its bridge which spans the highway. The law permits a railroad company to use its roadbed and bridges by running its trains over them in a manner customary and usual with railroad trains. If it runs its trains at a proper speed, and with no unusual or unnecessary noises, it is not liable for an injury which a traveler receives from a horse frightened by a train in passing over an overhead bridge. Favor v. Boston & L. R. Corp., 114 Mass. 350, 19 Am. Rep. 364.

The defendant's demurrer should have been sustained. Since the question made in the cross-bill of exceptions is controlling upon the case as a whole, and the judgment therein is reversed, there is no necessity for considering the errors alleged in the main bill of exceptions. Gay v. Gay, 108 Ga. 739, 32 S. E. 846.

Judgment reversed on the cross-bill of exceptions. Main bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Union County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by America Williams against Rachael Jones. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Henry B. Gurley was seised and possessed of a small tract of land upon which he resided. In 1893, upon his invitation, his granddaughter, America Gurley, then a young girl about 14 or 15 years old, came to live with him, and on the 14th day of March, 1896, he executed to her a deed to the tract of land, the material parts of which are as follows: "State of Georgia, Union County. This indenture made this the 14th day of March, 1896, between Henry B. Gurley and America E. Gurley, both of the county aforesaid, witnesseth: That the said Henry B. Gurley, for and in consideration of work and labor done and to be done, consisting of taking care and caring for the said Henry B. Gurley for and during his natural life, upon the faithful performance of said duty upon her part this obligation is to be of full force and virtue, otherwise this deed to be and the above and foregoing to be null and void, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, does hereby sell and convey unto the said America E. Gurley, her heirs and assigns, a certain tract of land [describing it], together with all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging, in fee simple," with warranty of title. The granddaughter remained on the premises, keeping house and caring for her grandfather, until the year 1900, when she married and left the premises to reside with her husband. Henry B. Gurley, who was then very much advanced in years, shortly thereafter moved into the house of his daughter, Rachael Jones, who resided about a half mile distant. On June 26, 1901, he executed to Rachael Jones a deed conveying the same land included in his previous deed to his granddaughter. Three or four years thereafter he died, and America E. Gurley (who had married Williams) brought suit against Rachael Jones to recover the land. In answer to the suit the defendant averred that the plaintiff had failed to support her grandfather according to the terms of her deed, whereby she forfeited all estate in the land conveyed to her by him, and that his subsequent deed to the defendant vested the title to the land in the defendant. It was also averred in the plea that the plaintiff was insolvent, and, if the plaintiff be permitted to recover the land, that the defendant was entitled to have judgment against the plaintiff for the value of the support and services rendered by the defendant to Henry B. Gurley, which should have been rendered by the plaintiff, and there was a prayer that such judgment be declared a special lien on the land. A verdict for the premises with mesne profits was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, which the court refused to set aside on motion for a new trial, and the defendant excepts.

W. E. Candler, J. B. Jones, John H. Davis, J. T. Davis, and B. F. Davis, for plaintiff in error. O. J. Lilley and C. J. Wellborn, Jr., for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Both parties claim from the same grantor; the plaintiff's deed being of older date. The court instructed the jury that the language in the deed from Henry B. Gurley to America Gurley (now Williams), wherein it was stated that the consideration was for labor done and to be done in taking care of the grantor during his life, and upon failure of the grantee so to do the deed was to be void, was a covenant, and not a condition either precedent or subsequent, and that it amounted only to a contract on the part of the grantee to take care of the grantor, a breach of which would not divest her title. This construction of the deed is alleged to be erroneous; it being contended that these words in the deed are words of express condition, and the grant therein one with a condition subsequent. We do not think that the deed was correctly construed by the court. A deed executed upon a consideration to support the grantor, without apt or proper words to create a condition, a breach of which would render the estate defeasible at the grantor's election, passes title to the grantee, and the failure of the grantee to maintain and support the grantor may give to the latter a right of action in equity to rescind the contract if the grantee is insolvent. McCardle v. Kennedy, 92 Ga. 198, 17 S. E. 1001, 44 Am. St. Rep. 85. But a grantor may convey land to another on condition that the grantee shall care for him for life, and provide therein that a failure to perform the condition shall have the effect of defeating the estate granted. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3136, 3137. The law inclines to construe conditions subsequent so as to render their breach remediable in damages, rather than by forfeiture; but, where the plain words of the grant declare that a breach of the condition shall defeat the estate granted, there is no room for construction. No precise technical words are required to create a condition subsequent, and the construction must always be founded upon the intention of the parties as disclosed in the conveyance.

In the deed under consideration the grantor not only stipulated that the consideration of the deed was that the grantee should care for him during life, but that, "upon the faithful performance of said duty upon her part, this obligation to be of full force and virtue, otherwise this deed to be and the above and foregoing to be null and void." This language can only mean that the estate was granted on condition that the grantee was to care for her grandfather during his life, and upon her failure to perform this condition her estate was to become forfeited. A forfeiture of the estate upon her failure to take care of her grandfather constituted the terms which the granddaughter consented to accept as a condition of the grant. The clause of the deed construed by the court in the instruction to which exception is taken created a condition subsequent, upon the breach of which the grantor, at his election, could have availed himself of the forfeiture. If the grandfather relieved the granddaughter from the obligation of caring for him, after she left his home, or if it was through his fault that she failed to continue her services, he could not claim a forfeiture from a failure to comply with the condition. As was said in Moss v. Chappell, 126 Ga. 196, 54 S. E. 968: "Forfeitures resulting from the breach of a condition may be expressly released, or may be the subject of a waiver, and a waiver may result from circumstances as well as express language to that effect. All this is well settled; and, where the release or waiver extends to the whole forfeiture, of course all benefit to be derived from the forfeiture is gone."

The case was tried on an erroneous theory, and a new trial is ordered.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. BROCK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909. Rehearing Denied June 29, 1909.)

1. CONTINUANCE PROPERLY REFUSED.

While the presiding judge would have been authorized to grant a continuance, it cannot be held that, under the showing and countershowing, he abused his discretion in refusing to do so.

2. CONTINUANCE (§ 44*)—AFFIDAVITS FOR.

Where a motion was made for a continuance on the ground of the illness of the mother of the leading counsel for the defendant, and was overruled on the showing and countershowing made, the production, on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, of the affidavits of such leading attorney and of another witness (no affidavits by them having been offered when the application for a continuance was made, and no reason being shown for the omission) will not require a reversal because of the overruling of the motion for a continuance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. AMENDMENT PROPERLY ALLOWED.

The allowance of the amendment to the petition did not furnish ground for a motion for a new trial, nor is a reversal required on any ground duly made and urged against the amendment.

4. CONTINUANCE PROPERLY REFUSED.

There was no error in refusing to grant the second motion for a continuance, made after the allowance of the amendment to the petition.

5. NONSUIT PROPERLY REFUSED.

The motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—CONCLUSIONS.

Where a petition, in an action against a railroad company for a personal injury, alleged that at the point in the limits of an incorporated town where the injury occurred, and in the immediate vicinity, the defendant's tracks, road-bed, and right of way were much traveled and frequented by the public, within its knowledge and that of its agents, an inquiry of a witness as to the extent to which those tracks and the spaces between them at that place were used by members of the public in walking, and the answer that they were used a great deal, and that almost everybody who came in from that side of the town used them, were not subject to the objection that the witness was asked to state a conclusion and not a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.* Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 833, 988.]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 192*)—PERSONAL INJURY ACTION—LOSS OF LIMBS—ATTEMPT TO WALK BEFORE JURY.

Where a plaintiff had suffered the loss of both legs by reason of a personal injury on a railroad, and testified on the trial of a suit because of it that he could walk a little on his knees, and that he also used a rolling chair, there was no error in permitting him to walk before the jury and exhibit to them the loss of his limbs and the effect thereof on his ability to walk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 677; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 95*)—MOTION TO STRIKE EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where various witnesses had been examined by both sides as to the extent of the use made by the public of railroad tracks and the intervening and surrounding spaces as a pass-way, a general motion "to rule out all the testimony that has been introduced by both sides in connection with people walking anywhere there except on that line," without pointing out any particular evidence or the testimony of any particular witness as subject to objection in that "connection," was too vague and uncertain, and there was no error in overruling it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 246; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where authorized by the pleadings and evidence, there was no error in charging that, if there was a failure to comply with the law with respect to keeping engines and cars under control and ringing the bell at public crossings, while such failure would not within itself amount to such negligence as to become the basis of a recovery, yet, if the plaintiff was injured within 400 yards of a public street crossing, the jury might consider such failure to check or give the statutory signal as a circumstance in connection with all the other evidence in the case in determining whether the defendant was negligent or not; the judge charging also correctly on the subject of negligence generally as applicable to the case-made.

(a) The pleadings and evidence in this case authorized such a charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 709; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The plaintiff, in a case involving permanent injury, having introduced in evidence the table of life expectancy contained in 70 Ga. 844 et seq., but not the annuity table, a portion of the charge, when considered with the entire charge as to damages, did not furnish ground for a new trial as failing to instruct the jury how to use such tables, and therefore being calculated to mislead them to the prejudice of the defendant, which part of the charge was as follows: "The plaintiff has introduced in evidence before you a mortality table, which you may consider upon the question of how long you believe the plaintiff would have lived, in awarding damages for a permanent physical injury in this case. You may consider the length of time the plaintiff would have lived, and you may consider also the extent to which his physical power has been impaired or reduced, if any. The value of plaintiff's services, however, up to his twenty-first year, could not be allowed by you."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 280*)—REFUSAL OF REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS.

Some of the requests to charge were properly refused as not correctly stating principles of law applicable to the case. In so far as any of them embodied principles which were legal and pertinent, they were sufficiently covered by the general charge, so that the failure to give them did not require a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

12. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize a recovery by the plaintiff; and while the verdict was large, in view of all of the facts of the case, the extent of the injury, the absence of error in rulings of law, and the approval of the presiding judge, this court will not grant a new trial on that ground alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 178, 372-385, 1396; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by G. T. M. Brock, by next friend, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McMillan & Erwin, C. R. Faulkner, A. G. McCurry, J. J. Strickland, and Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. Howard Thompson and R. R. Arnold, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Brock, a minor about 18 years of age, brought suit against the Southern Railway Company and its engineer for damages resulting from being run over by an engine of the defendant company. His arm was broken and his legs crushed, rendering necessary the amputation of both legs below the knees. At the time of the injury he was walking on the track of the defendant company about 253 yards before reaching a public street crossing, and at a place which he alleged was in the limits of an incorporated town, and where the tracks, roadbed, and right of way were much traveled and frequented by the public as a passway, within the knowledge of the defendant company, its engineers, and other employes. It was alleged that the exercise of ordinary care would have charged the defendants with knowledge that the track was likely to be occupied by pedestrians at that point, and also that the track was straight for three-quarters of a mile before reaching such point, and that the engineer either did see the plaintiff, or ought to have seen him, and could have prevented the injury by the use of ordinary care. There were allegations of failure to comply with an ordinance limiting the speed to six miles per hour, or to keep a proper lookout, or to give any signal of approach, or to check the engine, or to comply with the law in reference to approaching public crossings. The plaintiff also alleged that there was a freight train on a side track of the defendant company, running alongside the track on which he was, which freight train was making so much noise as to prevent his hearing the approaching engine and to attract his attention temporarily. He further alleged that the engine which injured him was being run at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and that the defendants were guilty of other acts of negligence. The defendants denied the substantial allegations. It is unnecessary to set out the evidence. On the trial the jury found in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant company, $20,000 damages. The company moved for a new trial, which was denied, and it excepted.

Most of the rulings announced in the headnotes require no elaboration. Some of them are directly controlled by former decisions. See Crawford v. Sou. Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 870, 33 S. E. 826; Macon & Bghm. Ry. Co. v. Parker, 127 Ga. 471, 56 S. E. 616; Sou. Ry. Co. v. Chatman, 124 Ga. 1026, 53 S. E. 692, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283; Georgia Railroad v. Williams, 74 Ga. 723; W. & A. Railroad v. Meigs, 74 Ga. 857. In Smith v. Cen. Railroad Co., 82 Ga. 801, 806, 10 S. E. 111, 112, where a person walked down a railroad track in the dark and was injured by a train coming up from behind and striking him, and no reason or explanation was given why he did not listen or look, or why he did not or could not hear or know of the approaching train, or that there was anything visible or tangible occupying his attention, it was held that he could not recover. Bleckley, C. J., distinguished that case from the two last above cited by saying that in them "other trains were near, and the injured person's attention might have been directed to them, and thus withdrawn from the danger that threatened." None of the grounds of the motion for a new trial require a reversal.

It was contended that the verdict was excessive, and that the judgment should be reversed on that ground. The amount found was large, especially if the plaintiff was considered as a trespasser. Damages are given as compensation for the injury done, and this is generally the measure, where the injury is of a character capable of being estimated in money. In some cases, and in regard to some kinds of injury and their results, such as pain and suffering, the measure of damages is left to the enlightened consciences of an impartial jury. In Davis v. Central Railroad, 60 Ga. 329, a charge was approved which instructed the jury on this subject as follows: "This does not mean that juries can arbitrarily enrich one party at the expense of the other, nor that they should act unreasonably through their caprice; but it authorizes you to give reasonable damages where the proof shows that the law authorizes it; but the jury should exercise common sense and love of justice, and, from a desire to do right, fix an amount that will fairly compensate for the injury received." Civ. Code 1895, § 3903, declares that: "The question of damages being one for the jury, the court should not interfere, unless the damages are either so small or so excessive as to justify the inference of gross mistake or undue bias." The judge of the superior court is vested with certain discretionary powers in regard to the granting of a new trial. Section 5477 provides that: "In any case where the verdict of a jury is found contrary to evidence and the principles of justice and equity, the presiding judge may grant a new trial before another jury." And section 5482 provides that: "The presiding judge may exercise a sound discretion in granting or refusing new trials in cases where the verdict may be decidedly and strongly against the weight of evidence, although there may appear to be some slight evidence in favor of the finding." Thus the judge of the superior court has by law conferred upon him the discretionary power to grant a new trial where the verdict is contrary to evidence and the principles of justice and equity, or is decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence; and it is his duty to exercise a sound discretion, and to grant new trials where it should be done. A court of errors has not the same discretionary power conferred upon it in this regard. When a case comes before the Supreme Court, after the refusal of a new trial by the judge of the superior court, it comes not only with the presumption in favor of the verdict of the jury, but also stamped with the approval of the presiding judge, after a consideration of the evidence and the verdict and the use of the discretionary power of review which the law confides to him as a right, and imposes upon him as a duty. Thus we are confronted with the question, not as one of primary discretion, but as to whether the trial judge has abused his discretion in approving the verdict, and whether there is any evidence sufficient to support it, or whether this court can say that the damages are so excessive as to authorize an inference of gross mistake and undue bias, in spite of the verdict and in spite of its approval.

In the present case a youth of 18 had an arm broken, and both legs so badly mangled as to require amputation below the knees. He testified, more than a year after the injury, that he had suffered, and continued to suffer, that he was unfit to do any active farm work, that he could walk a little on his knees, and also had to use a rolling chair, that he had never worked for wages, but had been offered work several times before the injury, and that he thought wages would be about $25 per month. Having held that there was no error of law in the rulings of which complaint was made, after a careful examination of the evidence we are not able to say that the presiding judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, or that it was so excessive in amount as to justify the inference by us of gross mistake or undue bias, after its approval by the trial judge. For instances in which large verdicts have been sustained where no error of law has been committed, see: Georgia Pacific Railway Co. v. Dooley,

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1909.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—POWER OF MUNICIPALITY.

A municipality cannot exercise the right of eminent domain unless the power to do so is conferred upon it in its charter or in some amendment thereto, expressly or by necessary implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—POWER OF MUNICIPALITY.

Neither in the act approved August 29, 1879 (Laws 1878-79, p. 315), nor in that approved October 21, 1891 (Laws 1890-91, p. 900), is there to be found any language which expressly or by necessary implication confers upon the city of Eatonton the right to condemn or take private property for the purpose of laying and constructing sewers thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Putnam County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by L. B. Griffith against the Mayor and City Council of Eatonton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. S. Turner and M. F. Adams, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Davidson, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Mrs. Lizzie B. Griffith brought her equitable petition for injunction against the mayor and city council of Eatonton. It was alleged in the petition that the plaintiff was the owner of certain lands, and that defendant was seeking to condemn a strip of this land for the purpose of "digging and laying a trunk sewer thereon for a distance of 1060 feet," and that the mayor and council had instituted proceedings to condemn that part of the petitioner's lands referred to. Injunction was asked upon various grounds, but at the hearing the petitioner rested her right to the injunction sought upon the sole ground that the charter of the city did not confer upon it and the authorities the "power to condemn private property for the purpose of laying and constructing sewers in said city." The mayor and council insisted that the charter did confer this power; and this assertion of the right under the charter by the city, and its denial by the petitioner, raised the sole question for the determination of the court below, and this question was decided in the negative.

Whether the city had the power which it is insisted was vested in the municipality depends upon the construction of certain sections of the charter to be found in an act approved August 29, 1879 (Laws 1878-79, p. 315), and entitled "An act to create a city government for the town of Eatonton, in Putnam county, and to confer upon the authorities thereof certain powers in lieu of the present town government, and for other purposes," and a section of an act amendatory of this act; the latter act being approved October 21, 1891 (Laws 1890-91, p. 900). In the first act referred to the only provisions in any way relating to the question under consideration are the following: Section 7: "That the mayor and aldermen of said city, sitting as a board of council, shall have power therein to lay off, vacate, close, open, alter, curb, pave, drain, and keep in good order, and repair the roads, streets, sidewalks, alleys, cross-walks, drains, and gutters for the use of the public, or any of the citizens thereof. * * * In case the board of council and owner of any land through which any street is to be opened or enlarged can not agree upon the value of the land to be used, the board of council shall choose one citizen, and the party owning the land, or his authorized agent, one, the two to choose a third, and the three so chosen shall decide the value of the land proposed to be taken, which decision shall be final." The act approved October 21, 1891, is entitled: "An act to amend an act to create a city government for the town of Eatonton, in Putnam county, and to confer upon the authorities thereof certain powers in lieu of the present town government, and for other purposes, approved August 29, 1879, by repealing that portion of said act which provides for the election of a marshal and providing for his appointment by the mayor and council, and by authorizing the mayor and council to pave the public streets of said city and assess the adjacent property owners for the payment thereof, by providing a more complete method of condemning private property for the public use of said city by enlarging the powers of the city authorities to punish offenders, and for other purposes." In the body of this act are to be found the following provisions:

"Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, that the following part of section 7 of said act contained in the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second, thirty-third, and thirty-fourth lines, thereof, to wit: The words, 'In case the board of council and owners of any land through which any street is to be reopened or enlarged can not agree upon the value of the land to be used, the board of council shall choose one citizen, and the party owning the land, or his authorized agent, one, and the two to choose a third, and the three so chosen shall decide the value of the land proposed to be taken, which decision shall be final,' be, and the same is, hereby repealed.

"Sec. 4. Be it further enacted that the method of condemning private property for public use in said city of Eatonton shall be as follows: If the board of council and the landowners can not agree upon a price for the land to be used, then each shall select a citizen, the two thus chosen to select a third, and the three thus selected shall decide the value of the land proposed to be taken, and in the event either the landowner or the board of council fails or refuses to select an assessor, then the ordinary of Putnam county shall select for the party failing or refusing, each party having the right to appeal to the Superior Court from the decision of the assessors."

This excerpt from the amendatory act is the only portion of it having any reference to the question involved here. Clearly, under the provision of the act of 1879, no right of eminent domain under which the city could lay and construct sewers was conferred upon the city; and, unless that power is conferred by section 4 of the amendatory act, it does not exist. Section 4, however, provides nothing more than a method for assessing damages in the case of the taking of private property under the exercise of the right of eminent domain conferred by the charter. It does not in itself undertake to create, enlarge, or modify the right of eminent domain as it existed in the charter sought to be amended. The mere provision in a charter of a method of exercising the right of condemning private property is nugatory, unless somewhere in the charter the power is given, expressly or by necessary implication, to condemn. Possibly the embodiment in the charter of the method of exercising the right of condemning or taking private property might be considered in passing upon the meaning of words which were ambiguous and which might be so construed as to confer the right of eminent domain. If the right to condemn private property had been expressly given in the charter, or is to be necessarily implied from the language of that instrument, even if the method by which the power could be exercised had not been provided for in the charter, a method of condemnation might be found in the general law. The creation of the method for exercising a certain right did not create or confer the power to exercise the supposed right. In the case of Stowe v. Newborn, 127 Ga. 421, 56 S. E. 516, it was held that authority was conferred to lay out and open streets and to take the necessary property for doing so in the following section of the charter of that town: "That said mayor and council shall have power to lay out, open, and abolish streets and alleys of said town, extend and change the same as the public interest may require, by paying the owners just compensation for the property taken for any such purposes." But authority for the exercise of the right of eminent domain was found in the section of the charter referred to, because "the use of the word 'taken' implies a seizure; and there is the provision that the owners shall be paid just compensation for the property so seized or taken. The Legislature in referring to compensation evidently meant the value of the property without reference to any agreement between the parties. Authority is conferred upon the municipality to lay out and open streets, and authority is further conferred to take the property necessary for laying out and opening such streets upon paying the owners just compensation for the property taken. * * * The power given to take property upon making just compensation necessarily carries with it the idea of voluntary appropriation of individual property for public use upon making just compensation therefor." Nowhere in the charter of the town of Eatonton, either subsequently or previously to the passage of the amendatory act, is there to be found language equivalent in meaning to that given by construction to the word "taken" in the case last referred to. See, also, the case of Ga. R. & Bk. Co. v. Union Point, 119 Ga. 809, 47 S. E. 183. If the right to exercise the power of eminent domain had been conferred by the Legislature upon the town of Eatonton, so as to authorize the laying and construction of sewers, the method for the exercise of such a right would be found in section 4 of the amendatory act quoted above. But, as the right itself had not expressly or by necessary implication been conferred upon the municipality, the provision of that section cannot be invoked as a source of such right; and the judge below properly held that the municipality did not have the right to condemn property for the purpose of laying and constructing sewers, and consequently that the injunction prayed for should be granted.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

KENNESAW GUANO CO. v. EDWARD O. MILES & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 296*) — PERFORMANCE — DEPARTURE FROM TERMS.

Where parties in the course of the execution of a contract depart from its terms, and pay or receive money under such departure, before either can recover for failure to pursue the letter of the agreement, reasonable notice must be given the other of intention to rely on the exact terms of the agreement. Until such notice, the departure is a quasi new agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

2. EVIDENCE AUTHORIZED FINDING.

The evidence authorized the finding in favor of the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by Edward O. Miles & Co. against the Kennesaw Guano Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Edward O. Miles & Co. brought suit against the Kennesaw Guano Company for $888.05 principal, on an account for tankage delivered, as stated in an itemized account attached to the petition. The defendant filed its answer, wherein it claimed damages against the plaintiffs because of their failure to deliver to the defendant the amount of tankage which they were under obligation to deliver under the contract between them. The defendant claimed that the plaintiffs were indebted to it the difference between the contract price of the tankage which they failed to deliver and its actual value, and asked judgment against them for an amount as shown by the statement attached to the answer. The case was submitted to the judge without a jury. He awarded judgment against the defendant, and it filed exceptions. Upon the trial the following contract was introduced in evidence: "Atlanta, Ga., April 1st, 1898. This agreement between the Kennesaw Guano Company and Edward O. Miles & Company, witnesseth: That said Miles & Company may render tallow from butcher bones (which they agree to do for twelve months from May 1st, 1898), on the premises of said company at Clifton, Georgia, on the following conditions: Said Miles & Co. are to furnish all necessary appliances, and make all connections at their own expense, and said company is to furnish steam (at such times as they may have steam on) at the rate of $1.00 for each rendering of not over five hours. Said Miles & Company are to pay, for the use of said premises, $4.00 per month, and in addition thereto said company is to have the option of buying at $8.00 per ton, when dry, all the by-product called tankage obtained in rendering tallow, which is guaranteed to be not less than ten tons per month, and to analyze not less than 4 per cent. ammonia and 35 per cent. bone phosphate. It is understood and agreed that said rendering is to be conducted in such manner as not to be offensive or inconvenient to said company (who are to be the sole judge of this), and the liquor from each rendering is to be sprayed on the pile of ammoniated goods in the pit of said company, without expense to them, and the necessary pipes, etc., for doing this thoroughly are to be furnished and connected by said Miles & Company. This arrangement or privilege may be canceled at the end of any month by said company giving said Miles & Company ten days notice." Indorsed on the contract was the following: "The within agreement is renewed to May 1st, 1900. subject to all the conditions named therein. This February 14th, 1899." The account sued upon by Miles & Co. showed a delivery of tankage by them to the defendant company on the following dates in 1901: February 1st, April 9th, July 18th, and October 1st. It was admitted upon the trial that this account was correct. The account attached to the answer of the defendant showed delivery of tankage under the contract on the following dates: August 1 and September 23, 1898; May 13, 15, September 14, and November 17, 1899; May 15 and September 27, 1900; May 10, 1901; and June 2, 1902. The total amount of tankage shown to have been delivered under this statement amounted to 167 and a fraction tons. The amount which the defendant company claimed it was entitled to have delivered was 410 tons, leaving a balance undelivered of 142 and a fraction tons. It was admitted that the tankage shown by the statement attached to the answer to have been delivered was actually delivered by Miles & Co. Mr. Ashford, the president of the defendant company, testified: "As to what was done at the expiration of the second term of this contract, which was May 1, 1900, there wasn't anything. I can't recall that anything at all was said about it. Edward O. Miles & Co. did not remove their plant from the premises, but they continued there just as they had been doing, operating the plant, rendering tallow, and making tankage. The tankage that was made was delivered to us at stated times; that is, at irregular times as they had accumulated enough to make a 'weighing,' as we called it. It was delivered to us when that had been done. There was no difference in the character of the business conducted by Miles & Co. on the premises after May, 1900, and that conducted before that time. They vacated this place October 1, 1901. I don't think they ever gave us any notice when they vacated. They just moved out. I don't remember that any notice was given at all. As a matter of fact, I do not think any notice was ever given. I have been in the manufacturing business about 12 years. As to what is meant by tankage, they gather up bones, scraps, and decayed meats that butchers put aside during the day. All of that has more or less tallow in it. They gather up so many pounds from one butcher and so many from another, so that every day there was a considerable quantity of it, maybe several wagon loads. Tankage is the stuff that remains after the tallow has been taken out. These bones were put into a steel tank that is air-tight, and steam is turned on, and it is cooked for several hours. When it cools down, the tallow rises to the top and is taken off. The residue is what is called tankage. It is a common product in the fertilizer trade. The large packers in Chicago have it in great quantities, and ship it down here. It is a well-known commodity, and is in demand by fertilizer manufacturers. I was engaged in the fertilizer business and buying it at that time. I am familiar with the market price. The market price of tankage at the mills in Atlanta between the dates of May, 1898, and October, 1901, varied as to grades. There are various grades. Sometimes it runs high in ammonia. That is the important ingredient that is sought in tankage. Tankage with 4 per cent. ammonia and 35 per cent. phosphate would have been worth at the time $13.50 to $14 per ton. That is the minimum price. * * * I do not think there is any doubt about their having delivered to my company all of the tankage they made."

Edward O. Miles testified: "Nothing was ever said to me by Mr. Ashford after the making of this contract until October 1, 1901, about a failure to deliver the tankage. From the time of the execution of this contract, April 1, 1898, down to October 1, 1901, the time the last car load of tankage was delivered, they never said anything to me about demanding that we comply with the terms of the contract as to furnishing 10 tons per month. We delivered all the tankage we had. During that time we made a number of settlements with the Kennesaw Guano Company. Settlements in full between us were made. They paid us in full the amount they owed us at each settlement. We settled, I think, two or three times a year. Whenever the tankage was dry, and the company was ready to receive it, they would notify us. They paid us for the tankage we delivered. These papers handed me are statements they rendered us of our account with them. This settlement was made April 29, 1899. This statement shows the check inclosed for balance of $79.52. That was paid. This statement shows a balance due us of $278.80, and a check was inclosed in the statement. This is a similar statement dated November 10th. This shows a balance of $185.58, which was paid by check inclosed. Here is a similar statement dated January 15, 1900, which shows a balance of $3.99, which was paid by check inclosed." Elliott, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that from May 1, 1898, to October 1, 1901, he held the position of bookkeeper with the Kennesaw Guano Company, and further testified: "Yes; there was money paid to Miles & Co. I think it was paid two or three times a year during this period of three or four years. I think it was in the summer of 1902 that I gave up my position with them. What the Kennesaw Guano Company was paying Miles & Co. was for tankage on these statements."

Mr. Ashford, recalled, testified: "As to whether or not any settlement was made between me and Miles & Co. under this contract between the date of its execution and October 1, 1901, several settlements were made, according to these statements here.

These statements simply represent what tankage was turned over to us upon that contract at stated times; and, when that tankage was turned over, naturally they wanted money for it, and we made out a statement up to that date of the amount that was turned over, and the amount charged for steam, and $4 per month was deducted from that tankage, and a check sent to them. As to any closing up of accounts, there were various times when I didn't know whether he was delivering more or less than 10 tons per month. * * * I called attention to the fact that they were behind in the delivery of tankage as soon as I found out that there was any considerable arrearage. I called Mr. Miles' attention to it, and he said he was giving us all he could get, but possibly he might be able to buy some. My recollection is that he said he would endeavor to do so. The fact is that I expected considerably more than 10 tons. * * * I cannot recall as to the date when I told him he was short. I told him that I noticed he had not been delivering as much as the minimum amount mentioned. I said that to Mr. Miles, but I don't remember when I said it. He was in my office. Mr. Miles is the only man I had anything to do with."

Edward O. Miles, recalled, testified: "I do not remember Mr. Ashford ever saying anything to me about not furnishing 10 tons of tankage, as he states, until I made a demand for payment for the dry bones shipped. As to when that was I would have to refresh my memory. It was about the time I filed this suit."

Wimblish, Watkins & Ellis and Franyston E. Ellis, for plaintiff in error. Howard & Bolding, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Miles & Co. brought suit against the Kennesaw Guano Company to recover the purchase price of a quantity of tankage delivered to the defendant. The defendant filed an answer, setting up a failure on the part of the plaintiff to deliver the quantity of tankage guaranteed under a written contract between the parties (a copy of which appears in the statement of facts), whereby it was damaged in the amount of difference between the contract price and the market value of the deficiency in the amount delivered; and praying judgment accordingly. The court, to whom the case was submitted without a jury, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount sued for, and to this judgment the defendant excepted. In the judgment the court said: "The court is further of the opinion that the evidence discloses a mutual departure from the exact terms of the written contract by the paying and receiving money thereunder by the parties thereto, which constituted a quasi new contract." The original written contract between the parties, among other things, provided: "Said Miles & Co. are to pay for the use of said premises $4.00 per month, and, in addition thereto, said company is to have the option of buying at $8.00 per ton, when dry, all the by-product called tankage obtained in rendering tallow, which is guaranteed to be not less than ten tons per month." The plaintiffs delivered to the defendant all of the tankage they made, which was less than the 10 tons per month guaranteed under the contract. The plaintiffs contend that the various settlements made between them and the defendant, and the payment by the defendant to the plaintiffs for the tankage delivered, which was less than the 10 tons per month guaranteed, and other conduct of the defendant, shows that there was a mutual departure from the terms of the original contract and a quasi new contract between the parties made, which relieved the defendant of the necessity of fulfilling the guaranty in the original contract of furnishing 10 tons per month. Civ. Code 1905, § 3642, provides: "Where parties, in the course of the execution of a contract, depart from its terms and pay or receive money under such departure, before either can recover for failure to pursue the letter of the agreement, reasonable notice must be given the other of intention to rely on the exact terms of the agreement. Until such notice, the departure is a quasi new agreement." The original contract began May 1, 1898. The plaintiffs did not vacate the defendant's premises, and cease to operate its plant in the making of tankage until October 1, 1901. The plaintiffs furnished to the defendant all of the tankage they made. During these several years the defendant paid to the plaintiffs, two or three times each year, the amount due for tankage furnished by the plaintiffs to the defendant, as per statements rendered. According to the testimony of witnesses for the plaintiffs, nothing whatever was said when these various settlements were made about the failure of the plaintiffs to furnish 10 tons per month, as provided by the contract, or at any other time until about the time this suit was filed to recover for the last deliveries of tankage made by the plaintiffs to the defendant. This suit was filed June 7, 1902. These various settlements were made each year, and some of them occurred under the renewed and some under the original contract, and, when they were made, the guano company took from the value of the tankage delivered, computed at the contract price, the amount due by Miles & Co. for rent and steam, and paid Miles & Co. the difference. The tankage delivered was all Miles & Co. made, and these settlements were made without the guano company making any complaint whatever that the guaranty provided for in the contract was not fulfilled, or that the amount delivered did not fulfill the guaranty provided for in the contract. While Miles & Co. delivered all the tankage they made, they did not deliver the amount called for by the guaranty; and if Miles & Co., on account of any deficiency in the amount of tankage delivered, owed the guano company the difference in the market price and the contract price of such deficiency at the time these various settlements were made, then the guano company at such times did not owe Miles & Co. anything, as the difference between the contract price and the market price of such deficiency would have been more at the date of the respective settlements than the amount due Miles & Co. by the guano company as the contract price of the tankage delivered less the amount due by Miles & Co. for rent and steam. The record does not show anything to indicate other than that both parties at the time the various settlements were made considered them as being an adjustment of all differences then existing between them. The contract imposed upon the parties thereto mutual obligations, requiring the guano company to furnish steam and a location for Miles & Co.'s plant, and on Miles & Co. the obligation to pay rent and for the steam furnished, in addition to giving the guano company the option to buy tankage. In the execution of this contract, Miles & Co. delivered to the guano company all the tankage they made, and the guano company received the same as it was delivered and paid therefor, after deducting the amount due by Miles & Co. for rent and steam. We think that under the facts appearing in the record the court was not required, but was authorized, to find that in the course of the execution of the contract the parties departed from its terms, and paid and received money under such departure, as a result of which the plaintiffs were relieved of the duty to fulfill its guaranty provided for in the original written contract. In this connection, see Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3642, 3674, 5152; Eaves v. Cherokee Iron Co., 73 Ga. 459; Hasbrouck v. Bondurant & McKinnon, 127 Ga. 220, 56 S. E. 241; Provident Savings Life Assurance Society v. Georgia Industrial Co., 124 Ga. 399, 407, 52 S. E. 289; Sou. States Phosphate, etc., Co. v. Barrett & Doughty, 130 Ga. 749, 61 S. E. 731; Mathis v. Harrell, 1 Ga. App. 358, 362, 53 S. E. 207; Bush v. West Yellow Pine Co., 2 Ga. App. 295, 58 S. E. 529; Fitzgerald Cotton Oil Co. v. Farmers' Supply Co., 3 Ga. App. 212, 216, 59 S. E. 713.

The original contract ended May 1, 1899. It was renewed by an agreement indorsed on it by both parties to the effect that it was extended to May 1, 1900. The president of the defendant company testified: "As to what was done at the expiration of the second term of this contract, which was May 1, 1900, there wasn't anything. I can't recall that anything at all was said about it. Edward O. Miles & Co. did not remove their plant from the premises, but they continued there just as they had been doing, operating the plant, rendering tallow, and making tankage. The tankage that was made was delivered to us at stated times; that is, at regular times as they had accumulated enough to make a 'weighing' as we called it. It was delivered to us when that had been done. There was no difference in the character of the business conducted by Miles & Co. on the premises after May, 1900, and that conducted before that time." We think that the conduct of the parties, after the expiration of the contract made in writing, was such as to renew such contract as it previously existed, and each of the parties was bound by the terms of such previously existing contract as modified by the mutual departure therefrom. In this connection, see Hill v. Goolsby, 41 Ga. 289, 291; Roberson v. Simons, 109 Ga. 360, 34 S. E. 604.

The defendant alleged in its plea that the premises were worth more for rent than the amount provided for in the contract, and offered the following amendment: "Defendant says that in the event it should be held by the court that the written contract between plaintiff and defendant was not extended as contended by defendant from May 1, 1900, to October 1, 1901, by mutual consent, and by the continued use and occupation of defendant's premises by plaintiff, that the defendant says that for the use and occupation of its premises from May 1, 1900, to October 1, 1901, plaintiff became indebted to defendant for the reasonable rental value of the premises, which defendant says was the sum of $50 per month." In view of the ruling above made, the court committed no error in refusing to allow such amendment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ELLIOTT v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 19, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 921*)—NEW TRIAL—ADMISSION OF IRRELEVANT TESTIMONY.

The admission of irrelevant testimony will not generally warrant the granting of a new trial, unless it appears that the evidence was calculated to injuriously affect the complaining party, especially is this true when the evidence is not material, and not calculated to mislead the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2207; Dec. Dig. § 921.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 151*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—JUSTIFICATION.

The evidence relied upon by the state to establish the fact of the homicide not disclosing any circumstances of mitigation or justification, it was not error for the court to charge that, "when a killing is proven to be the act of the defendant, the presumption of innocence with which he enters upon the trial is removed from him, and the burden is then upon him to justify or mitigate the homicide."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 276; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*) — APPEAL — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR—REVIEW.

One ground of the motion for a new trial charges that one of the jurors trying the case was disqualified because he was "biased and prejudiced" against the prisoner at the time of the trial; this charge being based upon certain expressions alleged to have been used by him in a conversation which took place subsequently to the killing and prior to the trial. The use of the expressions was testified to in the affidavit of two persons. The juror made affidavit denying the use of the expressions alleged to have been made by him. Held, that the affidavit tending to show disqualification and submitted for that purpose, and the counter affidavit of the juror submitted by the state, form an issue for determination by the trial judge, and his decision of the question thus made will not be disturbed by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 8068; Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—REVIEW.

There was evidence to support the verdict; and, that verdict having received the sanction of the trial judge, this court will not disturb the judgment refusing a new trial, no error of law being made to appear in the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 8067; Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

J. M. Elliott was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. D. McNeill and M. U. Mooty, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., Hatton Lovejoy, and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted in Troup county for the offense of murder. Upon the trial of the case a verdict of guilty was rendered. A motion for a new trial was filed, and upon the hearing it was overruled. To the judgment overruling the motion, the plaintiff in error excepted.

1. The motion for a new trial contains four grounds in addition to the general grounds set forth in the motion as originally filed. The first two of the grounds contained in the amendment to the motion relate to the admission in evidence, over objection of the prisoner's counsel, of certain testimony which was objected to on the ground that the testimony was "thoroughly immaterial." So far as can be judged from the grounds themselves, the testimony was, as contended by counsel, "thoroughly immaterial." Nothing is shown in either of these grounds as to any issue which would be affected by the evidence complained of injuriously to the plaintiff in error. Counsel for the movant in framing these grounds contented themselves with merely setting out this immaterial testimony, and did not undertake to state any issue involved in the case which was or could be affected by the testimony in such a manner as to harm the accused. "The superior courts may grant new trials in all cases when any material evidence may be illegally admitted to, or illegally withheld from the jury against the demand of the applicant." Pen. Code 1895, § 1059. The admission of irrelevant testimony will not generally work the granting of a new trial, where it does not appear that the evidence was calculated to injuriously affect the complaining party. Especially is this true when the evidence is not material, and not calculated to mislead the jury. Mayor, etc., of Gainesville v. Caldwell, 81 Ga. 76, 7 S. E. 99; Chestnut v. State, 112 Ga. 366, 37 S. E. 364.

2. The judge charged the jury as follows: "When a killing is proven to be the act of the defendant, the presumption of innocence with which he enters upon his trial is removed from him, and the burden is then upon him to justify or mitigate the homicide." It is contended that this charge states "an incorrect proposition of law, for that the burden never shifts in a criminal trial." The criticism upon the charge contains within itself an incorrect proposition of law. "If the proof that shows the killing discloses that it was done without malice, of course, the presumption does not exist; but, if the accompanying proof does not, then the burden is thrown upon the defendant to show that it was done without malice." Vann v. State, 83 Ga. 44, 9 S. E. 945. See, also, the case of Mann v. State, 124 Ga. 760, 53 S. E. 324, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, where the question raised in this ground of the motion for a new trial is fully discussed. In the instant case there was clear and uncontroverted evidence establishing the fact of the commission of the homicide alleged, and the evidence proving the homicide discloses no circumstance of mitigation or justification. Consequently the question which arose in the case of Green v. State, 124 Ga. 343, 52 S. E. 431, where a charge similar to the one here complained of was held to be error under the facts and circumstances of that case, does not arise. The distinction between cases in which the proof of a homicide is accompanied by circumstances of mitigation or justification and those cases in which there is proof of the homicide unaccompanied by circumstances that mitigate, excuse, or justify, with reference to the giving of instruction touching the shifting of the burden of proof, is clearly drawn in the case of Mann v. State, supra.

3. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was based upon the alleged disqualification of J. T. Pearson, a member of the jury which rendered the verdict complained of; and it is alleged that this juror "was biased and prejudiced against the defendant." Affidavits of the plaintiff in error and of his counsel showing that the fact of the alleged disqualification of the juror was unknown to movant and his counsel, and that it could not have been known to them in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, were duly filed and submitted in connection with the hearing of the motion. To establish the alleged disqualification of the juror counsel submitted the affidavit of J. A. Allen and J. D. Rhodes. In this affidavit the affiants depose that the juror referred to took part in a conversation on the night of the homicide relative to the probability of the lynching of the prisoner, J. M. Elliott, and that the juror said, in substance: "I am willing to do my part towards taking him out of jail, and lynching him. I also speak the sentiments of Tony Walker, but Tony Walker doesn't want his name mentioned in it. If the rest of you will go, I will do my part." The state submitted on the hearing the affidavit of the juror attacked, in which he deposed: "Deponent and J. A. Allen and J. D. Rhodes had a conversation in front of and near the store of deponent and the said J. D. Rhodes. The said J. D. Rhodes was drunk, and the said J. A. Allen was drinking. The said Rhodes and Allen were discussing the lynching of J. M. Elliott, defendant in above case. Said Rhodes and Allen were urging and talking about getting up a mob for this purpose. Deponent said little in the conversation, and did not say to them, neither has deponent said to any one else at that time nor at any other time, that he would lynch the said J. M. Elliott. Deponent would not have joined the said Rhodes and Allen in the lynching of the said Elliott, and deponent left the said Rhodes and Allen because of the condition that they were in and of what they were saying. Deponent went into the trial of the said Elliott, without prejudice against the said Elliott, and decided the case of said Elliott without bias or prejudice toward the state or the said Elliott." Fairly construed, we are of the opinion that the affidavit by the juror, submitted for the consideration of the trial judge on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, was a denial of the remarks attributed to him in the affidavit read to impeach his fairness and freedom from bias and prejudice. It is true that in the affidavit by which it is sought to establish the disqualification of the juror it is charged that the juror "in substance said, 'I am willing to do my part towards taking him out of jail and lynching him,'" and in the counter affidavit the juror under investigation denied saying in the conversation referred to or at any other time "that he would lynch the said J. M. Elliott." While the expression charged against the juror and the expression denied by him are not identical in words, in substance they are the same. The charge and the denial therefore made an issue for the decision of the trial judge, and his decision of that question is final. It was a matter within his discretion, and this court will not interfere with the decision rendered by him.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

4. The defense relied upon in this case was that the accused at the time of the commission of the homicide and prior thereto was of unsound mind, and that the diseased condition of his mind had assumed the form of "delusional insanity;" and that, although he committed the homicide charged, no criminal responsibility attached to him for the act. The question made by the defense urged was fully, fairly, and clearly stated to the jury in the able charge of the trial judge. There was strong evidence to support the contention of counsel for the accused, but there was also evidence which made it a question to be determined by the jury as to whether or not the defendant was of sound mind, and therefore responsible for his acts at the time of the homicide. Upon that issue the verdict of the jury was against the defendant; and there being evidence to support the finding, and the verdict having been sanctioned by the trial judge, it will not here be set aside on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BROWN v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1909.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 295*) — SUPPORT OF MINOR CHILDREN—ACTION BY WIFE.

Where the wife, on account of the misconduct of the husband, obtains a decree granting her a divorce and awarding to her the custody of their minor child, and no question as to the support of such child by the father has been made or passed on, the father is not relieved of his legal obligation for a proper support of the child. If he fails or refuses to discharge this obligation, the mother in an original action may recover of the father the amount of expenditures made by her after such decree for a proper support of such child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 295*) — SUPPORT OF MINOR CHILDREN—ACTION BY DIVORCED WIFE.

The petition was subject to special demurrer on the ground that it did not set forth with sufficient particularity the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in the support of the child.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Banks County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by M. O. Brown against Oscar Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

H. H. Perry, for plaintiff in error. J. J. Strickland and Fletcher M. Johnson, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant in error brought suit against the plaintiff in error to recover from him the amount alleged to have been expended by her in support of their son. Among other allegations in the petition, the following, in substance, appears: At the September term, 1902, of Gwinnett superior court, a total divorce was granted her from the defendant, the present plaintiff in error, and by the terms of the decree the custody and control of the child were awarded to her. The question of alimony was not involved or passed upon in the divorce suit, and the plaintiff did not insist upon any judgment therefor. She has managed to support the child from the income from her property and by encroaching on the corpus thereof and with the proceeds of her labor. The plaintiff insists that the defendant "reimburse her for what she has paid out since the separation [in support of the child], the same amounting approximately to $1,200," and alleges that the defendant is able to do so. The plaintiff filed an amendment to the petition, alleging that "she has expended since the divorce was granted the sum of $1,200 for the board and support of their child Fred, the same being expenses for necessities; that said necessities were not furnished by said Oscar Brown, and she was compelled to furnish them in order to maintain said son; that said expenses has been an average of $20 per month, including board, clothing, medicinal attention, and other necessities; that while at the beginning the expenses was possibly less, it has grown with his age." The defendant filed a demurrer on the ground that no cause of action was set forth and a special demurrer on the ground "that plaintiff fails to specify what article was furnished by her." After the plaintiff filed the amendment hereinbefore referred to, the defendant filed a demurrer to such amendment and to the petition as amended on general grounds, and because the "petition fails to state what the other necessities are, and fails to state what expenses were incurred for tuition or medical services, or what items of clothing were furnished, or what expenses were paid for board, and fails to itemize or state any particulars of her said claim, or to show the time when or to whom any amounts were paid." The demurrers were overruled. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $480, and a motion for a new trial was overruled. The defendant excepted to each of these rulings.

1. The defendant in error brought suit against the plaintiff in error for a divorce on the ground of habitual intoxication, and obtained a verdict and decree for a total divorce. In the decree the custody of their minor child was awarded to the defendant in error, who afterwards brought this suit against the plaintiff in error, the father of the child, for an amount expended by her for the necessary support of the child, and obtained a verdict. The plaintiff in her petition alleged: "Your petitioner did not insist at the time on a judgment for alimony, for the reason that the said Brown promised he would contribute the necessary amount to pay the expenses of their child, and could do this better without a judgment against him than with one." This, together with other allegations, merely gave the reason why the plaintiff did not in the divorce proceedings seek alimony for the child; and a proper construction of the petition, in view of all the allegations, is that it does not set forth a suit on any express promise of the defendant to pay her for any support she might give the child after divorce was granted. In one of the grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial the plaintiff in error complains that the court committed error in charging the jury as follows: "The law imposes the obligation upon the father to support his children until majority; and the court instructs you that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, can recover in this case, against the defendant for what she has thus expended." In another ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial the plaintiff in error contends that the court committed error in charging the jury as follows: "The court has left it to the jury to determine whether the question of alimony or support of the child was passed upon and adjudged in that trial [the divorce proceeding]. If it was not, the court instructs you that any one, including the mother, who had furnished a support for the child, would have a right of action against the father for money expended therefor." The general demurrer filed by the defendant and the assignments of error upon the charges quoted make for determination the question as to whether or not a wife, who has obtained a verdict and decree of divorce from her husband, where the custody of the children has been awarded her in the decree, and the question as to the support of the child has not been passed on, can recover from the father the amount expended by her subsequently to the decree for the necessary support of such children. If the wife obtains a total divorce, she does not after the verdict and decree sustain the relation of wife to her former husband, and he is no longer under legal obligation to support her, except such support as may be imposed upon him in the divorce proceedings. After the verdict in the divorce case, the husband is not liable for necessities furnished by third persons to the divorced wife, nor is she entitled to inherit any interest in his estate when he dies. A divorce between the husband and wife does not bar the children from being heirs of the deceased father, nor is there anything in our statute relieving such father from his legal obligation to support his children simply because there has been a divorce granted to his wife. Civ. Code 1895, § 2452, gives the court, in divorce proceedings, the right to award the custody of the children to the parent not in default; but under this section the court may award the custody to persons other than the parents, or to "guardians appointed by the ordinary." The father is primarily entitled to the custody of his children; but, if his conduct has been such as not to entitle him to their custody and to cause their custody to be awarded to some other person in divorce proceedings, this award of the custody to another by reason of misconduct on the part of the father of itself does not relieve him of his legal obligation to support his children. The fact that the custody of the children has been awarded to the mother does not change this rule. The fact that her former relation was that of wife to the father of the children could not relieve such father of his legal obligations to his children. Civ. Code 1895, § 2462, is as follows: "If the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife, they shall also, in providing permanent alimony for her, specify what amount the minor children shall be entitled to for their permanent support; and in what manner, how often, and to whom, and until when, it shall be paid; and this they may also do, if, from any legal cause, the wife may not be entitled to permanent alimony, and the said children are not in the same category, and when such support shall be thus granted, the husband shall likewise not be liable to third persons for necessities furnished the children embraced in said verdict who shall be therein specified." The only instance in which it is provided in this section that the father is relieved of liability to third persons for necessities furnished to his child is "when such support shall be thus granted," meaning when support is provided for the children in the verdict and decree in the divorce proceeding. Civ. Code 1895, § 2469, provides: "Until such provision is made, voluntarily, or by decree or order of the court, the husband shall be liable to third persons for the board and support of the wife, and for all necessities furnished to her, or for the benefit of his children in her custody." Where, because of the misconduct of the husband, a divorce is granted to the wife and the custody of the children awarded to her, and no support by way of alimony is provided for the children in the divorce proceedings, we know of no law relieving the father of his legal obligation to support the children, or of his liability for necessities furnished them by third persons. The wife stands as such third person, and can recover from the father for the proper support furnished his children by her after the divorce proceedings, even though the custody of the children was awarded to her. The legal obligation of the father to support his children, and his liability to third persons for proper support furnished the children, exists after as well as before a decree of divorce granted the wife because of the misconduct of the husband, where no support for the children is provided for in the divorce proceedings; and where, in such proceedings, the custody of the children is awarded to the mother and she furnishes proper support to the children, she can recover from the father, on account of expenditures made by her, an amount to be determined under all the facts and circumstances in the case.

There is much conflict in the authorities on this question, and some courts hold that the father is not liable to the mother for expenditures made by her in support of the children under such circumstances. A majority of the authorities, however, seem to be in accord with the view which we entertain and have hereinabove expressed, to the effect that the father is liable. One of the reasons given in the authorities holding the contrary view why the father is not liable is that support and service are reciprocal duties, and that the father cannot be liable for the support of his children when he loses their services by reason of their being awarded to the mother. We do not think, however, this argument is sound, because the services of the children are lost to the father by reason of his wrongful act, if the divorce is granted because of his misconduct, and the court only acts to protect them in taking them from him and awarding them to the mother; and it would not be proper to allow the father to be relieved of liability for necessary support furnished his children because of his own wrongful conduct. The view just stated is very concisely set forth in the case of Dolloff v. Dolloff, 67 N. H. 512, 38 Atl. 19, 20, in the following language: "Nor is it material that the plaintiff was awarded alimony to the amount of $600. Alimony in its proper signification is not maintenance to the children, but to the wife, and, when no order is made for the children's maintenance upon the allowance of alimony with custody of children, the father's obligation to support them is in no wise affected. In brief, when the father has been found by a judicial decree like the one in this case to be an unfit person to exercise parental control by reason of his own voluntary misconduct, the law does not allow him to convert such misconduct into a shield against his parental liability." Another reason given in this line of cases for holding that the father is not liable is that, when the children are awarded to the mother without any provision for their support, it is to be presumed that the court made such provision for their support as was necessary, and that the decree is conclusive as to the father not being under any obligation for their support after the decree, unless such decree is afterwards modified by continued proceedings in the original action. It would seem that, if it was proper for any presumption at all to be had in such a case, it would be that the court omitted to make any provision for the support of the children in the decree because it was deemed proper to leave the obligation to support his children where it legally and ordinarily belonged, to wit, with the father, until there was some legal proceeding in regard thereto. In 14 Cyc. 812, it is said: "At common law the father remains primarily liable for the support of the children of the marriage as well after as before a divorce." We know of no statute in this state changing this common-law rule. In the case of Spencer v. Spencer, 97 Minn. 56, 105 N. W. 483, 114 Am. St. Rep. 695, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, it was held: "The legal obligation of a father for the support of his minor children is not impaired by a decree of divorce at the suit of his wife for his misconduct, which gives the custody of the children to her, but is silent as to their support. If he refuses or neglects to support them, under such circumstances, the mother may recover from him in an original action a reasonable sum for necessities furnished for their support after such decree. The law implies a promise on his part to pay for such necessities." In this connection, see the cases cited in the note to this case in 114 Am. St. Rep., above cited; also notes to the same case in 7 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 903. See, also, Seely v. Seely, 116 Mo. App. 362, 91 S. W. 979; Dolloff v. Dolloff, 67 N. H. 512, 38 Atl. 19; Ditmar v. Ditmar, 27 Wash. 13, 67 Pac. 353, 91 Am. St. Rep. 817; Zilley v. Dunwiddie, 98 Wis. 428, 74 N. W. 126, 40 L. R. A. 579, 67 Am. St. Rep. 820; Graham v. Graham, 38 Colo. 453, 88 Pac. 852, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1270; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 1223; 14 Cyc. 812. In order for the wife to recover the amount expended by her for such support, where no provision for the support of the children was made in the divorce proceedings, we do not think it necessary, if proper, to institute any proceeding in the original case in which the divorce was granted her and the children awarded her; but she could bring an independent suit for such recovery. In such a case there is no order for maintenance of the children to review. In this connection, see Seely v. Seely, supra. In the case of Maddox v. Patterson, 80 Ga. 719, 721, 6 S. E. 581, 582, it was held, where the wife had been granted a total divorce and the custody of the children, with no order for alimony for either, that the minor child was entitled to an allowance of a year's support out of the estate of the deceased father under the facts of that case, and Chief Justice Bleckley, in rendering the opinion, said: "The judgment of divorce did not grant alimony, either permanent or temporary, to the wife or the child; and, so far as appears, there was no discharge of the father from his liability to support his child." If a minor child under such circumstances was entitled to a year's support out of the estate of the deceased father, we see no good reason why he should not be entitled to a yearly support from the father while in life.

The defendant, in his amendment to the motion for a new trial, assigns as error the first part of the charge last quoted in the beginning of this opinion, and alleges that such charge was error, because the court gave instructions that it was for the jury to determine whether the question of alimony or support for the child was passed upon and adjudged in the trial for divorce. The record discloses the fact that this question was not passed upon in the divorce proceeding, and this fact is not disputed or in doubt; and we therefore do not see how the defendant was harmed by the charge to which reference is made. We do not mean to hold that in an action by the wife for the recovery of expenditures made by her for the support of the child after she obtains a divorce and an award of the custody of the child it would not be a good defense for the husband to show, as plaintiff in error contends, that in consideration of his withdrawing any objections to the award of the custody of the child to her she agreed to thereafter support the child and to relieve him from any liability for its support.

2. The plaintiff in her petition, or in the amendment thereto, did not set forth with proper particularity the expenditures made by her in the support which she alleges she gave the child. We think the special demurrer to this part of the petition and the amendment thereto should have been sustained. In a suit against the father by the mother for expenditures made by her in the proper support of the child it was proper that the defendant be made acquainted with such items of expense, in order that he might be enabled to properly prepare his defense, both on the question as to whether or not such expenses were for the proper support of the child and whether or not they were actually made. The amendment alleges that "said expenses had been an average of $20 per month, including board, tuition, medical attention, and other necessities; that, while at the beginning the expenses were possibly less, it has grown with his age." This allegation did not properly set forth the different items of expense incurred, nor did any allegation in the petition or amendment thereto do this; and the special demurrer should have been sustained. The error in failing to sustain such demurrer requires a new trial. Kilkeny Plantation v. Furber, 130 Ga. 492, 61 S. E. 13. No other question referred to in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error involves error requiring a new trial.

GILLIS v. BOWMAN (three cases).BOWMAN v. GILLIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 21*)—GROUNDS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS BY COURT.

The trial judge has the right to propound a question or a series of questions to any witness, for the purpose of developing fully the truth of the case; and the extent to which the examination conducted by the court shall go is a matter within his discretion; and a lengthy examination by the court of a witness called by either party will not be cause for a new trial, even though some of the questions propounded by the court were leading in character, unless the court, during the examination of the witness by himself, expresses or intimates an opinion on the facts of the case, or as to what has or has not been proved on the examination takes such course as to become argumentative in character; and it not appearing, in any of the numerous exceptions contained in the motion for a new trial, that there was any abuse of discretion upon the part of the presiding judge as to the extent of the examination of the witness by himself, nor that the examination took such course as to become argumentative in its character, nor that any opinion was expressed or intimated by the court as to what had or had not been proved, no cause for reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial is shown in any of the grounds of the motion containing exceptions to the examination of the witness by the court itself. Bowden v. Achor, 95 Ga. 244, 22 S. E. 254; Harris v. State, 61 Ga. 359; Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 102; Gordon v. Irvine, 105 Ga. 144, 31 S. E. 151.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—ASSIGNMENT NOT SUSTAINABLE IN PART—EFFECT.

Where a lengthy examination of a witness by the court, containing numerous questions and answers, is set forth in one ground of the motion for a new trial, and it is complained that all of the questions and answers were objectionable for certain reasons, and it appears that some of the questions and answers were not clearly open to the objections urged, the judgment of the court below overruling this ground of the motion for a new trial will not be disturbed here.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

3. CHARGE NOT SUBJECT TO OBJECTIONS MADE.

Those portions of the charge excepted to upon the ground that they were argumentative or defective, in that they failed to state fairly and fully the contentions of the plaintiff in error, or that they contained expressions or intimations upon the facts of the case, or were not authorized by the evidence, are not subject to the criticisms made.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court below did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Four actions—three by W. D. Gillis against S. E. Bowman, and the fourth by Bowman against Gillis. In the three cases in which Gillis was plaintiff there were judgments for Bowman, and also for him in the case in which he was plaintiff, and Gillis brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Tipton and Perry & Williamson, for plaintiff in error. Jno. D. Pope, Sam S. Bennett, and Claude Payton, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Bowman was the tenant of Gillis during the years 1887 and 1888, and in the course of their dealings with each other they carried mutual accounts. In April, 1889, Bowman brought suit on account against Gillis for $443.50. In September of the same year Gillis sued out a distress warrant against Bowman for rent due and to become due, amounting to $317.50. Later in the same month Gillis brought suit on account against Bowman to foreclose his landlord's lien for supplies furnished to the amount of $86.66. Again, in December, 1890, Gillis brought an action in trover against Bowman to recover two bay mares, to which he claimed title, and for which he claimed Bowman had never paid him, of the alleged value of $240. In the three cases in which Gillis was plaintiff the jury rendered a verdict in favor of defendant; and in the case of Bowman against Gillis the jury gave a verdict in favor of Bowman for $413.50. Motions for a new trial were made in each of the cases, and to the judgments overruling them Gillis excepted. The motions in all of the cases contained the same grounds and raise the same questions for decision.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WALLER & CO., Inc., v. CLARKE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 26, 1909.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 79*)—ORDERS—TIME OF RENDITION.

On November 16, 1907, during the October term, which adjourned on November 26th, the court passed an order sustaining specified grounds of a demurrer to a petition, and ordered "that the petition be dismissed, unless the plaintiffs shall within 30 days amend to meet the grounds" sustained, and no amendment was offered during such 30 days. Held, the fact that the 30 days expired during the December term of the court, which began on the 2d day of December, 1907, did not make such order a December term order, or require or permit the dismissal of the case to be treated as having been made during the December term of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 175; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 81*)—REOPENING—REFUSAL.

The court committed no error in refusing the plaintiff's application to reopen the case and permit it to amend the petition during the December term after the expiration of the 30 days referred to in the order of November 16, 1907.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 182, 186; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 78*)—FINAL ORDER—EXCEPTIONS PENDENTE LITE.

Under the facts of this case, the order of November 16, 1907, was a final order, and no exceptions pendente lite could be filed thereto.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; Walter G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Waller & Co., Incorporated, against F. R. Clarke. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Alexander & Edwards, for plaintiff in error. Edward S. Elliott, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendant, and to the petition the defendant filed a demurrer. In ruling upon the demurrer the court passed an order on November 16, 1907, during the October term, sustaining specified grounds of the demurrer, and ordering that "the petition be dismissed, unless the plaintiff shall within 30 days amend to meet the grounds" sustained. The October term adjourned on the 26th of November. No amendment was offered by the plaintiff within the 30 days. On the 21st of December, 1907, during the December term, the plaintiff filed an amendment to the petition and its motion asking the allowance thereof. On the 14th of January, 1908, during the December term, the plaintiff had certified exceptions pendente lite complaining of the ruling made in the order of November 16th. On the 15th of February, 1908, during the December term, the court passed an order stating that "the application to reopen and be permitted to amend is declined." The plaintiff filed its bill of exceptions, which was certified on March 26, 1908, complaining that the court committed error in passing the order refusing "the application to reopen and be permitted to amend," and also in passing the order of November 16, 1907. This bill of exceptions specifies the exceptions pendente lite filed on January 14, 1908, as a part of the record, and recites that the December term began on December 2, 1907, and did not adjourn within thirty days therefrom. One of the contentions of the plaintiff is that the order of November 16, 1907, passed during the October term, carried the case into and left it pending during the December term. Nothing was said in the order of November 16, 1907, passed at the October term, about the case being carried into another term, or giving the plaintiff the right to amend during any term. The 30 days given in that order within which the plaintiff might amend to prevent dismissal of its petition was liable to expire in vacation. The court could not definitely know when the order was passed that the December term would be in session at the expiration of the 30 days. The December term began on the 2d day of December, and, as far as the court then knew, might finally adjourn before the thirty days expired. The plaintiff had the right to offer the amendment at any time before the expiration of the 30 days, and hence could have offered it before the December term began, and could have thus prevented the order from operating at a time occurring during the December term. The plaintiff could also have repudiated the offer of the court to allow amendment, and could have treated the petition as dismissed by refusing to amend and filing exceptions to the order before the December term began. The order said nothing about the plaintiff having the right to amend during the December term, or any other term, but simply fixed a number of days within which the plaintiff could amend. This order cannot be construed to be a December term order, nor can the dismissal be construed as a dismissal during the December term, simply because the 30 days happened to expire during the December term. Suppose the December term had adjourned before the 30 days expired, and a special term had been called, and the 30 days happened to expire during the special term; the order of November 16th could not, under such facts, be said to be a special term order, nor could the dismissal be said to be a special term dismissal, because the 30 days happened to expire during the special term. In this connection, see Morehead v. Allen, 131 Ga. 807, 813-815, 63 S. E. 507. The order of November 16th overruled the first five grounds of the demurrer, and on November 26th, the last day of the October term, the court passed an order revoking this ruling, and providing that: "The question of sustaining or overruling the said five grounds be and is hereby postponed until the coming in of the amendment of the plaintiff's petition, and their consideration shall be based on the petition as amended." No amendment was offered within the 30 days, and this order of November 26th did not in any way affect or modify the other provisions of the order of November 16th that "the petition be dismissed, unless the plaintiff shall within 30 days amend to meet the grounds" referred to in the order. After the expiration of the 30 days from the time the order of November 16th was passed, the plaintiff made a motion to reopen the case and be permitted to amend the petition during the December term of the court, and the motion was accordingly made at a term subsequent to the term at which the order was passed which had the effect of dismissing the case. The fact that the plaintiff made a motion to reinstate the case and excepted to the court's refusal to do so shows that the plaintiff considered and treated the case as having already been dismissed, and the fact that the court acted upon and refused such motion shows that the court so treated the case. The order of November 16th, passed during the October term, cannot be treated as an order of the December term simply because the 30 days therein referred to happened to expire during the December term. It nowhere appears that it was the intention of the court that such dismissal of the petition should be during the December term. Such dismissal of the case cannot be treated as a December term dismissal. Treating the permission given in the October term order to amend within 30 days as serving to keep open this term during this 30 days relatively to the right to amend and move to reinstate the case or vacate the order, the motion to reinstate under this view would not have been made during the October term because it was not made until this 30 days expired.

2. If the motion to reopen this case had been made during the term at which the dismissal was had, the granting of it would have been in the discretion of the court. But it was not made at that term. It was held in Watkins v. Brizendine, 111 Ga. 458, 36 S. E. 807: "A motion to reinstate a case, made after the expiration of the term at which the order of dismissal was entered, stands, as to excuses for delay, upon the same footing as an 'extraordinary motion' for a new trial." It does not appear in the present case that any sufficient excuses were offered by the plaintiff for its failure to amend within the 30 days, so as to make it the duty of the court to reopen the case and allow an amendment after the expiration of such thirty days. No good reason, if any at all, was shown why the case should have been reopened and plaintiff allowed to amend. The court committed no error in refusing to reopen the case and allow the plaintiff to amend.

3. When the order of November 16th was passed, that the petition be dismissed unless the plaintiff amended within 30 days, the plaintiff ought to have accepted or excepted, but it did neither. It did not accept the terms of the order by offering an amendment within 30 days, nor did it except by filing exceptions within the time required. The order merely gave the plaintiff the privilege to amend to prevent dismissal. If the plaintiff had submitted to the order requiring an amendment and amended its petition to conform thereto, it could not be heard thereafter to say that an amendment was not necessary. Glover v. Savannah, etc., Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 34, 32 S. E. 876; Atlantic Coast Line Ry. Co. v. Hart Lum. Co., 2 Ga. App. 88, 58 S. E. 316. The plaintiff in its exceptions pendente lite did not except to anything that happened during the December term of the court, but excepted to the order of November 16th, passed during the October term. Under the facts of this case, this order was a final order, and no exceptions pendente lite could be filed thereto. In Harris v. Gano, 117 Ga. 934, 936, 44 S. E. 11, 12, it was said that "no judgment or decree under our system can be said to be final until the time prescribed by law for setting aside the same by motion for a new trial or writ of error has expired." If, under the principle announced in this decision, a judgment sustaining a demurrer and dismissing a case is not final relatively to the right to file exceptions pendente lite until the time expires within which a motion to reinstate can be filed, it is a sufficient reply to say that no motion to reinstate was made during any term at which the case was dismissed. A judgment could not be said not to be final relatively to the right to file exceptions pendente lite until the time expires to file a motion to reinstate at a term other than the term of the final judgment, which would stand in a similar situation to that of an extraordinary motion for a new trial. The bill of exceptions bringing the case to this court was certified on the 26th of March, 1908. It does not appear when it was presented, but in it the order of February 15, 1908, refusing to reopen the case and allow the plaintiff to amend was assigned as error, and the bill of exceptions bringing the case to this court must have been presented after this date, which was too late to assign error on the order of November 16, 1907, passed during the October term, 1907, which adjourned on November 28, 1907.

As hereinbefore stated, the court committed no error in its judgment refusing to reopen the case and allow the plaintiff to amend after the expiration of the 30 days provided for in the order of November 16, 1907; and such judgment is affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Brunswick; D. W. Krauss, Judge.

Action by N. Emanuel & Co. against the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Crovatt & Whitfield and Rosser & Brandon, for plaintiff in error. Twitty & Reese, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Emanuel & Co. brought suit against the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to recover the value of one car load of cross-ties. By an amendment the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was stricken as a defendant, and the case left pending against the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial before the judge without the intervention of a jury on an agreed statement of facts. The court rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted to both rulings.

It is not necessary to consider the exception to the judgment overruling its demurrer, for, if the agreed statement of facts did not authorize a recovery against the defendant, the assignment of error to the final judgment will have to be sustained, and that judgment set aside. From the agreed statement of the facts the following appears: The defendant received the car of ties referred to in the plaintiffs' declaration at Thalman, Ga., on or about April 16, 1907, for transportation and delivery to the plaintiffs at Brunswick, Ga., and transported the car to Brunswick, Ga., and on April 23, 1907, delivered it to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, with instructions to deliver it to the plaintiffs at their docks in Brunswick. The shipment originated at Bladen, in Glynn county, which is a competitive point as to Brunswick, since shipments originating there can be transported and delivered to Brunswick either over the Atlantic Coast Line or over the line of the Seaboard Air Line to Thalman, and thence from Thalman to Brunswick over the line of the defendant. The plaintiffs have sidetrack connections on their docks in Brunswick with the Atlantic Coast Line, and none with the line of defendant, and under instructions of the plaintiffs to defendant, unless otherwise ordered, shipments of cross-ties in car load lots, consigned to plaintiffs and transported by the defendant, are delivered to the plaintiffs on such side tracks, and such delivery is made under the following arrangement: The car is delivered by the defendant to the Atlantic Coast Line, with instructions to be side-switched or transferred from the tracks of the defendant to the docks of the plaintiffs. The freight on the car is collected from plaintiffs by the defendant. Whether the shipment originates at a competitive or noncompetitive point, there is a charge made by the Atlantic Coast Line for the switching service, and this is charged against and paid by the defendant to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. The car in question was handled in this manner, but was never delivered to plaintiffs. They paid the defendant the freight due on said car, $14.10; and this was the full amount due thereon by the plaintiffs for delivery on the side tracks on the docks of the plaintiffs. The car was loaded with 259 cross-ties, of the value of 58 cents each. Certain rules of the Railroad Commission are attached to this agreed statement as a part thereof; but this court does not consider them material to the decision of the questions. If so, they will be judicially recognized.

The suit is one arising on contract, and not in tort, as contended by the defendant in error. If in tort, the judgment would have to be reversed, as this remedy is against the actual wrongdoer; and according to the agreed facts, the car load of cross-ties was lost by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company after having been delivered to it by the defendant. The present action is for a breach of the contract made by the defendant with the plaintiffs to transport the car load of cross-ties from the point of shipment and "deliver it to the plaintiffs at their docks in the city of Brunswick." Treating the action as one ex contractu, the defendant sets up two defenses: First, it contends that under the facts the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was the agent of the plaintiffs, acting under direct authority to receive and handle the shipment at Brunswick, and that when the delivery was made by the defendant to the Coast Line at Brunswick the contract was fully performed, and it was released from any further responsibility. Second, if the Coast Line was not the agent of the plaintiffs, it was a common carrier required by law to receive the carload of cross-ties from the defendant as a connecting carrier and to carry it to the plaintiffs' docks, receiving therefor the compensation fixed by law, and in no view was the Coast Line the agent of the defendant. Either defense would be sufficient in law, if authorized by the facts. We think neither conclusion is supported by the evidence. The contract made by the defendant with the plaintiffs was to transport the car of ties to Brunswick, and there deliver it to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, with instructions that it be switched or transferred to the docks of the plaintiffs; and it is agreed that the car was transported by the defendant to Brunswick and there delivered by it to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, "with instructions to deliver it to the plaintiffs at their docks in the city of Brunswick." The instructions to deliver were given by the defendant to the Coast Line Railroad, for it had undertaken, not only to transport the ties to Brunswick, but to deliver them to the plaintiffs at their docks. The freight from point of shipment to point of delivery was paid to the defendant by the plaintiffs, and the defendant paid the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad its charges for hauling the freight from its tracks to the docks of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had no contractual relations whatever with the Atlantic Coast Line. Their contract was solely with the defendant, and the latter employed the Atlantic Coast Line in order to complete its contract with plaintiffs to deliver "on their docks." The contract to deliver the ties to the plaintiffs "on their docks" was as plainly the duty of the defendant as the contract to transport from the receiving point to Brunswick.

That the foregoing conclusion is correct is further emphasized by the fact that the shipment was made from a competitive point. It might have been transported by the Atlantic Coast Line, and delivered to the plaintiffs on their docks at Brunswick, without any transfer or switching service at Brunswick. In order to successfully compete with the Atlantic Coast Line, the defendant would necessarily have been compelled to transport and deliver to the plaintiffs without imposing upon them the burden of transferring the car from its tracks to their side tracks on their docks. This is the reason why the defendant charged and collected the full amount of the freight from the point of shipment to the place of delivery on the side tracks on the plaintiffs' docks. The Atlantic Coast Line, under the facts, was neither the agent of the plaintiffs, nor was it a connecting carrier. It was simply performing a switching or transfer service for the defendant, acting under instructions given to it by the defendant, and paid for such service by the defendant. W. & A. R. Co. v. Exposition Mills, 81 Ga. 522, 7 S. E. 916, 2 L. R. A. 102; Dixon v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 110 Ga. 173, 35 S. E. 369. The evidence demanded the finding of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 807*) — DISMISSAL FOR LACK OF PROSECUTION — REINSTATEMENT.

Where a case pending in this court is assigned to the calendar for argument, and counsel receive the notice provided by rule 20 (57 S. E. xii), and fail to prosecute, it will be dismissed, and will not be reinstated, except for providential cause. However, the court may in its discretion reinstate during the same term a case which upon its call on the calendar has been dismissed for want of prosecution, if it appear that the failure to prosecute was due to no fault of counsel, but to the fact that the notice was not sent, or was lost in the mails.

Error from City Court of Millen; R. P. Jones, Judge.

Trover by J. B. Pierce against Frank

Sasser. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

G. C. Dekle and Hill & Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Jos. Law and Jas. A. Dixon, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This is a horse-swapping case. It seems an anomaly that transactions so essentially sui generis should be subject to the ordinary law of the land and the common rules of jurisprudence; but we suppose they are. Pierce, the plaintiff, had a black mare mule, about five years old, named Nellie. Sasser, the defendant, also had a mule. A trade was proposed. Pierce said his mule was a little wild, and that he would like to trade for something that suited him better. Sasser said his mule was lame in her front foot, and a little old, and that he would like to trade for something younger. Sasser offered his mule and $15 "to boot." Pierce made a counter proposition of $25 to boot. Pierce went out to where the Sasser mule was hitched to the buggy and examined the lame foot. Sasser said that he thought the trouble with the foot was "sand gravel," and that if the mule were shod she would get all right. Finally they agreed to "split the difference," and Sasser gave his mule and $20 "to boot" for the Pierce mule. After the trade was consummated, and the Pierce mule was being hitched to the buggy, Pierce "let the cat out of the bag" by telling old man Sasser (who was along with the party, and whom the witness spoke of as "grandpa") not to get in the buggy, for "that mule begins to climb oaks, and limbs begin to fall; you watch her climb the oaks and dodge the limbs." But "he who laughs last laughs best." Pierce's self-congratulation proved short-lived. He took the Sasser mule out for a drive next day, and soon persuaded himself that he had been swindled. It was not long until he was at Sasser's place desiring to "rue back." He tendered Sasser the mule he had obtained in the swap, and demanded Nellie in return. So far as the record shows he did not tender the $20 which had been paid him. Sasser being very well satisfied with Nellie, even if she was a little wild, refused to rescind. Pierce sued in trover for the recovery of Nellie and her hire. At the trial the foregoing facts appeared substantially without contradiction and without conflict between the witnesses. Pierce freely admitted that he had been informed that the mule was lame before he traded. He testified that Sasser had told him of this fact, but had stated that he thought it was "sand gravel," and that shoeing would cure it. He was not able to say, at the time of the trial, what the trouble was; but he thought she was "stove up and swinnied." He had not had her shod. The jury found in favor of Pierce; and Sasser is here alleging that the verdict is contrary to law and without evidence to support it.

It may be that, purely as a matter of fact, the conclusion of the jury is just or in a certain sense right, and we concede that they know far more as to matters of fact than we do; but as a matter of law (and, since the parties have appealed to the law, they must abide the rules) the verdict is wrong. "The right to rescind for fraud in a horse swap exists only when actual fraud has been committed. Rescission, where a right to rescind is not expressly reserved, cannot be had for constructive fraud, or merely on account of [a breach of] warranty, express or implied." Barnett v. Speir, 98 Ga. 762, 21 S. E. 168. The misrepresentation must relate to something already existent, as to which one party lies to the other. A false opinion given by the alleged offending party as to what will result in future from known conditions is not sufficient. Fudge v. Kelly, 4 Ga. App. 630, 62 S. E. 96. The plaintiff traded with his eyes open. He saw the mule was lame, and examined her foot. If he was swindled under such circumstances, his case falls within the province of a legal maxim known to the law for more than 600 years (see Pollock & Maitland, History of English Law, 196): "Volenti non fit injuria." Compare Willy v. Gazan, 69 Ga. 517. As Justice Hall said of the complainant in that case: "He took his course upon reasons that satisfied him of its propriety, and the consequences of his 'masterly inactivity' should not be visited upon others." Besides, it does not appear that Pierce offered back the $20. "Restitution before absolution is as sound in law as in theology; and that doctrine prevents an ex parte rescission by the plaintiff without restoring the defendant to his original situation." Summerall v. Graham, 62 Ga. 731.

2. This case was placed upon the calendar for April 16th, and upon its call at that time it was dismissed for want of prosecution. On April 26th counsel for the plaintiff in error moved to reinstate, and made it appear to the court that, though counsel had signed the bill of exceptions by name and post office address, as required by rule 8 (57 S. E. x), the notice required by rule 20 (57 S. E. vii) had not reached them. After investigating the matter, the court became of the opinion that the failure to prosecute was not due to fault of the plaintiff in error or his counsel, and we therefore ordered the case reinstated. If a case is regularly assigned, and counsel are duly notified, and the case is dismissed for lack of prosecution, it will not be reinstated, except for providential cause. See rule 22 (57 S. E. xii). But the case at bar is different.

Judgment reversed.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. F. Brannen, Judge.

L. J. Sessions was convicted of an illegal sale of liquor, and brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson & Speer, for plaintiff in error.
Fred T. Lanier, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant was convicted of the illegal sale of liquor. He approached two gentlemen by the names of Smith and Oglesby, and told them he could get them some liquor at $1.25 per quart. They gave him the money, and he went off and returned. It is plain from the evidence that he never delivered any liquor to Oglesby. As to whether he made a delivery to Smith the testimony is conflicting. Smith himself testified that the defendant did not deliver it to him. It was proved, however, that he and the defendant went behind a door in a store, and that the defendant surreptitiously passed him something which he hid under his coat. One witness stated that he could not see both parties; that he saw the defendant's hand go out, and there was a pint of whisky in it; that he did not see Smith take hold of the package, but the defendant's hand came back empty. Another witness testified that he could not see what was in the package, but that Smith received it and put it under his coat. Smith himself says that the defendant handed him no package—that he only returned him the money. The defendant made a statement soon after his arrest, apparently freely and voluntarily, that he had delivered the whisky to Smith. He makes the further point that he was merely the agent for the purchaser, and cannot be convicted because he disclosed the person from whom he purchased the whisky—one Love. The latter, however, was sworn as a witness, and testified that the defendant's statement in this respect was untrue. The court allowed different witnesses for the state to testify as to contradictory statements made by the defendant as to whether he had got the whisky from Love or not; and to this exception is taken. There is also an exception to the refusal of the court to allow counsel to ask a question, but it nowhere appears what answer he anticipated, and therefore the exception is not well taken. Exception is also taken to the following charge to the jury: "If the defendant bought whisky from some one for the buyer, and the defendant acted wholly as the agent for the buyer at the instance and request of the buyer, he would not be guilty of selling liquor, and you so find him in this case." This instruction is said to be erroneous, in that it is so qualified as to hold the defendant liable if he acted as agent both for the buyer and the seller.

1. The evidence is sufficient to authorize the conviction. The jury were authorized to find that the defendant in the transaction was not merely agent for the buyer, acting without benefit or consideration to himself, but that he was either the actual seller or was agent for the seller. White v. State, 93 Ga. 51, 19 S. E. 49. On the question of delivery the admission of the defendant, coupled with the corroborating circumstances appearing in the proof, was sufficient to make out this element of the offense. Douglas v. State, 6 Ga. App. —, 64 S. E. 490.

2. Even to allow a party to disprove facts testified to by his own witness is not a violation of the rule which prohibits a party from impeaching his own witness unless he has been entrapped. Much less so is it a violation of this rule to allow the state to prove that the defendant made different statements of the transaction to different witnesses. Hence the objection to allowing testimony of this nature was not well taken.

3. The instruction excepted to is not erroneous. The middleman in an illegal sale of liquor to be immune from liability must act wholly as the agent of the purchaser. If he induces the sale, or if he is acting for the seller in any wise, he cannot relieve himself from responsibility by getting the purchaser to create him his agent also.

Judgment affirmed.

SHAW v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON. (No. 1,630.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 816*)—OBSTRUCTIONS IN STREET—ACTIONS AGAINST CITY—PETITION.

The allegations of the petition clearly showing that the negligence charged against the defendant was not the main, controlling, preponderating, or proximate cause of his injury, the court did right in sustaining a demurrer and dismissing the petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by J. H. Shaw against the Mayor and Council of the City of Macon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

L. D. Moore, for plaintiff in error. C. H. Hall, Jr., for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Shaw sued the mayor and council of the city of Macon to recover damages for personal injuries. A demurrer was filed by the city, which the court sustained, and this judgment is the error assigned.

The allegations of the petition, briefly stated, make the following case: On the day of plaintiff's injury he was riding a bicycle on Main street. When he was opposite the warehouse or place of business of A. T. Small, he found that two-thirds of the entire width of the street was blocked by farm wagons and by bales of cotton placed there by Small, leaving only a narrow driveway, barely sufficient for two ordinary vehicles to pass on the street. There was no other way for him to go to his destination than to proceed down Main street, and he was compelled to ride through the narrow space left between the cotton and wagons. Soon after he entered the north end of the street, he saw W. M. Guerry enter the south end, driving a horse hitched to a buggy, traveling in a fast trot; and, immediately upon observing Guerry approaching him, he stopped his wheel, drew himself close against the cotton, and caught hold upon the cotton with his left hand, intending to pull himself up against the cotton, so as to escape a collision with the horse and buggy, and before he had time to climb to the top of the bales of cotton the horse and buggy reached him, and the small end of one of the buggy shafts struck his right arm, and he received the injuries for which he brings suit. He charges that the defendant city caused his injury by reason of the fact that it had permitted the bales of cotton to be stacked in and upon the street, and allowed the street to be blocked and obstructed for weeks and months prior thereto, and neglected to require this obstruction removed from the street, and that the obstruction constituted a public nuisance, for the maintenance of which the defendant was responsible.

The demurrer attacked the petition on the grounds: (1) The allegations showed that the negligence alleged against the defendant was not the proximate cause of the plain-tiff's injury. (2) Under the allegations of the petition, the direct and immediate cause of the injury was the collision of the plaintiff with the buggy driven by Guerry, in which collision the defendant is not charged with having any part. (3) The allegations show that the injuries received by the plaintiff were not the natural and probable consequences of the negligence charged against the defendant.

We think the demurrer was properly sustained. It seems clear from the allegations of the petition that the negligence charged against the defendant was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, but that the proximate cause of his injury was the act of the driver of the buggy. No inflexible rule of law can be laid down for determining what would be the proximate cause of an injury. The question must be resolved by the facts of each particular case. It may be stated generally that the negligence upon which a recovery can be predicated must be the chief, preponderating, and proximate cause of the injury. The doctrine is so fully covered and well settled by both the statute law of this state and the repeated rulings of this court and the Supreme Court that any elaboration is deemed profitless. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3911, 3912, 3913; Platt v. Southern Photo Co., 4 Ga. App. 159, 60 S. E. 1068; Southern Ry. Co. v. Tankersley, 3 Ga. App. 548, 60 S. E. 297; Vinson v. Willingham Mills, 2 Ga. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by O. D. Booth against I. H. Brooke & Co. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

S. D. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Robt. P. Jones, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Booth sued Lyon to the December, 1906, term of one of the justice's courts in Atlanta, and thereupon caused summons of garnishment to issue to Jones, requiring him to answer whether he was indebted to Lyon. On January 14, 1907, judgment was rendered in the principal action in favor of Booth against Lyon. On January 21st Jones answered the summons of garnishment under oath, stating that he owed Lyon, at the date of the service of the summons of garnishment, a sum in excess of that recovered by Booth against Lyon in the principal suit. On January 28th Brooke & Co. filed what purported to be a claim to the fund, reciting that the indebtedness of Lyon against Jones, which consisted of an open account, had been transferred to them before the institution of the suit and the service of the summons of garnishment. This paper, however, hardly operated as a statutory claim as it was not accompanied by the dissolving bond prescribed by the statute. At any rate, when the matter came on for hearing on February 26th, they withdrew it. No traverse was filed to the answer of the garnishee, which, as has been said above, admitted indebtedness to the principal defendant, and on February 26th the magistrate rendered judgment in favor of Booth, the plaintiff, against Jones, the garnishee, for the amount of the judgment which had been rendered in the main action. On February 27th Brooke & Co., without moving to open this judgment, filed a statutory claim in garnishment and gave the prescribed bond. At the March term of the court the plaintiff, Booth, in writing, set up the foregoing facts and moved that the claim be stricken. The magistrate overruled this motion, and, after hearing evidence going to show that the account of Lyon against Jones had been transferred to Brooke & Co. before the garnishment was served, awarded the money in controversy to the claimant. The plaintiff took the matter to the superior court by certiorari, and there, the foregoing facts appearing, the certiorari was overruled. To this judgment the plaintiff in error excepts.

1. Even if we should hold that the claimants had the right to intervene after the plaintiff had obtained final judgment against the garnishee, we should have to reverse the judgment, because, the answer having admitted an indebtedness from the garnishee to the defendant, the claimants could not legally have secured a judgment in their favor upon their claim without traversing that answer. Gordon v. Wilson, 99 Ga. 354 (1), 27 S. E. 762; Small v. Mendel, 96 Ga. 532, 23 S. E. 834; Davis v. Pringle, 108 Ga. 93, 33 S. E. 815.

2. But we think that the claim came too late. Final judgment had been rendered against the garnishee. There was no garnishment to be dissolved by the filing of the claim; and it is for this that the statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 4720) provides. That proceeding was at an end. If what the claimants did in the first instance and before the judgment was rendered was not sufficient to bind them by that adjudication (and that question, not being before us, is not decided), their right of action thenceforth was by suit against Jones, the garnishee. Rutherford v. Fullerton, 89 Ga. 354, 15 S. E. 471 (2). If Jones owed the indebtedness to Brooke & Co., and not to Lyon, it was his duty so to answer; if he did not know to whom the debt was owing, he should have answered accordingly, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4727. Since he did neither of these things the court properly awarded judgment against him; and that judgment conclusively established the fact thenceforth that Jones did owe Lyon a debt in the sum admitted and that the same was subject to the garnishment, irrespective of whether he was also liable to Brooke & Co. for the same amount. Rutherford v. Fullerton, supra. See, generally on this subject 20 Cyc. 1097, 1080, 1131, 1133, 1149. The judgment against the garnishee was conclusive as to every defense which actually was made, or which might have been made. Holbrook v. Evansville R. Co., 114 Ga. 1, 3, 39 S. E. 937.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 4724, the money raised by the process of garnishment is, after final judgment, subject to distribution among the creditors of the main defendant, just as if it had been raised by the levy and sale of his property under execution. But the would-be claimant in this case can gain no comfort from this section, nor from the decisions which have been rendered under it, for he does not claim to be a creditor of the defendant, but of the garnishee.

Judgment reversed.

BOOZE v. NEAL. (No. 1,476.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 162*)—DELIVERY—TRANSFER OF WAREHOUSE RECEIPT.

The transferee of a warehouse receipt for cotton stands upon the same footing as if a physical transfer and delivery of the cotton itself had been made to him.

2. EXECUTION (§ 179*) — LIEN — CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY.

Where a creditor, whose debt is secured by a mortgage, in satisfaction of that debt takes a transfer of the title to the property mortgaged, such a transfer is not effectual to vest in him a title which would prevail on the trial of a claim afterwards filed by such creditor to prevent the sale of the property under an execution issued upon a judgment, the lien of which is junior to the mortgage, provided that the judgment was properly entered on the general execution docket prior to the date of the transfer of the title of the property to the claimant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by J. W. Neal, executrix, against one Payne. Judgment for Payne on levy of execution. T. H. Booze filed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff in execution, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Nunnally, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. A common-law fi. fa. in favor of Mrs. Neal against one Payne was issued and properly recorded on the general execution docket on July 3, 1905, and on July 8, 1907, this fi. fa. was levied upon the cotton in dispute, to which Booze, the plaintiff in error, filed a statutory claim. It appears that in 1906 one Pyle furnished, or claims to have furnished, Payne money with which to make a crop for that year, and took a mortgage to secure the indebtedness. The claim of Booze is that this mortgage was taken under the act of 1899 (Laws Ga. 1899, p. 78), which provides, among other things, "The lien of mortgages on crops, which mortgages are given to secure the payment of debts for money, supplies and other articles of necessity, including live stock, to aid in making and gathering such crops, shall be superior to judgments of older date than such mortgages." In the fall of 1906 Payne brought the cotton in dispute to Pyle and turned it over to him in payment of this mortgage, and Pyle sold the cotton afterwards to Booze, the claimant. So far as material to the understanding of the controlling points in the case, this substantially states the evidence. The court found the property subject to Mrs. Neal's fi. fa., and to this ruling exception is taken.

1. In the foregoing statement we have said that Booze bought the cotton from Pyle. As a matter of fact he bought the warehouse receipt representing the cotton; the warehouse receipt having been taken in the name of Pyle. We think, however, there is no difference in legal effect between these two statements of the transactions, and that the claimant's rights are just what they would be if the cotton had been physically delivered to him instead of the receipt. Under section 2956 of our Civil Code of 1895, the transfer of warehouse receipts and other similar paper symbolic of property operates to transfer the title to the property when it is so intended; but it gives to the holder of the receipt no higher rights than if the property itself had been physically transferred, sold, or delivered. Bank of Sparta v. Butts, 4 Ga. App. 308, 61 S. E. 298. In no higher sense than this is Booze an innocent purchaser or an innocent holder. He stands in Pyle's shoes. He has all the rights which Pyle had prior to the sale; no more, no less.

2. This brings us to a consideration of the question as to whether Pyle could have maintained the claim to the property after he purchased it from Payne and before he sold it to Booze. Since his mortgage created merely a lien, and not a title, his immediate rights thereunder would not support a statutory claim; for in that action title is involved. Ward & Bro. v. Kennesaw Co., 127 Ga. 106, 58 S. E. 123. The claimant concedes this, but says that by reason of the fact that Payne turned the cotton over to Pyle as a payment of the mortgage there was thereby transferred to the latter such a title as authorizes the maintenance of the claim. This would have been true if the transfer or sale of the property had taken place before the lien of the judgment attached. However, as it is, the case falls squarely within the ruling in MacIntyre v. Ferst, 101 Ga. 682, 28 S. E. 989, in which it is held that "where a creditor, whose debt is secured by mortgage, in satisfaction of such debt takes a conveyance of the property mortgaged, such conveyance is not effectual to vest in him a title which would prevail upon the trial of a claim afterwards filed by such creditor to prevent the sale of such property under an execution issued from a judgment junior to the mortgage, but older than the deed." See, also, Deariso v. Lawrence, 3 Ga. App. 580, 60 S. E. 330.

The rationale of the rule is this: The purchase of the property by a lien creditor from his debtor is a novation. He stands just as if he had bought the property from the debtor and had paid him for it in cash, instead of crediting him with the value of it on the mortgage. Of course, if Pyle had bought the property from Payne in 1906, and had paid cash for it, his title would have been subject to Mrs. Neal's fi. fa., which was obtained and recorded in 1906. His standing is no better, nor is his right larger, because he paid for it in something else than money—with a credit upon and a cancellation of the mortgage; for certainly one who parts with cash itself should stand as favorably in the eyes of the law as one who gives up merely the right to enforce some paper out of which he expects to make cash. This works a hardship in some cases. But see Duncan v. Clark, 96 Ga. 286, 22 S. E. 927; Prince v. Walker, 1 Ga. App. 283, 58 S. E. 61.

C. M. Callaway was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta of keeping liquor for unlawful sale, and, having tendered a petition for certiorari to the superior court, which it refused to sanction, he brings error. Affirmed.

Cox, Cox & Cox, for plaintiff in error. W. P. Hill and J. L. Mayson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta of violating section 1537 of the City Code, prohibiting the keeping of liquor on hand for unlawful sale. He tendered a petition for certiorari to the judge of the superior court, who refused to sanction it, and to this ruling exception is taken.

He presents only three points: (1) That the conviction is illegal, for lack of evidence to support it, because it appears that, while the defendant did have liquor on hand, he did not have it for the purpose of unlawful sale, but had it for individual consumption; (2) that the conviction is contrary to law, in that the liquor was kept on hand at his place of business, and that the offense is covered by the state law, in such a sense as to oust the municipality of jurisdiction; (3) that the fine imposed by the recorder was not in accordance with the provision of the ordinance, the ordinance providing that one convicted of violating it "shall be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the court," the sentence imposed being that the defendant should pay a fine of $500 and costs, and "should work on the streets or public works of said city 30 days under the direction of the superintendent of public works."

As to the first point, the case is controlled by Sawyer v. City of Blakely, 2 Ga. App. 159, 58 S. E. 399. The defendant did contend that he had the liquors on hand for consumption, and not for sale; but there was proof that he had made at least one sale of it. The second point is controlled by Athens v. City of Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. —, 64 S. E. 711.

2. The third point is not made by the record. Counsel for the plaintiff in error contends that he is entitled to raise it under the assignment of error that "the judgment of conviction, sentence, and fine are contrary to law." Assignments of error must be specific, whether contained in a bill of exceptions or in a petition for certiorari. Civ. Code 1895, § 4650; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Jackson, 81 Ga. 478, 8 S. E. 209; Durham v. Cantrell, 103 Ga. 166, 29 S. E. 708; Clements v. McCormick Co., 115 Ga. 852, 42 S. E. 222; Hayden v. State, 69 Ga. 731; Fleming v. State, 67 Ga. 767. An assignment of error that the verdict and judgment "is contrary to law" is not a specific assignment of error, and cannot be considered by the court. Newberry v. Tenant, 121 Ga. 561, 49 S. E. 621; Rogers v. Black, 99 Ga. 142, 25 S. E. 20. Such an assignment cannot be considered, unless it is coupled with other assignments which specifically point out the reasons why the ruling, finding, judgment, or sentence complained of is contrary to law. It may be necessary to add that we are not speaking of the method of assigning error upon the action of the court in overruling motions for a new trial, demurrers, and similar pleadings, in which the specific grounds are definitely set up.

Judgment affirmed.

TONEY v. CITY OF ATLANTA. (No. 1,871.) (Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. ANOTHER DECISION CONTROLLING.

For the most part this case is controlled by Callaway v. City of Atlanta (this day decided) 64 S. E. 1105.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 169*)—OFFENSES—PERSONS LIABLE—CLERK.

A clerk, who in a municipality sells intoxicating liquor kept by his employer in his place of business, may be convicted of violating the municipal ordinance forbidding the keeping of liquor on hand for the purposes of illegal sale. By analogy to the rule in misdemeanor cases, all who participate either directly or accessorially in the violation of a municipal ordinance may be held as principals. Hendrix v. State, 5 Ga. App. 519, 63 S. E. 939.

COOK v. CITY OF ATLANTA. (No. 1,872.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1189*)—CERTIORARI—REMAND FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where, on certiorari from the finding of the recorder of the city of Atlanta, it appears that there was no proof of the venue, the superior court can remand the case for another trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1189*)—CERTIORARI—ERROR OF LAW—REMAND FOR NEW TRIAL.

Although the finding of the recorder of the city of Atlanta in a criminal case may be without any evidence to support it, this does not make the finding "an error in law which must finally govern the case," requiring the judge of the superior court on certiorari to render a final decision in the case; but he may send the case back for another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1189.*]

3. PREVIOUS DECISIONS CONTROLLING.

The other assignment of error is controlled by the decisions of this court in Callaway v. Mims, 5 Ga. App. 9, 62 S. E. 654, and Athens v. City of Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. —, 64 S. E. 711.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by H. H. Schaeffer against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Garrard & Meldrim, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Schaeffer brought suit for damages against the railway company. The defendant demurred. On October 20, 1908, the judge passed an order sustaining the demurrer and providing that the case should stand dismissed unless the plaintiff by 10 o'clock a. m. on October 26th should amend in certain respects set out in the order. It is recited in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff filed exceptions pendente lite to this judgment, and these exceptions were specified as a part of the record and have been duly sent here by the clerk; but no error has been assigned upon them, either in the main bill of exceptions or otherwise. It further appears from the bill of exceptions that on October 24th the plaintiff filed an amendment to his petition, but that on October 26th the judge passed an order disallowing the amendment on the ground that it was insufficient to meet the requirements of the order previously passed. To this judgment exception is taken, and error is assigned thereon. However, the proffered amendment is not set out in the bill of exceptions, or otherwise attached thereto or made a part thereof, though what purports to be a copy of the amendment has been sent up as a part of the record, under specification made in the bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff in error has not assigned error upon the final judgment, either in the bill of exceptions or upon his exceptions pendente lite. His only assignment of error is upon the subsidiary, though perhaps controlling, proposition that the court erred in not allowing the amendment to the petition. We think the recital in the bill of exceptions, that a final judgment was rendered and that the plaintiff excepted thereto pendente lite, while not sufficient to present for consideration the question whether the court erred in granting that judgment, nevertheless would be sufficient to give the court jurisdiction under the Lyndon Case, 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1047, provided there were a valid assignment of error upon the refusal to allow the amendment. However, we are not permitted to review the action of the court in rejecting the tendered amendment, because that paper is not set out, either literally or in substance, in the bill of exceptions; nor is it attached as an exhibit thereto, or otherwise made a part thereof. The rule is well settled that, where a party offers an amendment to his pleading and the judge declines to allow it, the proffered amendment cannot be specified as record. Branan v. A. B. Baxter & Co., 122 Ga. 224, 50 S. E. 45; Taylor v. McLaughlin, 120 Ga. 706, 48 S. E. 203; Walker v. Equitable Mtg. Co., 114 Ga. 871, 40 S. E. 1010 (7); Hays v. Clay, 124 Ga. 908, 53 S. E. 399; McGarry v. Seiz, 129 Ga. 296, 58 S. E. 856. The fact that the party went through the formality of filing the amendment before the order of the judge was taken upon it does not change the matter. "A party, as a matter of right, cannot file an amendment without a previous order of the judge. When he offers the amendment, it is an application for it to be made a part of the record, and when the court denies the application it is no part of the record, and cannot be filed as such." Branan v. A. B. Baxter & Co., 122 Ga. 224, 50 S. E. 45. In McCall v. Herring, 116 Ga. 235, 42 S. E. 468, it is held that, if the amendment is filed under order of the judge, it becomes a part of the record, though the judge subsequently strikes it for its legal insufficiency, and that in such a case the amendment may be specified as a part of the record. This distinction is referred to in the case of McGarry v. Seiz, supra.

It follows that we are without jurisdiction to determine the questions which the plaintiff in error has attempted to present.

Writ of error dismissed.

MCDONALD v. STATE (No. 1,867.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. CONVICTS (§ 12*)—CHAIN GANGS—EMPLOYMENT IN PRIVATE WORKS.

Under the law as it existed prior to September 19, 1908, the county authorities of the respective counties of this state had the legal right to employ the misdemeanor chain gangs in private works, but not to give the control of the convicts therein to private individuals. Prior to that date it was legal for the ordinary, having charge of county matters, to organize a chain gang, employ guards and other officers to manage it, and to contract with a private firm of persons that the chain gang should do labor in their private business, provided that the actual control of the prisoners was wholly in the county authorities, and was neither directly nor indirectly given to any private person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. CONVICTS (§ 12*) — CHAIN GANG — WHIPPING OF INSUBORDINATE CONVICT.

The duly appointed whipping boss of a chain gang so organized and employed could justify the whipping of one of the convicts, if it appeared that the latter had been guilty of insubordination or an attempt to assault a guard, provided the whipping was not brutal or in excess of what was reasonable under all the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

3. CONVICTS (§ 10*)—"OTHER WORKS."

The words "other works," as used in Pen. Code 1895, § 1039, which provides that misdemeanor convicts shall be sentenced to work on the public works, or on such other works as the county authorities may employ the chain gang, authorizes the employment of chain gangs on private works, providing the actual control of the prisoners is exercised by the county authorities.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. CONVICTS (§ 10*)—"MECHANICAL PURSUITS."

Work on a turpentine farm is not a "mechanical pursuit," within the meaning of that term as used in Pen. Code 1895, § 1039, providing that convicts shall not be employed by the county authorities in such mechanical pursuits as will bring the products of their labor into competition with the product of free labor (citing Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4462).

Error from Superior Court, Turner County; Frank Park, Judge.

T. A. McDonald was convicted of assault and battery, and brings error. Reversed.

McDonald was convicted of assault and battery upon one Dave Cook, whom the testimony shows he had whipped. He attempted to justify the battery by showing that he was the whipping boss of the Turner county chain gang, in which Cook was a misdemeanor convict, and that the latter had been guilty of refusing to work and of acts of insubordination by attempting to take a gun from one of the guards. The place where the whipping occurred was spoken of in the evidence as being the chain gang of Conolly & Pinson. To show that it was a legally organized chain gang, and that he was the regular whipping boss, the defendant offered the following documents, which were excluded by the court as being irrelevant:

"Georgia, Turner County. This contract, made and entered into this the _____ day of January, 1908, by and between Turner County, Georgia, which contracts by and through W. A. Greer, ordinary thereof, party of the first part, and Conolly & Pinson, a partnership, composed of H. W. Conolly and T. J. Pinson, of Worth county, party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for the consideration hereinafter named, hereby contracts to establish a chain gang upon the turpentine works of the said party of the second part on land lot No. 246 in the Sixteenth district of said county, for the purpose of working the misdemeanor convicts of said county and such other counties as do not work their own convicts, and to employ the said convicts assigned to and confined in the chain gang heretofore established as above stated, to be employed on the works of the said party of the second part, located in the said county, for and during the term beginning on February 1, 1908, and ending on such day as the said ordinary may designate between the date of February 1, 1908, and January 1, 1909, and the said party of the second part to be given 15 days notice from the day thus fixed for this contract to expire. The said chain gang is to be established, maintained, and operated, and the said convicts to be worked in the manner provided by law, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the prison commission of the said state, the ordinary of said county, and those having legal authority over the same; the same being at all times subject to any indorsements or changes that may be made in the law and rules and regulations governing the same by proper authorities. This contract shall apply to all convicts sentenced by the courts of said county as may be turned over to the parties of the second part by the party of the first part, and to such as may be hired by the said ordinary or his successors in office and assigned to the chain gang. It is further agreed that the said Conolly & Pinson shall have the right to hire any misdemeanor convicts from any county of this state or from any person, firm, or corporation who may have previously leased or hired said convicts, and maintain said convicts in camp No. 3 established upon the work of said Conolly & Pinson in land lot No. 246, upon the approval of the ordinary. It is expressly understood and provided hereby that no person directly or indirectly interested in the works of the said party of the second part shall exercise any authority or control over them in any way. This chain gang to be established under and be at all times subject to any order passed by said ordinary on the 1st day of January, 1906, with reference to the establishment and operation of chain gangs, which order is of file and record in the office of said ordinary.

"Now, therefore, pursuant to and in consideration of the foregoing terms and conditions, all of which are hereby agreed to, the party of the second part obligates and binds itself as follows, to wit: The party of the second part leases to the said party of the first part the convict premises located upon their turpentine works upon land lot No. 246 in said county, together with the bedding, cooking utensils, guns for guards, and all other equipments and supplies, and hereby delivers over the same to the management and control of the said party of the first part, and the proper authorities under law for the term of this contract, and further obligates to keep up and maintain said camp and keep it supplied with all necessary and proper equipment for and during the term of this contract, and, in addition to all this, to pay to the said party of the first part for the labor of said convicts the following net sum per month, to wit: Such price as may be agreed upon from time to time; the word 'month' as above used to mean 28 working days and the amount to be due and payable on the 1st day of each month. The said party of the second part further contracts to furnish upon the order of said ordinary, all regulation clothing and rations, and have the cooking done for said convicts, all in accordance with the rules and regulations of the prison commission of this state, this being subject to any change or changes that may be made from time to time in the regulations now of force for $10 per month; the word 'month' here used to mean calendar month, this to be due and payable from the party of the first part to the party of the second part on the same day of each month that the net hire of said convicts becomes due and payable from the said party of the second part to the said party of the first part as above designated, statement to be made up and filed with said ordinary after being certified and corrected by the superintendent of the chain gang, showing credits and debits accordingly. The said party of the second part hereby agrees and binds itself to give a good and sufficient bond, if required by said ordinary at any time, conditioned for the prompt and faithful discharge herein and hereby contracted on its part, the amount of said bond to be fixed by, and the same to be approved by, said ordinary.

"In witness whereof both the said parties have hereunto affixed their hands and seals the day and year first above written." [Signed and sealed by the parties.]

"Georgia, Turner County. This contract, made and entered into this the 1st day of May, 1908, by and between T. A. McDonald, of said county and state, party of the first part, and Turner county, Georgia, which contracts by and through W. A. Greer, ordinary for said county, party of the second part, witnesseth, that the party of the first part hereby contracts to perform well and faithfully all of the duties of superintendent and whipping boss of chain gang No. 3, located on lot of land No. 246 in the Sixteenth district of originally Worth county, now Turner county, Georgia, for and during the term of said appointment to said position for the sum of $40 per month, which the said party of the second part hereby agrees to pay, the same to be due and payable on the 1st day of each month and the month to be a calendar month. This contract is to be operative and to be of force from the 1st day of May, 1908, until the 1st day of January, 1909, unless sooner terminated as follows: The ordinary reserving the right to revoke the appointment of the said party of the second part for sufficient cause in his discretion, and the said party of the first part shall have the right to resign said position upon 15 days' notice to the party of the second part if he should so desire." [Signed and sealed by the parties.]

The court charged the jury as follows: "All convict camps in Georgia at this time, or in ten years prior to this time, were illegal, where the work done by convicts was done for private parties, or working turpentine or at lumber mills, etc.; the convict being required to work on the public works of the state and not in private camps." To this exception is taken.

John B. Hutcheson and Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above): It will be seen by reference to the action of the court in excluding from evidence the contract between Turner county and Conolly & Pinson, and also the order of the ordinary of the county appointing the defendant whipping boss of the convict camp, and in instructing the jury in the manner set out above, that the judge took the view that all misdemeanor convicts in this state in 1908 and prior thereto could not be employed otherwise than upon public works; that to employ them otherwise would be so wrongful that the officials of the county chain gang who attempted to carry out the direction of the ordinary (or other tribunal having county matters in charge) could not justify their acts in enforcing discipline. We think that the judge erred in his view of the law. By Pen. Code 1895, § 1039, persons convicted of a misdemeanor are punishable "by a fine not to exceed one thousand dollars, imprisonment not to exceed six months, to work in the chain gang on the public works, or on such other works as the county authorities may employ the chain gang, not to exceed twelve months, and any one or more of these punishments may be ordered in the discretion of the judge." In this same section there is a proviso as follows: "That nothing herein contained shall authorize the giving the control of convicts to private persons, or their employment by the county authorities in such mechanical pursuits as will bring the products of their labor into competition with the products of free labor." By Pen. Code 1895, §§ 1146-1149, the county authorities are authorized to appoint a whipping boss for misdemeanor convicts, to fix his compensation, and to define his duties. This officer is authorized to administer punishment upon the convicts in cases where it is reasonably necessary to enforce discipline and to compel work and labor; and the county authorities are empowered to adopt rules governing these things. By Pen. Code 1895, § 1149, no personal liability attaches to the whipping boss for any injury or damage done to a convict, if he acts in accordance with the rules thus adopted. This section seems to be broad enough in its terms to include an exemption from both civil and criminal responsibility.

By looking to the contract between the ordinary of Turner county and Conolly & Pinson, it will be seen that the proper authority in that county had organized a chain gang; that the convicts were not to be given into the control of private persons; that the chain gang was to be managed exclusively by the county authorities, through regularly appointed guards and officers under the supervision, rules, and regulations of the prison commission; but that the convicts were to be worked, not on public works, but upon what may be called private works—that is to say, upon the turpentine farm of Conolly & Pinson. The ordinary did not hire or lease the convicts to that firm, but did contract that the labor of the convicts should be employed for their use and benefit. This presents the question squarely whether, prior to September 19, 1908, it was lawful for the county authorities to employ the county chain gangs in doing work for private persons, where the control of the prisoners was fully retained by the county authorities, and where no private person, directly or indirectly, had any authority over the convicts themselves. The statute (Pen. Code 1895, § 1039) provides that the misdemeanor convicts shall be sentenced to work on the public works or on such other works as the county authorities may employ the chain gang; and the Supreme Court has held that the trial court should follow this formula in sentencing prisoners to the chain gang. Screen v. State, 107 Ga. 715, 33 S. E. 393.

Since works are usually either public or private, it would seem that there is but little need to resort to construction to determine the meaning of the statute. A person looking merely to the language of the Code section itself would easily and naturally reach the conclusion that the legislative intent was that convicts should be put to labor on the public works unless the county authorities should see fit to employ them in other work; and as works other than public are usually private, he would naturally draw the inference that the county authorities might employ them on private works. This, we say, is the plain, normal, ordinary meaning which the words would convey. But sometimes words get a strained or unnatural meaning from the context, or from the history of the legislation. The word "other" is a term that frequently tends to limit that which otherwise would have a broader meaning. Its use here might therefore justify a court in saying that the words "other works," from the context, mean other like works, and include only quasi public works. We shall therefore look into the history of the legislation on the subject to see if any such construction is proper in the particular instance.

The rule is well recognized, of course, that the history of a statute may give to its words a meaning they otherwise might not have, and, on the other hand, that it may emphasize the fact that the words are to retain their common and ordinary sense. See Acree v. State, 122 Ga. 144, 50 S. E. 180. We shall first look to see whether these words, "on such other works," etc., were in the statute originally or were added by amendment. Going back to the Code of 1873, we find section 4310 (corresponding to section 1039 of the Penal Code of 1895) providing, as to this subject, only for work in a chain gang on the "public works." By cognate sections of the Code of 1873 (sections 4814, 4815, 4820) the ordinaries of the counties of the state were given authority to organize chain gangs, and to cause the prisoners to be put to work on the public roads, or to turn over the county convicts to the Governor to be employed on the Western & Atlantic Railroad, or to hire them out to private individuals and other contractors engaged in doing public work. Under this plan, while the convicts were to be employed only in public works, their physical custody and control might be delivered into the hands of private persons, engaged in that form of work.

In 1874 two acts were passed. One of them, approved February 28, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 24), amended section 4814 of the Code of 1873, and authorized the ordinary or other county authorities to work the convicts on the public works of the county, in chain gangs or otherwise, "or to hire out such convicts, upon such terms and restrictions as may subserve the ends of justice." This act, after having been subject to certain mutations, now appears in Pen. Code 1895, § 1137. See Binns v. Ficklen, 130 Ga. 379, 60 S. E. 1051. Since, however, the trial judge, whose power to punish was fixed by section 4310 of the Code of 1873, could sentence the defendant only to public works, it is doubtful whether the county authorities could have hired the convicts out to any private individual who was not engaged in doing some form of public work. This question was presented to the Supreme Court in a slightly different form at a little later date, as we shall soon see. However, this attempt to change the law, though it may have been futile for technical reasons, shows the trend of the legislative mind toward the allowing of misdemeanor convicts to be put to private labor in such cases as the county authorities deemed best. In the same year an act (Acts 1874, p. 29) was passed allowing any misdemeanor convict, with the approval of the trial judge, to hire himself to a private individual to do private labor, and the status of the convict under these circumstances was defined. The system which required the counties to employ the misdemeanor convicts on the public works had evidently become unsatisfactory or burdensome.

In 1875 a local law was passed providing that, where persons were convicted and sentenced by any court in Quitman county to work on the public roads or public works, "the board of county commissioners of said county may and are hereby authorized to hire out such convicts within the limits of the state upon such terms and under such restrictions as may, in the opinion of such commissioners, best subserve the ends of justice and promote the interests of the county." Laws 1875, p. 263. In 1877 Oliver Moore was convicted in the county court of Quitman county, and sentenced to work in the chain gang. The county commissioners hired him to one Ogletree to work on the latter's farm. Ogletree demanded the prisoner of the sheriff and upon the latter's refusal to deliver brought habeas corpus. The case came in due time to the Supreme Court and was decided at the August term, 1877. See Ogletree v. Dozier, 59 Ga. 800. The Supreme Court, after quoting the local act of 1875, said: "It will be observed that this act does not provide that the court shall sentence the prisoner to be hired out on a private plantation in certain contingencies, but it empowers the commissioners to hire him out after the sentence of the court—in other words, to hire him out for private work, instead of working in the chain gang, or being confined in jail, or paying a fine as he was sentenced. It therefore empowers the commissioners to change or commute the sentence of the court. But the Constitution declares that the Governor shall have power to commute penalties. Code 1873, § 5075. To commute means to change; and as the Constitution vests this power in the executive, the Legislature, we think, cannot take it away and give it to county commissioners." It will be remembered that at this time the judge's power to sentence for misdemeanors was limited "to work in the chain gang on the public works." There must have been at that time some considerable sentiment against putting prisoners to what was evidently regarded as especially hard and degrading punishment, namely, to labor in the chain gang on the public works, for the court in the course of the opinion says: "In a legal sense, to commute would mean to change from a higher to a lower punishment—to change a penalty from the hard work of a chain gang to work on a farm, for instance; and we hold that this power belongs, if it be exercised at all, to the Governor." At the close of the opinion, Judge Jackson, who wrote it, threw out this suggestion: "We do not mean to say that the Legislature could not empower the courts to punish and sentence to work on a farm, or to any work or penalty not prohibited by the Constitution."

At the next session of the Legislature this suggestion was acted upon. The manifest legislative intent that misdemeanor convicts might be placed at private labor, instead of public work, having been thwarted because in its previous enactments the General Assembly had sought to confer the power so to work them upon the county authorities, irrespective of the language of the sentence of the court, and had not, as it should have done, changed the nature of the sentence to be imposed, that body in 1879 undertook an amendment of section 4310 of the Code of 1873, which related to the form of sentences. It will be found by reference to the legislative journals that the bill for that purpose originated in the House of Representatives, and, as it passed that body, merely added to the language already found in the Code sections the words, "or such other works as the county authorities may employ the chain gang," and that when it reached the Senate that body further amended by inserting the word "on" before the word "such" in the quotation just given (probably to make it clearer that this was a distinct provision, and that neither the word "such" nor the word "other" was to be limited in meaning by reason of close association with the language of the previous clause) and also by adding the provisos "that nothing herein contained shall authorize the giving the control of convicts to private persons or their employment by the county authorities in such mechanical pursuits as will bring their products of their labor into competition with the products of free labor." And in this shape the act was passed. Acts 1878-79, p. 54.

We cannot escape the obvious conclusion that this legislation, thus circumstanced, originated, limited, and enacted, evinced a clear legislative intent that the county authorities might employ the convicts in the doing of private work, provided that the custody of prisoners, their management and control, was not put into private hands, but was kept under the regular appointed officers, guards, bosses, etc., which by other sections of the Code the county authorities were authorized to appoint. If this had not been the intention of the General Assembly, it would not likely have gone to the trouble of passing the act in the form they did. If the Legislature, by using the words "other works," had intended merely quasi public works, the amendment would have been wholly unnecessary—would have been merely a piece of supererogation, for there had been no tendency to construe the words "public works" strictly, but, on the contrary, the Supreme Court had construed them broadly and liberally. See Lark v. State, 55 Ga. 436 (decided in 1875). Section 4310 of the Code of 1873, as amended by the act of 1879, retained its form until September 19, 1906, and is now incorporated in section 1039 of the Penal Code of 1895.

If it had not been for the proviso created by the Senate amendment to the act of 1879, the county authorities, under other Code sections and statutes then in existence (see Code 1882, §§ 4814, 4815, 4820, 4821 [e]), might not only have employed the convicts upon private works, but also have turned over the physical custody of the prisoners to private hirers. The effect of this proviso was to repeal so much of those laws as authorized the hiring out of the convicts and the delivery of their custody and control to private persons. County of Walton v. Franklin, 95

Ga. 538, 22 S. E. 279. The legal effect of the changes made in the law by the act of 1879 was to require the judges, in imposing chain gang sentences, to direct that the prisoners be employed either on public works or such other works as the county authorities might direct (Screen v. State, 107 Ga. 715, 33 S. E. 393), and to authorize the county authorities so to work them. The ordinaries and other authorities having in charge county matters were required by law to organize the chain gangs and to direct where they should be put to labor upon either public roads, city streets, or private work.

There is nothing to which we are unaccustomed in the retention of the control of convicts by the public authorities while their labor is sold to private persons. This plan was pursued as to the felony convicts from 1897 to April 1, 1906. Mason v. Hamby, (Ga.) 64 S. E. 569. See Acts 1897, p. 71; Acts 1903, p. 65. Under these acts the prison commission organized the penitentiary system, employed wardens, guards, etc., who had the immediate control of the prisoners, but leased the labor of the felony convicts to private lessees. Under the acts of 1897 and 1903 cited above, the prison commission was given general supervisory powers over the misdemeanor chain gangs, but the particular control was left with the county authorities and the officers by them employed.

In no case (if we except the palpable obiter in the case of Rountree v. Durden, 95 Ga. 221, 22 S. E. 149), has the Supreme Court ever held that a bona fide arrangement by which the county authorities organized the chain gang, employed the proper officers, and through them retained actual control of the men, but employed their labor for private individuals, was illegal. Such work in a very fair sense is indeed quasi public work, for the county receives the benefit of the labor, as the amounts realized from the contracts to do the labor for individuals is paid into the county treasury and is used for public purposes. In all of the opinions rendered by the Supreme Court on the subject there is a negative pregnant that such an arrangement would be legal. In Russell v. Tatum, 104 Ga. 332, 30 S. E. 812, it is said: "That convicts cannot be worked in chain gangs controlled by private individuals is well-settled law of this state." Also, in the same case: "The detention of the convict by the private individual who had him in custody was therefore illegal." In that case the county judge had hired the convict to Tatum, and Tatum had organized and was controlling the chain gang. In Simmons v. Ga. Iron & Coal Co., 117 Ga. 306, 43 S. E. 780, 61 L. R. A. 739 (9), the Supreme Court said: "Convicts cannot be worked in private chain gangs controlled by private individuals." In the course of the opinion it is stated: "The right to have the prisoner discharged is based on the further ground that he is held in custody, under sentence of the superior court, in a private chain gang under the control and management of private individuals, acting for a private corporation."

In Daniel v. State, 114 Ga. 537, 40 S. E. 806, it was said: "It appears from the evidence that the accused, after his conviction of the offense of larceny in the city court of Jefferson, was hired by the county authorities of Jackson county to the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Elbert county, and that the Elbert county authorities in turn hired him, with other misdemeanor convicts, to Swift Bros., a firm doing business in Elbert county. Swift Bros. were private parties. They made a bond with sureties, 'to hold the county of Elbert blameless and free from damage and cost and expense for the management, control, and detention' of the convicts hired to them. The officers of the camp, while appointed by the county, were paid by Swift Bros. The convicts were worked on a farm. Beyond the appointment of guards and bosses, who, as before stated, were paid by Swift Bros., the county authorities had no control whatever over the convicts. All this is uncontroverted. We are constrained to hold that under the law of this state the accused was not, at the time of his escape, in a lawful place of confinement, and cannot be punished for escaping therefrom, under the provisions of Pen. Code 1895, § 314. The law regulating the punishment of misdemeanor convicts (Pen. Code, 1895, § 1039) expressly provides 'that nothing herein contained shall authorize the giving the control of convicts to private persons, or their employment by the county authorities in such mechanical pursuits as will bring the products of their labor into competition with the products of free labor.' It would be absurd to hold that the mere appointment by the county of guards, without more, is such an assertion of control, management, and authority by it as to save the hiring of its misdemeanor convicts to private persons from repugnance to the proviso quoted." The italics in the foregoing quotations are ours, and are used to emphasize the fact that in each case the decision of the court was directed to the fact that the convicts were given into private control, and that there is not the slightest intimation that the confinement was illegal because the work was private work.

It would be remarkable, indeed, if the employment of convicts on private work were of itself illegal, that the Supreme Court should not have given some intimation of that fact in some of the cases cited, instead of placing the decisions solely and alone upon the question of whether the control was individual or official. For instance, in the Daniel Case, if the court had held the view that the employment of the chain gang in the doing of private work was illegal, a ruling to that effect would have prevented the necessity of going into the more complex question as to whether, under the particular arrangement appearing in that case, the control of the convicts was delivered to private persons, or was retained by the county authorities.

The General Assembly seems to have recognized that the language of section 1039 of the Penal Code allowed the county authorities to employ the convicts in private works; for at the special session of 1908, after a lengthy report had been received from a special investigating committee, inveighing against the employment of convicts otherwise than upon public works, an act was adopted striking the words "or on such other works," etc., from that section and leaving it so that the sentence of the court should read in future "to work in the chain gang on the public roads, or in such other public works as the county or state authorities may employ the chain gang." Laws Ga. 1908, p. 1119.

One other point deserves attention. One of the provisos in section 1039 of the Penal Code is that the convicts shall not be employed by the county authorities "in such mechanical pursuits as will bring the products of their labor into competition with the products of free labor." The contract between the ordinary of Turner county and Conolly & Pinson provided that the chain gang should work on the turpentine business of that firm. The court charged the jury that convicts could not be employed in the turpentine business. We hardly think that work on a turpentine farm is a "mechanical pursuit," according to the definitions which have been given that phrase. See the definitions of this phrase collected in 5 Words & Phrases, 4462. However, be this as it may, the employment of the chain gang in all mechanical pursuits was not forbidden. It might be so employed if the products of the convicts' labor was not brought into competition with the products of free labor. This was a question for the determination of the county authorities, under the supervision of the prison commission; and their decision in the matter was not subject to be brought into question by the whipping boss, or other official employed to conduct the chain gang under the direction of the county authorities; nor is their decision subject to collateral attack in this proceeding. This much of the statute is necessarily largely directory.

A similar provision was inserted into the act authorizing the prison commission to let out the felony convicts, prior to the present year; and it is a matter of current history and general information that they employed a large number of the men on turpentine farms, presumably because they would be brought less into competition with free labor there than in other ordinary employments. This proviso was inserted into the law for the benefit of free laborers, not for the benefit of the convicts. Neither the prisoners nor the guards or whipping bosses were legally interested in the question as to whether the products of the work done by the chain gang came into competition with the products of free labor or not. The question of the legality of the particular employment would be before the court if some free laborer (or perhaps some officer authorized to act on behalf of the state itself) had made the complaint. Mayor v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 480, 23 S. E. 508; Reid v. Mayor of Eatonton, 80 Ga. 755, 6 S. E. 602; Fincher v. Colum, 2 Ga. App. 743, 59 S. E. 22.

2. It follows from what we have said above that the court erred in excluding the documents tendered by the defendant, and in giving the instruction complained of. Exception is also taken to the action of the court in admitting, over objection, certain testimony tending to show the convict's bad physical condition at the time of the whipping. This was clearly admissible. While the "boss" might have had the right to whip the convict, he had no immunity from any liability for brutality arising from his going beyond what was reasonable under the circumstances. It does not clearly appear that the defendant was guilty of doing more than the circumstances and his authority in the premises authorized. This question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and all testimony fairly tending to illustrate this question will be relevant.

If the eyes of one, a citizen of another state, or yet of a future generation, should chance to fall upon these pages, he will perhaps wonder why questions of such apparent juristic simplicity should have engaged the pains of the court to such a length. However, we have deemed it necessary to go into the question lengthily and with much painstaking. Indeed, we may state, in fairness to the trial judge, that the view of the law presented in the rulings complained of is in accord with that current largely among the bench and bar of the state. A cognate phase of this great question, its legislative aspect, held the General Assembly of this state in extraordinary session for many days last year. Outcry, resolutions, investigation, and even the able report of the investigating committee (see Laws Ga. 1908, p. 1059 et seq.), have tended to raise the question to such importance as to make the research we have given it worth the while. The old system is gone; a new system is in vogue. Any word as to the wisdom of either is not within our province to say. The case arose under the old law, and must be administered accordingly.

Judgment reversed.

WHEELER v. ALBANY & N. RY. CO.

(Nos. 1,449, 1,450.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*) — BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—CONCISE STATEMENT.

The law requires that the brief of the evidence shall not consist of a report of all the testimony, but shall be a succinct, concise statement of only so much of the evidence as is material to an understanding of the errors complained of. To convert the full stenographic report into narrative form is not a compliance with the law. Abridgment and condensation are as essential to the legality of a brief of the evidence as is the approval of the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2609; Dec. Dig. § 538.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—FILING.

A motion for a new trial was duly filed in term time. No brief of evidence was then filed, but the hearing of the motion was continued to a day in future (less than 30 days from the date of the trial), and it was directed in the order that movant should present the brief of the evidence 3 days before the time set for the hearing. The movant did not present the brief of the evidence until the day which had been set for the hearing. However, when that day arrived, the term of the court at which the trial was had was still in session. Upon presentation of the brief of the evidence the respondent objected that it had not been filed within the time allowed by the judge, and moved to dismiss the motion for a new trial. The judge, nevertheless, approved the brief of the evidence and heard the motion for new trial on its merits. Held, that this was not error. Broadway National Bank v. Kendrick, 124 Ga. 1053, 53 S. E. 576; Eady v. Atlanta Coast Line R. Co., 129 Ga. 363, 58 S. E. 895 (2).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 11*)—SUCCESSIVE VERDICTS—SLIGHT ERROR.

The trial under review being the third trial of the case, and the verdict in favor of the prevailing party being the second finding in his favor, a new trial will not be granted on account of slight error. See Albany & Northern Ry. Co. v. Wheeler, 3 Ga. App. 414, 59 S. E. 1116, and Wheeler v. Albany & Northern Ry. Co., 4 Ga. App. 439, 61 S. E. 839.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-16; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. CHARGE FAIR AND ACCURATE.

The charge of the court fairly and accurately presented to the jury the degree of diligence required of a railway company as to the prevention of the communication of fire from its locomotives to adjacent property.

5. RAILROADS (§ 465*) — FIRE — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Wind, unless extraordinary, is not to be regarded as an intervening proximate cause, where a railway company negligently allows fire to escape from its locomotive and it is communicated to adjacent property. East Tennessee Ry. Co. v. Hesters, 90 Ga. 12, 15 S. E. 828 (3).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1692; Dec. Dig. § 465.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INAPPLICABLE INSTRUCTION.

The charge of the court upon the duty of the railway company to take cognizance of the combustible nature of grass and other things on its right of way, and to adopt means to prevent fire from being started on its right of way and carried to other property, does not seem to be directly and immediately applicable to the facts of the case; but a new trial will not be granted for this, as it is highly improbable that the plaintiff in error suffered any prejudice therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 453*)—FIRE—LIABILITY.

One who owns property adjacent to a railroad, and builds his houses or otherwise locates his property near to the right of way, takes upon himself the risk of injury through fires occasioned by the running of the locomotives with ordinary care and diligence; but he does not take upon himself the risk of fires caused by negligence of the company or its servants. A charge substantially to this effect was, therefore, not erroneous. See M. & W. R. Co. v. McConnell, 31 Ga. 133, 138, 76 Am. Dec. 685, as explained and modified in Brown Store Co. v. Chattahoochee Co., 121 Ga. 809, 49 S. E. 839. See, also, Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Barker, 94 Ky. 71, 21 S. W. 347; 56 Am. & Eng. R. Cases, 106.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1657–1659; Dec. Dig. § 453.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 69*)—TORTS—INTEREST.

The court properly instructed the jury that they might, in assessing the aggregate of damages awarded to the plaintiff for the negligent destruction of his property by fire, include interest upon the value of the property so destroyed from the date of the fire to the date of the trial at 7 per cent. per annum. Tifton, Thomasville & Gulf R. Co. v. Butler, 4 Ga. App. 191, 60 S. E. 1087. See Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 96, 32 N. E. 44, and notes thereto as reported in 18 L. R. A. 449, and 31 Am. St. Rep. 817. See, also, King v. So. Pac. Co., 109 Cal. 96, 41 Pac. 786, 29 L. R. A. 755.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Cordele; E. F. Strozler, Judge.

Action by H. C. Wheeler against the Albany & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff assigns cross-error. Affirmed on both the main and cross bill.

See, also, 3 Ga. App. 414, 59 S. E. 1116; 4 Ga. App. 439, 61 S. E. 839.

J. T. Hill and Maynard & Hooper, for plaintiff in error. Crum & Jones, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. One of the grounds of the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions is that the document filed as the brief of the evidence is not such a brief of the evidence as is required by law. We do not care to elaborate the propositions announced generally in the headnotes, but we wish to take this occasion to say a few words upon the subject of the proper method of preparing a brief of the evidence. In the beginning, let us say that what we are about to express is not to be taken as a particular reflection upon the able counsel for plaintiff in error. The delinquency to which we shall refer is one to which nearly every member of the bar may plead guilty. It is a fault, nevertheless—even more than a fault. It is a plain violation of the letter and the spirit of the law. The so-called brief of the evidence in this case is plainly an unabridged copy of the stenographer's report of the trial. It consists of about 65 pages of closely written typewritten matter. The substance of it, so far as material to a consideration of the error complained of, could easily be condensed within 5, or at most 10, pages. The remaining 60 pages is either repetition or purely immaterial surplusage. Now, section 5488 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides: "The brief of the evidence required in motions for new trials shall be a condensed and succinct brief of the material portions of the oral testimony, including a similar brief of interrogatories read on the trial. In such brief there shall be included the substance of all material portions of all documentary evidence. Documentary evidence copied as an exhibit or set out in the pleadings, and introduced in evidence, shall not be set out in the brief except by reference to the same. In all cases in which the testimony has been stenographically reported, the same may be reduced to narrative form, or the stenographic report may be used in whole or in part in making up the brief, with immaterial questions and answers and parts thereof stricken, so as in every case to shorten the brief, and include therein only material evidence." See, also, Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5528 (1, 2), 5529, and 5530.

The plain policy of the law is that the reviewing courts shall not be burdened with the duty of going through a full report of the testimony and sorting the material from the immaterial. It is a serious hindrance to the judges, in the process of attempting to apprehend the points involved in a proper decision of the case, that they must search for the relevant throughout an overwhelming and naturally obscuring volume of the irrelevant. If, when a record is thus thrust upon a busy court, the judges fail to catch a clear and accurate conception of the material points, the blame in justice should fall upon counsel who prepared the record, and the trial judge who approved it without requiring its abridgment, rather than upon the members of the reviewing court. We may call attention to some of the more palpable violations of the law in this respect which have been imposed upon us. We have had to review personal injury cases in which the exception was to the granting of a nonsuit, and in the report of the evidence would appear page after page devoted to a description of the plaintiff's injuries as detailed by himself, his physicians, and others, on direct and then on cross-examination. Of course, on exception to nonsuit, the extent of the plaintiff's injuries is not involved, and is an utterly immaterial question. A simple statement in the brief of the evidence to the effect that the plaintiff and others testified that he had been injured in one or more of the respects indicated in his petition would be all that was necessary. All in excess of this tended to obscure the actual points involved, added to the costs, and entailed a great deal of unnecessary labor upon the reviewing court. Take a trespass case, in which the point involved is whether the plaintiff has shown title, and in which there has been much testimony as to the extent of the damage. In the brief of the evidence no reference need be made to the testimony as to the extent of the damage, except a general statement that there was evidence supporting this element of the case, and, if there has been a verdict for the plaintiff, that the amount of the damages as shown by the testimony ranged between such sums as the witnesses in fact gave. It is utterly unnecessary to repeat and reiterate facts developed in the evidence. The reviewing court has nothing to do with the preponderance in cases of dispute. If one witness testifies to a fact, and a dozen others support him in it, it is profitless to set out the testimony of each of them. It is only necessary to give a brief statement of what the first witness swore and to say that the dozen others testified substantially to the same thing.

The trial judge ought never to put his approval to a brief of the evidence until it has been abridged in accordance with the spirit and purpose of the law. It is his duty to compel the obedience of counsel to this salutary rule. To change the verbatim report of the court stenographer into narrative form is not a compliance with the statute. It is not a brief of the evidence, and entitled to approval, unless all immaterial questions and answers are stricken. Reasonable brevity is as much a cardinal essential of a legal brief of the evidence as is the approval of the trial judge. Such great laxity has prevailed and has been tolerated in the enforcement of this statute (only in the most flagrant cases has the court hitherto declined to consider the so-called briefs of evidence on the ground that they were not in fact briefs of the evidence) that we do not deem it proper to begin a rigid enforcement of the law without notice to the profession. But this is to give the notice and the warning that hereafter the law must be obeyed in this respect. It is not our intention to be harsh or capricious in the enforcement of the rule, but we feel it our duty to ourselves and to the law itself to enforce the statute with greater strictness than we have done hitherto. We have been practicing lawyers in our time, of course; and we recognize that counsel for the movant is frequently deterred from an attempt to brief the evidence to the extent it should be briefed by reason of the fact that opposing counsel may object to any brief of the evidence which consists of less than a statement of the whole testimony. In this connection we may say that when an improperly prepared brief of the evidence appears in the record, without any explanation or contrary statement, it is presumed to be work of counsel for the movant. Hence, if counsel for the movant has not in fact been derelict in this respect, and desires to save himself from this imputation, he should present what he conceives to be a correct brief to the judge. If opposing counsel objects, and the judge sustains the objection and causes additions to be made, it is the privilege of moving counsel to cause this fact to appear, either by a note or memorandum attached to the brief of the evidence and verified as a part of it, or by a recital in the bill of exceptions; and if when the case reaches this court it appears that the brief has been improperly added to at the instance of counsel for the respondent, it is within the discretion of this court to give such direction to the matter, by taxing the costs, or otherwise, as will protect the party not at fault.

As we have said above, our object in entering upon this discussion in the present case is not to single out the attorneys immediately involved for criticism (for, indeed, they are even less offending than many others have been), but to take the opportunity of announcing the future policy of this court. We are sincere when we say that we prefer to decide cases upon their merits, rather than upon technicalities; but the law is law, and must be obeyed.

Judgment affirmed, on both bills of exception.

PELHAM MFG. CO. v. POWELL.
(No. 1,636.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CARE REQUIRED.

Actionable negligence by the master, with reference to his servant, is the failure to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe appliances with which to work, and the failure to exercise ordinary care to keep the place and appliances in a reasonably safe condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 171-184; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge which fails to qualify the care required to be exercised by the master as that of "ordinary care," or to qualify the condition of the place and appliance furnished by the master as that of "reasonable safety," but instructs the jury without qualification that "the master is charged with the necessity of furnishing such machinery as will be safe," incorrectly states the rule of law defining the master's duty, and in effect makes him an insurer of the servant's safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1148-1161; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—ERROR IN INSTRUCTIONS CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

The vice of a wrong rule in a charge is not extracted by the fact that the right rule is also given, because it is impossible to tell which rule the jury accepted. Especially is this true where the charge makes a concrete application of the wrong rule to the issuable facts and states the right rule as an abstract proposition of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED BY WITHDRAWAL.

Where an erroneous instruction is given on a material issue, the error is not rendered harmless by a subsequent statement of the judge that he had given the correct rule in another part of his charge. He must make it plain and clear to the jury that the first instruction was incorrect and is expressly retracted, and that the subsequent statement was correct and is substituted for the incorrect one; and it must appear, therefore, that the jury could not have been misled or confused by the two inconsistent statements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 730, 1031*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY—PRESUMPTION OF PREJUDICIAL EFFECT OF ERROR.

Grounds of a motion for a new trial which expressly allege that extracts from a charge are erroneous because they contain incorrect statements of the law applicable to the facts in issue, and were confusing, misleading, and prejudicial, are sufficient to raise the question of the legal correctness of such statements; and if such extracts are incorrect statements of the law, they will be considered in connection with the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether the movant has been injured by the giving of such incorrect instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3013-3016, 4038-4046; Dec. Dig. §§ 730, 1031.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Camilla; J. H. Scaife, Judge.

Action by Z. L. Powell, by next friend, against the Pelham Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jesse W. Walters & Sons, J. J. Hill, and Payne, Little & Jones, for plaintiff in error. Bennet & Cox and Pope & Bennet, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit by a servant against his master to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the master in the use and maintenance of inferior and defective machinery. Negligence was also alleged in the failure of the master to instruct the servant, who was a minor and inexperienced, of the dangerous character of the machinery and in its safe and proper use. The view we entertain of certain instructions to the jury on the law of the case, which are specially excepted to, makes unnecessary any detailed statement of the issues made by the pleadings and the evidence. A general statement of the evidence will be sufficient to illustrate the questions of law involved. The master was a corporation engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods. The servant was a boy about 17 years of age. He had had some experience as an operative in a cotton mill, but, according to his testimony, none in the particular work he was called upon by the master to do at the time of his injury. When he was injured he was engaged in cleaning the fronts of the card machines, by picking and removing with his hands the cotton lint and fibers which had gathered on the shelves below the doors of the machines and on the scavenger rollers. In this manner he had successfully cleaned 14 of the machines, and when he came to the fifteenth machine he discovered that the cotton had accumulated on the shelf below the door to such an extent as to prevent him from discovering that the door which opened into the chamber or case where the revolving cylinders were inclosed, and which was intended to remain closed as a protection from the danger incident to the operation of the machine, had fallen down from its position; and being ignorant of this fact, as well as the consequent danger, due to his want of experience and instructions, he put his right hand out to remove the accumulation of cotton, and it went through the open door space, came in contact with the revolving cylinder, and was so mangled as to necessitate amputation. The evidence in his behalf proved that the hinges or latches to the door, which had fallen, and which were intended to keep it in its place, had become defective by wear and tear, and were for this reason wholly insufficient for the purpose, as the door, with its hinges or latches in that condition, would fall from its position by the vibration of the machinery. It was also alleged that the machine in question was of an inferior and dangerous character, not equal to such as was in general use in cotton mills, and that in this respect the defendant was negligent. All the allegations of negligence were specifically denied. The evidence, considered as a whole on the various issues of negligence, was in conflict, the question of liability under the law applicable thereto was not free from doubt, and a verdict either way would not have been without support. This condition of equilibrium in the evidence makes any error of law presumptively prejudicial.

We have given the case the most careful study, and we have concluded that the court committed material and prejudicial error in his instructions to the jury, as shown by the excerpts objected to, on the rule of law declaratory of the master's duty to his servants. The excerpts from the charge, and the charge as a whole, require of the master a greater degree of diligence than that imposed by law. The jury was instructed, in effect, that the law made the master an insurer of his servants' safety; that his duty of diligence was absolute and unqualified, both as to instrumentalities and inspection; that he was bound to furnish and maintain safe places and safe appliances. Of course, this is not the correct rule of law, in Georgia or elsewhere. "The limit of the master's duty to his servant regarding places and appliances is to exercise ordinary care, having regard to the hazards of the service, to provide the servant with reasonably safe working places, machinery, tools, and appliances, and to exercise ordinary care to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition of repair." Armour & Co. v. Russell (C. C. A.) 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602, note. This states the law tersely and comprehensively. Civ. Code 1895, § 2811, embodies the same rule, and there are numerous decisions of this court and the Supreme Court to the same effect. The master does not insure or guarantee that the place or appliance furnished to his servant is even reasonably safe. He is required to exercise ordinary care to have them reasonably safe, and to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition.

We are aware that courts frequently, in declaring the rule of diligence applicable to the relation of master and servant, omit either the qualifying words "ordinary or reasonable" as expressive of the master's duty, or the word "reasonably" as qualifying the condition of safety of the place or appliance. And in cases where the evidence of the master's negligence was clear and convincing, the omission of either the one or the other qualifying word might not be reversible error. But the true rule of law demands that both qualifying words, or words of similar import, be used, and in a case where the question of the master's negligence was not manifest from the evidence, it would be presumptively prejudicial to the master's rights under the law to omit either qualifying word. If any principle of law in this age of mutation and progress even in law can be regarded as stare decisis, the one above discussed is in that class. It has its source in the common law, and runs harmoniously through the decisions of all courts of authority and the texts of law writers. Besides, it is the statute law of this state. Civ. Code 1895, § 2811.

Let us see how completely this principle was eliminated by the trial judge in his instructions to the jury. We will group several excerpts from the charge, involving substantially the same question and continuing the same error. From the third ground of motion for new trial: "The master is charged with the necessity of furnishing such machinery as will be safe for the operator to work around. If the machinery is not in proper condition, or if it is improperly constructed, to the extent that it results in the injury inflicted on the plaintiff, then you would find the defendant liable." From the fourth ground: "If you believe that the defect in the machinery was the proximate cause of the injury, then it would be your duty to find against the defendant." From the fifth ground: "Now the issue reduces itself to the fact as to whether or not—as to whether the proximate cause of the injury was the defect in the machinery in not having proper fastenings to the doors. If you believe that that was the proximate cause of the accident, then you will find the defendant liable; but if you believe from the testimony in the case that the proximate cause of the injury resulted from the want of diligence and proper precaution on the part of the plaintiff, then you would find in favor of the defendant. But if you should find that the proximate cause of the injury was the defective machinery, and that that caused the injury to the plaintiff, then you would address yourselves to the amount that you think would compensate the plaintiff for the loss of his hand."

The only possible construction that can be given to these excerpts from the charge is that the court, in making the concrete application of the law to the vital and controlling issues in the case, entirely eliminated from the consideration of the jury the question of the master's diligence. The existence of ordinary care which qualifies and determines the master's liability, and the further qualifying condition of the reasonable safety of the machinery, were both conspicuously absent from the charge. The hurtful and erroneous statement was three times made that, "if the defect in the machinery was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, the defendant would be liable," although the master may have exercised ordinary care in furnishing reasonably safe machinery and have exercised ordinary diligence in keeping it in a reasonably safe condition. In other words, the jury was told that the master was under an absolute duty to furnish absolutely safe machinery and under the absolute duty to keep it in an absolutely safe condition. The court explicitly tells the jury that "the master is charged with the necessity of furnishing such machinery as will be safe," and if they found from the evidence that he had not discharged this necessary duty, and "the defective machinery was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury," then the only question that could interest them further would be the amount of compensation that they would give the plaintiff for the loss of his hand. It is manifest from the excerpts quoted that the court instructed the jury that the master was an insurer of the servants' safety; and it is equally manifest that this was most harmful error, in view of the close conflict in the evidence in this case on the vital issue of the master's negligence.

It is true that the court in another part of the charge stated the correct rule on this subject to the jury. This statement of the true rule was given in the form of an abstract proposition of law, after the concrete application of the wrong rule had been thrice made, and after the method of computing the damages (determined by the application of the wrong rule) had been given in lengthy detail as laid down in Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730. The vice of a wrong rule in a charge is not extracted by the fact that the right rule is also given therein, because it is impossible to tell which rule the jury adopted, or that they could distinguish the right from the wrong; and especially would this be true in a case where the wrong rule was concretely applied to the facts, and the right rule abstractly stated. Peradventure, the jury may not have heard the statement of the right rule, or understood it after the trying ordeal of the mortality and annuity tables had been endured. The wrong rule was three times given in the beginning of the charge and before the minds of the jurors had been burdened and exhausted as just suggested.

It is also insisted by learned counsel that the court corrected the error made in the beginning of his charge on the question of the master's duty. At the conclusion of the charge counsel called the court's attention to this error, stated the true rule, and asked the court to specifically so charge. The court, in response to this request, stated: "The rule that I read is the correct rule, gentlemen." The record does not show that he then re-read to the jury the correct rule which had been previously read to them, and the fair inference is that he did not. But, if he had then read to them the correct rule, we do not think it would have been a sufficient correction of an error repeatedly made in the beginning of the charge; and especially did it fall far short in this respect, when the court did not expressly call the attention of the jury to the incorrect statement of the rule and expressly retract it. Atlanta Ry. Co. v. McManus, 1 Ga. App. 306, 58 S. E. 258 (5), and cases cited.

There are other meritorious attacks made on the charge of the court, notably that some of the excerpts contain an intimation or expression of opinion on the evidence; but we do not care to prolong this opinion, and doubtless there will not be a recurrence of these errors on a second trial.

Objection is made to the sufficiency of the assignments of error on the excerpts from the charge of the court above discussed. We think they are sufficient. They raise clearly and specifically the question that the propositions of law charged, and which are fully set out in the assignments, were erroneous, and, as applied to the facts material to the issues, misled the jury, and were prejudicial to the movant. If the propositions of law are erroneous, the error is presumably prejudicial, and the entire record will be reviewed, to ascertain if the plaintiff in error has been injured by the giving of such erroneous instructions. Wiley v. State, 3 Ga. App. 120, 59 S. E. 438; Anderson v. Southern Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 500, 33 S. E. 644; Binion v. Georgia Southern Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 282, 45 S. E. 276.

We do not deem it necessary to decide any of the questions made in the other assignments of error. Because of the errors contained in the assignments considered, we reverse the judgment refusing a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

BROWN v. STATE. (No. 1,875.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 770*)—CHARGE OF COURT.

It is no valid objection to a charge of the court that it presents the issues of the case vividly and graphically, if it is fair, is not argumentative, does not sum up the testimony, and does not express or intimate any opinion as to what has or has not been proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1806; Dec. Dig. § 770.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Columbia County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Jim Brown was convicted of arson, and brings error. Affirmed.

Pierce Bros., for plaintiff in error. J. S. Reynolds, Sol. Gen., and Jno. M. Graham, for the State.

POWELL, J. Brown was convicted of arson, and to the overruling of his motion for a new trial he brings error. In addition to the general grounds, he specifically assigns error upon the following charge of the judge to the jury: "The state contends that on the 6th day of last December, in this county, on a plantation belonging to Judge E. H. Callaway, known as the 'Mays' Place,' there resided an old darkey by the name of Brandon Gordon, with his family; that near his dwelling house was located his stable and his barn, in which he had his mule, wagon, buggy, and some fodder and some corn; that about daybreak on Sunday morning, the 6th day of December, he was awakened by a light coming between the boards in his house; that he and his family arose, and soon afterwards his neighbors assembled around his barn and stable which was being consumed by fire, and that the flames had gone to such extent as to make it impossible for him to save his mule, wagon, corn, and forage stored therein; that his property was destroyed. The state contends that it was through a human agency that the said barn was set upon fire; that it was not an accident; that the time of day, and the fact that some parties who went to a certain place in reference to the burning detected the odor of kerosene, establishes what is known in law as the corpus delicti—that is, that there was a crime committed. The state contends that the defendant had a motive and an incentive to commit this crime; that he had been last year (1908) a tenant on Judge Callaway's place; that there was some trouble between him and his landlord as to his working and payment of amounts due by him; that he had been removed from the plantation; and that his property had been levied upon, and that the crops that he had formerly planted and tended were turned over to this old darkey Gordon, whose stable and barn were burned. The state contends that the defendant had a feeling of vindictiveness against Callaway and against this brother tenant of his who had been put in charge of his property, and to whom it is claimed he attributed his troubles with his landlord. The state contends that the defendant made threats on various occasions as to what he would do by way of having vengeance upon the prosecutor in this case, Gordon. The state contends that, in furtherance of that malicious motive and purpose on his part, he committed this act. The state contends that it has submitted testimony tending to show that the tracks leading from that burning went in the direction of the defendant's house, and led up toward his house; that those tracks were first made with a shoe of a certain character; that at a certain point in the course of the tracks the party making the tracks stopped and took his shoe off, and then walked in bare feet for a distance; that he went down to the creek and attempted to jump across the creek; but it was too far, and he went back and crossed at another point; that, after making a considerable number of tracks with bare feet, he replaced his shoes. The state contends that the tracks upon comparison with the bare foot of the defendant showed a close resemblance to his feet, if it was not identical with it. The state contends that these various circumstances, taken together with the alleged threats, show that the house was burned by human agency, and that the defendant at the bar was the man who burned it."

In order that the matter may be clearly understood, we deem it proper to complete the context from which this excerpt is taken. To the foregoing language the judge added the following: "Now, gentlemen of the jury, the defendant denies that. He contends that he had no motive for burning the house; that he had no hard feeling against his landlord, nor against this man Gordon; that, while he had no property, he was able to go into the field and make an honest living, as he had done before; that he had no ill feeling against Gordon; and that Gordon had done nothing to provoke such feeling. He contends that he went back on the place to get two guinea fowls that belonged to him, and that he took his gun and shot them; that at the time he and Gordon had a very pleasant talk, and he invited him to come to his house, and he said he would meet him at church and be as good friends as they had ever been.

The defendant claims that, with a negro named Malord, he went that night down to Richmond county, and was not near the fire, and knows nothing about it. He says he never made any threats, and that these parties misrepresented him in their testimony. He contends that, as to those tracks, he said at the time, 'You see, gentlemen, I can't make a track of that sort,' and he asked somebody to take off his shoe, his hands being tied, and that he put his foot in the track, and it did not correspond at all. He says he is absolutely innocent. He contends that he has established the affirmative defense that he was not there, and did not commit the crime charged against him. Now, gentlemen of the jury, in stating these contentions to you, I do it only that you may the better apply the principles of law which I have given you in charge, and without meaning to say that I have recalled all of the many contentions in the case, or that I have stated them in the order of their importance. The duty rests upon you to remember the testimony, and to draw such inferences and conclusions from the testimony as men, acting under their oaths, can properly do. It is not my purpose to intrude upon your prerogative in determining the facts in this case. I give you the law in charge, and you are to decide what the facts are, and then return a verdict of guilty or not guilty."

The following objections are taken to the foregoing instructions to the jury: "That it was argumentative and calculated to impress the jury that the testimony introduced in behalf of the state was entitled to more weight and credit than that introduced in behalf of the defense—defendant's statement—that it militated against the defendant, in that it was such a sympathetic and graphical portrayal of the old darkey's loss and damage, couched in such fascinating and tragic language as was calculated to dissipate the dispassionate equanimity of the jury, and have a greater weight in the estimation of the jury than the testimony for the state; that it was such a summary as the jury could not have accepted it other than as an expression of an opinion upon the proven facts; the court nowhere throughout the entire summary having disclaimed to the jury any intention of expressing an opinion upon the proven facts." Two other minor exceptions are in the record, but they are clearly not well taken.

The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, and there is no reason for reversing the judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial unless the exception to the foregoing portion of the charge is well taken. "The office of a charge by the court is to give to the jury such instruction touching the rules of law pertinent to the issues involved in the pending trial as will enable them intelligently to apply thereto the evidence submitted, and from the two constituents law and fact make a verdict. In delivering his charge, the trial judge should carefully avoid an invasion of the province of the jury. He should refer to the evidence only so far as is necessary to present the leading issues of the cause, leaving the minor contentions of opposing counsel to the consideration of the jury under appropriate general instructions. It should contain no such summary of the evidence as might to a jury seem either to be an argument or amount to the expression or intimation of an opinion thereon." Thomas v. State, 95 Ga. 484, 22 S. E. 815; Nelson v. State, 124 Ga. 8, 52 S. E. 20. In the case just cited, it was held error for the trial judge to repeat to the jury the substance of the testimony of the state's witnesses and submit this, together with argumentative deductions therefrom as issues in the case. It is further stated in this case and in McVicker v. Conkle, 96 Ga. 597, 24 S. E. 23, that the judge should not recapitulate in detail the testimony of the witnesses in such a way as is likely to leave the impression on their minds that the testimony of a particular witness is to have more credit than that of another witness or any other evidence in the case. In Suddeth v. State, 112 Ga. 409, 37 S. E. 747, it is held to be reversible error for the judge to state to the jury what a particular witness has testified toward the establishment of a particular issue in the case. The charge must not be argumentative. It is not saved from error by the use of such phrases and expressions as "the state contends" or "it is contended," etc. Smith v. Hazlehurst, 122 Ga. 792, 50 S. E. 917. Upon the subject generally see Rouse v. State, 2 Ga. App. 184, 58 S. E. 416; Butler v. State, 2 Ga. App. 397, 58 S. E. 685; Fulton v. State, 2 Ga. App. 397, 58 S. E. 685; Waters v. State, 3 Ga. App. 649, 60 S. E. 335; Scott v. State, 4 Ga. App. 73, 60 S. E. 803.

When the charge excepted to is viewed in connection with its context, which is also set out above, it will be seen that it is not argumentative, and that it does not stress the state's contentions to the exclusion of those of the defendant, but that the contentions of both are fairly and accurately presented; that it was not such a summary of the testimony as to convey the impression that the judge was expressing an opinion on the facts proved in the case. It was a very fair presentation, not of the testimony, but of the issues raised by the testimony. It draws the issues clearly and correctly, but it makes no reference to the particular testimony by which these issues are supported. We concede the insistence that it is graphic, but we do not concede that it is erroneous for the judge to charge the jury graphically. It is a rare faculty to be able to array the leading issues of a long trial before the jury graphically and vividly without violating some of those rules which have been built up to keep the judge from encroaching upon the province of the jury; but Judge Hammond seems to be one of the few men who can do so, and this power is to his credit as a trial judge, and not to his discredit. But even one of his ability in this respect should keep himself under the closest surveillance, lest he by inadvertence step over the sharply drawn border line beyond which no judge can tread. See Sharpton v. State, 1 Ga. App. 542, 57 S. E. 929. The charge before us with all its vividness, clearness of expression, comes clearly up to the rule laid down in the Thomas Case, supra: "He should refer to the evidence only so far as necessary to present the leading issues of the case, leaving to the jury the consideration of the minor contentions of opposing counsel under appropriate general instructions." The excerpt from the charge taken as a whole is not subject to the exceptions taken to it. City Railway v. Findley, 76 Ga. 311 (8); Whitlow v. State, 74 Ga. 819 (3); Elder v. Cozart, 59 Ga. 200.

Judgment affirmed.

GREEN v. STATE. (No. 1,766.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 254*)—MISDEMEANOR—TRIAL BY JUDGE.

A defendant in a misdemeanor case pending in a city court, having the right to waive trial by jury, by such waiver gains the right to demand trial by the judge. The judge of the city court of Americus has permissive grant of power to try civil cases, but he is not compelled to exercise this power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 254*)—TRIAL BY JUDGE.

In the trial of criminal cases, where the defendant, having the right to make a choice, prefers to waive trial by jury and to be tried by the judge, the duty of the judge to try such a defendant is obligatory. Trial by a jury, where a defendant objects to a jury trial, deprives the defendant of the exercise of his right to be tried by the judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 252*)—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

Where, upon a prosecution under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), the accusation or indictment charges, as a part of the description of the contract, that it was made on a named definite date, and the proof shows that such contract was in fact made on a different date, a variance exists which forbids the conviction of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Bam Green was convicted of a violation of the labor contract law, and brings error. Reversed.

Blalock & Cobb, for plaintiff in error. Zach Childers, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error presents two reasons why his conviction of a violation of the labor contract law of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90) was contrary to law.

1. 2. By exceptions duly preserved pendente lite, as well as in his motion for new trial, the plaintiff in error insists that his trial before the jury, whose verdict found him guilty, is a nullity, and the verdict consequently void. It appears from the record that when the case was called for trial the defendant in the court below waived trial by jury and demanded a trial before the court without a jury. The court ignored the waiver and refused the demand of the defendant to be tried without a jury, and required the defendant, over his objection, to strike a jury and try the case before the jury thus selected. The point presented for decision is whether one who is being prosecuted for a misdemeanor has in any case the right, by waiving trial by jury, to demand that he shall be tried by the presiding judge. The learned judge of the city court of Americus, upon the authority of the ruling in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Thornton, 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99 (2), held, as appears from his opinion which is in the record, that it was optional with the judge as to whether he would decline to try the prisoner.

The ruling in the Thornton Case, supra, followed the older case of Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Gleason, 69 Ga. 201 (3), in which it was held that the judge of the city court of Savannah had power to determine all civil cases of which said court had jurisdiction, without a jury, where no jury was demanded, but that it was not obligatory upon him to do so. It will be noted, however, that the rulings in both the Gleason and Thornton Cases have express reference to civil cases. In the Gleason Case Judge Crawford, delivering the opinion of the court, only ruled that it was not mandatory upon the judge of the city court of Savannah, under the authority given him, to hear and determine civil cases where no demand for a jury has been made by either of the parties. The ruling rested solely upon the particular verbiage of the act then under consideration; for Justice Crawford proceeded to say: "If it had been the purpose of the Legislature to have required him to try all causes in his court where there was no demand for a jury, then the act would have read: 'The judge of said city court shall hear and determine all civil causes of which the said court has jurisdiction. * * *'. But the act simply says that the judge shall 'have power and authority to hear,' etc., which words in our judgment might, and doubtless would, have been omitted, had it have been the purpose of the act to repeal the law as it stood before, and have made it the imperative duty of the judge to hear and determine the cases brought to his court wherever a jury was not demanded. As the words used confer a mere permissive grant of power to the judge, we are not authorized to extend their meaning and legal effect, to the end that they shall be made compulsory upon him."

In the Thornton Case, Judge Cobb was expressly dealing only with the fourteenth section of the act creating the city court of Americus (Acts 1900, p. 97), which relates to civil cases alone, and which section employs the same language as the portion of the act creating the city court of Savannah, which had been construed by Judge Crawford in the Gleason Case; and therefore he very properly held, under the wording of the fourteenth section, that while the judge of the city court of Americus has authority to try civil cases without a jury in certain instances, "he is not required to do this, if, in his discretion, a jury trial is to be preferred." As the Gleason Case is cited as authority in the Thornton Case, and as Judge Crawford, in the former case, clearly indicates that it is clearly within the power of the Legislature to impose upon a judge of a city court the mandatory duty of trying causes in which there is no demand for jury trial, it becomes necessary for us to determine what difference, if any, exists between the provision of the act creating the city court of Americus with reference to the trial of civil cases, as contained in section 14 of that act, which was construed in the Thornton Case, and the provisions as to the trials of criminal cases, embodied in section 30 of the same act.

It is unnecessary to consider that portion of section 30 which relates to defendants confined in jail because of their failure to give bond, or to refer to possible differences in conditions between the cases of defendants arraigned during the regular term of the court when juries are present or those when the court is not sitting at regular term. In the case now before us it does not appear whether the defendant was or was not under bond, and the defendant was arraigned, so far as appears from the record, at the regular term of the court when juries were impaneled qualified to try him. In our opinion, the latter fact does not affect the merits of the case, because the defendant, in writing, waived trial by jury and demanded to be tried by the court. As we construe section 30 of the act establishing the city court of Americus, when the defendant waived jury trial and, by writing entered upon the accusation, demanded a trial before the court without a jury, the court had no discretion, but it became his duty to hear and determine this defendant's case. After making provision for various contingencies likely to arise upon the arraignment of the prisoner, the Legislature declared in the concluding sentence of the section just referred to that "if the defendant waives trial by jury then the said judge shall proceed to hear and determine such criminal cases," etc. In this provision the Legislature seems to have intentionally adopted the suggestion of Judge

Crawford in the Gleason Case, by using identically the language which would make the duty of the judge, as to a trial of cases in city courts, mandatory, instead of discretionary.

There may be instances in which the right to trial by a learned and upright judge is as substantial as the right of trial by jury. At any rate, it is manifest from the language employed in the act now before us that when a prisoner emphasizes his waiver of jury trial, by demanding to be tried by the judge, he is exercising a right of choice which it is the duty of the judge to respect. In delivering the opinion in Logan v. State, 86 Ga. 266, 12 S. E. 406, Judge Simmons says: "There is no reason why a prisoner in a case of this kind should not have the right to be tried by a conscientious and intelligent judge, if he prefers it, as well as the right to be tried by a jury. There may be reasons, indeed, why he should prefer the former to the latter, especially as it may often conduce to the speedy trial which it is the policy of the law to accord him." We apprehend that the waiver of trial by jury, when the court is not in regular term, may in some degree be influenced by the desire for a speedy trial, and yet, on the other hand, the fact that, even though a jury is present, still the defendant prefers to be tried by the judge, does not tend to delay the trial of the case.

3. The second assignment of error insisted upon is that the court erred in admitting, over the defendant's objection, testimony that the prosecutor made a verbal contract with the defendant on the 11th day of September, 1908, when the accusation charged that the contract was made on the 29th day of December, 1908. We think that the objection to the testimony was well taken and should have been sustained. A clear and definite description of the contract, by means of which the defendant has defrauded his employer, is essential in prosecution of violation of the labor contract act of 1903. As men may make many contracts within a limited time, it is necessary that the identity of the contract which is the basis of the prosecution should be clearly established, not only for the purpose of protecting the defendant against a subsequent prosecution upon the same charge, but also to enable him to prepare his defense. If the contract had been alleged to have been made in writing, it could not be contended that proof of an oral contract would not be inadmissible. In the trial of misdemeanors the state may prove that the alleged offense was committed at any time within two years; that is, the act which in itself is unlawful may be alleged to have been done upon a certain date, and may be proved to have been actually committed upon an entirely different day, and yet no variance would arise. But the violation of the labor contract act (Acts 1903, p. 90) does not consist in the act of making a contract. The making of the contract is only one of the essential antecedents to the actual violation, which is the intent to defraud by obtaining advances upon the contemporaneous or pre-existing contract with the intention of not performing the definite contract. To illustrate: It would be permissible to charge that the advances were made upon the 29th of December, 1908, and to prove that they were in fact obtained (and the coexistent fraudulent intent was present) on September 18, 1908; but there would be a fatal variance if the accusation alleged that the contract was made orally and the proof showed that the contract was in writing, and there would be a failure of proof of the contract if it was alleged that the contract was in writing and the original written contract was neither produced nor its loss accounted for. It might be proved that the fraudulent intent was manifest by the obtaining of advances at any date within two years; but, if the advances were made more than two years prior to the finding of the accusation, evidence upon the subject would be inadmissible. On the contrary, the contract on the faith of which the advances were made, if reduced to writing, might have been entered into and executed three or more years prior to the finding of the indictment, and still have related solely to the year in which the advances were made and the accusation was found. The contract of labor by means of which fraud may be perpetrated, when reliance upon its terms affords a basis of credit, must not only be unambiguous, but definite; and the fact that one may have defrauded by means of one contract would not authorize conviction for a fraud perpetrated by means of an entirely different contract. The descriptive averments as to the contract in the proof must correspond with those in the indictment or accusation. It would not do to convict upon the allegation that the accused had made a contract with A. B., by proof that the contract was made with C. D. And for the same reason a contract identified in an accusation as having been made in September cannot be the same as one made in December.

For these reasons, we think that the judge erred in not granting a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v.
HARRIS. (No. 1,408.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. DEATH (§ 77*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence authorized the verdict, which was not immoderate in amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 119*)—PLEADING (§ 49*)—PROVING NEGLIGENCE AS ALLEGED—NATURE OF ACTION.

Although the negligence with which a defendant is charged may be characterized in the plaintiff's petition as willful and wanton, if the specific facts alleged do not warrant such conclusion, the rule of duty which merely requires the exercise of ordinary care and diligence is not affected thereby, nor does it in such a case become incumbent upon the plaintiff, by reason of such allegation, to prove more than is required by law to entitle him to recover. The legal conclusions of the court are to be drawn from the statements of fact contained in the pleadings unaffected by the conclusions of the pleader. Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Shigg, 117 Ga. 454, 43 S. E. 706; Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Moore, 5 Ga. App. 562, 63 S. E. 642.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 200-216; Dec. Dig. § 119; Pleading*, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

3. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—DEATH—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The fact that the death of a person resulted from an electric current conveyed by a metallic wire is evidence of the fact that such wire is capable of transmitting a current likely to produce death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 241*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CODE PROVISIONS—EXPLANATION OF CONSTRUCTION.

It is not error to give in charge a section of the Code in its exact language, even though such language may have been construed as having a meaning somewhat different from the popular acceptance of the terms employed, if the language of the statute is thereafter fully explained to the jury in accordance with the construction placed upon it by the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 562, 563; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

5. DEATH (§ 104*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

The fact that a parent is entitled to the earnings of his minor child may be a circumstance tending to corroborate other evidence of the parent's dependence on such child, and of the fact that the child substantially contributed towards the parent's support. The well-recognized interdependence of parent and child upon each other during minority, and the right of a parent to the assistance of his minor child, might also tend to repel any inference arising from evidence tending to show that dependence and contribution shown to have existed in the past had been terminated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

It is not violative of section 4334 of the Civil Code of 1895 for a trial judge to instruct the jury that a material fact which is expressly conceded or virtually admitted is a fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 432-434; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Albany; D. F. Coosland, Judge.

Action by Ellen Harris against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. H. Hall, Warren Roberts, and Mann & Milner, for plaintiff in error. O. J. Wimberly, J. L. Pollard, and Cruger Westbrook, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in the lower court obtained a verdict of $2,500 for the value of the life of her minor son whose death was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant telegraph company. It appears that, while on his way to church or returning therefrom, the plaintiff's son, John Harris, came in contact with a telegraph wire of the defendant company which was so heavily charged with electricity that his death resulted. It is undisputed in the evidence that John Harris was the minor son of the plaintiff, and that death resulted from contact with the wire of the company. It is insisted in the brief of learned counsel for plaintiff in error that there was no evidence that the plaintiff was at the time of the death of John Harris dependent upon him, nor any evidence that he contributed to her support, and that the verdict should be set aside because it is in other material respects unsupported by the evidence. It is also contended that the court erred in his charge to the jury in the several respects to which reference will hereafter be made. Upon careful consideration of the record, we find no error of such materiality as to require the grant of a new trial.

1. As to the complaint that the verdict is without evidence to support it in the very essential particulars of dependence and contribution, we need only say that no proof was submitted on the part of the defendant, nor did any evidence drop from any of the witnesses for the plaintiff tending to dispute the uncontradicted testimony that John Harris materially aided in the support of his mother, who, according to the evidence, was necessarily dependent upon him for this assistance. And it appears that even a very few days prior to his death he had made such contribution to her support. It is true that the deceased had left his mother and his home in Alabama about a week before his death, but there is evidence in the record that he had previously done the same thing and that during both absences he had sent at least a part of his earnings to his mother, who depended upon him in part for her livelihood. It is well settled that the dependence of the parent upon the child, referred to in section 3828 of the Civil Code of 1895, need be only a partial dependence, and that it is sufficient if the contribution made by the child in aid of the parent's necessities be a substantial contribution. Daniels v. Savannah, Florida Railway Co., 86 Ga. 236, 12 S. E. 365; Central of Georgia Railway Co. v. Henson, 121 Ga. 462, 49 S. E. 278, and authorities therein cited. The only support which the contention of the plaintiff in error finds in the evidence is from the inference suggested by the fact that John Harris had run away from home and had abandoned his mother at the time of his death, and this inference is fully rebutted. It is true that testimony was introduced for the purpose of impeaching the evidence of some of the witnesses, but it is evident from the verdict that the jury preferred not to discredit the witnesses sought to be impeached by proof of contradictory statements.

2. In the first ground of the amendment to the motion it is insisted that the court erred in instructing the jury that if the plaintiff showed negligence on the part of the defendant, and further showed that that negligence caused injury, it would not be necessary for the plaintiff to show willful and wanton negligence. The plaintiff in error insists that the plaintiff, having charged in her declaration that the negligence was willful, was compelled, if she recovered at all, to recover under the allegations of her petition. It is, of course, true as a general rule that a plaintiff can recover only upon the allegations of negligence averred, and upon no other than those allegations. But, as this court has several times held, a cause of action, an averment, or an allegation is to be classified with regard to the substance of the statements therein contained and without regard to the nomenclature attributed thereto, even though it be in the pleadings themselves. Especially when inquiry is being directed to the nature of a right to be established or defense sought to be raised and when there is a plain statement of the facts must the mere conclusion and denomination of the pleader be disregarded. In the present case the facts which constituted the alleged negligence are fully and plainly set forth in the petition, and whether, according to the conclusion of the pleader, these facts constituted willful and wanton negligence, or did not, was entirely immaterial, and did not in the least affect either the plaintiff's right to recover or the absence of such right. The petition set out such facts as invoked the rule of ordinary diligence, and the gist of the action and the plaintiff's rights thereunder depended upon whether there was a failure to use such diligence as the law required. The fact that a pleader may in some portion of his petition characterize a defendant's conduct as grossly negligent does not change the rule of evidence upon the subject of the defendant's duty. It was proper for the court after having read the averments of the plaintiff's petition, which the defendant denied, and having stated that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove the averments of her petition, to state to the jury by way of qualification, that the case was not an exceptional one, and that the plaintiff was not required to prove any greater degree of negligence than was involved in the failure to exercise ordinary diligence.

3. It is insisted that the instruction: "I charge you, gentlemen, that if you find from the evidence that the defendant, the Western Union Telegraph Company, maintained at the place alleged in this declaration wires and poles along which was conducted an electric current, and if you further believe from the evidence that such wires were capable of transmitting a current sufficient to endanger or destroy human life, then I charge you that a duty existed upon the part of the defendant telegraph company towards the public and towards the deceased"—was not authorized by the evidence. We are not exactly clear that we fully apprehend this assignment of error. It would seem to be too indefinite to raise any point for consideration, but if, as suggested, a complaint is sought to be made that there was no evidence which would have authorized the court to refer to the jury the question whether the telegraph company's wires were capable of transmitting a current sufficient to destroy human life, then we have no hesitation in holding that the charge, which is otherwise sound and unobjectionable, was authorized by the evidence, because there is no dispute in the record that the boy's death was caused by an electric current of some kind transmitted by the very wires in question.

4. The third and fourth grounds of the amended motion will be considered together because they present the same point in a different form by excepting to two detached portions of the court's instructions to the jury relative to the provision of section 3823 of the Civil Code of 1895. The complaint made is that the court's statement of the law is incorrect, and that the court erroneously charged the jury that this mother could recover for the homicide of her minor son if she was dependent upon him or if he contributed to her support, whereas the plaintiff was not entitled by law to recover unless she was both dependent upon the minor son and he contributed to her support. To properly determine the merit of this exception, we will consider all that the trial judge said upon the subject and the connection in which the language was used. The court first charged the law as it appears in the Code. In other words, he substantially quoted the statute which gave birth to the plaintiff's right of action, the excerpt to which exception is taken in the third ground of the motion for new trial being: "I charge you that a mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child, a minor upon whom he or she is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support unless such person left a wife, husband, or child." It is true that, following the ruling in Clay v. Central Railroad Co., 84 Ga. 345, 10 S. E. 967, our Supreme Court has several times held that the Legislature intended to use in the statute the word "and" instead of the word "or," but certainly it cannot be said to be erroneous to give in charge in its identical terms the statutory provision of law which is the basis of a plaintiff's action if its real meaning is thereafter fully explained to the jury. Indeed, this is the proper method of instruction upon the law. We may say in passing that the construction placed upon the word "or" in the act of 1887 (now embodied in section 3828 of the Code) was somewhat surprising to the writer, as a member of the Legislature of 1887 which passed that act, as it no doubt was to the author of the original bill and others interested in its passage. But conceding that Judge Blanford properly construed the intention of the Legislature when he changed "or" into "and" in the Clay Case, supra, it must be considered that this was no doubt done because the two phrases "upon whom he or she is dependent," and "who contributes to his or her support," were assumed to have such an identity of meaning as to render them well-nigh synonymous, or such an identity as would cause the thought of dependence and contribution to be included, the one within the other. The language used was construed somewhat as if one should say four cows or quadrupeds. Naturally, the quadrupeds would have to be cows, and all cows are quadrupeds. Therefore the language could be construed as four cows and quadrupeds.

After placing before the jury the section of the Code upon which the plaintiff's right of action depended, the judge proceeded next to state the plaintiff's contentions as contained in the averments of the petition. "The plaintiff in this case, Ellen Harris, sued as the mother, alleging that she is the mother of John Harris, a minor; that he was killed; that she was dependent upon him, or that he contributed to her support; and that the minor left no wife, husband, or living child. Look into the evidence, gentlemen, and see whether or not those facts be true. Is this a minor? Was John Harris her minor son? Was he killed? Did he leave a wife, husband, or child surviving him? If you find all those things to be true, then look into the evidence, and see whether or not this plaintiff, Ellen Harris, was dependent upon the deceased, John Harris, or whether the deceased, John Harris, contributed to her support." The judge then charged the jury properly that by the word "dependent" the law does not mean absolutely and exclusively dependent, and that the plaintiff would be dependent upon her minor son, in a legal sense, if she was dependent upon him in any appreciable degree, and explained that by the term "contribute to her support" is meant a substantial contribution to her support. The court next informed the jury that though, where there is no father, the mother would be entitled to the earnings of her minor son as a matter of law, yet this was not the basis of the suit then pending. Having thus first repeated, in its identical language, the section of the Code which authorized the suit to be brought, and having stated the contentions of the plaintiff, and having relieved the minds of the jury of any possible confusion by informing them that this was not a mere suit for the value of the services of a minor child until he reached his majority, the court proceeds to define the meaning of the statute in exact accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court upon the subject by saying: "But what the law contemplates, gentlemen, is not simply a right to earnings, but the law contemplates the situation in which the minor is actually contributing to his parent's support, and that the parent is at the time dependent in an appreciable degree on the minor. If you find these things to be true, all of them, and further believe that the homicide happened through the negligence of the defendant telegraph company and without fault on the part of the deceased, as I shall hereafter refer to them more at large, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, and, under such circumstances, she would be entitled to recover the full value of the life of her child; that is to say, not merely an amount which the deceased may have contributed to her support, but for the full value of the life of the deceased." When fragments of the charge detached from their settings are viewed separately, there may appear ground for criticism; but, when the charge of the court upon this subject is read as a whole, it is impossible to conclude that the jury could have misunderstood the lucid and correct exposition of the law given upon this subject by the trial judge. Though the court necessarily used the word "or" in quoting the statute, and repeated it in his statements of the contentions of the plaintiff, he finally concluded, when giving the law authoritatively, by using the conjunction "and," and not the disjunction "or," and the jury were told in addition that "all of them," including not only contribution and dependency, but the other essential facts to which allusion was made, must be found by the jury to be true before the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. It is interesting to note that in Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Motz, 130 Ga. 414, 61 S. E. 1 (and, the writer thinks, more in accord with the true intention of the General Assembly in the passage of the original act, which was a decided innovation), the petition, which contained, as to this point, only the averment that "the plaintiff's son was a strong, healthy boy, and was rendering to him, prior to the time of the son's death, services of the value of $5 per month, and the earning capacity would increase," was held good against a general demurrer. This decision would seem to indicate that, while in deference to precedent "or" may still be interpreted "and," for the reason that it is perhaps true that in all cases of substantial contribution to a parent's support the parent is appreciably dependent upon the minor for support to the extent of such contribution, the latter clause, "or who contributed to," may be treated as intended merely to qualify and limit the term "dependent," so as to indicate a legislative intent that only a very slight dependence, such as is found in an actual contribution for a parent's support, is all that the statute contemplated.

5. In the fifth ground of the amendment to the motion complaint is made that the court erred in charging that the mother, if there is no father, would be entitled to the earnings of her minor son until such time as that she had relinquished her control; the assignment of error being that it was not a correct and true statement of the law applicable to the case, inasmuch as the plaintiff was seeking to recover the full value of her son's life, and the suit not being one to recover for the services of a minor child. At first sight the complaint might seem not to be without merit. But this impression is removed when the excerpt of which complaint is made is read in its connection, and it appears that the court was about to draw the distinction between the mere right of the parent to have the earnings of her minor son and the absolute necessity of proving that, regardless of the child's legal obligation, he was actually contributing to his mother's support. After stating that while it was true that the mother, as a matter of right, was entitled to the earnings of her minor son, the court proceeded to say that "the law contemplates the situation in which the minor is actually contributing to his parent's support, and that the parent is, at the time, dependent in an appreciable degree upon the minor." We consider the instruction of which complaint is made in the connection in which it was given as being favorable to the plaintiff in error rather than hurtful. It in effect told the jury that they could not award damages to the plaintiff merely because she was entitled to the value of her minor son's services, but that, in order for the plaintiff to recover, it must appear that the deceased was actually contributing to his mother's support, and that the mother was dependent upon that assistance. In other words, the jury were told that in the action pending before them it mattered not how valuable the services of the deceased might have been, nor that the mother was entitled, as a matter of right, to the value of the services of the minor son, she could not recover against the defendant unless she was dependent upon the son (which would not affect her right to recover for services) and unless he contributed to her support (which likewise would not defeat a recovery in an action brought by a mother for mere value of services of her minor son). As well argued by counsel for defendant in error in their brief, the statute is broader than the right which the law gives the parent to contribution from the child. It reaches not only the cases where the child is under legal obligation to the parent, but extends to cases where there is no such legal obligation. The greater includes the less, and the fact that the parent is entitled to his earnings is powerful circumstance bearing upon the question. See Savannah Electric Railway Co. v. Bell, 124 Ga. 664, 665, 53 S. E. 109, and citations. The well-recognized interdependence of parent and child upon each other during minority, and the right of the parent to the assistance of his minor child, might tend to repel any inference that the dependence and contribution shown to have existed in the past growing out of the relation had been terminated as long as the relation itself existed, and in view of the fact that there was no evidence of a relinquishment of the parental control. As we said above, we think the reference to the right of the mother to the earnings of her minor child tended rather to accentuate the necessity for proof on the plaintiff's part of dependence on her minor son and of actual contribution to her support made by him, and for that reason was favorable to the plaintiff in error. But, if we should be wrong in this view, we are quite sure that it was not such an error as would authorize the grant of a new trial.

6. Further complaint is made that the court erred in expressing an opinion upon the facts in the case, in stating to the jury that the deceased, John Harris, was not a trespasser, for the reason that he had a right to be where he was at the time of his death. We do not think that the error here assigned is such as would warrant a reversal. It is uncontradicted in the evidence that John Harris met his death on one of the public streets of the city of Albany. The petition alleged that the point where the deceased lost his life by reason of the defendant's wires hanging too near the ground was in North street, a public street in the city of Albany. The answer of the defendant was not sufficient to raise any issue upon this subject. The answer says that "this defendant owns, controls, and operates an electric wire within the limits of the city of Albany, said state and county, but says that after said wire leaves said North street the poles that carry said wire are on the right of way of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, and that then said wire is not in any public street, except where said Central of Georgia Railway Company is in said street." According to the answer, the Central of Georgia Railway Company runs along North street, but the occupancy of the street by the railway company, especially in view of the fact that there is no evidence of any specific grant of authority to the railway company for that purpose, does not give the railway company any right to the use and occupancy of the street superior to that of a pedestrian who may desire to use a highway dedicated to the whole public. It thus being conceded that the deceased met his death in a public street, there was no impropriety in the judge stating to the jury as a matter of law that "John Harris had a right to be there." While the provisions of section 4334 are to be strictly enforced, the application of this section must necessarily be confined to facts as to which there is an issue, and it has been recognized that there is a difference between words which amount to a legal conclusion rather than to an expression of opinion. Furthermore, it has been held that an intimation of opinion on a matter conceded, or even the statement of facts admitted to be such, is not improper. Facts conceded may be characterized as conceded facts in charging the jury. Judge Bleckley in Brantly v. Huff, 62 Ga. 536, in ruling upon this subject, says: "What is not conceded either in the pleadings or by the parties or their counsel in the presence of the court cannot be recited to the jury from the bench as conceded; but, where a matter has been stated in the charge as a concession, and it does not appear, on the authority of the judge himself, that no such concession was in fact made, the presumption is that it was made." In Savannah, Fla. & Western Ry. Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, 9 S. E. 471, 14 Am. St. Rep. 163, the complaint that the judge expressed an opinion upon the facts was again overruled because it appeared that the matters in question were admitted or conceded. See, also, Wilson v. Atlanta & Charlotte Ry. Co., 82 Ga. 390, 392, 9 S. E. 1076. In East Tennessee Ry. Co. v. Marklens, 88 Ga. 61, 13 S. E. 855, 14 L. R. A. 281, Judge Lumpkin, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "While a judge is forbidden to express or intimate his opinion concerning a question of fact about which there is any doubt whatever, he may, with propriety, say to the jury that there is no evidence to support an alleged fact when such statement is undoubtedly true. The object of section 3248 of the Code of 1882 [now section 4334] is to prevent judges from interfering with the functions of juries in determining contested issues of fact when there is proof on both sides; but, when an alleged fact is entirely unsupported by evidence, the judge may aid the jury by so informing them, thus relieving them of that much difficulty in reaching the correct conclusion in the case." The case at bar is not unlike the case of Hollfield v. White, 52 Ga. 567, 569. See, also, Underwood v. American Mortgage Company, 97 Ga. 238, 24 S. E. 847; Southern Ry. Co. v. Chitwood, 119 Ga. 28, 45 S. E. 706; Shields v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 1 Ga. App. 175, 57 S. E. 980. The legal effect of the undisputed evidence in this case was to show that John Harris was not a trespasser, but had a right to be where he was at the time of his death, and the statement of which complaint was made is not strictly speaking an expression of opinion as to what facts had or had not been proved, but the statement of a necessary legal conclusion arising from undisputed facts, and consequently not erroneous. It cannot be contended that the telegraph company had the right to block a highway in the city of Albany so as to prevent the passage of pedestrians, nor did it have any right to leave its wires so close to the ground as to be a menace to the safety of passers-by. It being undisputed that the point where the death of John Harris occurred was in a public street, it is, in fact, immaterial whether the poles and wires of the defendant company were on the so-called right of way of the Central of Georgia Railway or not, because, as we have heretofore held in Cordray v. Savannah Electric Company, 5 Ga. App. 626, 68 S. E. 710, the pedestrian had as much right to the public thoroughfare as either the railroad or the telegraph company. It appears that the wires were down at this particular point for about 18 days. Under all authorities, this was negligence on the part of the telegraph company. See Jones on Tel. §§ 185, 188, 194; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 1015, 1016; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 208, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; Atlanta Con. Street Ry. Co. v. Owings, 97 Ga. 663, 667, 25 S. E. 377, 33 L. R. A. 798; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 104 Ga. 56, 30 S. E. 420. Whether the wire was surcharged with electricity by contact with the wire from power plant or whether it was the conductor of a bolt of lightning, it is very plain from the evidence that, if due diligence had been used in repairing the line within the period of eighteen days which had transpired, the plaintiff's son would not have been killed by contact with the wire. The jury were authorized, under the evidence, to find in favor of the plaintiff, and might have found a larger verdict than that rendered.

Taken as a whole, the charge of the court is without error; and the judgment refusing a new trial is affirmed.

(6 Ga. App. 254)

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. MANCHESTER MFG. CO. (No. 1,265.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 134*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the finding in favor of the plaintiff in the lower court, and the amount of the verdict is not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 588-592, 607; Dec. Dig. § 134*.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—TRIAL (§ 256*)—HARMLESS ERROR—OMISSION TO CHARGE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In the absence of a request in writing, it is not reversible error for the court to omit to charge upon the burden of proof. In the absence of a request for more specific instructions, it was not error to instruct the jury, upon the subject of the burden of proof, that "it is essential for the plaintiff in this case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, that the evidence shall show, by a preponderance thereof, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover," although the court may not thereafter have specified or particularized each of the special points at issue as to which the burden of proof devolved upon the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 627, 628, 630-641, 680, 662-676; Dec. Dig. § 216*; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 137*) — CARRIAGE OF GOODS — ACTIONS FOR LOSS — INSTRUCTIONS.

There being evidence that the cotton which was the basis of the present suit was delivered to the carrier, and that said cotton was never delivered by the carrier to the consignee, it was not error to instruct the jury that a common carrier is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence, and that in case of loss the presumption of law is against a common carrier, and no excuse avails the common carrier, unless it is occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Manchester Manufacturing Company against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with damages for delay.

Wimberly & Jordan, for plaintiff in error.
John P. Ross, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error excepts to the judgment overruling its motion for new trial. In addition to the usual assignment that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, exception is taken to the instructions to the jury contained in the charge of the court which are stated below. The suit was brought by the Manchester Manufacturing Company to recover the value of eight bales of cotton which it alleged had been delivered to the defendant as a common carrier for transportation from Forsyth to Macon, Ga., and which the carrier failed to deliver. It was not denied that the cotton was the property of the consignee, the plaintiff. The weights and value of the cotton were not disputed, and this disposes of the complaint contained in the original motion that the verdict is excessive. So far as the facts are concerned, the only questions to be determined are whether the plaintiff in error received the cotton and whether thereafter it was delivered to the defendant in error.

As we view the record, there is practically no dispute that the cotton alleged to have been lost was received by the carrier company. The date of the bill of lading introduced in evidence, which acknowledged receipt by the carrier of 50 bales of cotton from B. F. Hill, consigned to "order notify Manchester Mills, Macon, Ga.," the cotton being marked "MAN," together with the oral testimony showing that only 42 bales of this lot of cotton were shipped in a separate car, and that the 8 remaining bales were shipped in a different car, establishes clearly that the carrier received the 8 bales of cotton identified by the witnesses by marks and weights. The real issue in the case was whether or not the carrier had delivered the cotton to the Manchester Mills. It is undisputed that it is the custom of the Central of Georgia Railway Company to effect delivery to the Manchester Manufacturing Company by means of a side track and the delivery of shipments consigned to the cotton factory at its own warehouse on that side track. Three witnesses testified that the 8 bales of cotton in question were never delivered to the manufacturing company at its warehouse. We think this would have authorized the finding on the part of the jury that the carrier did not deliver the cotton to the consignee, even if there had been evidence directly in conflict, if the jury judged these witnesses to be credible. To rebut this testimony the railway company proved that the 8 bales of cotton were taken from the car in which they reached Macon and deposited in another car, and directions were given that this car should be carried to the manufacturing company's side track. There was, however, no evidence on the part of any employé of the carrier that the car was transferred to the usual place of delivery at the warehouse of the Manchester Manufacturing Company while it contained the cotton; in other words, no evidence that the cotton was ever carried to the side track of the manufacturing company.

The circumstance that the 8 bales of cotton were reloaded into car I. C. 24703 on Saturday, September 29th, and that switching instructions in regard to it were given, and that the same car was used on October 2d, by the Manchester Manufacturing Company, which loaded it with yarn consigned to Philadelphia, would show that the car was switched from the depot to the side track at Vineville some time between Saturday, September 29th, and Tuesday, October 2d, a period of three days, and might support the inference that the car, when it reached the Manchester Mills and went into the possession of the manufacturing company, contained the 8 bales of cotton. But to rebut this inference the employé of the manufacturing company who made and received shipments in its behalf testified that he not only did not receive the 8 bales of cotton from the car, but when he examined the car, with a view of using it to make the shipment of yarn, he found it empty; and the jury may have considered it as a circumstance of considerable significance that no witness was introduced in behalf of the defendant carrier to show when the car in question was shifted to the manufacturing company's side track, or to show whether it was empty, or what it contained, at the time that it was delivered upon that track.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively, by the preponderance of the evidence, that the cotton was never delivered to it by the defendant company. There was no presumption either way as to this. It seems to us, in the absence of any evidence that when the car was shifted to the usual place of delivery it contained the cotton, that the positive evidence of the witnesses whose duty it was to unload all shipments consigned to the manufacturing company, and who testified that the 8 bales of cotton were not delivered, either in the car in question or any other, was entitled to that preponderance attributed to it by the jury, in preference to the inference that the 8 bales of cotton, having been once placed in that car, would be presumed to have been carried therein to the place of delivery, especially as the testimony developed that the car, when found at the Manchester Manufacturing Company's place, was not at the usual and customary place for the reception of cotton. Viewing the testimony in behalf of the defendant in its strongest light, the most that can be said is that a clear issue of fact was raised as to whether the carrier had ever delivered the 8 bales of cotton in question, which it was the province of the jury to determine, and their judgment upon the credibility of the testimony is not to be questioned here.

2. In the amendment to the motion for new trial it is insisted that the court erred in charging the jury: "Now, it is essential for the plaintiff in this case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, that the evidence shall show, by a preponderance thereof, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover"—for the reason that the court did not explain what evidence would entitle the plaintiff to recover. This exception affords an illustration of the truth that a fragmentary segment of a charge can generally not be justly criticised, when disassociated from its setting. It has frequently been held that it is not reversible error to omit entirely to instruct the jury upon the subject of the burden of proof. But, of course, if instructions are attempted to be made upon any subject, those instructions should be correct and pertinent.

Error is further assigned upon this excerpt, in that it is insisted that the court should have charged that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show (1) that the cotton in dispute was delivered to the defendant railway company, and (2) that the cotton had never been delivered by the railway company to the plaintiff. A reading of the instructions of the trial judge, as a whole, demonstrates that the exception is without merit, for the reason that it was made perfectly plain to the jury that the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show both of the facts insisted upon by the plaintiff in error. However, viewing the excerpt alone, inasmuch as the court charged that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover unless it showed that it was so entitled by the preponderance of the evidence, this was tantamount to an instruction that the burden was on the plaintiff to maintain its case by the preponderance of the evidence, and if more particular or specific instructions were desired, to the end that the court should point out specifically to the jury the particular points at issue (each one of which should be maintained by the plaintiff by the preponderance of evidence), then the attention of the court should have been thereto directed by an appropriate request.

3. Exception is also taken in the second ground of the amended motion for new trial to the following charge: "Under our law, one who pursues the business constantly or continuously for any period of time or any distance of transportation is a common carrier, and as such is bound to use extraordinary diligence. In cases of loss the presumption of law is against the common carrier, and no excuse avails the common carrier, unless it was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state." The plaintiff in error insists that this charge was misleading, and that the court should have charged that, before any presumption would arise against the common carrier, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively that the cotton in dispute was never delivered by the carrier to the plaintiff. We do not think that this instruction misled the jury, and upon a review of the whole charge it is clear that the jury were made to understand that the principle which is abstractly a correct statement of section 2264 of the Civil Code of 1895 was not applicable, unless the jury were first satisfied that the cotton in question was never delivered by the carrier to the plaintiff. Indeed, no other meaning can be drawn from the very language as contained in the Code and as used by the trial judge. Whether this section should have been charged or not, it is manifest that the plaintiff in error could not have been injured, because it is only in cases of loss that the presumption that there was a failure to use extraordinary diligence arises against the common carrier, and the jury would well understand that the cotton could not be said to be lost in any sense in the present case unless it had been first made apparent that it had never been delivered to the consignee.

This writ of error appears to us so entirely without merit as to constrain the belief that its only purpose, legally speaking, was to procure delay. It is therefore the judgment of the court that not only should the judgment of the lower court be affirmed, but that the motion of the defendant in error that damages be awarded should also be granted.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

ILLINOIS LIFE INS. CO. v. McKAY.McKAY v. ILLINOIS LIFE INS. CO.

(Nos. 1,569, 1,570.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 15, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 349*)—PREMIUMS—DEFAULT IN PAYMENT—FORFEITURE OF POLICY.

The provision for the punctual payment of the premium when due is of the essence and substance of life insurance, and a failure to comply therewith in strict accordance with the requirements of the contract, in the absence of any waiver, express or implied, inevitably results in the forfeiture of the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 891-904; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 186*) — PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.

Where an insurance company expressly or by implication authorizes the policy holders to transmit a premium by mail, if the remittance is made in apt time to reach the company in due course on or before the date when the premium falls due, this will be a sufficient payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 360*) — LIFE INSURANCE — PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.

Where by the express terms of a policy of insurance a premium was due to be paid to the insurance company at its home office in Chicago, Ill., on May 21, 1907, and a letter containing the amount of the premium was deposited in the post office at Americus, Ga., properly stamped and addressed, at 4:30 p. m. on May 20, 1907, this did not constitute payment of the premium, since the remittance could not reach its destination in due course of mail on or before the date of payment, and the company had the right under the policy to refuse to accept it as payment when received the day after it was due, and to forfeit the policy for a failure to pay the premium. The company could waive the forfeiture and reinstate the insured on the conditions stated in his application for reinstatement.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by Ida McKay against the Illinois Life Insurance Company. Verdict for plaintiff for less than the amount claimed, and it brings error, and plaintiff assigns cross-error. Reversed.

Long & Price, R. L. Greer, and Jule Felton, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. On October 25, 1904, a policy of insurance was issued by the Illinois Life Insurance Company upon the life of Wright Douglas McKay in the sum of $1,000, payable to his wife, Ida McKay, immediately upon receipt and approval of proofs of the death of the insured, provided the policy is in force at the time of the death of the insured. The policy was in the usual form. The consideration for its issue was the payment to the insurance company of the quarterly premiums on the 21st days of October, January, April, and July of each year. The policy contained the following provision:

"The premiums herein are due and payable in advance at the home office of the company at Chicago, Ill., but may be paid to the agents of the company in advance in exchange for the company's official receipt, signed by the president or secretary, and countersigned by the agent. * * * Failure to pay any premium, or premium note, or interest thereon, when due, will void this policy and forfeit all premiums paid thereon to the company, except as herein otherwise provided." The policy also provided for a grace of one month in the payment of all premiums, subject to an interest charge at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. The insured died on the 31st of October, 1907, and proofs of death were duly furnished to the company. Payment was refused, and the widow brought suit against the company for the principal amount of the policy besides interest, damages, and attorney's fees. A demurrer was filed by the company to the claim for damages and attorney's fees. The court sustained the demurrer as to the claim for damages, and overruled it as to the claim for attorney's fees. The plaintiff filed exceptions pendente lite to the sustaining of the demurrer as to the claim for damages, and brings a cross-bill of exceptions assigning error on this judgment. A verdict was directed against the company for $1,000 principal and $250 attorney's fees, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The defense relied upon was that the insured had failed to comply with the condition of the policy, in not paying the premium due to the company on April 21, 1907, on the date when due, or before the expiration of the 30 days of grace allowed by the policy for such payment, and that, therefore, the policy was forfeited by its express terms. On the question of the payment of premiums on the policy, the following is the undisputed evidence: The insured paid all the premiums at or before the time when they were due until the premium due April 21, 1907, with the 30 days of grace, due May 21, 1907. On March 20, 1907, the company, through its home office at Chicago, Ill., sent notice to the insured, notifying him that his premium would be due on April 21, 1907, and inclosed in the envelope containing the notice was a return envelope, addressed to the company at Chicago, Ill., for a remittance of the premium. On April 26, 1907, the premium not having been received by the company, it again wrote to the insured and notified him that his premium due on April 21, 1907, was past due, but that the policy would remain in force for one month from the due date of the premium, subject to the interest charged at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and that during such time the premium could be paid without his being required to furnish evidence of good health. On May 20, 1907, a letter was deposited in the post office at Americus, Ga., addressed to the Illinois Life Insurance Co., Chicago, Ill., containing a check for $11.76, the amount of the premium due, without interest thereon. The letter containing the check was mailed at Americus, Ga., 1,000 miles from Chicago, at 4:30 p. m. on May 20, 1907. The letter containing the premium was received by the company by due course of mail on May 22, 1907, one day after it was due according to its terms.

On May 24, 1907, the company wrote to the insured, acknowledging receipt of his check for $11.76, informing him that the remittance had reached the company one day after the due date, and would only be accepted by the company upon its approval of an application for reinstatement, and inclosing in the letter a blank on which he was to make such application. The application for reinstatement was duly filled out and signed on June 4, 1907, and was received and accepted by the company. It was as follows: "I, the undersigned, having forfeited all claim under policy No. 35,264 in the Illinois Life Insurance Co., which policy has lapsed for non-payment of premiums, hereby apply for reinstatement of insurance, and to induce said company to revive my said policy and reinstate the same I do declare and warrant that I am now in good health." The application made other specific statements by the insured in regard to his use of alcoholic liquors and other matters. The proofs of death as furnished to the company contained statements which led it to believe that the applicant was not in good health at the time when he made his application to have his policy reinstated, and that his statement contained in such application that he was then in good health was untrue. Thereupon the company tendered to the beneficiary named in the policy the premiums that had been paid on the policy, with interest, and denied liability thereon. The company had no local agent at Americus, and the payment of the premiums had been made by the insured by transmitting through the mail the quarterly premiums, and he had always done so, before the premium due April 21, 1907, in time for the letter containing the premium to reach the company at Chicago at or before the date when due. The two premiums subsequent to the reinstatement of the policy were also paid to the company in the same way. There was no evidence that the company had ever received or accepted any premium at Chicago, Ill., after its due date, according to the terms of the policy. The evidence as to the insured's condition of health when he made his application for reinstatement was in conflict, but this question is not now material in this case.

The verdict was directed by the court on the legal ground that the deposit of the letter containing the check in payment of the premium due April 21, 1907 (with 30 days' grace, due May 21, 1907), in the post office at Americus, Ga., on May 20, 1907, at 4:30 p. m., was a payment then and there to the company, and consequently there was no default in the payment of the premium. It will therefore appear that the only question under the facts stated and not controverted is as to the correctness of this view of the law by the trial court. It must be conceded that the company had the right to declare a forfeiture of the policy for non-payment of the premium when due; for this was a condition precedent to the life of the contract. It is settled beyond all question that a stipulation in a policy as to the payment of premiums must be strictly and literally complied with, in the absence of any waiver, constructive or actual, and the premium must be paid when, where and in what manner the policy provides. In the leading case of Klein v. New York Life Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 88, 28 L. Ed. 662, the Supreme Court of the United States declares that "the provision for the release of an insurance company from liability on the failure of the insured to pay the premiums when due is of the very essence and substance of the contract of life insurance, and to hold the company to its promise to pay the insurance, notwithstanding the default of the assured in making punctual payment of the premiums, is to destroy the very substance of the contract." And the same learned court, in Insurance Company v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. Ed. 789, says, on the subject of default in the payment of premiums, that "forfeiture for nonpayment is a necessary means by the insurance companies of protecting themselves from embarrassment. Delinquency cannot be tolerated or redeemed, except at the option of the company." This court knows of no exception to this rule of law, and further authority on this point is deemed wholly unnecessary.

Was there a default, therefore, in the payment of the premium under the facts of this case? There was an admitted default, unless the deposit of the letter in the post office at Americus at 4:30 p. m. on May 20, 1907, with the check inclosed for the amount of the premium, without interest, was a payment of the premium due to the company on May 21, 1907. The policy provides expressly that "the premiums are due and payable in advance at the home office of the company at Chicago, Ill.," and that "failure to pay any premium, or premium note, or interest thereon, when due, will void this policy." If these words are to have their usual and ordinary significance, it would seem that the premium must be received at the office of the company within the time specified, in order to constitute a payment of the premium and prevent a forfeiture of the policy, unless the company has by its conduct waived in some way this provision of the policy, and that, as the letter containing the check for the premium was not received by the company in Chicago at its head office until one day after the premium was by its terms due to be received there, the policy was forfeited. We are of the opinion that the deposit of the letter containing the check for the principal amount of the premium due in Chicago on May 21, 1907, in the post office at Americus, Ga., at 4:30 p. m. on May 20, 1907, did not constitute a valid payment in apt time within the terms of the contract; in other words, that the deposit of the letter with the check in the post office at Americus, not in time to reach its destination in Chicago and to be received there by the addressee at the time stipulated, was not a payment of the premium according to the express language of the contract.

In view of the practice by this company of permitting its policy holders to transmit through the mail premiums to it in Chicago, if the insured had deposited the letter containing the check for the premium (and we refer now to the principal, without interest on the premium) in apt time to have reached its destination in Chicago before the expiration of May 21, 1907, it would have been a sufficient payment of the premium in compliance with the terms of the contract. "Where an insurance company invites its patrons to transmit premiums by mail and gives express directions in relation thereto, it will be inferred that the company intends to accept as payment funds mailed to it in time to reach its office in due course on or before the day the premium falls due." 3 Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, 2316; Hartford Life & Annuity Insurance Co. v. Eastman, 54 Neb. 90, 74 N. W. 394; Protective Life Insurance Co. v. Palmer, 81 Ill. 88. In several New York cases it is held that, when the letter containing the remittance is deposited in the post office, the payment of the premium is made; but these decisions, we think, are contrary to the great weight of authority and are not in harmony with the reasons for the strictest and most liberal compliance with these stipulations of contracts of insurance. Primeau v. National Life Association, 77 Hun. 418, 28 N. Y. Supp. 794; McCluskey v. National Life Association, 77 Hun. 536, 28 N. Y. Supp. 931. In Hartford Life Ins. Co. v. Eastman, supra, the court says, in connection with the custom of receiving premiums through the mail: "Having invited its patrons to use the mail in making payment of premiums, it is but reasonable and just to infer that the company intended to accept as payment funds sent by mail in time to reach it in due course on or before the day such premiums would become due."

On this question we think the law, briefly stated, to be this: Where the insured has been accustomed to remit premiums by mail, and such remittances have been accepted by the insurance company, the latter cannot refuse to accept the remittance mailed in ample time to reach its destination on or before the date when due, even though the remittance was not actually received until after the premium became due. But, when the remittance has not been mailed in ample time to reach its destination by due course of mail by the date when due, it is not a payment of the premium, and the company can refuse to receive it, and can, at its option, enforce by forfeiture the stipulation of the policy as to punctual payment. "When a life insurance policy expressly provides that the premium thereon shall be paid on or before a certain date and in default thereof the policy shall be void, the nonpayment of the premium on the date named works a forfeiture, even if the premium is tendered on the next day." Fowler v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 116 N. Y. 389, 22 N. E. 576, 5 L. R. A. 806, and citations. This court knows of no excuse, not even the act of God, for a failure to comply strictly and literally with the stipulations of a policy contract on the subject of the payment of premiums. We mean, of course, where there is no waiver by the company, either express or implied. In this case there is no evidence whatever of any waiver by the company. The premiums had theretofore all been received by the company in Chicago on or before the due date. When the insured in this particular instance failed to pay this premium, which was due on April 21, 1907, the company, shortly thereafter, called his attention to his failure to pay the premium according to his contract and notified him of his 30 days of grace. When the premium was received by the company on May 22d, it refused to receive it as payment, and at once notified the insured that it would only receive it subject to its approval of its application for reinstatement, and the insured himself, in his application for reinstatement, fully recognized the fact that he was in default in the payment of his premium. Without the power of enforcing a forfeiture for a failure to pay premiums punctually, there would be no efficient means of enforcing such payments, and the business of insurance could not long survive.

We therefore conclude that the learned judge of the trial court, under the undisputed facts, erred in his view of the law on this subject and in the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff. We think that there should be another trial on the issue of the validity and binding effect of the reinstatement of the insured by the company on his application made for that purpose.

The ruling complained of in the cross-bill of exceptions is controlled by Harp v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 130 Ga. 726, 61 S. E. 704 (5), and Missouri Life Ins. Co. v. Lovelace, 1 Ga. App. 447, 58 S. E. 98.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

CASHMAR-KING SUPPLY CO. v. DOWD & KING. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 28, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Justice, Judge. Action by the Cashmar-King Supply Company against Dowd & King. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Stewart & McRea, for appellant. T. C. Guthrie and Pharr & Bell, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This cause was before this court at fall term, 1907 (146 N. C. 191, 59 S. E. 685), and a new trial granted. The majority of the court are of opinion that the evidence introduced on the second trial is substantially the same as that introduced on the first and that the questions now presented are covered by the former opinion. Mr. Justice HOKE is of opinion that there is some new evidence which should have been submitted upon the issue as to the statute of limitations. The judgment is affirmed.

GILBERT et al. v. HOWARD et al. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; E. B. Jones, Judge. Action by A. P. Gilbert and another against J. H. Howard and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed. Bramham & Brawley, for appellants. Fuller & Reade, Aycok & Winston, and Bryant & Brogden, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. We agree with counsel for appellants that the matter involved "is largely a question of construction and interpretation of the written agreement" between the parties. We further agree with counsel for appellees that, "when this case came before the court (147 N. C. 314, 61 S. E. 176) before, the contract sued on was interpreted" and the rights of the parties to it were determined. The matters presented on this appeal are entirely of fact, and in the trial we find no error.

MAUNEY v. UNITED STATES LEATHER CO. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 13, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Ferguson, Judge. Action by S. F. Mauney against the United States Leather Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed. Pless & Winborne and E. J. Justice, for appellant. Hudgins, Watson & Johnston, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The court is of opinion, on examination of the record in this appeal, that there is evidence of negligence to be submitted to the jury, and that the case was fairly presented by the judge in the court below. We find nothing in the record which warrants a new trial. No error.

NEWTON et al. v. BROWN et al. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 13, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Pender County; Lyon, Judge. Action by H. B. Newton and another against H. A. Brown, Jr., and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed. Mears & Ruark, Stevens, Beasley & Weeks, and J. T. Bland, for appellants. E. K. Bryan and C. E. McCullen, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs claimed title to the land in controversy by color and possession. Upon an examination of the record we find no error in his honor's rulings upon the evidence. The contested matters were largely of fact, and they were submitted to the jury in a charge following well-settled principles and free from error. No error.

WEBB v. W. M. RITTER LUMBER CO. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Caldwell County; Murphey, Judge. Action by J. B. Webb against the W. M. Ritter Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed. Jones & Whisnant, for appellant. W. C. Newland and M. N. Harshaw, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The court is of opinion, upon an examination of this case, that the matters involved are almost entirely of fact, and that no error was committed upon the trial. No error.

GAMBRELL et al. v. GAMBRELL et al. (Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.) Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge. Action by Henry Calvin Gambrell and others against Mrs. Lena Gambrell and others. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed. Martin & Earle, for appellants. Bonham, Watkins & Allen, for respondents.

WOODS, J. After careful consideration of the able and elaborate arguments of counsel, we are convinced that the reasoning of the circuit decree is sound, and its conclusions correct. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

RAY v. COUNTS. (Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 19, 1909.) Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County; B. W. Memminger, Judge. Action by F. M.

Ray against S. H. Counts. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. B. T. Rice, for appellant. S. G. Mayfield, for respondent.

WOODS, J. After careful consideration of the evidence and argument, we think the reasoning of the circuit judge is conclusive. His conclusions of law are in accord with the most recent decisions of this court on the subject. Moseley v. Witt, 79 S. C. 141, 60 S. E. 520; Lewis v. Cooley, 81 S. C. 461, 62 S. E. 868. This court adopts the decree of the circuit court, and affirms the judgment for the reasons therein stated.

LAMBERT v. PETERS. (Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 17, 1909.) Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond. Action by R. L. Peters against G. W. Lambert. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and remanded for new trial. Wm. L. Royall, for plaintiff in error. John A. Lamb, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This case was heard with the case of Lambert v. Phillips & Son, 64 S. E. 945, upon the same record, and involves the same questions. For the reasons stated in the opinion in that case, handed down at this term of the court, the judgment in this case must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in that opinion.

MURPHY v. MURPHY. (Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 23, 1909.) Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County. Divorce by Leota Grace Murphy against Lawrence D. Murphy. Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Reversed and rendered. James Watson and J. D. Cutlip, for appellant.

BRANNON, J. The circuit court of Wood county dismissed a bill for divorce filed by Leota Grace Murphy against Lawrence D. Murphy, based on adultery, and the wife appeals. No defense was made by the defendant. We think that the fact of adultery is sustained by proof of the actual act, and by proof by other witnesses of his visiting houses of ill fame and going to rooms with the female inmates and his having them in their night-clothes on his lap. We therefore reverse the decree of dismissal, and enter a decree that the bond of matrimony between Leota Grace Murphy and Lawrence D. Murphy be dissolved, and they be absolutely divorced from each other.

BRITT v. CAROLINA & N. R. CO. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. Fall Term, 1908.) Action by O. M. Britt against the Carolina & Northern Railroad Company. For former opinion, see 148 N. C. 37, 61 S. E. 601.

PER CURIAM. The defendant comes into court and declares that since the petition to rehear was docketed the cause of action has been settled and discharged, and asks leave to withdraw the petition to rehear. Thereupon it is ordered that the petition to rehear be dismissed without prejudice.
